A word or two more as to the exercise of jurisdiction over the Aroostook territory. The report of the land agent of the State to the Legislature of Maine, made on the 1st of January of the present year, informed that body that in April preceding he had gone upon the territory, and served process on certain persons there engaged in the cutting of timber; had broken up their encampments, and taken away their teams, &c. The report gave a very minute account of his proceedings. He had gone on again in October, for the same purpose, and with the same success. There he had met the British warden, Mr. McLaughlin, who offered no obstruction. The agent communicated to the warden all he had done, very particularly; and Mr. McLaughlin had then observed that he (Mr. McL.) had come there for the same purpose. There had been no harshness of language or feeling on either side. There was no collision, offered or threatened; and the result had been that the land agent expressed his conviction that there would be no resistance made to such proceedings as these, further than a formal protest to save the question of jurisdiction. These were the proceedings the last year; and was the Maine Boundary Question—Mr. Adams.

Ho. of Reps.

State now to be told that she must not do the same thing this year? that it was rash to do so? The depredations on timber during the present year had been enormous. What was the State to do in such an emergency? Submit quietly, or again attempt to arrest the plunderers? She sent her land agent again to do the same thing this year as she had done the last, and which she had then done without molestation. No attempt had then been made to stop his operations by British authority, and Maine had no reason to expect it now. She went with a civil force for civil purposes.

But what had taken place? The trespassers were strong handed; they had seized the agent, and transported him no one at first knew whither. Maine expected, and had a right to expect, that if he had been carried over the lines he would be immediately released. She had no reason to apprehend that the lawless acts of the trespassers would be adopted by the Government. But so far from her reasonable expectations being fulfilled, the land agent himself, and others who had been aiding him, have been imprisoned in the province of New Brunswick, and are held as high State offenders under the law of nations and of treaties. What next? Sir John Harvey sends a demand to Governor Fairfield that the American force shall be immediately withdrawn; that Maine shall no more attempt to arrest the operations of the trespassers, and shall utterly cease all jurisdiction and possession; and he bases his demand on the assumed agreement between the British and American Governments, that Great Britain shall retain exclusive possession of the territory until the disputed question of boundary should be finally settled. It has already been shown that there never had been such an agreement. It was an assumption without proof. The most that could be pretended was, that both parties should stand as they were until the question was determined. It was a new and a most audacious step; now for the first time taken by the British authorities, so far as regards the Aroostook territory. The announcement of such a claim was not, indeed, a new thing; but the practical attempt to enforce it by arms was new. This provincial Governor threatened an instant interference by the military forces of Great Britain. Was Maine to submit to this? Was she to cower before the threat? to abandon, to be driven back in ignominy and disgrace? Never! never!

Mr. E. said he should not argue the question of the right of Maine to the territory, and the whole territory. That had been solemnly affirmed by Congress. Congress had declared that Maine had a right to the soil as clear as daylight; and the message now asserts her right to judge of the exigency which calls for her interference. She has judged, and the case is therefore fully made out.

Gentlemen had pressed the great importance of preserving pacific relations with Great Britain. Mr. E. would go as far in honorably preserving those relations as any man. War had no charms for him. The question is, what is the best mode of preserving peace? Is it to yield to every indignity till, having been repeated, and repeated without resistance, they came at last to be claimed as matter of right—as matters of agreement? Is Maine now to be told that, if she raised a finger in support of her rights, the British arms are to be brought forth against her? Was that the way to preserve pacific relations between the two countries? Give Mr. E. leave to tell gentlemen that this identical crisis had been foreseen, foretold, and, in his opinion, had been brought upon us, by the neglect, if not by the pusillanimity, of the General Government.

Mr. HOWARD here asked leave to suggest, in the most respectful manner, to the honorable gentleman from Maine, whether it was for the honor and the interest of Maine, in this matter—whether it was wise in one of her Representatives—to introduce reflections of this kind against a past Administration, and thus lead off the attention of the House upon a collateral issue? He must, of course know, that such accusations would be met, and the House engage in a dispute which was wholly irrelevant. If the present Administration did what the gentleman approved, and had now taken the ground he supposed they ought to take, why go out of his way to attack an Administration now past? Mr. H. entertained great personal respect for the gentleman, and would suggest to him, in the most friendly manner that such reflections had better, on all accounts, be omitted.

Mr. EVANS said he was not now making accusations or attacks upon the course of the past Administration. That was not his object. He had done so at the last session, and had vainly endeavored to rouse a sense of justice in the House. His object was to show that Maine had not been rash in this matter, and to express his firm conviction that if Maine had been then treated as she ought to have been, this crisis would never have occurred. Had the bill which Mr. E. introduced, and against which the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HOWARD] had set himself in determined opposition, been passed, this difficulty never would have taken place. He had shown how cruelly Maine had been aggrieved, and had pointed out a practical, pacific, and effectual remedy; but the House had refused to adopt it. He did not say this for the sake of complaining, or accusing anybody; but he wished to fix the truth deeply and strongly on the minds of gentlemen, so that justice may at length be done, and peace hereafter preserved, if the present crisis be safely passed.

If any still thought that the State had taken a rash step, they have not looked into the history of the fact; they have not reflected on the repeated indignities she has endured from the subordinates of a foreign Government, and which she had in vain endeavored to induce their own Government to repel. Things had now reached that point that nothing was left her but either to surrender at once, or to stand for her rights like men. I cannot forbear again to advert to the bill of last session. What was the reason it did not then pass? Was it not because a new negotiation was then on foot? This was in June; and yet, had not this House been told in December, that not one word had passed between the two Governments in the matter since? And, within a few days, have they not again been told that nothing has yet been done? Our Government had pressed its negotiation, I trust, but in vain.

He considered then, all this talk about new preliminaries of new negotiations as intended merely to amuse the State, and induce her to remain passive a little longer. There was, in fact, no negotiation going on. It had, practically, been suspended now for six years. Had not the President himself told the House that the question of boundary was at this moment further from being settled than it had been at the close of the Revolution? Had not Maine waited long enough? She thought so. All her people thought so; and the ground she had taken she would occupy. If Sir John Harvey had formed a similar determination, collision was inevitable; and every thinking man must admit the exigency to be great. It calls for prompt and wise action. Any expectation of amicable arrangement, founded on longer procrastination, was out of the question. If any gentleman thought that it would be enough for the General Government to tell the State of Maine that something should be done, but she must, in the mean time, wait, and be very quiet, they deceived themselves. Maine would do no such thing; could do no such thing. The crisis was one which called for action; and such action as should satisfy the world that Maine was not to be left to manage this matter alone. The very idea that she would be so left by the General Government had done more than anything else to push this aggression to its present height. The British Government were under the impression that Maine was abandoned by the Government of the United States. Mr. E. had read in the Albion, a very respectable English paper published in this country, an expression of the utmost confidence that the whole proceeding of Maine would be formally disavowed by the American Government, and that she would be left to fight out her puny battle on her own resources. Such delusion must be dispelled. I warn gentlemen not to permit so fatal an error to go abroad. Let our conduct show that it is a preposterous error. Mr. E. trusted that the American Congress would now say to the world that it was their affair, and they would maintain it as becomes the honor of their country. What ought to be done Mr. E. would not now pretend to say; he left that to those around him, in whose wisdom and experience and patriotism he had the fullest confidence.

Mr. ADAMS now rose to speak, when Mr. PETRIKIN demanded the previous question.

[Cries of "No!" "No!" "Withdraw it!" "Withdraw it!" from all quarters of the House.]

Mr. P., after some hesitation, withdrew the motion.

Mr. ADAMS then said that he had but a very few words to say, and would occupy the House but a very few minutes. [Go on!] He assured the House that he entirely concurred in almost every word of what had just been said by the honorable gentleman from Maine.

The SPEAKER here desired many members, who had gathered round Mr. A.'s seat, to resume their places. Order being restored,

Mr. ADAMS repeated the declaration that he concurred heartily in almost every word that had just been uttered by the gentleman from Maine. If in anything he fell short, it was in this, that he was willing to wipe out even from his memory that part of the course of the Administration which the gentleman had censured. He was willing to forget that, in consideration of the pledge given in the message that the rights of Maine and of Massachusetts, and all else respecting this matter which the United States had a right to demand, would be pressed by the Executive power.

But Mr. A. had risen chiefly in consequence of one word in the message which related to the State of Maine. From the single reading at the Clerk's table, which was all the opportunity Mr. A. had had to learn its contents, he was not quite sure that he had distinctly understood the passage to which he wished now to refer. He only desired that the Committee on Foreign Affairs should ascertain whether his impression, which he would now state, was correct, and, if it were, that they would apply the necessary remedy. Concurring as he did in the general tenor of the message, as perfectly expressive of a determination on the part of the Executive Government to maintain inviolate the rights of the nation, still there was also in it a tenor of advice, of counsel, to the State of Maine, in regard to which Mr. A. would confess he should have been more satisfied if the message had not been quite so conciliatory, to use no harsher term. He referred to the counsel given to Maine by the President, to retract what she had done; and this not on the ground of its being considered the action of the Executive Government of the United States. This appeared to Mr. A. very much like putting the responsibility of all that had been done upon Maine alone; and it appeared further to authorize that State to do what Mr. A. doubted greatly that she had any constitutional power to do, viz: to make an arrangement with the Governor of New Brunswick, founded on mutual explanations. It proposed, in fact, a negotiation between Maine and New Brunswick, to which the United States Government was not to be a party. Mr. A. had risen simply to request an examination of the papers by the Committee on Foreign Affairs; he desired that that committee should scrutinize these communications, to see if that was the recommendation given; and if it was, then he should think it was the duty of the House to recommend to the President that he would appoint some person to act for the United States in this advised accommodation.

It seemed to Mr. A. that the President had recommended Maine to negotiate with New Brunswick for a compromise, thus throwing the responsibility on the State of Maine which ought to be assumed by the President of the United States. It was, he believed, a new thing in constitutional history, that a President of the United States, having here, resident at the seat of Government, the Minister of a foreign Power, with whom he might at any time hold communication, should correspond with a distant part of the Union on a point at issue between that distant portion of the Union and an adjacent portion of the dominions of the foreign Power represented by that Minister, and say to her, "settle this matter between yourselves; you had better do what to you shall seem best about it; consider the great danger that must attend a state of warfare, and make it up between yourselves."

And besides, it did appear to Mr. A., from the tone of the correspondence which had taken place between the Governors of Maine and New Brunswick, that they were not exactly the parties who were in a temper fit to settle a disputed national question between themselves, without any representative of the General Government to stand by Maine in the arrangement. This seemed, on the part of the Government, the assumption of a sort of neutral position. He hoped no such thing was intended; he hoped he had not correctly understood the matter; but that the letter of Mr. Forsyth to the Governor of Maine would be thoroughly examined, and, if it contained no such idea, that the Committee on Foreign Affairs would so report to the House, or else that they would have an understanding with the Executive, so that all danger from that quarter might be removed.

Mr. CRARY here moved the previous question; but the House refused to second it—ayes 48, noes 89.

Mr. LINCOLN said that the peculiar position which he had occupied in relation to one of the States most immediately and directly interested would not permit him to remain silent during the discussion of a subject so deeply important to the country. It was this intrinsic importance of the subject which alone induced him to throw himself upon the indulgence of the House for some remarks which naturally grew out of the position which his State might seem to occupy in this matter before the country.

Mr. L. stated that an appeal had been made to the Executive by the State of Massachusetts on the very point now in controversy; and it could not have escaped the observation of every member how that appeal had been responded to. Possibly some misapprehension might have grown out of the manner in which the appeal in question had been met. This was no new subject of complaint with that people, or with their Government. It had been his painful duty, for years, to contemplate it as one of the most unpleasant portions of his public concern. There had been a former period when the peace of the country was as much threatened as at present; at that time, one of the citizens of the United States had been taken from his own dwelling, (from what the law declared to be his castle,) and carried off like a felon, and incarcerated in a British prison. As great a degree of excitement had pervaded the public mind then as now. It had then been Mr. L.'s lot to participate in the great responsibility of those counsels, which, in the good providence of God, had proved instrumental in preserving the national peace; and possibly from this very reason he could not but anticipate at present a like favorable issue. He had listened with unminged satisfaction to the language of the official communication which had just been laid before the House; and he did believe that, if the sentiments and the temper which marked that executive message should influence the counsels of the two Houses of Congress, all danger of a rupture of the public peace would be happily removed.

Were it proper to go into a view of the causes which had led to the existing difficulties, it would not be difficult to justify the ground taken by our own Government in regard to the disputed territory. There could not remain a doubt in the mind of any reasonable being that the rectitude of the claims of the State of Maine to the possession of that territory, as an integral portion of her soil, were beyond all just controversy. Nobody who would look into the facts could doubt that the true boundary line between that State and the adjacent British possessions was as clearly defined on the actual face of the country as it was in the language of the treaty of 1783. But while he held most strongly that the right of Maine to the jurisdiction of this portion of her territory was irrefragable, still he could not but think that a little more forbearance on her part would better have comported with the dictates of sound discretion and enlightened patriotism. He believed that the State of Maine would discredit her own wisdom, violate her own interest, and do injustice to the patriotism of the nation, if she should refuse a little longer to forbear, in the hope that the last fatal resort for the redress of national grievances might be avoided. What was the cause of the present discussion? An attempt to exercise jurisdiction over a portion of country, in regard to which there might have been on either side a misconception as to the right of the other party. Was it a strange thing that such a misconception should exist? Was this a matter to be wondered at, when for ten consecutive years it had been a debatable subject, each nation claiming jurisdiction over the same portion of the soil? In 1832, the Secretary of State of the United States addressed an official communication to the States of Maine and Massachusetts, demanding of them an account of their reasons for an encroachment by their respective agents on this very territory—a letter from no less distinguished and temperate an individual than Louis McLane, inquiring how it came to pass that a land agent of the State of Massachusetts was found on the waters of the Aroostook. Now, if the Government of our own country could feel itself justified in asking such a question, was it very marvelous that some misconception on the same subject should exist on the part of the British Government.

Mr. L. hoped he should not be misconceived for a moment. He intimated no doubt, for he had no doubt, as to the justice of the claims of the State of Maine; he admitted them to their utmost extent; and he would sacrifice all that was dear to himself, and much that was dear to the country, before he would consent she should give up one iota of her demand, in submission to the claim of a foreign Government. And he would now say, in behalf of his own State, although she had not buckled on her armor at the indication of her sister, she would be none the less true to her, and none the less firm in defending her and her rights, when it became necessary that she should place herself by her side in the front of battle.

In 1833, this British land agent, McLaughlin, preferred the same claims as he did now; and Mr. L. held in his hand a document which would show that his claims were then as much a ground of complaint and remonstrance on the part of Massachusetts.

The extent of these pretensions might be gathered from the representations made by Mr. McLaughlin, subscribing himself "Warden of the disputed territory," in a communication addressed to Sir Archibald Campbell, under date of the 28th of September, 1833; from which Mr. L. read the following extract:

"Since I have the honor of the appointment of Warden of the territory, I have endeavored, as much as possible, to prevent trespasses being made by the cutting of pine timber, &c., and which, I am happy to say, has been generally effected, as it is well known that there are now large quantities still standing adjacent to the line, from Mar's hill to the Great falls; which would otherwise have been removed."

"The subject to which I must now beg the honor to call the attention of your Excellency, is that of an infringement of the understanding between the Government of Great Britain and the United States, during the settlement of the question of boundary, by the land agents of the States of Massachusetts and Maine, who are not only holding out inducements to the subjects of both countries to cut pine timber on the territory in my charge, by paying them a duty of two shillings and six pence per ton, but have entered into contracts for opening two roads to intersect, one fifty miles from its confluence with the St. John, and the other thirty miles; both of which are either to be completed this fall or early in the next season."

"It is unnecessary, and probably might be considered improper on my part, to advert to the conduct of these agents; but your Excellency must be well aware of the trouble it occasions in the performance of my duty; and certainly there does appear something exceedingly inconsistent that the land agents of these States should attempt to counteract the wishes—nay, I may almost say, the instructions—of both Governments to an officer who has been appointed to prevent collision between them."

This representation had been made (said Mr. L.) the occasion of a demand, by Mr. McLane, of an explanation from the Governor of Massachusetts of the exercise of a right of supervision over the property of the Commonwealth in the disputed territory, in the following language:

"Sir: I have the honor to transmit, by the direction of the President, a copy of a note from Sir Charles R. Vaughan, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of his Britannic Majesty, dated the 20th instant, accompanied by a copy of a letter from Sir Archibald Campbell, Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, to Sir Charles R. Vaughan, and also of a letter from Lieutenant J. A. McLaughlin to Sir Archibald Campbell, complaining of the conduct of certain land agents of the States of Maine and Massachusetts in the territory in dispute between the United States and Great Britain. I am instructed to state that it would be a source of regret to the President should this complaint prove to be well founded; and in causing it to be communicated to your Excellency, it is his earnest wish that the necessary steps may be promptly taken by the proper authorities of Massachusetts to enforce a due obedience to the terms of the existing arrangement between the Government of the United States and that of Great Britain in regard to the disputed territory."

There was something more than an admission of a concurrent jurisdiction on the part of Great Britain; a taking to task, even, of the Executive of Massachusetts for interposing a preventive authority for the protection of the property in the lands. The Secretary of State of the United States alludes "to the terms of the existing arrangement;" an arrangement which, if it means anything, must have reference to the "wardenship" of the territory claimed by McLaughlin, and made the subject of Sir Archibald Campbell's communication. It was true (continued Mr. L.) this claim of British jurisdiction, now for the first time distinctly put forth, was not submitted to by the Government of Massachusetts. The wardenship of the territory by the British agent was resisted; and, in the most earnest language of remonstrance, the Federal Government was admonished that it would not be recognized by the Government of the State. To show the opinion then entertained of this extraordinary claim, Mr. L. said he would take the liberty to read the protest made by the Executive of Massachusetts to the Secretary of State against any such pretension.

Mr. L. then read from a letter of the Governor of Massachusetts to Mr. McLane, under date of November 1, 1833, the following extract:

"I cannot but earnestly protest against the authority of any appointment on the behalf of His Majesty's Government, which may be regarded as a claim to the exclusive protection of this property, or be deemed an acquiescence, on the part of the United States, in interference, under color of a wardenship of the disputed territory, with that direction to its improvement which the governments of Massachusetts and Maine, respectively, may see fit to give to their agents. The rights of soil and jurisdiction over it are in the States, and forbearance to the exercise of these rights for a season, from mere prudential considerations, a respectful regard to the wishes of the General Government, or comity towards a foreign nation, is not to be construed into a readiness to surrender them upon the issue of any proposed negotiation."

Also, an extract from an executive communication of the Governor of Massachusetts to Mr. McLane, under date of November 15, 1833:

"No occasion has been given, on the part of the government of Massachusetts, for the representations transmitted to you by his Majesty's Minister; but, on the other hand, that there is cause to remark that his Majesty's officers of the Province of New Brunswick, by the seizure and sale of timber cut by trespassers on the Aroostook, and afterwards in the rightful custody of the agent of this Commonwealth, have been the first to violate the existing understanding upon the subject. Indeed, sir, the unsettled state of the question of boundary is daily becoming more and more embarrassing to the exercise of the unquestionable right of property with us. The most desirable improvements of the country are repressed, and the settlement and cultivation of an extensive and valuable territory altogether prevented. A spirit of dissatisfaction and irritation is increasing between the border inhabitants of the State and Province respectively, and there is reason to apprehend that the governments of Massachusetts and Maine will find it as difficult to forego much longer jurisdiction over the property as to deny to their citizens their urgent demand for its occupation and enjoyment."

Here was evidence both of a claim to jurisdiction on the one hand, and a direct protest on the other, against the act of the British authorities in appointing a warden, as he was denominated, who should interfere to prevent the improvement of the territory, or interfere in any manner with the property of Maine or of Massachusetts. Yet, from the year 1833 to 1839, this warden had been maintained in office by the British Government. And now it was held that an act naturally enough consequent upon his appointment was a just foundation for a declaration of war; and this without allowing any opportunity for explanation.

Mr. L. could not believe that war was at all necessary. If the jurisdiction was proved to be in the United States, it must result from the line of boundary as described in the treaty of 1783. This was to be settled in its practical application upon a survey and an appeal to the monuments, both natural and artificial, which clearly defined the course of that line as intended by the treaty.

It did not become Mr. L. to question the motives, nor perhaps the wisdom of the measures, on the part of the State of Maine, which had led the country into the present exigency; but it did occur to him, as the Representative of a State deeply interested in the issue, that we ought not at once to rush into the conflict; and he must be permitted to say that the measures taken by the Executive Government of Maine were not such as were best calculated to effect a settlement of the question consistently with the peace of the nation. Had the Governor or the Legislature of that State directed a different course to be pursued, should we now have been met by the threatening language and the military array of the British authorities? To capture a few, or even many trespassers, was it necessary to carry into this disputed territory two hundred bayonets and a six-pounder? Certainly, this would furnish to a jealous opponent some little ground to suspect that the object was something other than to capture trespassers who were stealing logs and dragging them over the lines. And if, in consequence, there had been a military array called out to meet this show of force on our part, might it not have been the result of misunderstanding, which a little temperate explanation would remove? It was obvious that the two parties had mutually mistaken the intentions of each other; and it was but reasonable to entertain a hope that the difficulty might be compromised.

Mr. L. observed that, in this matter, he acted under a higher responsibility than some gentlemen in that House; and this made him the more forward in making the suggestion that it was best to forbear and to conciliate. He rejoiced the subject was proposed to be sent to a committee on which there was a Representative from the State of Massachusetts.

The present Governor of Massachusetts, in his late message, had manifested a high-minded regard to the interest and the honor of the State. He was possessed of intelligence quite adequate to a just apprehension of the whole subject, while in his firmness, coolness, and enlightened patriotism, all would confide; and he had declared that, after the subject had been referred to the General Government, if an appeal should be made to Massachusetts, she stood ready to lend her whole force to the maintenance of the national rights and honor. Massachusetts had preferred taking counsel of the wisdom of this legislative body, rather than of the excited feelings of those whose vicinity to the scene excluded, in some degree, that calm, collected, and dispassionate view of the whole subject which the crisis so eminently demanded. Mr. L. invoked for her course, on this occasion, a calm and considerate judgment. He had risen that it might be seen that at least one Representative from a region more especially interested in the controversy, was willing to commend to the House and the nation a spirit of conciliation and forbearance.

Mr. CUSHING said that, in the present stage of this business, he had but a very few remarks to make; and in what he wished to say he should endeavor to feel admonished of the extreme tenderness of the question, and of the critical position of the country.

He could not enter into the merits of the controversy between the United States and Great Britain, in regard to the northeastern boundary. He could not condescend to debate any further that point. The United States has already discussed it too long; or, if there was to be any more discussion of that point, this House was not the place for it. This House had, in common with the Senate, unanimously adopted a resolution affirming, in the most ample terms, the territorial rights of Maine and Massachusetts; the resolution of the House being in the following emphatic words:

Resolved, That after a careful examination and deliberate investigation of the whole controversy between the United States and Great Britain, relative to the northeastern boundary of the former, the House of Representatives do not entertain a doubt of the entire practicability of running and marking that boundary in strict conformity with the stipulations of the definitive treaty of peace of 1783; and entertain a perfect conviction of the justice and validity of the title of the United States to the full extent of all the territory in dispute between the two Powers.<sup>22</sup>

With which resolution before us, he should consider it indecorous, and a needless waste of time, to reopen that question here before this House.

But I desire (said Mr. C.) to call the attention of gentlemen to the precise merits of the new and incidental question which has now grown up, that the true state of the facts may be understood in all quarters, misapprehensions corrected, and the responsibility for the result rest with Great Britain, where it justly belongs.

Neither the House nor the country, it seems to me, is fully alive to the delicacy of the relations of Great Britain and the United States at this moment. The message, as suggested by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. EVANS,] does not, on the face of it, seem to indicate a full perception of this, or come up to the apparent exigency; though reasons of State may have called for and may justify some suppression in this respect on the part of the President.

But how stands the fact? We have these threatening events in the Northeast, and these new pretensions of the colonial authorities of Great Britain, to show what is doing there. How is it in the North? We have heard much of the success of a distinguished pacificator in restoring a peaceful state of things there; but the fires of indignation along that whole line, which the misuse of Great Britain and the misconduct of the ruling party in Upper and Lower Canada have awakened, are smothered, not extinguished; and it needs but the touch of a spark to rekindle them into a devouring flame, to spread like lightning from Maine to Michigan. In the Northwest we find Great Britain tampering with the Indians under our jurisdiction; keeping them in her pay; subsidizing them; supplying them with munitions of war; preparing them, as of old, to dash upon our frontier settlements, and to subject these anew to all the horrors of savage warfare. How is it in the West? Is not the whole of the vast country in and beyond the Rocky Mountains intruded upon and usurped by the subjects of Great Britain? And, as if the British Government did not mean that any part of the United States should want cause of offense against it, we find it striking a deadly stab at the dearest of the vital interests of the whole South.

Under these circumstances, while I deprecate angry collision on the northeastern frontier as deeply as any one can, yet I tell gentlemen it behooves them to look over the whole ground. Unless the all-grasping spirit of universal encroachment on the part of Great Britain be arrested, either by moderation in her councils, or by fear, the time must and will come, when her power and ours cannot coexist on the continent of North America. And I say this, that the House may duly appreciate the importance of the present contingency.

Now, in regard to this controversy, I shall exclude, so far as possible, all expression of the natural feelings of indignation which the pretension of Great Britain is calculated to awaken. That pretension is the monstrous one that the treaty of peace of 1783 was a grant or concession by Great Britain to the United States; that it was a deed of land from her to us; and whenever doubts arise concerning its import, the construction is to be in favor of the grantor; and that we, the people of the United States, hold the soil on which we dwell, not by the colonization and settlement of it which our forefathers accomplished at their own hazard, not by inheritance, derived from that generation to the succeeding one, not by the victories of the Revolution and by conquests on the field of battle, but by mere grant and concession from the favor of Great Britain. The same pretension she undertakes to apply to all the rights appertaining to the soil and sovereignty of the United States, such as the fisheries and the navigation and use of the seas adjoining North America. So that, whenever Great Britain chooses to lay claim to any part of the United States, no matter how groundless and scandalous may be the claim, no matter if the tract of country she sets up a claim to, be, and always has been, occupied by us, at that instant, on the mere setting up of the claim, her right as the ancient sovereign of the United States is revived, and she is to be intended to be in the possession, constructively, of the country claimed, and, though not in fact having the possession, is to be suffered to take possession of it, and to exercise exclusive jurisdiction over it until she may choose to give up her claim; converting us, the people of the United States, as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] truly suggests to me, into the mere tenants at will of Great Britain. That is the point on which this present controversy, this claim on the part of Great Britain to the exclusive possession of the valley of the Aroostook, hinges.

This pretension was, for the first time, asserted by Sir Charles Vaughan, in 1827, in a letter to Mr. Clay. He said:

"The territory is still in dispute; the sovereignty and jurisdiction over that country have consequently remained with Great Britain, it having been in the occupation and possession of the Crown previously to the conclusion of the treaty of 1783."

Mr. Clay indignantly repudiated the idea that whatever territory in North America Great Britain claims, she is to be regarded as having occupation and possession of constructively, as the mother country, and demanded that

"The Government of New Brunswick should cease from the exercise of all and every act of exclusive jurisdiction within the disputed territory, until the question of right is settled."

Our Minister in Great Britain was instructed to meet and rebut this pretension in the most decisive terms. He did so. It was attempted to be maintained by the Earl of Aberdeen in behalf of Great Britain, with the weapons of diplomatic chicanery and old mother country insolence, which belonged to such a pretension; for it is indeed a point impossible to be yielded by the United States; it is vital to our very independence; we might as well return to colonial vassalage again at once, as give up the assertion of our coequal independence, and of the coequal rights of soil flowing from it, which is the fundamental principle of the treaty of peace.

Now for the application of this principle. From 1783 to 1816, no mortal man heard of a claim of Great Britain covering the valley of the Aroostook. The whole of the claim, indeed, to the disputed territory, so called, is a progeny of the war of 1815. It is a belligerent device—the attempt to get possession of a tract of country lying between New Brunswick and Lower Canada. What is not hers by right, and what she could not obtain by conquest or purchase, she has endeavored to obtain by diplomacy. The claim itself is groundless and absurd; but, making the claim, she proceeds to claim the possession also, by virtue of the pretension I have stated. On no other ground can Sir John Harvey undertake to exercise exclusive jurisdiction on the Aroostook. The lands there are held under grants of Massachusetts or Maine, going back more than thirty years. The governments of Massachusetts and Maine have had jurisdiction there down to the present time, surveying the land, giving permits to cut timber, removing trespassers and the like, just as upon lands within the undisputed limits of Maine. The exclusive jurisdiction of New Brunswick in this region has never been asserted and enforced as against Maine. For it is to be remembered that this dispute has happened on the Aroostook. The arrest of individual citizens of Maine, which have heretofore taken place, have been in the Madawaska country. The Madawaska is a northerly branch of the St. Johns, the Aroostook a southerly one, and the valley of the latter is in the southernmost portion of the disputed territory, which the King of the Netherlands assigned to the United States. I suppose it is on this account that Great Britain has practiced more forbearance in regard to the Aroostook than the Madawaska, and in the former has refrained hitherto from the attempts to enforce exclusive jurisdiction, which she has practiced in the latter. At any rate, the House will admit Great Britain has no right of exclusive jurisdiction; that her claim of right is founded on a pretension utterly and palpably untenable; that she has neither right of exclusive possession, nor exclusive possession in fact.

Has the Government of the United States made any agreement conferring on her the right (temporarily or otherwise) to the exclusive possession of this territory? I shall not go back to cast reflections on the Government of the United States. It has, in my judgment, much atoned for past error by the decision of its present course. A new crisis has arrived. I stand upon the correspondence between Mr. Forsyth and Mr. Fox, to which this affair has given rise. Whatever misconception there may have been concerning this, on the part of any officer of the British Government, or in this country, there is, at any rate, no such agreement. Great Britain can plead misconception no longer. She must now enter upon a new course of measures. She has not exercised hitherto exclusive or forcible jurisdiction on the Aroostook; she must now cease to claim the right to do so hereafter, under this pretended agreement, which the United States never made. And the conclusion to which I come on the whole matter is this: the understanding actually had has either been misconceived, or willfully misinterpreted, by the British authorities or officers in America. It does not seem even to have been so understood in England. At the very outset of the affair, in 1827, the proposal for an understanding, it appears, came from Mr. Canning, who "suggested the propriety of abstaining on both sides, pending the suit, from any act of sovereignty over the contested territory." Here is the suggestion of the understanding. And whatever statements of it occur in the correspondence of the subordinate functionaries of the two Governments from that time to this, I have a remarkable declaration, made by Lord Palmerston, the present Foreign Secretary, in a debate in the House of Commons, on the 24th April, 1837, as I find it reported in the London Times:

"Sir R. Peel said: Is the province of Maine in the occupation of any part of the disputed territory?"

"Lord Palmerston replied: The disputed territory, or at any rate the greater part of it, is in our occupation at present, upon the understanding that neither we nor any other party, shall exercise any of the rights belonging to permanent territorial sovereignty."

"Sir R. Peel. I do not see how any arrangement of that sort can be made. The land must be occupied by one party or the other. Is it occupied entirely by British subjects?"

"Lord Palmerston. It is not settled at all at present; it is occupied by vast forests of wood, and it is understood that neither party is to cut the wood until the differences are settled in one way or the other."

These two declarations are each very different from that of Sir John Harvey, who undertakes an assertion by force of exclusive jurisdiction, not only unsupported by, but in direct opposition to the declaration of Lord Palmerston. In resisting this pretension of Sir John Harvey, the Government of Maine is right, as he is wholly wrong in making the pretension. It is a pretension which cannot and will not be tolerated by the United States.

In regard to the conduct of the government of Maine, there is one important consideration to be borne in mind. There is a question of State rights at the bottom of this. I have heard it denied whether Maine had any constitutional power to do what she has done. Such is not my reading of the Constitution. Each State has an indefeasible right to the integrity of her territory, which the United States cannot curtail but with her consent. Each State has an indefeasible right to defend the integrity in arms, if need be, by her own force, if that of the United States be not at hand. Struck, she must and should strike. Such is the sacred right of self-preservation, sanctified by the great charter of the Union, and by the first principles of human action, which are superior to all the constitutions on earth. The Constitution contains the following clause:

"No State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any duty of tonnage, keep troops or ships of war in time of peace, enter into any agreement or compact with another State or with a foreign Power, or engage in war, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent danger as will not admit of delay."

I shall not inquire whether the Governor and Legislature of Maine did or not start in the best possible manner. That is a question passed. The wheel of time has rolled over it, and, in the progress of events, we have reached another and a graver issue. Sir John Harvey is in the act of invading the State of Maine, and invading it under pretensions which neither the peace nor the honor of the United States can tamely endure. The State of Maine possesses, under these circumstances, full constitutional power to arm in her own defense, and to withstand and repel hostile invasion. The power is expressly given to her by the Constitution; and herein, at least, the law is not silent amid the din of arms. She had the power, and she has judged, as she might and must, whether or not the exigency had arrived for the exercise of the power; and, having armed herself, has invoked the aid of the Federal Government in defense of the integrity of her own soil and that of the United States.

Of the part which it now becomes the duty of Congress to perform, I shall say nothing at present, because I do not wish to anticipate or prejudge the action either of the Committee on Foreign Affairs or of the House.

Mr. PICKENS rose and said he desired to trespass for as short a time as possible upon the attention of the House. The subject under their consideration was painfully delicate and deeply interesting. He desired to say nothing that would precipitate us, directly or indirectly, into that which all wise men would like to avoid. Mr. P. regretted that gentlemen had thought it necessary to go into the details of the past history of this controversy; he would rather avoid that at present. He had listened with profound attention to what had fallen from the venerable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] and he entirely agreed with him in one observation particularly, and that was, that at present he was willing to "forget the past." It was a remark full of wisdom and patriotism. He also desired to forbear an examination or censure of what had occurred in the progress of this unpleasant controversy. Mr. P. would prefer to meet the present state of the question—to stand upon the issues now made—and act under the circumstances with which we were surrounded. The gentleman [Mr. ADAMS] had observed that he understood the message of the President, now before us, made a proposition to leave the adjustment of this controversy to the governments of Maine and New Brunswick, &c. In this he thought the gentleman had misunderstood the message.

Mr. P. had had no opportunity of judging its contents, except by the hasty reading given of it by the Clerk at the desk; and he had conversed with no gentleman as to its substance; but he understood that part which the gentleman referred to as rather advising and expressing a hope that both the Governors of Maine and New Brunswick might pause, and that those who had been captured on both sides might be mutually released, and that the militia ordered out might be peaceably disbanded. It was rather an expression of desire that things might take this direction, and the affair be terminated, than leaving it, as was supposed, to New Brunswick and Maine to settle and adjust it. This was his understanding of that part of the message.

But the gentleman [Mr. ADAMS] had pronounced the message too pacific for him. Now, the pacific tendency of it (if it were so) was to him (Mr. P.) its highest recommendation. He thought it was due to the dignity of the matters involved that it should be pacific. He could see no objection to its pacific character at present. He deprecated the allusions made to the probability of war; we should move with delicacy on that point. He had listened with deep pain to that portion of the remarks of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. EVANS] which intimated that, if the President supposed that peace could be preserved, he was mistaken. The gentleman had said it was now too late for that, for the conflict of arms had already taken place, in all probability, on the frontier. He hoped and trusted that in this the gentleman was mistaken. Others had made similar remarks.

He earnestly desired that peace might be preserved; and he had no doubt it could be. Imbecility and indecision now, at this juncture, would bring war; but decision and firmness would preserve peace and our honor too. As to the controversy of the past, he would desire to say but little; he would, however, take this occasion to say that he had examined it, and, as to the question of the location of the true line, under the treaty of 1783, there was not a jury of twelve men, even in England, who, under oath, could refuse us a verdict upon the facts of the case; it was a question too clear for controversy. And as to the possession of the particular section of country where the conflict had taken place, it had for thirty years been settled by our citizens under grants from Massachusetts. The pretensions of exclusive jurisdiction set up by Great Britain arose from the ground that she considered our sovereignty as commencing only from the Declaration of Independence or the treaty of peace; and that, therefore, in all disputed territory, she would exercise jurisdiction from the claims of prior sovereignty. This, Mr. P. considered rather a fiction. The treaty of 1783 was signed by independent equals.

He would here say in the past Maine had been wronged—deeply wronged—by whom he would not now say; but he would say she had also wronged herself.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] had alluded to other points of difficulty between us and Great Britain, and to one in which the South was vitally interested. Yes; he held in his hand the correspondence recently published between the British Cabinet, through Lord Palmerston, with our Minister and Government; it related to the vessels that had been driven by storm upon the coast of Bermuda, with slaves from this section of country, destined for New Orleans, and which had been seized by the British authorities and liberated.

The SPEAKER intimated that it was not in order.

Mr. PICKENS said he did not intend to discuss it. The British Cabinet, in this correspondence, had taken the ground distinctly, and so communicated it to our Government, that they could not, under any circumstances, recognize the right of property in persons. They had consequently, in the case of one of the vessels, (the Enterprise,) positively refused indemnity, because it happened after their act of emancipation to the West India Islands.

Mr. P. had perused this correspondence with the deepest indignation. The Government had, by it, set up the right to decide for us in what our property should consist. It struck a high-handed blow at our independence. But he would forbear to pursue the subject, and only say that, rather than submit to its arrogant assumptions, he would prefer to see the country, from the Patapsco to the Sabine, laid low in one smoking ruin. This was one amongst the many points at issue between us and Great Britain, to which the gentleman [Mr. CUSHING] had alluded. The controversy on the northeastern boundary had presented a tangible issue before us, and, he thought, the more decided the movements were, the better for the peace of the two countries. He thought the strong military movements of Maine, if conducted with judgment, would tend to prevent conflict; that if only small numbers on both sides, and equally divided, were to meet, there would be greater danger of conflict of arms. He, therefore, differed from the gentleman from Massachusetts furthest from him [Mr. LINCOLN] in his censure upon the Governor of Maine in his call for a strong armed force.

Mr. LINCOLN said that Mr. P. had misunderstood him; that he referred to the first movement to drive off trespassers, and merely said that that was a military movement.

Mr. PICKENS was glad to understand this from the gentleman; and what he intended to advance was, that the most decided movements at this juncture would be, in the end, the most peaceable. He deprecated anything that might finally tend to war between us and Great Britain; he hoped there would be no occasion to make that last sad appeal. But if it was to be forced upon us, he would pledge his all upon the contest. In this matter, to a transient observer, at first sight, Maine might seem to be alone interested; but we are all bound together under a sacred compact; we belong to a common Confederacy, and have a common country; and although I represent a remote section, yet the cause of Maine is our cause. And if war must come, (which may God in His mercy avert!) although it would be desolating in its effects to my section of country, yet we had met such events before. Our treasure had been advanced, and our blood shed, in a war for those who were remote from us; we could do it again, notwithstanding their unkindness to us. Not only does our honor call in the present case, but it is so "nominated in the bond;" and dreadful as its effects may be upon my country, yet you shall cut from me the "pound of flesh," although it should take from my heart the last "drop of blood." The crisis calls for prudent, wise, firm councils. Mr. P. regretted that some gentlemen seemed to speak as if war was certain. He did not think so. He judged from the message and papers now before us that there would be no permanent conflict. He felt assured that the interests of the two countries were deeply identified in peace, and their wisdom and justice would preserve it.

Maine Boundary Question—Mr. Everett.

But if we were to be dragged into a war, the world should know that we would go into it as one man.

Mr. SERGEANT said he had but a very few words to say. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. EVANS] had made a remark he (Mr. S.) did not assent to; though, in other respects, that gentleman had shown that he thoroughly understood this subject, and that he felt it as deeply as he understood it. The remark was to this effect: that the Executive of the United States did not seem to comprehend the exigency of the occasion, nor to have acted up to it. If this remark were applied to the past, I do not know that I should differ much from the gentleman from Maine. I do believe—nay, I am fully convinced—that, for some years past, the various exigencies which have arisen, or been threatened, in relation to this matter, however obvious, have not been looked at as carefully, nor acted upon as energetically, by the Government here in Washington, as they ought to have been; and hence it has happened (as any one who will trace the history of this controversy may readily perceive) that, for ten years past, the British Government and its officers have, unfortunately, been allowed to take up errors at our expense, until at last they have endeavored to persuade themselves of one great and ruinous error, the immediate cause of our present difficulty and danger. It is this: that there has been an understanding, or a sort of agreement or compact, of some sort or other, express or implied, by which, pending the controversy in relation to the boundary line, they were to have exclusive jurisdiction over the disputed territory. To that error the exigency of the present occasion (too striking and serious to escape observation) has drawn the attention of the Executive, and he has corrected it; and, with it, he has corrected the Governor of New Brunswick, and taken from that officer the whole ground on which he stood; for, if I understand him correctly, the Governor of New Brunswick justifies himself entirely on the ground that there is an agreement between the United States and his country, by which the latter is to have exclusive jurisdiction over this territory. That, then, is precisely and distinctly contradicted in the message of the President; and henceforward the Government of the United States takes the ground that Maine has taken, namely, that no such jurisdiction exists. I believe thoroughly that there is not, and has not been, any such agreement or understanding. It is impossible. I believe it, not only on the high authority of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. LINCOLN,] but on authority which I find in our own history.

Eleven years ago there was a correspondence on the same subject between the then Secretary of State, Mr. Clay, and Sir Charles Vaughan, the British Minister here. Looking to that, you will find no allusion, even to such an understanding; but the Minister of England takes the ground of their right, not their understanding; and the argument is to this effect: that, before the treaty of peace, the possession and sovereignty of the whole were in the Crown of England, and that they so remained until the right of the United States is established—that is until the line is settled; for I cannot otherwise understand the argument that they remain there until we establish our legitimate right to dispossess them. But there is the root of all this. Sir Charles Vaughan did not pretend to any understanding; he goes upon what he asserts to be the right. The Government of the United States, to this day, denies the right of jurisdiction on the part of England; and Mr. Clay, in his letter written in the year 1828, protests against such a claim. Now, after this protest of 1828, the thing having been slept over from that time to this, Great Britain has wrought up this alleged, but entirely unfounded, claim of right growing out of her alleged jurisdiction with an express understanding between the two Governments. I cannot account for it on any other ground than this: that there has been of late a seeming acquiescence on the part of the United States, or rather a want of decided contradiction. But there never was such an acquiescence as to justify the claim of jurisdiction by Great Britain on the ground of understanding. This may be a difficult, and, as one would suppose, a dangerous question in the form in which recent incidents present it; but neither of these considerations furnishes any reason why it should not be carefully examined and decided; on the contrary, there is every motive for decision. Indecision, procrastination, is the cause of this frontier conflict, if any has taken place. Indecision on the part of the General Government is the cause of blood being shed, if any has been shed. Now, I say that the Government of the United States does at length comprehend the present emergency, because a result has come, as every man who watches the course of things carefully cannot fail to see, in which every step that is taken may precipitate us into a condition which all would avoid, if with honor it can be avoided, and which, if it does come, as the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. THOMPSON] says, comes because it must come. No man ever invited it. War is always a calamity, and not to be sought.

But the case, such as it is, is to be looked in the face with a firm but prudent regard. The honor of the nation must be maintained. The peace of the nation must not be heedlessly jeopardized. Steps having been taken on the part of the government of Maine and of the local Government of Great Britain, we ought now to know and make known what the United States—the nation—will do. We should no longer be left in doubt whether Maine is to go on alone; whether she is to be left to take care of herself, or do as she may think fit. Unless the Government of the United States in some way make known what it deems to be its rights, and the extent to which it will go in support of them, you will have a war there, whether you desire it or not. For aught we know, you may have a war there at this very moment. But if the United States, looking to these rights as national rights, with the weight of her authority as a nation, announces her determination, then, at once, a new character is given to the controversy—a character of solemnity and power to command respect. From that moment, those who have looked lightly upon the fact of a few militia being sent out of the State of Maine into this territory, will regard the matter in a different aspect; and surely no Governor of New Brunswick, in such a state of things, will venture to say to the Government of the United States what the present Governor of that Province has said to the Governor of Maine, nor to hold out such threats as he has done. Sir, this is a complicated case. I do not mean to enter into the question as to this land being claimed by cession or grant. That is a pretext of Great Britain. It is a fallacy. There was no grant or cession. The land was taken by conquest, in war, as in other cases of conquest; and the treaty of peace defined the boundaries and fixed the limits, as in all other wars. Within those limits we acquired by our own strength, and not by grant. We acquired it as we acquired our independence—by the favor of Heaven upon our arms in a just cause. It is ours, as our independence is. Great Britain says she has a right to the possession until we can show a better one. In law, the possession has always been in us. There was no actual possession, and in that case the possession follows the right.

I have said the question is complicated. We have a national question about boundary, but this question involves in it the question of territory of two States of the Union. If the boundary is established according to our claim, what is within it belongs to Massachusetts and Maine; if not, their dimensions will be proportionally reduced. If, I say, our claim is not correct, the soil is theirs; the jurisdiction is theirs; and they have a right to peaceable possession, and that, too, within a reasonable time. We are bound to aid them and enforce their just rights, by settling the question of the line, and to restore to them the possession and enjoyment of that which is theirs. How long are they to wait? We must not trifle with their rights and interests. The national question, fixing the United States boundary, might admit of delay. It is for ourselves alone. But the rights and interests of Massachusetts and Maine impose upon us a duty we must not neglect. If we do, I will not say they may not take care of themselves in such way as they best can.

But, sir, another serious consideration arises in connection with this latter point. It is this: that just exactly as the decision of the question is procrastinated, new pretensions are set up, every one of which you have to unravel. I hope the last of them is now disposed of; and that the message of the President, and the declaration of Congress, will place the question in such a position as to convince the people of the United States, as well as the Government of Great Britain, that it must be brought to a speedy settlement; and I do hope, whatever else may happen, that the admonition furnished by the present collision will have a proper effect on the two Governments; and if both duly appreciate and take it to heart, as a matter which seriously touches the peace and welfare of both, in a right spirit, I have no fear that anything has yet occurred to prevent a just and amicable settlement.

But it is most evident that the management of this controversy, involving the peace and honor of the nation, ought not to be suffered to fall into hands of less authority or strength than those of the nation. The nation must furnish the counsels, and the nation must furnish the force. We must decide the momentous questions of peace and war, and the Executive is bound to take care that they be not committed to others. Above all, they must not be left to chance; to casual collision of trespassers, or to local or subordinate authorities, to involve us in war, by bringing about a state of things which may leave us no choice. The Government of the United States must do its duty—promptly, fully, and effectually; or leave to the State of Maine the benefit (if such it be) of the argument, that she must take care of her own interests in her own way.

The Committee of Foreign Affairs will now have charge of this grave subject. It will be for them, looking at it in all its bearings, to indicate the course which, in their opinion, is due to the occasion. This Government must be placed in front. It must be the party. Its whole authority and power must be put forward to calm irritation, to allay tumult, to give pause for reflection, and afford assurance that justice will be done, cost what it may cost. In this way I have no doubt peace may be preserved, and our rights secured.

Mr. EVERETT said he had desired the message should have been committed without debate. Events may have transpired which would present a new aspect to the question. Before this hour a change has unquestionably taken place—either a conflict, or the parties have taken positions in which none was to be expected. If a battle has been fought, a state of war exists. If the parties have withdrawn their forces from the disputed territory, the immediate dispute is at an end. In this state of uncertainty he thought all debate premature, and worse than useless. It tended to produce a premature excitement. And who could answer for the effects of the excitement that might originate here on the country, in connection with other causes of excitement? Look at your whole northern frontier, in connection with the Canada question. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS] has alluded to a subject of deep interest to the South. Who, I repeat, can answer for the effect of the excitement that may be produced by a premature debate in this House? The magnitude of the subject overrides all party considerations. It is a question of peace or war with one of the most powerful nations. Who can estimate its duration or its consequences? It should be well considered. A day or two will put us in possession of all the facts; and he had hoped that until then all debate would have been suspended. On this occasion he had not expected an exciting debate from members of the States immediately interested. They now ask the aid of the United States, to whose unimpassioned judgment he had hoped they would have submitted their claims. Least of all had he expected to have heard opinions in advance from a gentleman who was not only interested in the question, but also a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations. He must say to that gentleman that, in his opinion, he had disqualified himself from acting on the committee on this question; and he expressed a hope that he would, on this occasion, withdraw from it. For one, he should be unwilling to take his opinion as a safe direction for the action of this House.

Mr. CUSHING rose for explanation. The gentleman from Vermont was proceeding in a pretty cavalier way to disqualify and disfranchise him (Mr. C.) from acting on the Committee on Foreign Affairs, because of what he had said on the pending question. He desired him to put his finger on the part of his remarks open to any such exception. It was news to him that a member from any State was not to speak on a subject which particularly concerned the interests or honor of his State; or that a member of a committee was precluded from discussing the class of topics appertaining to such committee. Just the contrary. Did the gentleman from Vermont abstain from speaking in regard to Indian affairs when before the House?

Mr. EVERETT. I gave way to permit the gentleman to put a question, not to interpose a speech. I will answer his question. I shall not put my finger on any part of his speech; I put my hand on his whole speech.

I repeat, sir, I deprecate any premature excitement here or in the country. A debate has been entertained; a debate tending to produce deep excitement, under which the subject was about to be committed to the Committee on Foreign Relations; whose report, as well from the individual character of its members as from their official stations, would have a commanding influence over the action of this House and over the opinions of this country. If anything I can say will be heeded by the committee, I would present to them some considerations on which I desire they may report. I am aware how unpopular and unpatriotic it may seem to some to attempt to arrest the excited feelings of the House; but my only desire is that we deliberate before we act. I do not intend to give my opinions in advance, but to present to the committee some subjects for consideration.

I would call their attention to the controversy. What is it? I do not understand from the message that it involves the ultimate right of Maine to the disputed territory. Her right, in the opinion of this House, is unquestionable. This House has so resolved. Yet, on the part of Great Britain, the right is not conceded. It remains a subject of controversy. That controversy is not the one now at issue. I regret, sir, that it is not the issue; that issue ought to have been made long ago, and decided. I ask the attention of the committee to the real issue. Is it not this: That British subjects, without the license of either Government, are committing trespasses—cutting timber—on the disputed territory? Maine contends for the right, in common, to drive them off. Great Britain contends for the exclusive right to remove them. Is not this the direct question in issue? And does it involve any further question than this, who has the possession of the disputed territory until the question of right between the United States and Great Britain is settled—Great Britain claiming the exclusive right, and Maine claiming a right in common? Does it not, then, come back to the issue; who shall drive off the trespassers? I again express my regret that a question should have arisen on a point so collateral to the great subject of dispute.

The next consideration that I would suggest is as to the right of Maine to compromise the United States to war. Here I desire to be understood, that if a foreign nation should invade the undisputed territory of a State, such State may instantly expel the invader, and that it would be the duty of the United States to furnish instant aid if required. But in the present case, however clear, in our opinion, may be the right of Maine to the territory, yet as between the United States and Great Britain the question of right is unsettled. It is a question of boundary, depending on a treaty; a question yet in controversy. Setting aside all pretense of any agreement as to the possition, (which I may notice hereafter,) is not this the situation of the question, as between the United States and Great Britain? Is not the right of possession, as well as the right of soil, yet in dispute? And between what parties is the controversy? Is it not between the parties to the treaty under which the controversy arises—a controversy as to the boundary between the two nations?

Mr. HOWARD rose to make an inquiry. The gentleman from Vermont (Mr. EVERETT) had alluded to the claim set up by Sir John Harvey of exclusive jurisdiction over this territory. The suggestion which the gentleman had made, whether this must not be considered as an affair altogether belonging to the Government of the United States, was one well worthy of consideration. But the inquiry which Mr. H. wished to put to the gentleman from Vermont was this: whether the claim on the part of Sir John Harvey to exclusive jurisdiction was not to the exclusion of the authorities of the United States as well as of the authorities of Maine?

Mr. EVERETT. Certainly; the British claim the right to exclusive possession; and this gives it a stronger claim to be considered a national question. Is it then competent for the State of Maine to become a direct party in the controversy? Is it not, in every part of it, a controversy exclusively between the United States and Great Britain? Has Maine any more right to interpose on a question of the right of possession than of the right of soil? I had occasion at the last session to refer to this subject, in the debate on the Cherokee treaty. The Executive then advanced the doctrine that a State could interfere with the execution of a treaty. I then suggested this case as one to which the doctrine would apply, and to its consequences.

I am aware, sir, that these suggestions call on the committee to question the leading principle of the message. As I understand it, from the reading at the table, it fully sanctions the right of Maine to interpose in the controversy. If this be correct, I again express my regret that Maine had not chosen to make the grand point of the controversy; that, instead of sending an armed force to drive off trespassers, she had not taken possession of the whole territory, to which we have resolved she has an undoubted right.

There is another subject I would recommend to the consideration of the committee. I take it for granted that, in point of fact, there never was any agreement by which the exclusive possession of the disputed territory, until the right was settled, was conceded to Great Britain. I understand from the message there is no trace of such an agreement in the diplomatic records of the Department; and no one will regard any verbal arrangements, should such be alleged to have been made. Taking this, then, for granted, I ask the committee to ascertain what have been the acts of the parties; whether Great Britain has claimed any such agreement, and whether we have admitted it, or acquiesced in the claim; and if it should appear that Great Britain has claimed it, and complained of its infraction, and this we have acquiesced, or even apologized, how far this may be authority for the present claim of exclusive jurisdiction, or at least for the Governor of New Brunswick to make the claim. Whether we have not, by our own acts, conceded to Great Britain what she had no right to demand by express agreement.

I have one article more to recommend to the consideration of the committee.

I find from the message that the Governor of New Brunswick bases his right to resist the force of Maine on the alleged agreement of our Government to their exclusive possession of the country ad interim. He makes this point in his dispatch to the British Minister here. The British Minister insists on this claim; our Government denies it, and calls for the proof. The issue is then made on this agreement. The British Minister refers to his Government; in substance, he says he has not the evidence, but has sent home for it. All, then, is made to depend on the production of the proof—of the evidence of the agreement. I ask the committee to consider whether, at this point, we had not a right to claim that the controversy on the part of Great Britain should have been suspended until the evidence was produced? Ought the correspondence to have ceased at the point it did? Ought not the Executive to have replied to the last letter of Mr. Fox, by a demand of a withdrawal of the British troops until the evidence was produced? How could he have resisted the demand? He had the power to give the order. He represents the British Government in all its relations with the United States. The issue is made by him. If there was no agreement, all pretense of justification is at an end. We accepted the issue; if there was such an agreement, he is right, and we are wrong. We demand the evidence, and on our demand he was bound to stay all proceedings until the evidence was produced. I ask the consideration of the committee particularly to this question: why was not this demand made?

I have submitted these considerations, not only for the reflection of the committee, but for the country. On a question so important, on which there is so little time to deliberate, when we may be so soon called to act, I have thought it proper to present such considerations as seemed to me proper to aid us in arriving at a just conclusion. I said, in the commencement, that I should offer suggestions, not opinions. I, for one, shall endeavor to profit by every suggestion or argument from any quarter; and trust that we shall arrive at such conclusions as the honor and best interests of the country require.

ARMED OCCUPATION OF FLORIDA.

REMARKS OF HON. T. H. BENTON, OF MISSOURI,

IN THE SENATE, February 18, 1839,

On the bill for the Armed Occupation and Settlement of Florida, in reply to Mr. CLAY.

Mr. BENTON said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The objections made by the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) to the efficiency of the plan proposed by the bill was matter of opinion, and could very properly be met by other opinions. The Senator thinks the proposed plan will be inefficient—that it will not accomplish the object. This is his opinion. Precisely contrary to that is the opinion of General Jesup, Governor Call, General Hernandez, the Surgeon General, (Dr. Lawson,) General Gadsden, and many others who have been engaged in the Florida war. By all these officers the bill is believed to present not only an efficient, but almost the only effectual mode of getting the Indians out of Florida, and recovering the possession of forty-one thousand square miles of our territory. This is the opinion of officers of experience—officers who have been engaged in the arduous service of expelling these Indians. It is their unanimous opinion; and I content myself with opposing this unanimous opinion of experienced officers to the solitary opinion of Senators on this floor who have never been nearer to Florida than they now are.

The Senator from Kentucky objects to the grant of land to the settlers, but does not propose to substitute anything for it. The land is the pay to the settlers for occupying, cultivating, and defending the country. If the land is denied them they get nothing, and it is not to be expected that men will go into such a service for nothing. Pay in money is out of the question. If the bill had proposed it we should have had almost a panic at the thoughts of a new army of ten thousand men. The bill sedulously avoids the idea of an army. It proposes cultivators, and gives them the appropriate compensation due to cultivators. It proposes land, and if that is refused the bill is destroyed.

The Senator from Kentucky further objects to the grants of land to the settlers, upon the ground that they will waste and squander it—will sell their claims for a trifle—and will derive no benefit from them; and he instances the case of the soldiers of the late war who sold their claims for twenty or thirty dollars each. Granted that such was the fate of the soldiers' bounty land, and granted that such would be its fate again, under a similar grant, to regular soldiers, and yet nothing could be more absurd than to infer the same of these settlers. In the first place, the Florida settlers are to be—not soldiers—but cultivators; the land they are to receive is not a bounty for enlistment, but the pay which they are to receive at the end of their service. It is the object for which they labor, and the reward which is to compensate them for their toil and risk. They go to the country to get it. They stay there until they get it. They choose it themselves; and, when they choose it, it is to live upon it. How different was the case of the soldiers from all this. They had no choice of their land; it was distributed to them by lot; and tens of thousands of the grants were not worth a cent; the soldiers were at an immense distance from the land—a thousand miles or more from it—they knew nothing about it—in many instances were not able to get to it—they were beset by temptations and discouragements—and gave up for a trifle what they knew nothing about. A most defective law permitted evasions, and the sales, though nominally declared void before the patent issued, were easily made to assume a valid form.

All this is different in this bill. These settlers will not be, like disbanded soldiers, scattered through the towns and cities, a prey to speculators, but they will be at their stations in Florida—in their block-houses among Indians—where no speculator will ever come. Instead of a lottery drawn by a boy to distribute unknown lands among them, every settler, if alive, must make his own choice, and, if dead, his heir-at-law, and not a purchaser, must make it for him. The entry cannot be made by a purchaser, assignee, attorney, or anybody whatever, but the settler, if alive, and, if dead, by his heir-at-law. After the entry is made, there can be no alienation of the land, even by judicial sale, until twelve months after a patent issues; and if attempted to be alienated, a ready, perfect, cheap, easy, and certain method is provided for invalidating such alienations. In this respect the bill before the Senate differs from all that have preceded it. So that there is not the least danger that these settlers will squander their lands. They are not soldiers, but tillers of the earth, and, therefore, will hold on to their share of the earth. They do not take their land by lot, but by choice, and therefore they know what they get. They are not a thousand miles off, but at the spot, and ready to enter on their land. They must make the entry, or the land cannot be had. They cannot alienate for a year after the patent issues, when they will know the full value of their property. For all these reasons, the objection of the Senator from Kentucky can have no application to these settlers, however just it might be in relation to regular soldiers.

Mr. B. then read the sections of the bill which related to the grant of land to the settlers, to corroborate the statements which he had made, and called upon the Senate to mark the effectual manner in which they secured his rights. The following were the sections read:

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, at the return of peace and removal of the Indians, each settler who shall have complied with these conditions, or his widow and heirs-at-law, in the event of his death, shall be entitled to a bounty of three hundred and twenty acres of land, to be selected from any of the public lands in the district in which he settled, in the peninsula of Florida, or east of the Suwannee river, or adjacent keys and islands; the said selection to be made by the settler according to priority of settlement, so that first settlers shall have first choices; but, when two or more settlers in the same district shall have settled on the same day, priority of choice between them shall be decided by lot.

"Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That, as soon as the surveys can be safely commenced, all the public lands east of the Suwannee, and also in the peninsula of Florida and in the neighboring keys and islands fit for cultivation, shall be surveyed; and land offices shall be opened for receiving, in addition to their other duties, the entries of the settlers who can prove a compliance with the conditions mentioned in this act, and, to aid such proof, copies of the book containing the names of the settlers shall be deposited in such offices.

"Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That one land office shall be opened in the district of country north of the latitude of the mouth of the Withlacoochee; another in the district south of that line and north of a line drawn across the peninsula from the southern extremity of Tampa Bay; and a third in the district south of that line and including the remainder of the peninsula; and the settlers within these respective districts shall each be confined to his own district in selecting and entering his bounty land.

"Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the bounty lands hereby granted shall be free of taxes, and inalienable, even by judicial sale, until the patent issues, and also for one year thereafter; the said patent shall issue to the original settler if alive, and if dead, it shall then issue to his heirs-at-law and widow, if he has left a widow, to be held and divided by them according to the laws of Florida; and every alienation of any such bounty land, even by judicial process, made before the issuance of the patent, or within one year thereafter, shall be null and void; and the intrusive possessor, by virtue of any pretended sale, lease, devise, gift, or transfer, contrary to this act, may be turned out of possession at any time by an action of ejectment in the name of the original settler or of his widow and heirs-at-law, or any one or more of them, or in the name of any subsequent purchaser, after the said land becomes legally alienable; and full damages shall be recovered in the same suit against the intrusive possessor as a trespasser and dis-seizor."

Having read these sections of the bill, Mr. B. appealed to the Senate to say if the objection of the Senator from Kentucky was not entirely inapplicable. The case was wholly different from that of soldiers of the regular Army. What happened to these soldiers cannot happen to the settlers under the bill. They would not sell their lands for a trifle, if they could; and they could not, if they would. The widow and the heirs-at-law, or the settler himself, or any subsequent purchaser, after the land was alienable, can easily set aside the sale; and that without limitation of time, and recover in the same suit, all the intermediate rents and profits. If the soldiers' bounty lands of the late war had been placed under the same guards, and they had been required to go and make their own selections and their own entries, they would never have been squandered away for a few dollars in hand.

INTERFERENCE IN ELECTIONS.

SPEECH OF HON. J. C. CALHOUN, OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

IN THE SENATE, February 22, 1839,

On the bill to prevent the interference of certain Federal officers in elections.

Mr. CALHOUN said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I belong to that political school which regards with a jealous eye the patronage of this Government, and believes that the less its patronage the better, consistently with the objects for which the Government was instituted. Thus thinking, I have made no political move of any importance, for the last twelve or thirteen years, which had not for its object, directly or indirectly, the reduction of patronage. But, notwithstanding this, I cannot bring my mind to support this bill, decidedly as I approve of its object. Among other difficulties, there is a constitutional objection, which I cannot surmount, and which I shall, without further remark, proceed to state and consider.

This bill proposes to inflict the penalty of dismission on a large class of the officers of this Government, who shall electioneer, or attempt to control or influence the election of public functionaries either of the General or State Governments, without distinguishing between their official and individual character as citizens; and the question is, has Congress the constitutional right to pass such a law? That, again, involves a prior and still more general question: has this Government the authority to interfere with the electoral rights of the citizens of the States?

In considering this general question, I shall assume, in the first place, what none will deny, that it belongs to the States separately to determine who shall, and who shall not, exercise the right of suffrage; and, in the second, that it belongs to them, in like manner, to regulate that right; that is, to pass all laws that may be necessary to secure its free exercise on the one hand, and to prevent its abuse on the other. I next advance the proposition, which no one in the least conversant with our institutions, or familiar with the Constitution, will venture to question, that as far as citizens are concerned, this right belongs solely to the States, to the entire exclusion of the General Government, which can in no wise touch or interfere with it without transcending the limits of the Constitution. Thus far there can be no difference of opinion.

But a citizen may be also an officer of this Government; which brings up the question, has it the right to make it penal for him to use his official power to control or influence elections? Can it, for instance, make it penal in a collector, or other officer, who holds a bond, in his official character, on a citizen, to threaten to enforce it, if he should refuse to vote for his favorite candidate? I regard this proposition as not less clear than the preceding. Whenever the Government invests an individual with power, which may be used to the injury of others, or the public, it is manifest that it not only has the right, but that it is in duty bound to prevent its abuse as far as practicable. But it must be borne in mind that a citizen does not cease to be one in becoming a Federal officer. This Government must, accordingly, take special care, in subjecting him to penalties for the abuse of his official powers, that it does not interfere in any wise with his private rights as a citizen, and which are, as has been stated, under the exclusive control of the States. But no such care is taken either in this bill or the substitute proposed by its author. Neither makes any distinction whatever between the official and private acts of the officer as a citizen. The broadest and most comprehensive terms are used, comprehending and subjecting all acts, without discrimination as to character, to the proposed penalty. Under its provisions, if an officer should express an opinion of any candidate, say of a President who was a candidate for reelection, whether favorable or unfavorable, or to whisper an opinion relating to his administration, whether good or bad, he would subject himself to the penalty of this bill, as certainly as if he had brought the whole of his official power to bear directly on the freedom of election. That a bill containing such broad and indiscriminate provisions, transcends the powers of Congress, and violates, in the officer, the electoral rights of the citizen, held under the authority of his State, and guaranteed by the provision of the Constitution which secures the freedom of speech to all, is too clear, after what has been said, to require additional illustration. It cannot pass without enlarging the power of the Government by the abridgment of the rights of the citizen.

But, it may be replied, that there are instances where the Government has subjected its officers to penalties for acts of a private character, over which the Constitution has given it no control. Such undoubtedly is the fact, and its right to do so, in the instances referred to in the discussion, cannot be denied; but all such cases are distinguished from that under consideration by lines too broad to be mistaken. In all of them the acts prohibited were, in the first place, such as were incompatible with the official duties enjoined; as in the case of the prohibition of commissaries to purchase or deal in articles similar to those that are made their official duty to purchase, in order to prevent fraud on the public. And in the next, the acts prohibited involved only civil rights, belonging to the officer as an individual, and not political rights, which belong to him as a citizen. The former he may yield at pleasure, without discredit or disgrace, but the latter he cannot surrender without debasing himself, and giving up a sacred trust vested in him, by the State of which he is a member, for the common good; nor can this Government demand its surrender, without transcending its powers and infringing the rights of the States and their citizens.

It may also be said that, in most cases, it would be impossible to distinguish between the official and the political acts of the officer, so as to subject the former to penal restraints without interfering with the latter; and that it would, in practice, render ineffective the admitted right of the Government to punish its officers for the abuse of their official powers. It may be so; but little or no evil can result. Whatever defect of right this Government may labor under, in such cases, is amply made up by the plenary power of the States, which has an unlimited control over the electoral rights of its citizens, whether officers of this Government or not. To them the subject may be safely confided. It is they who are particularly interested in seeing that a right so sacred shall not be abused, nor the freedom of election be impaired. We must not forget that States and the people of the States are our constituents and superiors, and we but their agents; and that if the right in question be abused, or the freedom of election impaired, it is they, and not we, who must mainly suffer, and who of course are the best judges of the evil and the remedy. If the policy of the States demands it, they may impose whatever restraint they please on the Federal officers within their respective limits, in order to guard against their control or influence in elections; and, if it be necessary, to divest them entirely of the right of suffrage. To those who are so much more interested and competent to judge and act on this subject than we are, I am for leaving the decision as to what ought to be done, and the application of the remedy. Entertaining these views, I am forced to the conclusion that this bill is unconstitutional, and if there were no other reason to oppose its passage, would be compelled to vote against it.

But there are others sufficiently decisive to compel me to withhold my support, were it possible to remove the constitutional objection. So far from restricting the patronage of the President, should the bill become a law, it would, if I mistake not, greatly increase his influence. He has now the almost unlimited power of removing the officers of this Government—a power, the abuse of which has been the subject of much and, in my opinion, of just complaint on the part of the Chamber to which the mover of this bill belongs, on the ground that it was calculated to increase unduly the power and influence of that department of the Government. Now what is the remedy this bill proposes for that evil? To put restrictions on the removing power? The very reverse. To make it the duty, as it is now the right of the President to remove, and in discharging this high duty he is made the sole judge, without limitation or appeal. The fate of the accused would be exclusively in his hand, whether charged with the offense of opposing or supporting his administration. Can any one, the least conversant with party morals, or the working of the human heart, doubt how the law would be executed? Is it not certain that it would be most rigidly enforced against all officers who should venture to oppose him, either in the Federal or State Governments, with a corresponding indulgence and lenity towards those who supported him? A single view, without prolonging the discussion, will decide. Should there be a President of such exalted virtue and patriotism as to make no discrimination between friend and foe, the law would be perfectly useless; but if not, it would be made the pretext for indiscriminate removal of all who may refuse to become his active and devoted partisans; and it would thus prove either useless, or worse than useless.

With the object which the mover of the bill has in view, it seems to me he ought to take the very opposite course, and instead of making it the duty of the President to remove, he ought to impose restrictions on the power of removal, or to divest him entirely of it. Place the office-holders, with their yearly salaries, beyond the reach of the Executive power, and they would, in a short time, be as mute and inactive as this bill proposes to make them. Their voice, I promise, would then be scarcely raised at elections, or their persons be found at the polls.

But suppose the immediate object of the bill accomplished, and the office-holders rendered perfectly silent and passive: it might even then be doubted whether it would cause any diminution in the influence of patronage over elections. It would, indeed, greatly reduce the influence of the office-holders. They would become the most insignificant portion of the community, as far as elections were concerned. But just in the same proportion as they might sink, the no less formidable corps of office-seekers would rise in importance. The struggle for power between the ins and the outs would not abate in the least in violence or intensity, by the silence or inactivity of the office-holders, as the amount of patronage, the stake contended for, would remain undiminished. Both sides—those in and those out of power—would turn from the passive and silent body of incumbents, and court the favor of the active corps that panted to supplant them; and the result would be an annual sweep of the former, after every election, to make room to reward the latter, and that on whichever side the scale of victory might turn. The consequence would be rotation with a vengeance. The wheel would turn round with such velocity that anything like a stable system of policy would be impossible. Each temporary occupant that might be thrown into office by the whirl, would seize the moment to make the most of his good fortune before he might be displaced by his successor, and a system (if such it might be called) would follow not less corrupting than unstable.

With these decisive objections, I cannot give my support to the bill; but I wish it to be distinctly understood that, in withholding it, I neither retract nor modify any sentiment I have expressed in relation to the patronage of this Government. I have looked over, since the commencement of this discussion, the report I made as chairman of a select committee on the subject in 1835, and which has been so frequently referred to in debate by those on the opposite side of the Chamber, and I find nothing which I would omit, if I had now to draw it; but much which time and reflection would induce me to add, to strengthen the grounds I then assumed. There is not a sentence in it incompatible with the views I have presented on the present occasion.

I might here, Mr. President, terminate my remarks, as far as this bill is concerned; but as the general question of patronage is at all times one of importance under our system of Government, and especially so, in my opinion, at this present juncture, I trust that I shall be indulged in offering my opinion somewhat more at large in reference to it.

If it be desirable to reduce the patronage of the Government, (and I hold it to be eminently so,) we must strike at the source—the root, and not the branches. It is the only way that will not in the end prove fallacious. The main source of patronage may be found in the powers, the revenue, and the expenditures of the Government; and the first and necessary step towards its reduction is to restrict the powers of this Government within the rigid limits prescribed by the Constitution. Every extension of its powers beyond would bring within its control subjects never intended to be placed there, followed by increased patronage and augmented expenditure and revenue.

We must in the next place take care not to call the acknowledged powers of the Government into action beyond the limits which the common interest may render necessary, nor to pervert them into means of doing what it was never intended by the Constitution we should have the right to do. Of all the sources of power and influence, prevention of the powers of the Government has proved in practice the most fruitful and dangerous, of which our political history furnishes many examples, especially in reference to the money power, as will appear in the course of my remarks.

After restricting the powers of the Government within proper limits, the next important step would be to bring down the income and expenditures to the smallest practicable amount. It is a primary maxim under our system, to collect no more money than is necessary to the economical and constitutional wants of the Government. We have, in fact, no right to collect a cent more. Nothing can tend more powerfully to corrupt public and private morals, or to increase the patronage of the Government, than an excessive or surplus revenue, as recent and sad experience has abundantly proved. Nor is it less important to restrict the expenditures within the income. It is, in fact, indispensable to a restricted revenue, as the increase of the former must, in the end, lead to an increase of the latter. Nor must an exact administration, and a rigid accountability, in every department of the Government, be neglected. It is among the most efficient means of keeping down patronage and corruption, as well as the revenue and expenditures, just as the opposite is among the most prolific source of both.

It is thus, and thus only, that we can reduce effectually the patronage of the Government, to the least amount consistent with the discharge of the few, but important duties, with which it is charged, and render it what the Constitution intended it should be, a cheap and simple Government, instituted by the States, for their mutual security, and more perfect protection of their liberty and tranquility. It is the way pointed out by Jefferson and his associates of the Virginia school, which has ever been distinguished for its jealous opposition to patronage, as the bane of our political system, as is so powerfully illustrated in the immortal documents so frequently referred to in this discussion—the report to the Virginia Legislature on the alien and sedition law, in the year 1799.

But there is, and ever has been, from the first, another and opposing school, that regarded patronage with a very different eye, not as a bane, but as an essential ingredient, without which the Government would be impracticable; and whose leading policy is, to enlist in its favor the more powerful classes of society, through their interest, as indispensable to its support. If we cannot take lessons from this school, on the question of reduction of patronage, we may at least learn, what is of vast importance to be known, how and by what means this school has reared up a system, which has added so vastly to the power and patronage of the Government, beyond what was contemplated by its framers, as to alarm its wisest and best friends for its fate. With the view of furnishing this information, so intimately connected with the object of these remarks, I propose to give a very brief and rapid narrative of the rise and progress of that system.

At the head of this school stands the name of Hamilton, than which there is none more distinguished in our political history. He is the perfect type and impersonation of the national or Federal school, (I use party names with reluctance, and only for the sake of brevity,) as Jefferson is of the State-rights Republican school: They were both men of eminent talent, ardent patriotism, great boldness, and comprehensive and systematic understanding. They were both men who fixed on a single object far ahead, and converged all their powers towards its accomplishment. The difference between them is, that Jefferson had more genius, Hamilton more abilities; the former leaned more to the side of liberty, and his great rival more to that of power. They both have impressed themselves deeply on the movements of the Government, but as yet Hamilton far more so than Jefferson, though the impression of the latter is destined in the end, as I trust, to prove the more durable of the two.

It has been the good fortune of the school of which Mr. Jefferson is the head to embody their principles and doctrines in written documents, (the report referred to and the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions,) which are the acknowledged creed of the party, and may at all times be referred to in order to ascertain what they are in fact. The opposite school has left no such written and acknowledged creed, but the declaration and acts of its great leader have left little doubt as to either its principles or doctrines. In tracing them a narrative of his life and acts need not be given. It will suffice to say that he entered early in life into the army of the Revolution, and became a member of the military family of Washington, whose confidence he gained and retained to the last. He next appeared in the Convention which framed the Constitution, where, with his usual boldness, he advocated a President and Senate for life, and the appointment by this Government of the Governors of the States, with a veto on the State laws. These bold measures failing, he retired from the Convention, it is said, in disgust; but afterwards, on more mature reflection, became the zealous and able advocate of the adoption of the Constitution. He saw, as he thought, in a scheme of Government which conferred the unlimited power of taxing and declaring war, the almost unbounded source of power in resolute and able hands; hence his declaration that, though the Government was weak in its organization, it would, when put in action, find the means of supporting itself; a profound reflection, proving that he clearly saw how to make it, in practice, what his movements in the convention had failed to accomplish in its organization.

Nor has he left it in doubt as to what were the means on which he relied to effect his object. We all recollect the famous assertion of the elder Adams, that the "British Constitution," restored to its original principles, and freed from corruption, was the wisest and best ever formed by man; and Hamilton's reply, that the British Constitution, freed from corruption, would be impracticable, but, with its corruption, was the best that ever existed. To realize what was intended by this great man, it must be understood that he meant not corruption in its usual sense of bribery. He was too able and patriotic to resort to such means, or to the petty policy this bill is intended to prevent. Either of these modes of operation was on too small a scale for him. Like all great and comprehensive minds, he acted on masses, without much regard to individuals. He meant by corruption something far more powerful and comprehensive; that policy which systematically favored the great and powerful classes of society, with the view of binding them, through their interest, to the support of the Government. This was the single object of his policy, and to which he strictly and resolutely adhered throughout his career, but which, whether suited or not to the British system of Government, is, as time has shown, uncongenial and dangerous to ours.

After the Constitution was adopted, he was placed at the head of the Treasury Department, a position which gave full scope to his abilities, and placed ample means at his disposal to rear up the system he meditated. Well and skillfully did he use them. His first measure was the adoption of the funding system, on the British model; and on this the two schools, which have ever since, under one form or another, divided the country, and ever will divide it, so long as the Government endures, came into conflict. They were both in favor of keeping the public faith, but differed as to the mode of assuming the public debt, and the amount that ought to be assumed. The policy of Hamilton prevailed. The amount assumed was about eighty million dollars, a vast sum for a country so impoverished, and with a population so inconsiderable as we then had. The creation of the system, and the assumption of so large a debt, gave a decided and powerful impulse to the Government, in the direction in which it has since continued to move, almost constantly.

This was followed by a measure adopted on his own responsibility and in the face of law, but which, though at the time it attracted little attention or opposition, has proved the most powerful of all the means employed in rearing up and maintaining his favorite system. I refer to the Treasury order directing the receipt of bank notes in the dues of the Government, and which was the first link in that unconstitutional and unholy alliance between this Government and the banks, that has been followed by such disastrous consequences. I have, Mr. President, been accused of extravagance in asserting that this unholy connection with the paper system, was the great and primary cause of almost every departure from the principles of the Constitution, and of the dangers to which the Government has been exposed. I am happy to have it in my power to show that I do not stand alone in this opinion. Our attention has lately been attracted by one of the journals of this city, to a pamphlet containing the same sentiment, published as far back as 1794, the author of which was one of the profoundest and purest statesmen to whom our country has ever given birth, but who has not been distinguished in proportion to his eminent talent and ardent patriotism. In confirmation of what I assert, I will thank the Senator from North Carolina, near me, [Mr. STRANGE,] to read a paragraph, taken from the pamphlet, which contains expressions as strong as any I have ever used in reference to the point in question.

Mr. STRANGE read as follows:

"Funding and banking systems are indissolubly connected with every commercial and political question, by an interest generally at enmity with the common good. In the great cases of peace and war, of fleets and armies, and of taxation and navigation, their cries will forever resound throughout the Continent. Whereas the undue bias of public officers is bounded by known salaries, and persons not freeholders are hardly, if at all, distinguishable from the national interest. One observation is adduced in proof of this doctrine. Paper fraud knowing the restiveness of liberty when oppressed, is under an impulse to strengthen itself by alliances with legislative corruption, with a military force, and with similar foreign systems. War with Britain can be turned by it to great account. In case of victory, a military apparatus, united to it by large arrears, and an aversion to being disbanded, will be on hand. In case of defeat, paper will constitute an engine of Government analogous to the English system. Can republicanism safely intrust a legislative paper junto with the management of such a war? If it does, no prophetic spirit is necessary to foretell that paper will be heaped upon liberty, from the same design with which mountains were heaped upon the giants by the dis-solute junto of Olympus."

Mr. CALHOUN. The next movement he made was the boldest of the whole series. The union of the Government with the paper system was not yet complete. A central control was wanting in order to give to it unity of action, and a full development of its power and influence. This he sought in a national bank, with a capital of $10,000,000, to be composed principally of the stock held by the public creditors; thus binding more strongly to the Government that already powerful class, by giving them, through its agency increased profit and a decided control over the currency, exchanges, and the business transactions of the country. On the question of chartering the bank, the great battle was fought between the two schools. The contest was long and obstinate, but victory ultimately declared in favor of the national Federal school.

The leader of that school was not content with those great achievements. His bold and ardent mind was not of a temper to stop short of the end at which he aimed. His next movement was to seize on the money power, and he put forth able reports, in which he asserted the broad principle that Congress was under no other constitutional restriction in the use of the public money but the general welfare, and that it might be appropriated to any purpose whatever, believed to be calculated to promote the general interest, and as freely to the objects not enumerated as those that were specified in the Constitution. To this he added another and perhaps more dangerous assumption of power, that the taxing power, which was granted expressly to raise revenue, might be used as a protective power for the encouragement of manufactures, or any other branch of industry which Congress might choose to foster; and thus it was in fact perverted from a revenue to a penal power, through which the entire capital and industry of the Union might be controlled. Congress was not prepared at that early stage to follow so bold a lead, but the seed was sown by a skillful hand, to sprout when the proper season arrived.

When he retired from office no controlling mind was left to perfect the system which he had commenced with such consummate skill and success; and shortly after, under the administration of the elder Adams, the alien and sedition acts, and the quasi war with France, as it was called, followed the violent and precipitate measures of less sagacious and powerful minds, and which in their reaction expelled their authors from power, and raised Jefferson to the Presidency.

He came in as a reformer; but, with the most ardent desire and the highest capacity to effect a reformation, he could do little to change the direction which his rival had impressed at the outset on the political machine. Economy, indeed, was introduced, and the expenditures reduced, but the ligatures which united the Government with the paper system were too strong to be bursted. The funded debt, though greatly reduced by him, could not be extinguished. The charter of the United States Bank had still half its turn to run, and the use of banks and bank notes in the fiscal transactions of the Government had taken too strong a hold to be superseded at once. In the mean time, the agitation caused by the gigantic conflict between France and England reached our distant and peaceful shores, and the Administration was almost exclusively occupied in efforts to prevent aggressions on our rights, and preserve our neutrality. To effect that, every expedient was attempted; negotiation, embargo, non-importation, and non-intercourse, but in vain. War followed, and with it all hopes of carrying out the reform contemplated by Jefferson when he came into power failed.

When peace arrived, the country was deeply in debt. Capital and industry had taken new direction in consequence of the long interruption of our foreign commerce, and the public attention was completely diverted from the questions which had brought into conflict the two great political schools, and which had so long divided the country.

The season had now arrived when the seed which had been so skillfully sowed by Hamilton, as has been stated, began to germinate, and soon shot forth with the most vigorous growth. Duties came to be imposed without regard to revenue, and money appropriated without reference to the granted powers. Tariff followed tariff in rapid succession, carrying in their train a profusion of expenditures on harbors, roads, canals, pensions, and a host of others, comprehending objects of almost every description. In such rapid succession did the protective duties follow, that, in 1828, in the short space of twelve years after the termination of the late war, they reached the enormous amount of nearly one half of the aggregate value of the entire imports, after deducting the reshipments. Beyond this point, the system never advanced and fortunately for the country it did not. Had it continued its progress a few years longer, the enormous patronage which it placed at the disposal of the Chief Magistrate would have terminated our form of Government by enabling him to nominate his successor, or by plunging the country into a revolution, to be followed by disunion or despotism, as was foretold would be the consequence in the report to the Legislature of Virginia, so often referred to, if the system it reprobated were carried out in practice. But, happily, with the tariff of 1828, the reaction commenced, and has been ever since progressing. How or by whom it was commenced, and has been urged forward to the present point, this is not the proper occasion to state. All I propose now, is to trace its progress, and mark the point at which it has arrived.

The first step of this retrograde movement was the overthrow of the administration of the younger Adams. He came into power on the extreme principles and doctrines of the Federal national school, and on them he placed the hope of maintaining his elevation. For the truth of this assertion I appeal to his inaugural address and his messages to the two Houses at the openings of the annual sessions; and to expel his Administration from power was, of course, a preliminary and indispensable step towards the restoration of the principles and doctrines of the opposite school, and fortunately this was effected by a decided majority at the expiration of his first term.

The next step was the final discharge of the funded debt; and for this important step, at so early a period, the country is indebted principally to a friend, now, unfortunately, no more—the amiable, the talented, the patriotic Lowndes—the author of that simple, but effective measure, the sinking fund act, passed shortly after the termination of the late war.

But the most formidable of all the obstacles—the source of the vast and corrupting surplus, with its host of extravagant and unconstitutional expenditures, the protective tariff, still remained in full force, and obstructed any further progress in the reaction that had commenced. By what decided and bold measures it was overcome is well known to all, and need not be told on this occasion. It is sufficient to say that, after a long and desperate struggle, the controversy terminated in the compromise act, which abandoned the protective principle, and has, I trust, closed forever what has proved in this Government a most prolific source of power, patronage, and corruption.

The next step in the progress, was the overthrow of the Bank of the United States—the center and soul of the paper system—a step that may justly be regarded as not inferior to any other in the whole series. That was followed by the deposit act of 1836, which transferred to the treasuries of the States the vast surplus, which continued to flow in upon us, notwithstanding the great reduction under the compromise act. This decisive measure disburdened our surcharged Treasury, and has forced on this Government the necessity of retrenchment and economy, and thereby has greatly strengthened and accelerated the reaction. So necessary is the reduction of the income to reform, that I am disposed to regard it as a political maxim in free States, that an impoverished Treasury, once in a generation at least, is almost indispensable to the preservation of their institutions and liberty.

The next stage in the progress was the suspension of the connection between the Government and the banks, in consequence of the suspension of specie payments. This occasion afforded an opportunity to strike the first blow against that illegitimate and unholy alliance. It was given decidedly, boldly, and vigorously, but still with only partial success. The interest in favor of maintaining the connection was too powerful to be overcome at once; but though not broken the tie is greatly weakened, and nothing now is wanting to sever forever this fatal knot, but to follow up what has already been done by persevering and energetic blows.

25TH CONG....3D SESS.

Abolition Petitions—Mr. Moore.

This is the point to which the reaction has already reached; and the question now to be considered is, to what point ought it to be urged, and what are the intermediate obstacles to be overcome? I am, for myself, prepared to answer. I have no concealment; my aim is fixed. It is no less than to turn back the Government to where it was when it commenced its operation in 1789; to obliterate all the intermediate measures originating in the peculiar principles and policy of the school to which I am opposed, and which experience has proved to be so dangerous and uncongenial to our system; to take a fresh start, a new departure, on the State-rights Republican track, as was intended by the framers of the Constitution. That is the point at which I have aimed for more than twelve years, and towards which I have persisted during the whole period, to urge my way, in defiance of opposing difficulties, dangers, and discouragements, and from which nothing shall drive me, (while in public life,) till the object at which I aim is accomplished. By far the most formidable difficulties are already surmounted. Those that remain are comparatively insignificant.

Among these, the most important and difficult by far is, to separate the Government from the banks, but which, after the blows the connection has received, will require not much more than unyielding firmness and perseverance. This done, the great work of fleeing the Government entirely from the paper system on which Hamilton laid the foundation of his whole system, will have been achieved.

The next is to carry out, in the revision of the tariff, which must take place at the next or succeeding session, the provisions of the compromise act, that there shall be no duty laid but what may be necessary to the economical and constitutional wants of the Government. Should this be accomplished, there will be an end to the protective system, with all the evil that followed and must ever follow in its train. Nor can I believe, after what we have experienced, and what has been said during this session, that there will be any insuperable difficulty in effecting an object so intimately connected with the peace and tranquility of the Union.

Having freed the Government from the paper and protective systems, the next step in importance is, to put a final stop to internal improvements, the construction and improvement of harbors, and the extravagant waste on what we are pleased to call the pension system, but which has departed from every principle justly belonging to such a system. No Government was ever before burdened with an expenditure so absurd and monstrous. It confounds all distinctions between the deserving and the undeserving, and yearly draws millions from the Treasury without any just claim on the public bounty, and ought to be both arrested and reformed.

A single step more brings the Government to the destined point; I mean a thorough reformation in the administrative department of the Government. I doubt not but that every branch needs reform. There are, doubtless, numerous defalcations in addition to those brought to light. The fault has been more in that system, a brief narrative of which I have given, than in those who have been charged with the administration of the Government. For years money was as dirt. The Treasury was oppressed with it, and the only solicitude was how to get clear of what was considered a useless burden. Hence the vast increase of expenditures; hence the loose and inattentive administration of our fiscal concerns; hence the heavy defalcations. Nor are these remarks confined to the executive department of the Government; they apply to all, to the two Houses of Congress as well as to other branches. But there is no longer a surplus. The Treasury is exhausted, and the work of retrenchment, economy, and accountability, is forced on us. Reform in the fiscal action of the Government can no longer be delayed, and I rejoice that such is the fact. Economy and accountability are virtues belonging to free and popular Governments, and without which they cannot long endure. The assertion is preëminently true when applied to this Government; and hence the prominent place they occupy in the creed of the State-rights and Republican school.

Having taken these steps, every measure of prominence, originating in the principles or policy of the national Federal school will become obliterated, and the Government will have been brought back, after the lapse of fifty years, to the point of original departure, when it may be put on its new track. To guard against a false steerage thereafter, one important measure, in addition to those enumerated, will be indispensable, to place the new States, as far as the public domain is concerned, in a condition as independent of the Government as the old. It is as much due to them as it is indispensable to accomplish the great object in view. The public domain within these States is too great a stake to be left under the control of this Government. It is difficult to estimate the vast addition it makes to its power and patronage, and the controlling and corrupting influence which it may exercise over the presidential election, and through that, the strong impulse it may receive in a wrong direction. Till it is removed, there can be no assurance of a successful and safe steerage, even if every other sinister influence should be removed.

It would be presumptuous in me, Mr. President, to advise those who are charged with the administration of the Government what course to adopt; but, if they would hear the voice of one who desires nothing for himself, and whose only wish is to see the country prosperous, free, and happy, I would say to them, you are placed in the most remarkable juncture that has ever occurred since the establishment of the Federal Government. By seizing it, you may bring the vessel of State to a position where she may take a new tack, and thereby escape all the shoals and breakers, among which a false steerage has run her, and bring her triumphantly into her destined port, with honor to yourselves and safety to those on board. Take then your ground boldly; avow your object; disclose your measures; and let the people see clearly that you intend—what Jefferson designed to do, but from adverse circumstances, could not accomplish—to reverse the measures originating in principles and policy uncongenial to our political system—to divest the Government of all undue patronage and influence—to restrict it to the few great objects intended by the Constitution—in a word, to give a complete ascendancy to the good old Virginia school over its antagonist, which time and experience has proved to be foreign to our system of Government—and you may count with confidence on their support, without looking to any other means of success. Should they take such a course at this propitious moment, our free and happy institutions may be perpetuated for generations; but, if a different, short will be their duration.

On this question of patronage, let me add, in conclusion, that, according to my conception, the great and leading error in Hamilton and his school originated in a mistake as to the analogy between ours and the British system of Government. If we were to judge by their outward form, there is, indeed, a striking analogy between them in many particulars; but if we look within, at their spirit and genius, never were two free Governments so perfectly dissimilar. They are, in fact, the very opposites. Of all free Governments that ever existed—no, I will enlarge the proposition—of all Governments, free or despotic, that ever existed, the British Government can bear the largest amount of patronage, the greatest exaction and pressure on the people, without changing its character, or running into revolution. The greater, in fact, its patronage, the stronger it is, till the pressure begins to crush the mass of population with its superincumbent weight. But directly the opposite is the case with ours. Of all Governments that ever existed, it can stand under the least patronage, in proportion to the population and wealth of the country, without changing its character or hazarding a revolution. I have not made these assertions lightly. They are the result of much reflection, and can be sustained by conclusive reasons drawn from the nature of the two Governments; but this is not the proper occasion to discuss the subject.

ABOLITION PETITIONS.

SPEECH OF HON. ELY MOORE,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 4, 1839,

On presenting a remonstrance from citizens of the District of Columbia against the reception of abolition petitions, &c.

Mr. MOORE said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I present to the House a remonstrance, signed by some several hundred citizens of this District, against the reception of petitions from citizens of the States praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. The memorialists represent that they regard Congress as the local legislature of this District, standing in the same relation to the citizens of the District that a State Legislature does to the citizens of a State; and that they claim the right to advise or instruct the Congress, as their local legislature, on all subjects relating exclusively to the local interests and municipal institutions of the District; and, further, that they regard the interference of persons residing without the limits of the District, by petition or otherwise, as intrusive and unwarrantable; and claim the paternal protection of Congress against such interference with their rights and interests. I concur with the views of the memorialists, and shall proceed to vindicate them to the best of my abilities.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, I am justified in the declaration that since I have had the honor of a seat in this body, at least one third of our time has been unnecessarily wasted, or mischievously employed—I will not undertake to say which—in debating petitions, resolutions, &c., &c., touching the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. In other words, if I am correct in the views which I would beg leave to submit to the consideration of the House before I take my seat, we have, for the last four sessions of Congress, consumed a large portion of our time in discussing a subject over which the Federal Legislature, in their Federal capacity, have no jurisdiction. If this be so, is it not time that we pause? nay, is it not high time that we so change our course of action on this exciting and vexatious subject as to reject, outright, all petitions and memorials praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia? It is well known to the members of this House that all attempts to suppress discussion on this subject have proved utterly abortive. And so long as we continue to receive petitions from the citizens of the States on the subject of slavery, so long will our time, as heretofore, be occupied in agitating this question. Nay, it must be apparent to all, now that abolitionism has assumed a political character, that this perplexing subject will become, from year to year, more and more embarrassing to the Federal Legislature, unless there shall be found sufficient firmness in a majority of its members to shut down the gate at once upon all petitions of an abolition character. And, sir, permit me to say that I am not altogether confident the American people do not attach undue importance to the "right of petition," when understood in a broad and political sense; in that sense, I mean, in which it has ever been regarded in England. When I hear gentlemen on this floor declaim with so much warmth and energy on what they are pleased to call the "blessed, sacred, and inestimable right of the people to assemble and petition for redress of grievances," I am sometimes inclined to believe that their zeal is not exactly according to knowledge, and that they have not duly considered the character and genius of our free institutions.

It is true, and to my mind it is as strange as it is true, that the Congress of 1789 deemed proper to propose an amendment to the Constitution recognizing "the right of the people peaceably to assemble and petition the Government for a redress of grievances." The statesmen of that day, as well as those of the present, were too much in the habit of looking to England, not only for precedents, but for political principles and practices. And from that source did they derive their ideas concerning the sanctity and importance of the right of the people to assemble and petition their Government. That the right of petition has ever been held dear and sacred by the oppressed and down-trodden subjects of Great Britain, is not to be marveled at. Nothing could be more natural than that a people, whose political franchises had been wrenched from them by the iron hand of despotic power, should esteem it a boon to be graciously permitted to assemble and make known their wrongs, and to petition, to supplicate, for redress. It was the only avenue to the throne which tyranny had left them; the only mode to obtain, or rather to solicit, redress, which the Sovereign had vouchsafed them. The grievances complained of by British subjects—I speak particularly in reference to by-gone times—were mostly general in their effects and political in their character, and originated with the Government; and the only general or political remedy, if remedy it could be called, which the subjects were permitted to apply, was to assemble and petition the Crown relative thereto. Hence, ever associated with the "right of petition" is the idea of an expression of the public sentiment, or of the public will. But with what propriety this identical idea has been transferred to the American Constitution, I confess I am at a loss to determine.

In England, especially in the reign of King John, of "Magna Charta" memory, and of the first three Henrys, the people loudly and earnestly clamored for the right of petition, because their voice could only reach the throne through the medium of supplication—of petition. It was the omnipotency of the prince on the one hand, and the impotency of the subject on the other. Under such circumstances, it was not only natural but politic for the subject to address the sovereign in the abject language of supplication—of petition. But, sir, does it become American freemen, the sovereign people—in whom all power resides—to approach their Representatives, their agents, their servants, the creatures of their own making, with the abject, servile language of petition, prayer, supplication? No, sir, no! Thank God! it is the peculiar province, the proud privilege of the American people, to speak to those in power, on all subjects of general political moment, in the potent and authoritative language of instruction—of dictation. And who will affirm that the right to instruct, to dictate, does not supersede the poor privilege to petition? What, sir; shall it be deemed a privilege for the creator to supplicate the creature? The master to petition the servant? Why, sir, this would be inverting the order of things with a witness. I hold that it is not befitting the American people to address the language of prayer, of petition, of supplication, to any power save that of Almighty power. When freemen pray, let them supplicate the only power superior to their own—the God of the universe!

But, sir, it is not my intention to dwell longer, at this time on this subject. On some future day I may enter fully into a discussion of this question. It shall now be my object to prove—admitting the right of petition, as I now do, in all its length and breadth—that the citizens of the States have no right to petition Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia. Let no man charge me with a desire to strangle the right of petition in order to make out my case. I hold that I am not obnoxious to the charge. I am the last man that would attempt, by word or deed, directly or indirectly, to embarrass or abridge the legitimate exercise of any valuable right. Nor, sir, would I bring any important privilege into disrepute or contempt by the abuse of it. And I contend that it is as much an abuse of this privilege for the citizens of the States, and especially the non-slaveholding States, to petition the American Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, as it would be for such citizens to petition the Parliament of Great Britain, or the French Chamber of Deputies, for a like purpose; or as it would be for the citizens of Maine to petition the Legislature of Virginia to abolish slavery within the limits of that State. No man in the possession of his wits, having the least acquaintance with the character of our Government, will assert that it would be a denial of the right of petition for the Legislature of Virginia to reject petitions from the citizens of the State of Maine, praying for the abolition of slavery. And if it would not be a denial of the right of petition in this case, how can it be a denial of that right for the Legislature of this District to reject petitions of like import from citizens of the States? Would it not be equally proper for the citizens of the District of Columbia to petition the Legislature of Massachusetts to pass laws for the relief and amelioration of the condition of the laborers employed in the manufactories of that State, as for the citizens of Massachusetts to petition Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia? If a rejection of petitions would not be a denial of the right of petition in the one case, how could it be so in the other? For I contend, and shall show most conclusively, that the citizens of the District of Columbia have the same right to interfere in the internal police of Massachusetts that the citizens of Massachusetts have to interfere in the internal police of the District of Columbia.

It will be perceived by the House, from what I have stated, that I regard Congress as the local legislature of this District; standing in the same relation, in one respect, to the citizens of the District, as do the State Legislatures to the citizens of the States. Entertaining this opinion, then, I contend that the rejection by Congress of petitions, coming from citizens of any of the States, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, is no more a denial of the right of petition than it would be for the Legislature of Maryland or of Arkansas to reject petitions coming from citizens of Vermont or Rhode Island, praying for the abolition of slavery. It will be conceded by all—at least by all professing the Democratic faith—that "every free citizen must be represented;" and that the power of the representative is derived from the will of the represented. This elementary principle of the American Constitution forms the basis of all legislation. This being so, it follows that the free citizens of this District "must be represented." Previous to the cession of the "ten miles square," by the States of Maryland and Virginia, the citizens of these States residing within the present limits of this District were represented by the respective Legislatures of these States. And as neither Virginia nor Maryland had the power so far to disfranchise their citizens as to deprive them of "the right to be represented," that right, of course, remains unimpaired. The States making the "cession" could delegate no power to Congress which they themselves did not possess; consequently, Congress can exercise no power by virtue of the "acts of cession," which it would not have been competent for those States to have exercised. The citizens of the District of Columbia, therefore, like all other free citizens, are entitled to be represented. And as they are not represented by the States which made the "cession," they must, necessarily, be represented by Congress, to whom the "cession" was made. But what must be regarded as decisive on this point, is the fact that Congress may tax the citizens of the District of Columbia, just as a State Legislature may tax the citizens of a State. Sir, the character and genius of our free Government preclude, repudiate, and abhor the idea of taxation without representation. Sir, the Congress of the United States are the representatives of the citizens of the District of Columbia. Congress, as a legislative body, exercise two species of legislative power over this District; the one Federal, the other municipal. The first, limited as to its objects, but coextensive with the Union. The last, unlimited as to objects, but inoperative beyond the territorial limits of this District.

The relation in which Congress stands to the citizens of the District, therefore, is twofold. First, as the representatives of the whole Union; and second, as the local Legislature of the District. In the latter capacity, Congress stand precisely in the same relation to the citizens of the District as the State Legislatures do to the citizens of the States; and, consequently, are as much bound, in all their acts affecting merely this District, to obey the will of the people residing within the limits of the District, as are State Legislatures to obey the will of the citizens of the States. Without the consent of the people of the District, therefore, Congress have no right to abolish slavery within its limits. Congress, as the Federal Legislature, acting in their federative capacity, have no more right to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia than they have to abolish slavery in the State of South Carolina. If Congress possess the power at all, they can only exercise it as the local Legislature of the District, and in pursuance of the will of the citizens residing within the limits of the District. To affirm the contrary, to assert that the municipal institutions, the domestic or local rights and interests of the citizens of the District of Columbia are subject to the arbitrary will and control of the citizens of remote, distinct, and independent States or communities, or, which is in effect the same, of Congress, is to assert that the people of the District do not possess the right of self-government, and that the power of Congress over them and theirs is plenary and absolute. Who will avow this openly? Who will say in direct terms, that Congress, or the citizens of remote States, through their immediate Representatives in Congress, may rightfully and constitutionally interfere with and control the whole internal police of the District, in defiance of the wishes and regardless of the remonstrances of its citizens? Who, I ask, will openly confess himself the advocate of doctrines and principles so alien to the character and genius of our Government, so fraught with tyranny and despotism, and so utterly repugnant to the great principle upon which our institutions are founded—the right of the people to be represented, or, in other words, the right of the people to self-government? Let him who would strike at the rights of a community remember that the blow would be equally dangerous to liberty as if aimed at the rights of individuals.

I shall be told, of course, that, by the sixteenth clause of the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States, Congress have "exclusive jurisdiction over the ten miles square." Well, sir, how are we to understand this exclusive legislative power? Why, sir, in the first place, it was evidently the intention of the framers of the Constitution to exclude from the territory embracing the seat of the Federal Legislature the jurisdiction of the States which should cede such territory, as well as all other State authority. And, in the second place, that Congress, as the local Legislature of such District, should assume the jurisdiction and exercise the legislative powers surrendered up by the States which made the "cession;" and Congress, in pursuance of this right of "exclusive jurisdiction," exercise the same legislative functions over the District of Columbia, when acting in their local capacity, that the State Legislatures do over the States. When Congress, therefore, act in pursuance of their exclusive legislative power over the "ten miles square," they abandon their national functions, and assume the functions of a local or State Legislature; and all the laws passed by Congress when acting in this local capacity are limited in their operation to the territory comprising the "ten miles square;" just as the laws enacted by a State Legislature are inoperative beyond the limits of such State. In other words, laws passed by Congress in their local legislative capacity, are no more obligatory beyond the bounds of this District, than are laws passed by the Legislature of Maryland, for example, binding beyond the limits of Maryland. In this opinion I am fully sustained by a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. The court decided that the tickets in a lottery authorized by a law of Congress within the District of Columbia, could not be vended in the State of Virginia, in contravention of the laws of that State. (Cohens vs. Virginia.)

The general or national powers which Congress exercise over, and which are binding upon, the States, were delegated by the States; and the powers of "exclusive legislation," which Congress exercise over the District of Columbia, and which are effective only within the District, were

Abolition Petitions—Mr. Moore.

derived from the States of Maryland and Virginia, by virtue of certain acts in which they ceded to Congress this District. Had Congress been invested with no other power than that of exclusive legislation over the "ten miles square; could there be any question with regard to the extent of their power? Or would it have been alleged in that case that all laws passed by Congress were essentially national in their character, and operative without, as well as within, the limits of the District? I presume not, sir; because the power of exclusive legislation which Congress exercise over the District of Columbia can be of no greater extent than if such power had been the only one conferred. Congress cannot exercise exclusive legislative power over the States, because of the reservation of power to the States, or to the people thereof. Even over the "ten miles square" the power of Congress is limited by the acts of "cession." With what propriety, then, can it be contended that because a law is passed by Congress, it is, therefore, a law of the United States, and of universal obligation? No, sir; whenever Congress legislate in virtue of their local and exclusive jurisdiction over the District of Columbia, they act as a local or municipal Legislature; and the acts passed by them in that capacity are limited in their operation to the territory of the District. A law of Congress, to have the effect of a law of the United States, must be passed in execution of some of the Federal powers, or, in other words, in pursuance of delegated power. But all laws of Congress passed in virtue of the power to exercise exclusive legislation over the District of Columbia are local or municipal in their character, and cannot operate extra-territorially, or beyond the limits of the District. True, there are certain laws passed by Congress which have a local reference to this District, and which proceed from the delegated powers with which Congress are invested. Acts appropriating money for the erection of public buildings, &c., are of this description. These acts, although local in their immediate operation, have reference to national objects, are passed in virtue of the general legislative powers, and are general or national in their character.

Congress can exercise no power, by virtue of the sixteenth clause of the eighth section of the Constitution, over the District of Columbia that it would not have been competent for Maryland and Virginia to have exercised prior to making the cession. The "exclusive powers of legislation," therefore, possessed by Congress over the "ten miles square," are of the kind which were never delegated to the General Government, but reserved to the States. To say that the power of exclusive legislation conferred upon Congress by the sixteenth clause of the eighth section of the Constitution embraced any of the general powers contained in any of the fifteen preceding clauses of the eighth section, would be to charge the framers of the Constitution with granting a repetition of powers by distinct articles. This is not to be presumed; neither is it to be presumed that the framers of the Constitution conferred upon Congress Federal powers concurrent with existing State powers. No, sir; the framers of the American Constitution, as wise and patriotic men, conferred no powers upon Congress that were calculated to beget strife and contention, and instead of promoting, mar the harmony which ever ought to subsist between the National and State Governments; and equally wise and cautious were they in combining the Federal and local or State powers in such manner as that Congress, in discharging the double functions of a Federal and State Legislature, should not confound nor produce a collision between these powers or functions. Thus Congress, I repeat, as the General or Federal Legislature, exercises the general powers delegated by the States; and, as a local or State Legislature, exercises, from time to time, the reserved and undelegated powers pertaining to the States. In the former capacity, Congress may declare war or make peace, "coin money, and regulate the value thereof," &c., but cannot legislate with regard to the local wants and interests of this District; but in the latter capacity, Congress may incorporate companies, build bridges, open streets; in a word, supply the wants and meet the exigencies of the District, precisely in the same manner that a State Legislature may do with regard to a State. And the laws passed by Congress in this State or local capacity are necessarily limited in their operation to the District of Columbia, precisely as a State law is confined in its operation to the State limits. If the laws passed by Congress in their local legislative capacity had the effect of United States laws, the banks of this District would be United States banks, and the insurance companies United States insurance companies.

The District of Columbia is, in all respects, whether as a sovereignty or as a community, as much independent of the Federal Legislature, when acting in their Federal capacity, as are Georgia and North Carolina, or as those States are of each other. The Federal Legislature, therefore, as such, possess no more power over the subject of slavery within the limits of this District than they do over that subject within the limits of those States. Consequently, Congress are no more bound to receive petitions from the citizens of the States praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia than the Legislature of a sovereign and independent State would be bound to receive petitions from the citizens of another sovereign and independent State; or, than the Legislature of a State would be bound to receive petitions from the citizens of the District of Columbia, touching the domestic interest and internal police of such State. Hence the popular fallacy with regard to the right of petition. The question is not as to the right of petition, but as to the destination or direction which petitions should take. Admitting that citizens of a State have a right to petition their Legislature, touching any subject of grievance over which the Legislature may have jurisdiction, and that the citizens of the United States have also a right to petition the Federal Legislature on all subjects of a Federal character, does it follow, therefore, that the citizens of one State have a right to petition the Legislature of another State, concerning its domestic institutions and internal police? Or, that citizens of the United States have a right to petition the Federal Legislature on a subject that is not Federal, but strictly local in its character, and with which the petitioners have no right to intermeddle? Certainly not. And as the citizens of Vermont or Connecticut, for example, have no more right to interfere with the domestic institutions of the District of Columbia than they have with the domestic institutions of the State of Maryland or Virginia, which is just none at all, they might, with the same propriety, petition the Legislatures of those States to abolish slavery within their limits, as to petition the local Legislature of this District to abolish slavery within its limits. And as it would not and could not be considered a denial of the right of petition on the part of the Legislature of either of those States to reject such petitions, so neither could it be regarded as a denial of such right for Congress, the local legislature of the District of Columbia (and it has been already shown that it is only in this local capacity that Congress can have jurisdiction over the subject at all) to reject similar petitions from citizens of those or any other States.

It matters not, therefore, whether Congress have the power to abolish slavery within the District of Columbia or not, as Congress is not bound, in either case, to receive petitions from the citizens of the States touching the subject of slavery within this District—such citizens having no right to interfere with this or any other subject of internal police within the District. What, sir, could it be regarded as a denial of the legitimate exercise of the right of petition on the part of Congress, to reject petitions from citizens of the States praying Congress to narrow or widen the streets in this city, or in the city of Georgetown, or of Alexandria, or to repeal the charters of the incorporated companies within this District, or otherwise to change, alter, or in any way affect the municipal institutions or internal police of the District? No man, I apprehend, will so allege; and why not? For the reason, sir, that the petitioners would have no right or authority to intermeddle with the local rights and interests of an independent community—a community as absolutely independent of the petitioners, in all the respects just mentioned, as are the municipalities of France. And, as the institution of slavery in the District of Columbia, as well as in the slave States, is, in all respects and to all intents and purposes, local in its character, Congress are no more bound to entertain petitions from citizens of the States asking for its abolition, than if such petitions related to the municipal institutions of a foreign country. If Congress would not be bound to receive petitions in the one case, they would not in the other; and, consequently, if it would not be a denial of the right of petition to reject, in the one case, it would not be so in the other. I repeat, then, that whether Congress have the power to abolish slavery within the District of Columbia or not, it cannot be regarded as a denial of the right of petition for Congress to reject petitions from citizens of the States, praying for the exercise of such right, no more than it would be for them to reject petitions from the subjects of a foreign Power asking for similar action. Were the institution of slavery in the District of Columbia general and national in its character, instead of being, as it is, strictly and essentially local and municipal, then would the citizens of the States, I grant, be authorized to petition the National Legislature concerning it, and the National Legislature, recognizing the right of petition, would be bound to receive such petitions, if couched in respectful language. But under our existing form of government, and under existing circumstances, Congress are not bound, and in truth have no legitimate right, to entertain petitions from individuals residing without the limits of this District touching the abolition of slavery, or any other subject of a local and municipal character, affecting merely the citizens residing within the District.

Such being my views, then, I can but regard those petitioners—resident of the States—praying Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, as guilty of an impertinent and unwarrantable interference with the rights, privileges, and interests of a free and independent community. And so long, sir, as I entertain my present opinions, I shall feel constrained to reprobate any action on the part of Congress which may be calculated to give countenance and encouragement to such mischievous and audacious interference. Sir, by receiving these petitions, we tacitly yield our assent to acts of aggression on the rights of those whom it is our peculiar duty and province to defend and protect.

Let Congress promptly reject all petitions emanating from citizens of the States, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and this corroding and wide spreading evil will be speedily arrested. The Halls of Congress, sir, have been converted into abolition laboratories, where this accumulating mischief is compounded and refined, where it receives its point and potency, and whence it is fulminated upon the country.

But again, sir, Congress have no constitutional authority to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, without the consent of the slave owners. The Constitution declares that "no person shall be deprived of his property without due process of law; and that private property shall not be taken for public use without compensation." An attempt to render this language of the Constitution more explicit or more emphatic, by any comments of mine, could but be regarded as a reflection upon the intelligence of this House. If Congress cannot constitutionally take private property, except it be for public use, and only then by making compensation to the owners thereof, and this is the only true and legitimate construction, by what authority can they wrest from citizens of the District their private property? Such acts unquestionably would be without the shadow of constitutional warrant. The advocates of abolitionism, therefore, in order to surmount this constitutional impediment to their schemes, must show, in the first place, that the citizens of the District of Columbia constitute no part of the citizens of the United States; and, in the second place, that slave property is not private property. Whenever they shall successfully do this, I will admit that the American Constitution affords no guarantee against the violation of the rights of property, and that Congress may, constitutionally abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, without the consent of the slave owners; but not till then.

If the citizens of this District may have one species of property wrested from them by the high hand of power, what security have they that their property, of whatsoever kind, will not share a similar fate? But this supposition cannot be tolerated for a moment. The doctrine strikes at the very root of all free government, and is, to all intents and purposes, subversive of the social compact. In the language of the Supreme Court—

"There are acts which the Federal or State Legislatures cannot do without exceeding their authority. There are certain vital principles in our free, republican Government, which will determine and overrule an apparent and flagrant abuse of legislative power; as to authorize manifest injustice by positive law, or to take away that security for personal liberty or private property, for the protection whereof the Government was established. An act of the Legislature contrary to the great, first principles of the social compact, cannot be considered a rightful exercise of legislative authority. The obligation of a law, in governments established on express compact and on republican principles, must be determined by the nature of the power on which it is founded. A few instances will suffice to explain. A law that punished a citizen for an innocent action, or that was in violation of an existing law; a law that destroys or impairs the obligation of the lawful private contracts of citizens; a law that makes a man a judge in his own case; or a law that takes property from A and gives it to B. It is against all reason and justice for a people to intrust a Legislature with such powers, and therefore it cannot be presumed that they have done it. The Legislature may enjoin or permit, forbid or punish; they may declare new crimes, and establish rules of conduct for future cases; but they cannot change innocence into guilt, or punish innocence as a crime, or violate the rights of an antecedent lawful private contract, or the rights of private property. To maintain that our Federal or State Legislatures possess such powers, even if they had not been expressly restrained, would be a political heresy altogether inadmissible in our free, republican Government."

The principles here affirmed by the Supreme Court are unquestionably sound, and they apply as well to the citizens of this District as to those of the States. Congress, therefore, can do no act affecting the rights of property in the District, that they are prohibited to do in the States. With what propriety, then, can it be contended that Congress are bound to receive petitions on a subject upon which they have no constitutional right to act? Suppose individuals should petition Congress to pass a "law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof," or, to "abridge the freedom of speech or of the press," would it, or could it be regarded as a denial of the right of petition for Congress to reject such petitions? No sane man will so aver; because the petitioners would, in effect, require Congress to violate the Constitution. And would it not be equally a violation of the Constitution for Congress to pass an act depriving individuals of their property without "due process of law?" or to take "private property" without "just compensation?" Most unquestionably it would. Let us consider, then, for a moment, the nature of the demand made upon us by the Abolitionists; and let us see whether that demand be in accordance with their sturdy pretensions to piety and patriotism or not? They petition, besiege, and implore us—to do what? Why, sir, to repudiate the principles of the Federal compact; to violate the national faith; to violate the rights of private property; to trample upon the Constitution which we have sworn to support, and consequently to pollute and blacken our souls with the terrific crime of perjury! Yes, sir, all this do the Abolitionists require at our hands, when they ask us to abolish slavery—"as a great moral evil!"—in the District of Columbia.

But this is not all. The Abolitionists design to effect the abolition of slavery in the States also; and it is worse than idle—it is dishonest and insolently hypocritical in them to pretend that their schemes and efforts are limited to the District of Columbia and the Territories. Everybody knows, and many of the Abolitionists themselves confess that such is not the fact. It is as much their intention to accomplish the abolition of slavery in the States as in the Territories or in this District. Such being the case, then, let us examine, for a moment, the nature and tendency of the abolition movement. It will be acknowledged by all that, prior to the organization of the Federal Government, the States were, in all respects, and to all intents and purposes, sovereign and independent States or nations, and, as such, no one State, of course, could interfere with the rights or internal police of another State, without a violation of international law. An attempt, therefore, on the part of Massachusetts, for instance, to abolish slavery in Georgia, would have been truly and properly regarded by Georgia as an aggression upon her national rights, an assault upon her State sovereignty, and as a virtual denial of her independency as a State or nation. What would have been true then, would be equally true now. Any interference on the part of Massachusetts with the subject of slavery in Georgia, is as clearly wrong—as much an infraction of international law—since the formation of the Federal Government, as it would have been prior to that event. The States, under the Constitution are as essentially and as absolutely sovereign—where their sovereignty is not limited by the Constitution—as they were before the formation of the Constitution. And as slavery exists in the States—not by virtue of the Constitution, but by virtue of State sovereignty alone—it necessarily follows that it is without and beyond the power of the Federal Government to abolish it. Congress have no more right to interfere with the institution of slavery in the States than they have to interfere with the internal institutions of a foreign Power. The power to abolish slavery in the States never having been delegated to Congress, cannot be exercised by Congress without a violation of the Federal Constitution. On the subject of slavery, the States are not only independent of each other, but also of the General Government. The States having reserved to themselves all the rights of sovereignty, not directly and explicitly conceded to the Federal Government, they are just as free to exercise those reserved rights as if such Government had never been established. This proposition I hold to be self-evident. The right to hold slaves not having been ceded to the General Government, but retained by the States, it follows that an attempt on the part of the citizens of the non-slaveholding States, or of Congress, to interfere with the institution of slavery in any of the slaveholding States, would be a violation of the rights of sovereign and independent States or nations, and, of consequence, in direct and positive contravention of international law.

The Abolitionists, by warring against the rights and sovereignty of the States, encourage a violation of the national faith, sanction the infraction of law, and endanger the stability and integrity of the Federal Union. "In taking this ground," to adopt the language of one of the most original thinkers and energetic writers of the age,* "they (the Abolitionists) set the law at defiance, and are either a mob or a band of insurrectionists. In taking this ground, they justify all the lawless violence against which they have so vehemently declaimed. If one class of the community may set the laws at defiance, why may not another? If the Abolitionists may set at naught the international law, which gives the slaveholding States the exclusive jurisdiction of the slave question, why may not other citizens say they have a right, by mob law, to prevent them, if they can, from doing it. It were not difficult to convict the Abolitionists of preaching the very doctrines the mobocrats attempt to reduce to practice. They ought not, therefore, to think it strange that they have been but in too many instances the victims of lawless violence. When a portion of the community take it into their heads that they are wiser than the law, and commence the performance of acts in contravention of law, they ought to be aware that they open the door to every species of lawless violence, unchain the tiger, and must be answerable for the consequences."

What must be the certain and inevitable tendency of the abolition movement, and what its moral and political results, if its progress shall be onward and its march be throughout the Union? The consequences, alas! must be but too apparent and appalling to all reflecting men—to all who prize the Union—all who love America. The efforts of the Abolitionists, whether triumphant or not, cannot fail to rock the battlements, if not rive the foundations of the Republic. In the name of Liberty, they seek to overthrow her last fortress—the American Constitution. In the name of patriotism, they strive to revolutionize and uproot the very foundations of our Federal system. And in the name of humanity, they would tear down the prop and pillar of the last fond hope of human kind—the sovereignty of these United States! Such is the political character and tendency of the abolition movement. But this is not all. There are fearful moral evils involved in the designs of the Abolitionists—the violation of law and of plighted faith. Nay, more; allied to abolitionism is blind, reckless, feverish fanaticism. The wild, enthusiastic, and impetuous spirit which kindled the fires of Smithfield, and strewed the plains of Palestine with the corpses of the Crusaders, stands, with lighted and uplifted torch, hard by the side of abolitionism, ready to spread conflagration and death around the land.

But to return to the subject of slavery, and of the right of petition as relates to the District. The question will be asked, no doubt, if the citizens of the States have no legitimate right to petition Congress on the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia, and if Congress are not bound to receive such petitions, why is it that so many thousands have signed petitions of this character? The reason is obvious, sir. The prime movers in abolition proceedings, and the great body of the intelligent signers to abolition petitions, belong to the Federal school in politics. They are consolidationists, and repudiate the doctrine of State rights. They regard the powers of the Federal Government as omnipotent. Hence they believe the Federal Legislature not only have the power to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, but also in the States. The Federal or national bank party can believe nothing short of this. Sir, this whole abolition movement had its origin in a Federal heresy. Abolitionism is the veritable offspring of Federalism. It looks to centralization for the realization of its hopes, and the consummation of its purposes. Withdraw from abolitionism the sustaining arm of its parent Federalism, and it inevitably becomes helpless, and in despair falls prostrate in the dust. In confirmation of what I have just stated, I would appeal to facts—notorious, undeniable, incontrovertible facts. I would appeal to the known and acknowledged principles of the Federal party. I would appeal to the Journals of Congress—to the recorded votes of the members of this House on all test questions touching the subject of abolition. I would appeal to the history of the recent elections, and especially to the election in the State of New York, where it is well known every Abolitionist and free negro voted the Federal or Whig ticket. Nay, more. I would appeal to the ten thousand abolition petitions with which this Hall has been flooded for the last four years. I will hazard the declaration, and challenge and defy successful contradiction, that among the hundred thousand individuals that have signed petitions praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, there are not one hundred who are known to be friendly to the present Administration. Who will, who can, who dare deny the truth of this assertion?

If the Federal Legislature have power, under the Constitution, to "abridge the freedom of speech, or of the press," as has not only been contended for, but the exercise of such power actually sanctioned by the Federal party in the time of the elder Adams; and if they may charter a national bank, as is also contended, and delegate to such bank or corporation the power of legislation, in the grant of creating at pleasure other banks and other directors, within any of the States or Territories of this Union, in defiance of the wishes and in contravention of the laws of such States or Territories,* why, I would ask, should they not also claim the power to abolish slavery, not only in the District of Columbia, but also in the States? To contend that Congress have the constitutional power to do the first-named acts, and not the latter, would be sheer and gratuitous nonsense. I repeat, therefore, that the only hope of the Abolitionists is in the ultimate triumph of the Federal party and of Federal principles. So long as the Democratic or State-Rights party shall maintain the ascendancy, the efforts of Abolitionists will be comparatively innocuous; but whenever the political power of this country shall be swayed by Federal hands, the designs of the Abolitionists will well nigh have reached their consummation. Shall I be told that the Federalists are not all Abolitionists? This may be partially true; but then are not all Abolitionists necessarily Federalists? How can they expect to accomplish their object—the general abolition of slavery—but through the Federal power, and in pursuance of Federal principles? Certainly they cannot be so grossly ignorant as to suppose that the Democratic State-rights doctrine of strict construction would be favorable to their views, or that it would be possible to achieve their object through the influence of Democratic principles, or by virtue of Democratic legislation.

But again: if the Federalists are not now all Abolitionists, the time will soon come when they must become so as a party, or otherwise fall into a contemptible and hopeless minority. Which will they do? Will they repudiate abolitionism and Abolitionists, and, by so doing, insure their own political destruction? Or will they maintain and strengthen the league already formed with the Abolitionists, in the hope of securing and confirming their political existence and ascendancy? Which will they do, I ask? Why, sir, if we shall judge of their future course by their past conduct, it will be no difficult matter to determine what they will do. They will do, as they ever have done, sacrifice every principle of honor, of virtue, and of patriotism, if it be necessary to enable them to direct and control the political power and destinies of the Republic. When, let me ask, have the Federal party ever shown by their acts that their love of country was paramount to their love of power? Never, sir, never! But this is not all. The coalition between the Federalists and Abolitionists was not only to have been expected, for the reasons already stated, but from considerations of still greater pith and moment.

In all civilized communities, the two extremes of society—the affluent and the breadless, the powerful and the impotent—come together and war upon the center—the intermediate classes. Such ever has been, and ever will be the case. It is, in fact, a law of human society; and well do the Federal party understand the operations of this law. Hence their constant efforts to make the poor poorer, and the feeble more impotent. And hence it has ever been the policy, the aim and object of the Federal aristocracy of this country, to impoverish, depreciate, and degrade the Democracy; especially that portion who, in obedience to the mandate of Heaven, “eat their bread in the sweat of their face.” To accomplish this, their purpose, the Federalists have availed themselves of every means in their power. They have stigmatized the Democracy as infidels, lechers, agrarians. They have done more. They have vitiated the elective franchise by political coercion, by bribery, and corruption. And more than all, they have defrauded the Democracy of their equal political rights by means of unequal, unjust, and exclusive legislation. And now, in order to render the condition of the laboring classes of the North and East still more dependant and depressed, the Federal party have joined the Abolitionists, for the purpose of conferring upon the black laborer nominal freedom, and upon the white laborer virtual bondage! Yes, sir, for the especial purpose of humbling and degrading the Democracy, have the Federal party of the North and East joined in the abolition crusade; and whenever their object shall be attained, and the southern negro shall be brought to compete with the northern white man in the labor market, the moral and political character, the pride, power, and independence, of the latter are gone forever, and Federalism will have realized its fondest and most cherished hopes. But let me tell you, sir, the Democracy of the North and East are not unmindful of passing events. Since abolitionism assumed a political character, they have watched the movements of the Federal abolition party with deep concernment. They are conscious of the approaching danger, and are coolly and deliberately preparing to face it. Yes, sir, whenever the Democracy observe the Federal party prosecuting a political measure with zeal and vigor, as they now do abolitionism, they involuntarily, instinctively gather up their energies to meet and repel approaching mischief; and I warn them now, they cannot prepare too soon, nor with too much vigor and forecast. The crisis approaches. The fearful conflict, the mortal struggle, the tiger strife is at hand, and God alone can tell the result.

NOTE.—Mr. MOORE was called to order, in the course of his remarks, by General WADDY THOMPSON, of South Carolina, and by the decision of the Chair was prevented from concluding his speech. Mr. MOORE, before taking his seat, gave notice that he would publish all that he had intended to say, precisely in the same form and manner he would have done had no interruption taken place.

EMIGRANT INDIANS.

SPEECH OF HON. A. H. SEVIER,
OF ARKANSAS,

IN THE SENATE, February 23, 1839.

On the bill to provide for the security and protection of the emigrant and other Indian tribes west of the States of Missouri and Arkansas.

Mr. SEVIER said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The object of the bill now under consideration is, what its title purports, “to provide for the security and protection of the emigrant and other Indian tribes west of the States of Missouri and Arkansas.” And I might add that its object is also to provide for the security and protection of the frontier settlements of those States, and for the civilization and general welfare of the North American Indian race.

These, Mr. President, are the objects of the bill; and to accomplish them effectually, the bill proposes to establish, in the country set apart, by our laws and our treaties, for the permanent residence of the Indian tribes, an Indian territorial government.

That such an organization, for such a population, under our authority, is new, I am ready to admit. But should it appear, in the progress of this discussion, that such an establishment, on the score of efficiency and economy, is probably, of all others, the best calculated to secure and protect the Indians against each other, as well as our own citizens in their vicinity, I feel assured that though the measure may be new, it will receive, as it did at the last session of Congress, the marked and decided approbation of this body. The country proposed to be organized into a Territory is described in the first section of the bill, and is as follows:

“Beginning at the sources of the Puncah river; thence down said river to Missouri river; thence down the Missouri river, on the southwest bank, to the State of Missouri; thence along the western line of the State of Missouri to the northwest corner of the State of Arkansas; thence along the western boundary of the State of Arkansas to Red river; thence up Red river to a point two hundred miles in a direct course west of the State of Arkansas; thence in a direct line to the beginning.”

This country, it will be perceived, is beyond the boundaries of any State or organized Territory or white settlement. Its average breadth is something over two hundred miles, and its length about six hundred. It contains an area of about eighty millions of the public land, and is healthy, well watered, sufficiently timbered, and a great deal of it remarkably fertile, and is well adapted for agricultural and pastoral purposes. Lead ore, iron ore, coal, and salt springs have been discovered in it. In short, all those who reside there, as far as my knowledge extends, are well pleased with their situation. This, sir, is a short description of the country—a country which is held by them, by virtue of our treaties, in fee simple; and which, consequently, is forever beyond our reach, except in the double contingency of its abandonment by the tribes, or of their extinction; in either of which events it reverts to the United States, and comes once more into our possession, and is subject to our disposal as other public land. This perpetual tenure is reaffirmed in the first section of this bill.

Sir, until recently a vast majority of these Indians resided within the limits of the States; and while in that condition it was not in our power to do much for them; and the uncertain tenure by which they held their lands, their embarrassment by State legislation, and the constant encroachment upon their soil by the whites, dissuaded them from doing much for themselves. Most happily, Mr. President, these difficulties no longer exist. In pursuance of a wise, humane, and salutary policy, these Indians have been sent out from among us, and are placed side by side of each other, in their new homes, beyond the reach of further encroachment or intrusion. In this location, for the first time since the Revolution, we feel ourselves unrestrained, in our legislation for them, by any question of jurisdiction, or power, or policy; and, on their part, they have imbibed a stimulus to exertion, in feeling that they have a permanent home: in feeling untrammelled by State laws, and unmolested by unwelcome intruders. Their location is fortunate for us on another account. They are now remote from any unfriendly foreign influence in time of war; and in time of peace we find them a great convenience in carrying on, through their country, a profitable commerce to Santa Fé.

Being thus permanently settled, it now becomes our duty to view them in their new position, and to shape our legislation accordingly. We must now give up our temporary measures, and place our relations with them upon a firm and solid basis. We are bound by solemn treaty obligations to them, we are bound by duty to our own people in their vicinity, to provide permanently and effectually for the mutual peace and protection of all parties; and, to succeed in the accomplishment of these high national obligations, something else is required at our hands than forts, and troops, and bayonets, or agencies, or superintendencies, or the potent eloquence of annuities. Yet all of these, for the present, at least, I consider essential ingredients in carrying out the objects of this bill; but they are not all that is necessary. Something else is required; and that is the adoption of some obligatory, binding, international laws or regulations, for the amicable adjustment of all the differences which may occur among the respective tribes. The commission of fraud, or trespass, or felony, by an individual of one tribe upon an individual of another tribe, must cease to be a justifiable cause for war among them. These injuries must be redressed by law, in a peaceable manner.

Sir, previous to the commencement of the policy of locating the Indians west, it must be borne in mind that the indigenous tribes of that region, from time immemorial, had been engaged in wars not only among themselves, but had also been at war, for the same length of time, with the tribes east of the Mississippi river—with some of the identical Indians we have located in their immediate neighborhood. For example, the Osages, who were once formidable, frequently sent out war parties east of that river, and these tribes thus assailed, in their turn, invaded the Osage country west of that river.

The remembrance of these long existing feuds and mutual injuries is yet fresh in the recollection of all of them of the present day, and these reminiscences but too frequently display themselves in acts of open murder and secret assassination.

We have not only these indigenous tribes—who have never been substantially at peace—to govern, but we have also some seventeen or eighteen emigrant tribes to manage and control; and of the latter of these we have good reason to anticipate some trouble, on account of the ill feeling some of them bear us, arising from causes occurring previous to their removal; and these causes, whether real or imaginary, are not likely to be soon forgotten.

The tribes now residing in this Territory do not feel bound to peace by the existence of any international law. The only law, at this time, which they understand or appreciate, is that most destructive of all others, the law of retaliation.

There are now in the Territory about ninety-five thousand Indians, belonging to twenty-two separate tribes, and speaking as many different languages. Some few of these, the Choctaws, the Chickasaws, and Cherokees, have, to some extent, written laws for the internal government of their respective tribes. The Delawares, I understand, are about imitating their example. With these exceptions, the whole of these ninety-five thousand Indians, who are divided into upwards of twenty tribes, who speak different languages, who reside adjoining each other, and many of whom entertain for each other mutual hereditary animosities, have for their government no international law.

To avoid the disastrous consequences which must inevitably result from this critical condition of things, this bill is proposed, by which it is thought these twenty-two tribes may be induced to adopt some general code by which their differences, of whatever character, may be amicably adjusted.

This important object, the Committee on Indian Affairs believe, can be effected under the auspices and influence of the United States, and not with their countenance and support; and I need not tell you, sir, that we feel great solicitude upon this subject, as we believe that unless something of this character is speedily done, we shall have war among the Indians; and when those wars are once begun, we all know that they will not be confined to Indian soil, but that they will spread and extend themselves to our border settlements, and involve them in their dreadful consequences.

This important view of this subject seems to have been taken by the proper department some years ago. In 1833 a commission was constituted by our Government, the object of which was to promote harmony and good feeling among the Indian tribes. In 1834 similar efforts for similar purposes were made by the Government, and with some success. The chiefs of different tribes were brought together in council, and through the instrumentality of our agent, mutual engagements of peace and friendship were entered into by those chiefs; and for twelve or eighteen months, these engagements had a most salutary effect. But for the last year or two, for some cause or other unknown to me, these councils have ceased to command the special attention of the Government; and losing that support and patronage, they have been abandoned by the chiefs themselves, and hence stealing and murder, as formerly, have once more become, with many of them, the order of the day.

To show you, sir, to what extent these things are carried on in that quarter, I will trouble you with reading a few paragraphs from a work to which, in the course of my remarks, I shall have occasion frequently to refer. The work is entitled "An Annual Register of Indian Affairs in the Indian Territory," and is edited by the Rev. Isaac McCoy, with whom it is my good fortune to be slightly acquainted; a gentleman of extensive information, of fervent piety, of active enterprise; one, sir, who has devoted the last twenty years of his life in the laudable efforts of striving to civilize, Christianize, educate, and improve the moral condition of the Indian. It is from the printed work of such an author that I will now read to the Senate a few paragraphs:

"In 1833 the Government convened councils of a general nature, of delegates from various tribes, and induced them to exchange mutual promises to be at peace with one another. This measure, though it touched the subject but slightly, nevertheless produced a good effect. All parties, for some time, abstained from depredation and murder. These councils not being repeated, the parties felt less restraint, and ultimately returned to their former unkind treatment of one another; and thefts and murders have become more frequent with each succeeding year.

"The Osages are accused of destroying hogs and cattle belonging to the neighboring tribes, to a considerable amount. Horse stealing is frequent in divers places, carried on by the worthless of different tribes. By some, the work is almost reduced to system. They will steal horses in the southern parts of the Territory, or in Texas, and convey them north, and there steal others, and take back on their return.

"But, besides the renegades, whose crimes are disapproved by their well principled countrymen, there are others engaged in these and in worse practices, for which they are honored by their respective tribes, according to Indian custom. The Kauzaws have brought into their villages at least thirty stolen horses within the last summer and autumn. The Osages have stolen, perhaps, a greater number, among which are some valuable horses belonging to the citizens of the United States. In August last, a large drove of horses was stolen from one of the Osage villages.

"In April, 1838, a few Pawnees made a friendly visit to the Sauks and Ioways, on Missouri. As they were returning to their homes, a party of Kauzaws fell in with them and attacked them, and killed one.

"In August last, the Kauzaws and Osages sent out a party, consisting of about eighty warriors. They surprised a party of Pawnees, and took eleven scalps. Four of their men were killed, and two wounded. A few of the united party separated from the main body. These also had a battle, and took five scalps, making seventeen killed by those tribes, of whom we have obtained certain information. Reports of other murders, committed by other tribes, have been in circulation. On the 1st of September last, a war party of about twenty Kauzaws were out, the result of which we have not heard.

"In the months of June, July, and August, the Rev. M. Merrill, missionary to the Osages, accompanied that tribe on their buffalo hunt, which lasted more than two months. They saw three war parties of Pawnees, the first was a party of thirty, who had been to the Cheyennes to steal horses. They had, first, a skirmish with the Cheyennes, and had been defeated, with the loss of one killed and one badly wounded. They next fell in with a party of Osages, and were again defeated with the loss of two men killed.

"The second was a party of ten, which had started to the Osage villages to steal horses. One of their party was bitten by a snake, which induced them to return without accomplishing anything.

"The third party said they were going to the Cheyennes to steal horses, but it was believed that they designed committing depredations upon the Osages.

"Near the western boundary of the Cherokee country a bloody battle was fought the last summer, (1838), between the Kiawwas and Camanches on the one side, and the Cheyennes on the other.

"A detachment of dragoons, in command of Lieutenant Northup, was on an expedition in that country, and arrived at the ground two days after the battle. The Kiawwas and Camanches were encamped, and had heard of the approach of the detachment. As the Cheyennes advanced to attack their enemies, they were met by the latter about a mile from the encampment. The latter were slowly beaten back into their encampment, though disputing desperately every inch of ground. The whole scene was in an open prairie. The women dug holes in the earth, in which to hide themselves and children. The Cheyennes continued to make dreadful havoc of their wretched enemies, and would have soon reduced the whole to a heap of corpses, when a messenger from camp mounted a horse, and set off to meet the detachment of dragoons to solicit assistance. As he was leaving a Cheyenne, who understood the language of the Camanches, was informed by one of the latter, that the messenger had gone to hasten the white men and Osages, where they every moment expected to come to their assistance. The Cheyennes instantly retired, leaving fourteen dead on the ground, besides the dead that had been carried off during the action. Fifty-eight of the Kiawwas and Camanches were killed. More than one hundred horses lay dead on the ground, chiefly within the encampment.

"From time immemorial many of the Osages have been in the habit of spending the winter in the country east of their present villages from fifty to one hundred and fifty miles. The country is now within the State of Missouri, and covered by a very sparse white population. The latter found the Osages troublesome, and in the autumn of 1837 drove them back to their own side of the line; and in several instances, in which the Osages seemed obstinately inclined to remain, they were severely whipped. The Osages, exceedingly distressed for food, being almost in a state of actual starvation, for some time continued, at the risk of life and limb, to cross the line by stealth, with women and children, for the purpose of hunting the game for food. The whites having reason to fear that habit and hunger might have such influence upon these wretched people that a greater force than they could embody would become necessary for their expulsion, adopted measures to increase their strength, and in the month of October an army of five hundred militia came to their assistance. They scoured the country along the line a distance of upwards of one hundred miles, and found about one hundred of these miserable beings—men, women, and children—and conveyed them across the line into the Indian country. Notwithstanding these admonitions, the more severe of which had been so deeply impressed upon the back as to be seen and felt for many weeks, hunger within, and staring in the countenance of others, including mothers, wives, and children, urged them to continue secretly to cross the line. Their sign was frequently discovered by the white inhabitants, who believed that their stocks of cattle and swine suffered by these incursions.

"In March, 1838, it was discovered that two hogs had been killed by a party of Osages. Nineteen of the citizens armed themselves with rifles, and were in pursuit, with a view of flogging the depredators. The latter were overtaken near the line between the whites and Indians. The Osages were in camp: the number of men about twenty, besides the women and children. The whites asked for the persons who had committed the depredation. Some altercation followed, and, in the mean time, an Osage was seen loading his gun, with which he said he designed to kill one of the party with whom he was quarreling. While he was in the act of loading, he was shot dead by two of the party. Others fired on both sides. The Osages fled into the woods, having two men killed and one wounded. Two of the whites were wounded, one of whom died a few days afterwards."

Sir, relying upon this information, as the Senate must, I think they will agree with me that many months will not elapse, unless something be done to arrest these depredations, and murders, and bloody battles, before we shall witness in that quarter of our country Indian wars upon a grander scale than ever existed before upon this continent. Yes, sir, and at the same time more destruction, arising from the circumstances of their proximity to each other, and of being better armed now than they ever were before.

Sir, the Committee on Indian Affairs, viewing the subject in the light I have endeavored to present it to the Senate, and wishing to furnish the remedy for the existing evil, offer this bill for your acceptance. They offer it as a measure of peace, and one which, in their opinion, is amply sufficient, if faithfully administered by the Executive authorities, to preserve from extermination the wretched fragment of the Indian race. These are among the leading objects of the bill, but they are not the only objects. We desire something more. We desire to civilize and improve the condition of the Indian, by imparting to him our institutions and religion, and our arts and sciences; and to do this successfully he must have peace and repose.

Sir, when we remember who these Indians were, and what they are, we anticipate, in this most noble, disinterested, and benevolent enterprise, the efficient aid of the Senate. Let us, upon this occasion, lift ourselves above our prejudices, and forget, for a moment, the history of the bloody and exterminating wars, which were carried on upon this continent for several centuries, between our ancestors and the natives of this country; contests, as we all know, which have resulted in the subjugation and overthrow of the one race by the arms and skill and courage of the other. Sir, the millions of these natives, who once inhabited the Atlantic coast, are at this day nowhere to be found. And this extensive and invaluable country, which was theirs, and for which they fought, is ours now. We hold undisputed dominion over it. We have derived it from them by gift, or by purchase, or by conquest. No descendants of theirs, if there be descendants of the original proprietors, is found to question our title to the whole of it. Let us remember the kind and hospitable reception of our ancestors by the natives of the country; a reception which has been perpetuated by carved figures in the walls of the rotundo of the Capitol. And in remembering these things, let us this day step forward and do something for our wretched dependants worthy of a great, a merciful, and generous christian people. Public sentiment will sustain us in such an effort. Sir, our intercourse with the Indian, which has met with the approbation of our constituents, has undergone, during the last few years, a very material change. We no longer purchase his lands for beads, and tobacco, and paints, and strouding, and beaver traps, and other such worthless gew-gaws. No, sir; no. We give him now a fair equivalent in something more substantial. We give him implements of husbandry, cattle, hogs, houses, farmers, mechanics, and teachers, and heap up to him money in almost countless thousands. And what, Mr. President, have been the happy results growing out of this new, though just and liberal policy? It is most grateful to the heart of humanity to contemplate it. Results have sprung from it which no one, a few years ago, ever contemplated.

Sir, in 1817, a little upwards of twenty years ago, when the first effective step was taken to colonize the Indians west of the Mississippi, we find it stated in the preamble to the Cherokee treaty of that date that the object of this colonization, as understood and expressed by both parties, was exclusively for hunting. Improvement or civilization of these emigrants was not dreamed of by the worthy negotiators of that instrument. We find in the sixth article of that treaty these words:

"The United States do also bind themselves to give to all of the poor warriors who may remove to the west side of the Mississippi, one rifle-gun and ammunition, one blanket, and one brass kettle, or, in lieu of it, one beaver trap, which is to be considered a full compensation for the improvements which they leave."

Sir, they went thither with the avowed purpose, and with the necessary accouterments, for remaining in their original barbarity and ignorance, and to enjoy unmolested their savage propensities for war and for the chase.

The number of those who emigrated was about three thousand. Instead of pursuing the chase, as was anticipated, they went to work; and in 1835, in the space of about eighteen years, they had increased to four thousand. They had acquired property, had become agriculturists, and had become civilized to a great degree, as I will show you by referring again to the Register of Indian Affairs. Mr. McCoy says:

SENATE.

"They own numerous salt springs, three of which are worked by Cherokees. The amount of salt manufactured is probably about one hundred bushels per day.

"They also own two lead mines. The salt works and their lead mines are in the eastern portion of their country; and all the settlements yet formed are within this eastern portion, which embraces about two and a half million acres.

"Like the Choctaw, the Cherokee nation embraces all conceivable conditions between refinement, intelligence, and wealth, and the opposite extremes but little removed from the original state. The earlier emigrants are, perhaps, in more comfortable condition than the same proportion of any other tribe within the Territory. But with the large accession of late emigrants, there has necessarily been an augmentation of uncomfotableness.

"Some of their own immense herds of cattle. We counted upwards of two hundred at one time within sight, grazing on the prairies, belonging to one man; and it was thought he owned about one hundred more. It was thought by some intelligent white men in their country that within five years past they had sold between six and seven thousand head of cattle.

"They probably own three thousand horses, fifteen thousand five hundred hogs, six hundred sheep, one hundred and ten wagons, a plow, and often several plows to each farm, several hundred spinning-wheels, and one hundred looms.

"They cultivate all kinds of culinary vegetables common to the western country; raise corn in abundance, and have commenced the growing of wheat. Their fields are inclosed with rail fences. They have, generally, good log dwellings, (for a new country,) many of which have stone chimneys to them, with plank floors, all erected by themselves. Their houses are furnished with plain tables, chairs, and bedsteads; and with table and kitchen furniture, nearly, or quite, equal to the dwellings of white people of new countries.

"They have seven native merchants, one regular physician, and, unfortunately, several steam doctors. Several of them have, at divers times, become partners in large contracts for furnishing the United States Army and emigrant Indians. The traveler finds among them houses of public entertainment, with neat and comfortable accommodations.

The Cherokee Government, though highly creditable to them, is not fully systematic and judicious, like that of the Choctaws. This may be accounted for by the unsettled condition of the affairs of the Cherokees for some years past. The laws extant in the Territory are such as have been adopted by the earlier emigrants, since their settlement in this country, and are not a transfer of the code to which the larger portion of the tribe were subordinate on the east of the Mississippi.

"Their settlements are divided into four districts, each of which elects, for the term of two years, two members of the national council—the title of which is 'The General Council of the Cherokee Nation.' By law, it meets annually on the first Monday in October. They have three chiefs, which, till lately, have been chosen by the general council. Hereafter they are to be elected by the people. The approval of the chiefs is necessary to the passage of a law; but an act upon which they have fixed their veto may become a law by the vote of two thirds of the council. The council consists of two branches. The lower is denominated the Committee, and the upper the Council. The concurrence of both is necessary to the passage of a law. The chiefs may call a council at pleasure, and in several other respects they retain, in some degree, the authority common to Indian chiefs. Two judges belong to each district, who hold courts when necessary. Two officers, denominated light-horsemen, in each district, perform the duties of sheriffs. A company of six or seven, denominated light-horsemen, the leader of whom is styled captain, constitute a national corps of regulators, to prevent infractions of the law, and to bring to justice offenders."

This, Mr. President, is the present condition of these three thousand Indians who, in 1819, went, as I have already told you, west of the Mississippi. These are they, the wildest of their tribe, who, about twenty years ago, left behind them their own people, their hallowed homes, and the graves of their forefathers, because their offensive enemy, civilization, was successfully approaching their wigwams.

Sir, the poorest and most miserable of the indigenous tribes of that region, in consequence of a change in our policy towards them, and in consequence of having a permanent home, and of being undisturbed by our people, seem to have imbibed a spirit of industry and improvement, and to be rapidly rising up from their prostrated state of degradation. Yes, the poor Otoo, whose naked body was never covered, until lately, with any other garment than a buffalo skin, is now seen holding the handles of a plow, and is to be seen busily engaged in tilling the earth for the subsistence of himself, his wife, and children.

Mr. President, within the limits of the proposed Territory there are eighteen emigrant tribes, who number in population about seventy-three thousand two hundred, and there are eight indigenous tribes, whose aggregate number is about twenty-one thousand six hundred, making, in all, about ninety-five thousand. In this estimate I have not included the wild Indians of the prairie or the mountains, or those residing north of the Missouri, or around the sources of the Mississippi, as all of these are without the limits of the Territory. Of those whose condition we are now considering, the principal and most influential, and, with a few individual exceptions, by far the best informed and civilized, are the Choctaws, the Chickasaws, the Cherokees, and Creeks. Many of these have learned our language, our religion, our literature, our agricultural pursuits, and mechanic arts. Some of them studied our forms of Government, and have organized their Government for their respective tribes, in imitation of ours. They have printing presses among them; they publish newspapers in the English and Indian languages. They print their school books and almanacs, &c.; and Guess, a full-blooded Cherokee, an untutored savage, has had the lasting honor of inventing for the Cherokees their alphabet. Several of the tribes provided for the establishment of schools, several of which are now in operation, and at which some hundreds of Indian youths are now annually educated. Several of the tribes have set apart large sums of money, forever, of which our Government is the trustee, for purposes of education. And, sir, as you are well aware, there are now annually educated, at your residence, in the heart of Kentucky, some two or three hundred Indian boys, at the voluntary expense of the Indians themselves. These tribes have among them several shrewd, intelligent, wealthy, native merchants, who annually import into the country many thousand dollars' worth of merchandise.

They have mills and gins and cotton farms, and in 1837 the Choctaws made and sent to market six hundred bales of cotton, which was worth upwards of twenty thousand dollars.

They raise every year a large surplus of corn, hogs, and cattle, which they dispose of, in part, by contract, to Government, to feed the emigrating Indians and supply the troops of our garrisons. But, sir, as this inquiry must be interesting to the Senate, I will be more particular, and read a few extracts from the work I have previously referred to. Speaking of the Choctaws, the author of this work says:

"They are improving in civilization and comfort. Their houses and fields indicate a good degree of industry. Many have large farms. They own much live-stock, such as horses, cattle, sheep, and swine: are pretty well supplied with farming utensils. They own about six hundred negro slaves.

"They own three flouring mills, two cotton gins, eighty-eight looms, and two hundred and twenty spinning wheels. They have thirteen native merchants, besides white men engaged in the same business.

"In respect to civilization, there is great difference among them. Some have fully adopted the habits of civilized man, many are in comfortable circumstances in life, and some may be said to be wealthy. From these more favorable circumstances all grades of condition exist, down to the Indian who is advanced but little in civilization.

"The best evidence of the improving condition of the Choctaws is seen in an entire change in their government, which they have effected, from the barbarous to the civilized. We cannot now assemble chiefs and headmen among them, and transact business with them relating to their people, as is the custom among uncivilized tribes. The system of chieftaincies has been abolished.

"The tribe denominates itself 'The Choctaw Nation.' It has adopted a written constitution of government, similar to the Constitution of the United States. Their declaration of rights secures to all equal privileges, liberty of conscience, excluding all religious tests; it secures trial by jury, and, in a word it provides for all that is felt to be necessary in the incipient stages of political existence. The constitution may be amended by the national council.

"Their country is divided into four judicial districts. Three of these districts annually elect, by popular vote, each nine members of the national council, and the fourth elects, by the same mode, thirteen members; in all, forty. These are allowed three dollars a day while engaged in legislating. Within each district an officer, denominated a chief, is elected for the term of four years. The national council meets annually on the first Monday in October. It consists of forty members, the necessary clerks, a light-horseman, (sergeant-at-arms), and doorkeeper. It is also attended by the chiefs, who have an honorary seat provided for them by the side of the speaker, but they have no voice in debate in council. Their signatures are necessary to the passage of a law. They may veto an act, but it may become a law by the concurrence of two thirds of the council notwithstanding. The council is styled 'The General Council of the Choctaw Nation.' It adopts by-laws for its government while in session; it elects a speaker and other requisite officers, and appoints appropriate committees to adjust matters for legislation. All writings are in English, but are read off in the Choctaw language. All discussions are carried on in the Choctaw language. Each member, when about to speak, rises, and respectfully addresses the Speaker, using the Choctaw word for Speaker, adding the syllable ma, which nearly corresponds with the English Mr. or sir. The question is put in the form customary in legislative bodies, and the vote is given by rising. The preliminary of a law is, 'Be it enacted by the General Council of the Choctaw Nation.' In future the constitution and laws will be printed in both the Choctaw and English language. By the constitution the government is composed of four departments, viz: legislative, executive, judicial, and military. Three judges are elected by the people in each district, who hold inferior and superior courts within their respective districts. Ten light-horsemen in each district perform the duties of sheriffs, and the sum of $200 per annum is allowed to each district for their compensation. An act has recently been passed for the organization of the militia.

"Individual Indians have frequently become civilized, and subject to the laws of white men, but the Choctaws furnish the first instance among the aboriginal tribes of America, of self-government, divested of the barbarous customs which belong to the savage state. It is truly gratifying that the laws of a commonwealth have been established within the Indian territory so soon after the plan of organizing an Indian government had been undertaken by the Government of the United States. It evinces the capacity of the natives to think and act for themselves; and it may be looked upon as a sure presage of the success ultimately of the design of the Government to place all the tribes in the enjoyment of such blessings.

"The following brief narrative of the manner in which our business was attended to by the last General Council, to which we presented for consideration the bill for the organization of the Indian territory, does not fully comport with the design of the Register; nevertheless, as it relates to a period which will be marked as a new era in the history of the Indians, and as the reader cannot feel perfectly satisfied with general remarks, because, if we would understand the true condition of a people, we must have before us an unvarnished story of their affairs in common life, we will insert it:

"On our arrival we informed a member of the council that we had been commissioned to transact business with the Choctaws, and inquired in what manner it could be brought before them. He said a written notice must be sent to the Speaker; and politely offered to serve us in presenting any papers that we desired. A communication was accordingly conveyed to the Speaker, who, in due form, submitted it to the consideration of the council. It was decided by a vote that we should, at a given time, be introduced into the council. A seat was prepared, an interpreter appointed, and a committee of two sent to inform us, and to conduct us to our seat. Having received our communication, the subject was for the present dismissed by the council, to be considered in its proper place in the order of business.

"There was in the vicinity only one house of public entertainment. For want of room in the tavern, and for the sake of economy, a majority of the members, and of others in attendance, boarded themselves in camp. This session lasted much longer than had been anticipated. The consequence was some inconvenience for want of supplies, and great anxiety to adjourn, which with many was increased on account of their business requiring their presence at their homes. Notwithstanding this state of anxiety, on a Saturday night they unanimously voted not to sit on the Sabbath, and, by a unanimous vote, invited a minister of the Gospel to preach in the hall, and appointed an interpreter, and a committee to notify him. All this was done without a hint from a white man to prompt it. A congregation never beheld with more propriety under the preaching of a chaplain in Congress Hall than did this in the national hall of the Choctaws.

"Our business was referred to a committee, which reported. The council, in the discussion of the subject and in making out its response, sat with closed doors. Their communication was sent to us by a messenger.

"We then informed one of the members that we should be happy to take leave of the council in a formal and friendly manner. They passed a resolution, by which they sent a member and invited us within the bar, and heard from us a brief farewell address, at the conclusion of which the speaker and all the members rose from their seats, and remained standing until we had retired.

"They sit in council with heads uncovered, excepting some in Indian costume, who wear turbans. There were many animated speeches. We could not understand a single sentence, but were charmed with the gracefulness with which the speakers disengaged themselves from their seats, and delivered their speeches. Intonation of voice was sweet, and gesticulation appropriate; both of them free from those extremes of high and low, of storm and calm, which too often injure speeches in legislative bodies. Some of those who were prominent in debate were full-blooded Indians, in the Indian costume.

"Many of the counselors, no doubt, will soon figure as statesmen. We forbear, in this place, to mention names, because we should be compelled either to do injustice to some, or to fill up too much space. On one occasion a very animated debate arose, in which two ardent young men responded to each other in two or three pretty long speeches, in which they used written notes."

Of the Creeks, he states:

"They cultivate corn, and all the vegetables common to the climate and country. They spin, weave, sew, and follow other pursuits of industry. Their fields and dwellings resemble those of white people in new settlements. Many of them have large stocks of cattle. The contractors for furnishing supplies to emigrant Indians have purchased of the earlier emigrants vast quantities of corn; among others, the annexed amount of purchases have been made from the following persons prior to the crop of 1837:

Of Lewis Perryman .....	$3,650 worth of corn.
Of Mr. Hardrich .....	4,500 "
Of Daniel Grayson .....	1,500 "
Of Richard Grayson .....	1,500 "
Of George Grayson .....	1,500 "
Of Mrs. J. McIntosh, (widow,) .....	1,400 "

In all.....$14,050 "

"Before the crop of 1837 had been harvested, contracts were made for upwards of twenty-five thousand dollars' worth of corn. Vast quantities still remain unsold. Even the latter emigrants, who arrived in their country the winter and spring previous to the cropping season of 1837, though they had to prepare new fields, in the months of September and October of the same year sold to the contractors $10,000 worth of corn. They have two native merchants.

"Notwithstanding the Creeks, as a people, are in the rear of the Choctaws and Cherokees in regard to civilization, there is much intelligence, refinement, and wealth among them."

Sir, I will not weary the patience of the Senate by further extracts; I will only add that all the statements which I have read to the Senate will be found to be fully corroborated by the official reports of Messrs. Armstrong and Brown and others, made at the last session to the War Department, and which were, as the Senate will remember, communicated through that Department to Congress. These reports were printed, and are now to be found in our public Journals of the last session. Should any honorable Senator desire further information upon this interesting subject, I refer him to these reports.

Mr. President, these are the people in whose behalf the Committee on Indian Affairs invoke your legislation. These are the people whom we desire, in the faithful discharge of our covenants with them, to preserve from exterminating wars among themselves. These are they whom we desire to civilize and improve, and to keep from falling back into their original state of savagism, from which they have so recently and but so partially emerged.

Here, Mr. President, I should conclude my remarks, were it not that an impression seems to prevail in the minds of some gentlemen that the Indians will not willingly accept of this bill or comply voluntarily with the terms it proposes. Sir, if no attempts had been made to ascertain their sentiments upon this subject, I should say, with great confidence, from my knowledge of the Indian character, that such impressions are not well founded.

The Senate will recollect that this is the third time this bill has been introduced into this body, and that the Indians have been very minutely apprised of our movements upon this, as they are, generally, upon all subjects connected with their interests. Many of them have seen copies of this bill, and have had its several provisions explained to them. Those who understood it have given their assent to it in the most unequivocal manner. Eleven of the tribes have assented to the terms of this bill, and should it become a law, are ready to comply with each and all of its provisions. But it is true, as I understand, that the Choctaws look upon it with jealousy, and have been induced to consider it as the first step for their removal further towards the "setting sun;" and, on that account, as I understand their agent to state, they disapprove of it. Sir, let them understand this bill, and, more than that, our motives in passing it, and I will guaranty that they will accept of it most gratefully. Why should they, of all others the most interested in such a measure, refuse or be unwilling to meet their brethren in council to form a confederacy for general purposes? I can see no good reason for their refusal.

By the fifth section of this bill it is made the duty of the superintendent to "invite the chiefs of the various tribes, or parts of tribes, embraced in this act, to unite in a general council, for the purpose of forming a confederation, for regulating the intercourse and preserving peace with each other, and for their assent to such of the provisions of this act as may require their cooperation or assent; and such articles of confederation and such assent shall not be binding on any tribe unless subsequently assented to by such tribe in council, or by its delegates duly authorized for that purpose."

Is there anything in this section, Mr. President, (and this section is the essence of the whole bill,) which looks like the first step for driving them further to the west? And, by the first section of the bill, after describing the boundary of the Territory, and giving it a name, it is stipulated that those lands "shall be, and the same are hereby, reserved for the use of the various Indian tribes who have, or may have, a right to the same; and the faith of the United States is hereby pledged, that such parts of said Indian Territory as have been, or shall be, granted or ceded to any of the Indian tribes, are, and shall be, secured to them and their descendants, and the United States will cause patents to be issued to said tribes, respectively, according to the terms of such grants or cessions." Has this the appearance of a disposition, on our part, of harboring the treacherous design of driving our red brethren further to the west? No, sir; no such base treachery and violation of our plighted faith, I am proud to say, has ever yet sullied the escutcheon of an American Senate. The Senate, sir, is incapable of stooping to such degradation, or of packing upon their consciences such a load of infamy. Sir, we have no such views; our object is to benefit, and not to injure; to preserve, and not to destroy. Sir, permit me to inform my red brethren that, if ever they are intruded upon by our citizens, that intrusion will approach them from the west, or from the shores of the Pacific, beyond the Rocky Mountains. Let them look for the "pale faces" in that direction, for they have nothing to fear from them from any other quarter. In short, sir, they object to the bill, not for what it contains, but for what it does not contain.

In any event, this will be a harmless measure, as it can operate only upon those who voluntarily assent to it. And should it be rejected, after fully understanding it, and, in consequence of that rejection, the evils we anticipate should fall upon those unfortunate human beings, it will, at least, be a consolation for us to reflect that, as humane guardians, we have done our duty in trying to avoid those calamities.

By the eighth section of the bill, we give to the confederated tribes a delegate, to reside at the seat of Government. Being a member of that committee whose duty it is to take cognizance of all subjects relating to Indian affairs, I feel authorized in saying, that I have no doubt that the interests both of the United States and of the confederated tribes would be promoted by having a delegate here to consult and advise with. Such a boon, addressed to aspiring ambition, it is thought, would also have a happy tendency.

Before concluding my remarks, it is proper for me to say a word or two upon the subject of administering the Indian territorial government. And upon this particular branch of the inquiry I beg leave to avail myself of the estimates of my friend and late colleague upon the committee, [Mr. Tipton,] who, from his superior knowledge, and the great time he has devoted to the consideration of this subject, in all its various bearings, is much more to be relied upon than are any calculations of mine. I regret, sir, that any circumstance should have called him from his seat before this bill had been disposed of; and, most of all, such a circumstance as that of domestic, family afflictions.

The parallel which he draws in administering the intercourse laws in the proposed Territory, and the expenses of the government proposed by this bill, was stated by him in his speech of the last year. He says:

Present annual expenditures under existing laws within the proposed Indian Territory.

"At the end of the first four years after the territorial government goes into operation, one half of the agents, sub-agents, and interpreters may be dispensed with; and after the expiration of eight years, every agent, sub-agent, and interpreter may be discharged, leaving the superintendent, the chiefs, and the general council the management of the entire business of the territory. Among the emigrant tribes, there are a number of young men of talent, well educated, and wanting employment. These men, with the assistance of the superintendent and council, will be able to manage all the business for the people within their Territory. Offices will be created for them to aspire to, and it will, I have no doubt, be found the interest of both our Government and the Indians, at no distant day, to withdraw every white man holding an office from the Territory, leaving the Indians to manage their own concerns for themselves.

"The expenditures will soon be still further reduced, by discontinuing the grantees at present employed among the Indians, under treaty stipulations, as above stated, all of whom, excepting two, are engaged for limited periods, namely:

During the pleasure of the President .....	18
At the discretion of Congress .....	4
For five years .....	4
For ten years .....	8
For sixteen years .....	3
For twenty years .....	4
For thirty years .....	5
Uncertain .....	11

"Some of them have been several years engaged, and may soon be discharged. In the year 1859, the term of service for the longest engagements will expire. At that period we can withdraw the last of our mechanics from the service of the Indians, and it is proper that we should do so.

"It will become the duty of the head of the Indian department to inform the Indians that our Government will, at the end of the present engagements for white mechanics, discontinue them. The superintendent and all other officers of the Territory will see the necessity of placing Indian youths in workshops, either within their Territory or elsewhere, to learn all branches of mechanism, to be prepared for the time when our present engagements to furnish them will have expired.

"When we shall discontinue the practice of furnishing mechanics and laborers to work for the Indians, the expenses of the territorial government will be reduced to $6,100 per annum."

Such, sir, are the calculations he makes, and I have no doubt but they will be found in practice to be very correct.

Mr. President, allow me, before I conclude, to express, in a word, my regret that this bill does not seem to find favor with the department. It is a measure which the Committee on Indian Affairs, backed by the late and present Executive, have been striving for years to consummate. I regret this unexpected opposition, because for that officer I entertain the kindest feelings; and believe the sentiments he expressed in his late report are the honest convictions of his mind; and yet I must say that I have read his report without being convinced of my error.

I will trouble the Senate no further. We, sir, have discharged what we consider our duty in bringing this matter before the Senate, and in their hands I leave it.

NORTHERN FRONTIER.

SPEECH OF HON. J. H. BRONSON,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 27, 1839.

The general appropriation bill being under consideration, Mr. BELL moved to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. BRONSON said:

MR. SPEAKER: I have not risen at this time to go into a general examination of the expenses of the Government or the appropriations contained in this bill, but shall confine myself chiefly to such as relate to the northern frontier, which I am more particularly induced to do at this moment in consequence of the remarks of the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] from whom we have just heard a reiteration of some charges which have before been made by that honorable gentleman in relation to the course of the Administration respecting the border difficulties on that frontier, and the action of the Northern Frontier—Mr. Bronson.

Ho. OF REPS.

Executive in respect to that matter. I understand the gentleman from Tennessee to charge that the Administration are mainly in fault for the unfortunate events which have taken place on the northern border, in which our own citizens have been engaged, and that it has been owing principally, if not entirely, to the want of prompt, energetic, and efficient action on the part of the Executive of our Government, that our own citizens have taken part in those troubles, and that the spirit which has been manifested by the border inhabitants in relation to the Canadian difficulties would have been speedily and easily suppressed if the President had taken early and decided ground on the matter. Sir, the gentleman could not have been led into a greater error, respecting the conduct of the Executive, and I apprehend he has not well remembered the history, or examined the documents, in reference to these matters, or he could not have fallen into such a course of argument.

I recollect, some time ago, when this House was in Committee of the Whole, to have heard the same charges substantially from the honorable gentleman from Tennessee; and, in alluding to the appropriations which had been made for the protection of the northern frontier, and which he stated at $1,000,000, (but which I believe were only $625,000,) the honorable gentleman insisted that "every cent of that expenditure might have been saved to the nation, if the President, instead of temporizing and waiting to see what public sentiment would be, and suffering the feeble proclamations of the Governors of the States to go forth as a substitute for his own, had, upon the first indication of disturbances in that quarter, issued such a proclamation as he did in November last;" and the gentleman added, that "that did not suit the policy of an electioneering Administration; it was hazarding quite too much to take ground in advance of public opinion," &c.

These charges are, in my opinion, wholly unfounded in fact; and I shall endeavor to show to this House, and to the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, that they are so. Why, sir, so far from there being any want of prompt action on the part of the President, or any hesitation as to the course which he should pursue, the truth is that he did, at the earliest moment, take ground, openly and decisively, respecting the interference of our own citizens with the Canadian troubles, and that, from that moment, the course of the Administration has been uniform and unceasing in endeavoring to prevent any violations of our laws and treaties, and to preserve our neutrality by every means in its power, and by all lawful means to restrain our citizens from a participation in the affairs of their Canadian neighbors.

Without recurring to facts notorious, and within the knowledge of every citizen on the frontier, I beg to call the attention of the House to the documents which have been printed and laid upon our tables, and which show what action the Executive has taken on this subject. As early as the 7th of December, 1837, and in the very outset of the troubles in Lower Canada, and before any difficulty had arisen in Upper Canada, the Secretary of State, by the direction of the President, addressed circulars to the Governors of Vermont, New York, and Michigan, and also to the United States district attorneys in those States, of which the following are copies:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
WASHINGTON, December 7, 1837.

SIR: A contest having commenced in a territory of Great Britain adjoining the United States, between portions of the population and Government, during which attempts may be made to violate the laws of the United States, passed to preserve the relations of amity with foreign Powers, and to fulfil the obligations of our treaties with them, by the directions of the President I have the honor to request the attention of your Excellency to any movements of that character that may be contemplated in the State of New York, and your prompt interference to arrest the parties concerned, if any preparations are made of a hostile nature against any foreign Power in amity with the United States.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN FORSYTH.

Governor of the State of New York.

[The same to the Governors of Vermont and Michigan.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
WASHINGTON, December 7, 1837.

SIR: In the course of the contest which has commenced in a portion of the territory of Great Britain, between portions of the population and the Government, some of our citizens may, from their connection with the settlers, and from their love of enterprise and desire of change, be induced to forget their duty to their own Government, and its obligations to foreign Powers. It is the fixed determination of the President faithfully to discharge, so far as his power extends, all the obligations of this Government, and that obligation especially which requires that we shall abstain, under every temptation, from intermeddling with the domestic disputes of other nations. You are, therefore, earnestly enjoined to be attentive to all movements of a hostile character contemplated or attempted within your district, and to prosecute, without discrimination, all violators of those laws of the United States which have been enacted to preserve peace with foreign Powers, and to fulfill all the obligations of our treaties with them.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN FORSYTH.

DANIEL KELLOGG, Esq.,
United States Attorney, Rockingham, Vermont.

[The same to the district attorneys for the northern district of New York and Michigan district.]

And on the 9th December, 1837, a circular was issued by the Secretary of the Treasury to all the collectors on the frontier, in which, after reciting the foregoing instructions given to the district attorneys, the Secretary of the Treasury says:

"By a similar direction, you and your officers are required to cooperate with the district attorneys, and other United States officers, in all legal modes, to assist them in the accomplishment of the objects before stated."

Thus far there had been no particular overt act on the part of our citizens, which called for, or would justify, any more active or decided interference on the part of the General Government; but late in December the gathering took place on Navy Island, which was finally followed by that atrocious outrage, the burning of the "Caroline;" and on the receipt in this city of the news of that affair, and of the movements consequent upon it, which was about the 4th or 5th January, 1838, a proclamation was immediately issued by the President, in which, after a preamble noticing the state of affairs on the frontier, &c., the proclamation concludes as follows:

Now, therefore, to the end that the authority of the laws may be maintained, and the faith of treaties observed, I, Martin Van Buren, do most earnestly exhort all citizens of the United States who have thus violated their duties, to return peacefully to their respective homes; and I hereby warn them, that any persons who shall compromise the neutrality of this Government, by interfering in an unlawful manner with the affairs of the neighboring British provinces, will render themselves liable to arrest and punishment under the laws of the United States, which will be rigidly enforced; and, also, that they will receive no aid or countenance from their Government, into whatever difficulties they may be thrown by the violation of the laws of their country, and of the territory of a neighboring and friendly nation.

Given under my hand at the city of Washington, the fifth day of January, one thousand eight hundred and [SEAL.] thirty-eight, and the sixty-second of the independence of the United States.

M. VAN BUREN.

By the President:

JOHN FORSYTH, Secretary of State.

This proclamation, it will be observed, (which bears date the 5th January, 1838,) contains, in substance, the same sentiments which were afterwards reiterated in the proclamation of November last; and, though not in the same words, yet it does as clearly and distinctly indicate the ground which the Executive intended to take as does the proclamation of November; and if that was sufficiently explicit to define the position of the Administration, certainly this one of January was equally explicit. I apprehend the gentleman had overlooked this proclamation when he charged the Executive with being governed by electioneering motives, and unwilling to hazard anything by taking ground in advance of public sentiment. Sir, if the Administration had been governed by such motives as the gentleman from Tennessee imputes, no such proclamation would have gone forth, and particularly at that time, when the national feeling and national honor had been so outraged by the atrocity before alluded to. An "electioneering Administration" would have "temporized" under such circumstances, and in view of a speedily approaching election on that frontier; and, by so doing, might have compromised the neutrality and endangered the peace of the country. But with what propriety this Administration can be charged with so temporizing, I leave for the House to judge. At the same time that this proclamation of the 5th of January was issued, General Scott was sent to that frontier, further circulars were issued by the Secretary of War to the Governors of Vermont, Michigan, and New York, reiterating the views and designs of the President which had been previously expressed, and requesting them to aid the General Government in enforcing the obligations of neutrality as well as to repel invasion, and to call out the militia of the States if necessary.

I might go on accumulating evidence upon evidence, and fact upon fact, to show that nothing can be more unjust than the charge that the Administration did not early and distinctly take ground upon this subject, and such ground, too, as suited, not the policy of an electioneering Administration, but the policy of an Administration willing and anxious to maintain the interests and honor of the whole nation; and the documents which I have quoted, as well as the whole history of the affair, when examined, will show most conclusively that there was no shrinking from duty on the part of the Executive; that in advance of public sentiment, and in the very outset of the Canadian troubles, the President took the earliest and most efficient means which were in his power to restrain our own citizens from any unlawful interference with those troubles. The citizens of the frontier were not unadvised of the real intentions of the President, or kept in the dark as to his views on this important subject; they were plainly put forth in the proclamation of the 5th of January; and if the honorable gentleman from Tennessee had been upon the frontier, or at all acquainted with the history of things there for the last twelve months, he would have known, as every man there does know, that the early and decisive action of the President and of the executive officers of the United States on that frontier, was not only well known and openly avowed, but that, in consequence of the position taken by the President, in consequence of the duty which necessarily devolved upon the Executive of seeing the laws faithfully executed, the administration of the General Government, as well as the administration of the government of the State of New York, upon whom a like duty devolved, were thrown into a position antagonistic to that class of citizens which had taken an interest in favor of Canadian independence; antagonist to the "Canadian patriot" interest; if I may so call it; and it is well known that generally, along the whole frontier, that interest, so far as any political bias was given to it, was decidedly against the Administration party in the late New York elections.

I might refer to the newspapers in that interest for proof of this fact, and in answer to the honorable gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. RANDOLPH,] who refers me to the fact that he saw a number of Mackenzie's Gazette, in which the editor sustained the Administration party in the State of New York at the late elections, I would remark that no doubt he did; that Mackenzie did urge his followers to sustain the Administration ticket, but, at the same time, and in some of the same papers, he openly denounced the course of the President and some of the executive officers on the frontier; and it is a well known fact that the stand taken by the Administration in this matter, has not only been unsatisfactory to the "Canadian patriot" interest, but by many in that interest has been openly denounced, and that, as a necessary consequence, in the last elections on the frontiers, the friends of the Administration, or that party as a party, lost strength and influence from this cause, to what extent, I will not now undertake to say, but to some extent, and that not inconsiderable, is beyond all controversy.

Mr. REED inquired whether the collectors on the frontier had done their duty, or whether there had not been complaints against them for participation in Canadian affairs?

Mr. CLARK inquired whether the postmaster at Oswego was not a Canadian patriot, or charged with having taken an active part in those matters?

Mr. BRONSON. I cannot, Mr. Speaker, say whether the collectors on that frontier have done their duty or not; I believe they have, and so far as I have any knowledge on the subject, I know of no well grounded complaints against them. For my own district I can speak more positively, and in that district I am confident that the collectors and their officers have faithfully performed their duty, so far as they have been able to do it, and that against them there is no just ground of complaint. As to the postmaster at Oswego, about whom my colleague inquires, I have no knowledge; but I have heard very recently, for the first time, that there were such charges against him as my colleague mentions, and I have also understood—in fact I know—that they were, in a great measure, denied by him or his friends. As to their truth or falsity I am unable to state; but if they are true, to the extent charged, I have no doubt the proper corrective will be applied to him as a public officer.

And now, Mr. Speaker, having said thus much in relation to the course of the Administration respecting these frontier difficulties, I shall take this occasion to say a few words about the citizens on the northern frontier, among whom are my own constituents, and the course which they have taken; particularly, that part of them who have intermeddled in these border feuds, or in the disturbances of the neighboring Provinces. They have been the subject of much wholesale denunciation and abuse, not only by the Tory press of the Canadas, but by some newspapers of our own country, and particularly in the city of New York; and in this city, also, they have been dealt with in terms of very strong reprehension, if not of denunciation. As to the press of the city of New York, it may be, and undoubtedly is, a very fair exponent of the views and feelings of the commercial interest of that city; but I beg leave to say that on this, as well as on some other subjects, it does not reflect the true sentiments and opinions of the great mass of the citizens in the interior of our State.

Some few grains of allowance should be made for the citizens on that frontier, and some consideration given to the fact that their proximity to the Canadas has enabled them, or rather compelled them, to know and feel something of that arrogance and assumption which is too frequently manifested towards this country by the English generally, and which, when exhibited through the provincial Tory press, or subordinate officials, loses nothing of its intensity, but, on the contrary, approaches more nearly to insolence. The unceasing and bitter hostility which is constantly manifested by the provincial press towards the institutions of our country, and the frequent and oft-repeated taunts and sarcasms against everything which savors of Democracy, or which is akin to Republican institutions, is well calculated to excite the indignation of those who have been taught to venerate and esteem such institutions, and whose feelings of patriotism and love of civil liberty are based upon or interwoven with their respect for Republican or Democratic institutions. And it is not matter of surprise that the frontier inhabitants are, for this reason, more sensitive; and were, on the breaking out of the troubles in the Canadas, more accessible to sympathy, and more liable to excitement, than those not living on the borders. It was in part the result of their position, and if they have more readily allowed their sympathy to get the better of their judgment, perhaps some palliation may be found in the suggestion which I have just made; a suggestion which, perhaps, I might be warranted in making in much stronger language than I have done, but at this moment, I would desire to say nothing that might irritate, or that may not be pertinent to the subject.

Now, sir, I know it may be said that a spirit of hostility to the British Government exists on the frontier, and that a disposition to violate the neutrality of the country is most unjustifiably exhibited; and I am aware that while our Government, so far as it was able as a Government, has endeavored to prevent any infractions or violations of neutrality, and has kept faith with the British Government with the most scrupulous exactness and with a fearlessness and impartiality worthy of all praise, yet, that many of our citizens on the frontier, acting upon their individual responsibility, and in defiance of the known wishes of the Government, have either evaded the laws or openly trampled upon them, and in a manner not at all justifiable, have disregarded their duty to their own country and the treaty obligations due to a foreign Government; and while, as a Representative and as a citizen, I feel bound to speak in terms of decided reprehension against all such unlawful and unauthorized interference with the troubles or disturbances of a neighboring and friendly nation, yet I feel equally bound, as a man and a Republican, to extend the broadest mantle of charity over the misguided and deluded individuals who have engaged in this unequal contest, and who have suffered their compassion and general love of liberty towards the whole human family to outrun their discretion and stifle their better judgment.

In speaking of this class of our frontier citizens, I wish to be understood as speaking of the great majority or mass of those who have styled themselves "Canadian patriots." Individual instances there may have been, and probably were, among them of persons actuated by the gross and sordid incentive of pecuniary gain, or personal aggrandizement, or perhaps by motives still more unworthy, who have aided in raising the whirlwind which they had not the ability to control; who have pointed out the road to others which they had not the courage to travel themselves; who have led their fellow-citizens to the brink of a precipice, over which some have been precipitated, but from the dangers of which they themselves have been especially careful to stand aloof. For such, if any there are, I would hold up no mantle of charity. Neither will I throw away upon them any severity of remark, or expression of just indignation. The wail of the widow and the orphan and the moan of bereaved parents, which is still sounding on that frontier for the slaughtered and imprisoned victims of the Prescott expedition, is a sterner rebuke and a more eloquent denunciation than any language I can utter. But the great mass of those called "patriots" were, in my opinion, actuated by no such motives as I have just mentioned. With them it was a warm and generous sympathy for the oppressed, that ardent and enthusiastic feeling for those whom they supposed to be the objects of tyranny and despotic Government, which ever animates the lover of civil liberty, and which, I trust, ever will flow warm and freely in the heart of every citizen of this Republic. This feeling is the very vital spark, the Promethean fire, of civil and religious liberty, and is one which should not be crushed and extinguished, but directed and countenanced. It furnishes a strong and enduring evidence of a deep rooted and heartfelt attachment on the part of our citizens to our own form of Government and our own free institutions, and though in this instance the stream of sympathy may have overflowed its natural channels, yet it does not therefore follow that the fountain should be dried up.

That these feelings were called into action, in part, by unworthy men, and for unworthy purposes, may be very possible, and it is unquestionably true that a most mistaken view of facts has prevailed, and that the great mass of our citizens on the frontier who have taken part in these border troubles, or given them countenance by their acts or their words, have been deluded and led into a participation in these affairs by the most high-wrought and well-told tales of oppression and tyranny, under which our Canadian neighbors were suffering. I say "well told" because, if reports are true, they were, in many instances, told by loyal spies, who, in the guise of Canadian refugees and patriots, found access to the meetings of those called patriots on this side, and by their urgent appeals and eloquent descriptions of the oppression practiced by the British Government, increased the sympathy of our citizens, inflamed their zeal, and found the excitement which already existed, and which has subsequently been exhibited so disastrously for the individuals concerned, and so much to the dishonor of our laws.

Whether these reports are true, I know not, but I have reason to believe them, and if they are so, there is no measure of condemnation severe enough to characterize such baseness and perfidy. For the honor of human nature, and in charity to those who employed them, it is but justice to believe that those spies, in this respect, acted upon their own responsibility, and beyond any instructions that could have been given them.

The bitter and heart-rending results of the Prescott expedition finally opened the eyes of our deluded citizens. Many a widowed wife, bereaved parent, or fatherless child, in my district, will long lament the generous enthusiasm and mistaken philanthropy which led their relatives to that disastrous expedition; and, while the melancholy deaths of some of those brave and misguided men, and the protracted imprisonment of others, are still fresh in the minds of those conversant with that matter, they serve not only to impress upon us most forcibly the sincerity of those unfortunate men, but to show how the best motives and most chivalrous feelings may be perverted to dangerous and improper purposes.

They have been called brigands, pirates, and all other opprobrious names which the vocabulary of Canadian loyalty furnishes so profusely, but never were such epithets more unjustly applied. Deluded, duped, and deceived they unquestionably were; but they displayed a courage and chivalry worthy of such a cause as they believed themselves to be engaged in; and they earned for themselves no such appellation of opprobrium as has been bestowed upon them; and, in the estimation of brave and honorable men, they will never be looked upon as brigands or pirates. True, their expedition must be condemned as one subversive of law, and contrary to the obligations of neutrality, and as such, will meet with unqualified reprehension; yet charity at least, as well as all the facts in relation to their motives, compel us to believe that they were instigated and urged on by impressions that were alike honorable to themselves and to human nature.

Sir, I have deemed it not improper to say thus much of these affairs, and of the citizens of our northern frontier, and to enter my protest against the general and sweeping denunciations which have, from the commencement of these troubles, been too often bestowed upon them, and especially to say that the motives and feelings of those who have taken part in these troubles, have been too harshly construed, and too readily condemned. In the district which I have the honor to represent, and, I believe, along the whole frontier, a more correct tone of feeling now prevails; a more just appreciation of the merits of the controversy, and of the duties of our own citizens, is exhibited; the obligations of the laws are respected, and I have confidence to believe and hope that, while our people will lose none of their sympathy for the oppressed, none of their zeal for free government and the general diffusion of republican principles, they will refrain from any improper or unlawful interference in the other Government, and that they will confine the exhibition of these sentiments in such way as to manifest at the same time the sincerity with which they cherish them, and a sacred regard for our own laws. Whether these anticipations will be realized, time only can determine; but I have much faith to believe that they will, and in the future difficulties or disturbances in Canada, if there should be any, our people will act as becomes the citizens of the Union, and in such manner as to give no just cause of offense.

As to the final issue, and ultimate or speedy termination of those disturbances in the provinces, I shall at present say nothing, (though in some measure connected with the state of that frontier,) except to remark, that on those subjects I expressed opinions during the last session of Congress, in some remarks which I then had the honor to submit to this House, which opinions I have, as yet, had no reason to change.

As incidentally connected with this subject, Mr. Speaker, there is another matter to which I shall call the attention of the House, and which although perhaps not strictly applicable to the bill now under consideration, I feel justified in commenting upon after the remarks which we have just heard from the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] in relation to the exposed and defenseless condition of our country in case of hostilities with any foreign Government. Sir, I concur with the honorable gentleman in the correctness of those remarks; and I would add that in no part of our country do they apply with greater force than to the northern and northwestern frontier. The dilapidated and ruinous condition of the fortifications and military works along the whole of that frontier, few as they are in number, is too well known; and with those who believe that such defenses are important to the country, is a subject of deep consideration and anxiety. Along the whole of that frontier, from the Vermont line westward to Detroit, or to Sault Ste. Marie, there is hardly anything deserving the name of a fort. "Niagara" is still dignified with that appellation, but its dilapidated condition renders it at present of little value as a work of military defense; and yet, sir, in case of a war with Great Britain, (an event which we all trust and hope is not likely to happen—an event which is deprecated, and justly so, as a calamity, not to this nation alone, but to the whole civilized world,) that frontier would be the theater of the contest—the battle-ground of the two nations; and it is upon that frontier that the bloodiest scenes of such a contest would be enacted; and, while we are lying supine and inactive, the British Government are not only filling up the provinces with troops and munitions of war, but at the same time strengthening their military posts along that frontier, repairing their fortifications, and putting themselves in a complete state of defense. I have recently been informed that they have eight substantial forts in good repair in Upper Canada, along this line, while we have not in the same distance, one single work in good order and in proper repair. It is said, also, that about eighteen thousand troops, the very élite of the English army, are now in British North America. Now, sir, though I would not willingly excite any jealousies on this subject, or create any unfounded alarms, yet I ask, in all candor, why and for what purpose is all this warlike array on the part of the British Government?

I am aware that it will be said that the disturbances and revolts in the Canadas have rendered it necessary, and that this military display is for the purpose of overawing and maintaining the British possessions in those colonies; but it will be recollected that the colonial authorities have repeatedly declared (particularly in the upper province) that the local militia and loyal inhabitants of the province were entirely adequate to all emergencies. Lieutenant Governor Head made it a matter of congratulation that such was the fact, and it has since been the boast of the Canadian authorities, that the loyalty of the inhabitants was such as to afford ample security to the province, and that the local militia or volunteers were fully to be relied upon and competent to suppress any rising or rebellion that might fairly be anticipated. Whether this fact is so or not, I shall not undertake to say, though I have my own opinions on that subject; but so long as the British authorities assert it to be so, it is quite evident that they cannot refer to the Canadian revolts as a reason for such unusual military preparations; and when we advert to this state of things, connected with the present alarming state of the question relative to the Maine boundary, and connected with the alleged fact that a large British fleet is now in the Gulf of Mexico, hovering on our southern coast, we are at least admonished that that powerful nation is ready either for peace or war, as the case may be; and that, while we may be disclaiming all ideas of hostilities, she, in the wisdom which usually marks her councils, is preparing for the worst. And it is not fair to presume that the present warlike display in Canada is not, as is pretended, for the mere purpose of overawing and holding in subjection a few thousand wretched Canadian subjects, but that the British Government have some ulterior views, in which our country is more or less interested.

I forbear to comment at length upon the troubles now thickening upon the Maine frontier. When the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom that subject had just been committed, shall make their report, and call for the action of this House, it will be a more fitting time to canvass that matter. At present, I have only to say, that come what may, I feel sure that Maine will not find herself abandoned in the maintenance of her lawful rights; and that, if war must come, there will, on all hands, be exhibited a unity of feeling and interest, such as becomes such a crisis.

which has pervaded this House in respect to that subject since it was first brought before us by the President's message. From the country, too, generally, the same sentiment comes up, and it is apparent that the touch of aggression from a foreign foe is felt as sensibly in the remotest corners of the Union, as in the more immediate neighborhood of the encroachment; that all parts of this extended Republic feel instantaneously the smallest insult or slightest encroachment upon our soil; and that the readiness and promptness to maintain the rights of Maine are common to all.

I am, sir, as well aware as other gentlemen of the momentous consequences of a war with England; that such a step may involve in its train not only the present peace and happiness of this country, but even our future existence as a nation; that we peril the cause of civil liberty and of free government throughout the world; that interests too momentous to calculate are involved in such a contest, and that it is a precipice which should not be rudely or rashly approached. But if the violated rights of one of the sovereign States of the Union shall require it, or if our national honor demands it, there is no alternative; and though the present deplorable and destitute condition of our forts and defenses on the Atlantic coast, as well as on the other frontiers of the Union, may leave us for a time at the mercy of an enemy, I have no fears that the energies and resources of the country will not be found equal to any emergency.

I disclaim any disposition to cultivate a belligerent or hostile feeling, or to excite that feeling. I am willing to go as far as any one honorably can to preserve peace, and join to any reasonable extent, with those who deprecate the approach of war, but I put it to gentlemen, with what propriety we can take that stand towards Great Britain, in our present defenseless condition, and whether we are not liable to the charge of seeking peace because we are unprepared for war. The strong man, armed to the teeth, and fully able to defend himself at all points, may with great propriety profess a pacific disposition and disinclination to quarrel, and he will receive full credit for the sincerity of his professions; but the weak man, unarmed, and unable to defend himself among the strong and powerful, would be laughed to scorn for holding such language, which would be attributed to weakness and inability to resist aggression rather than a pacific disposition.

True, this is not an exact parallel; it is, perhaps, overwrought, because we are not, as a nation, entirely unarmed or defenseless, but, in our anxiety to keep the peace with all nations, and in the palmy state of peace and prosperity which has signally blessed this country for the last twenty years, we have, in a great measure, overlooked those preparations for war which a wise nation always provides in time of peace. In respect to national defenses, we are behind the age; we have not kept up with the times. Why, sir, it was but a very few days ago that a French armed steamship suddenly appeared in Baltimore harbor, under the very walls of the town, and had it not been for the ice in the Potomac, she would have been lying opposite this city before any one had the least notice of her approach; and, had she been an enemy's ship, might have battered down even the walls of this Capitol before we were hardly aware of her arrival. Both the French and English have, of late, paid much attention to this branch of their naval force; and both nations have now a number of the first class of steamships, with which they could, in a hostile as well as a peaceful manner, visit almost, at a moment's notice, any of our Atlantic cities, while we have been looking on, but not acting in this matter. The arrival of the frigate, which I have just mentioned, in the harbor of Baltimore, has, I trust opened our eyes, in some measure, to the importance of this subject; and I hope that, before Congress adjourns, there will yet be some measure taken to add to our Navy this most important class of vessels.

Mr. CAMBRELENG here remarked that a bill, or an amendment to a bill, had recently been reported, and was now upon the table, making an appropriation for the building of three steam frigates.

Mr. BRONSON. I am glad to hear it, Mr. Speaker, and I hope it may pass before we adjourn.

In relation to the northern frontier particularly, I would remark that there are now before the House three or four fortification bills, and bills relating to the defenses of the northern and north-western borders, and which provide, in some measure, for the defense of those frontiers, by repairing old works and erecting new ones, and which I indulge the hope will receive the action of the House at this session, and upon which, if they should be so fortunate as to be acted upon, it would be more proper to enter into some detail in relation to those defenses, as well as to submit amendments providing for some new works, which in that way I hope to have the opportunity of bringing forward.

I have trespassed longer upon the patience of the House than I intended, and am aware of the value of time at this late period of the session; but the importance of the subject, and the interests of my own constituents render any apology unnecessary.

DRY-DOCK AT BROOKLYN.

SPEECH OF HON. Z. PRATT, OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 1, 1839,

On the proposition to construct a dry-dock at Brooklyn, New York.

Mr. PRATT said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I am unaccustomed to public debate. Other pursuits in life have somewhat indisposed me to present my views in that collected, comprehensive, and systematic manner which long legislative experience has enabled those to do, who preceded me in the debate upon this question. But I will, in my own crude and undigested manner, present to the consideration of the House the various facts in my possession, which, in my humble opinion, should have a bearing upon this question. I dislike the practice of consuming the valuable time of the House, as some gentlemen are wont to do, upon other matters irrelevant to the subject before them; and I have no doubt the good sense of the people detests the practice; but, notwithstanding my great aversion to this practice, I cannot refrain, when a question presents itself, touching, in some measure, the interests of the State I have the honor, in part, to represent, to give my views upon the immediate question before the House.

In the first place, the question is, whether we shall appropriate, in accordance with the suggestions of the committee who reported this bill to the House, and who have no doubt weighed well the relative wants of the several sections of country which have been indicated as proper places for dry-docks, or whether we shall extend the provisions of the bill to embrace several, or a whole system, instead of this one provided for in the bill. There are two questions presented to my mind, when it is proposed to extend this bill to cover other appropriations: First, does the public service require more than one dry-dock? and, second, will the condition of the public Treasury warrant the House in appropriating to more than one?

Mr. Chairman, I hold it to be the duty of Governments, as well as individuals, before entering upon an enterprise or disbursement, to first ascertain whether they have the means to effect the object contemplated. I shall apply this golden rule to the question now before the House, before I proceed to inquire whether the public service requires at this time more than one dry-dock.

The honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has presented to the House a very able and comprehensive report, in which he warns us against carrying on the lavish system of expenditures which has obtained within the past few years, no doubt caused from the great abundance of surplus means which distended our public Treasury. I coincide with the views of that committee, and trust the House will be so far influenced by its irresistible conclusions as to cut off all appropriations but such as the public service indispensably demands. By a statement of this committee, the present resources of the Treasury for 1839 are but $28,900,000, while the charges upon the same for the same period (including Treasury notes issued during the last year, to be redeemed—$7,712,350) amount to $32,876,857, leaving a deficiency of $3,976,857. I will, however, give the language of the committee:

"To meet this deficiency, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to sell the remaining bond of the Bank of the United States, amounting, with interest, to $2,380,000, and there remains $2,237,650 of the Treasury notes authorized to be issued, by the act of 1838, which have not yet been issued." Should the former be sold, and the limitation of the Treasury note act of 1837 be extended to the 30th June, and no appropriations be authorized during the present session but those embraced in the foregoing statement, [which did not include an appropriation for dry-docks,] there would be an estimated balance in the Treasury on the 1st January next of about $690,000. Even this balance will be reduced by some additions which will be necessarily made during the session to the appropriations enumerated in the foregoing statement. Should Congress authorize the usual amount of new appropriations, and the three millions proposed for fortifications, harbors, &c., it would be necessary to provide five or six millions for the Treasury, in addition to the resources and receipts existing or contemplated."

I hope, Mr. Chairman, the House will be admonished by the sentiments and opinions of the report of the committee, that they will dispense with, as far as possible, all extravagance. Let us commence with this bill, for I hold to the doctrine that that which is not indispensable to the wants of the service is an inexcusable extravagance. I am of the opinion that, for the present, we can do with one additional dry-dock. The question will then suggest itself to the mind, where shall that site be best to enhance the public interest? I will endeavor to show, hereafter, by the facts which I have gleaned from the public documents. Indeed, I am convinced, from reading this report, that we cannot have the means of building more than one at this time, considering the large amount it will cost to construct it, say $800,000—a large amount.

But I shall, in the first place, examine this in a national point of view. I will throw aside State pride, and merge the interest of the same into the great national interest. This is the ground we should all take, though, unfortunately, some gentlemen have attempted to bring this into the common vortex of a local scramble, without regard to the public weal; but when this shall be the issue, he would not shrink from a comparison of the site contemplated for the creation of the same in his State with that of Philadelphia, or any other, or relinquish the claims of his State to that of any other State. It was deeply to be regretted that this kind of legislation had too much obtained; but it is not too late to correct it, and the sooner we do it the better, because it will prevent the great and useless expenditure or waste of public money, which, by management and compromise, is applied to other than national objects; which, in fact, results to the benefit of individuals instead of Government, and to their private emolument. And unless it be stopped, there are none in this Hall who can anticipate the end, nor foretell the always exhausted and deranged condition of our public Treasury; the onerous taxation to replenish it, and the consequent strife, disaffection of the people, and their distrust of our institutions. Whenever I hear the question stated that A gets more of the public money than B, I feel some forebodings for the future. I feel that, should it become a settled principle in our Government that B shall have as much of the money of the people as A, notwithstanding his wants are not so great, or, in other words, that it cannot be applied to the use of B without a great waste, indeed, total loss, I say I feel that the great national interests, the Navy, the Army, and civil service, must become dilapidated—broken up; the commercial, agricultural, and manufacturing interests will be deprived of their proper stimulants, and this nation, like all others that have preceded it, will become enervated, and dwindle into insignificance, and be disrespected and despised by all well-regulated Governments on the earth. Holding this view of the subject, what great responsibility rests upon us to use all proper means to prevent these fatal results being incurred to, and being realized by, our posterity. We should spurn every attempt to create in the national Halls any other interests than the national interests; that which will embrace the whole country. The States, by their inherent and sovereign power, can regulate their own peculiar interests, and thereby preserve them from the overshadowing influence of the national Government.

Does not the public service require that Brooklyn should be first selected as a site? When I come to consider the immense tonnage which arrives at that port and belongs to that port, both mercantile and national, I have no misgivings in making it the first selection, if the want of the Navy demand another; and to prove that it does, I will insert below a table apposite to this subject, showing the arrivals of vessels of war, the large number repaired, &c. The repair of many of these vessels, I have been told, has been frequently delayed for a time for the want of a dock; and when repaired it is at considerable expense, caused by the removal of munitions of war, &c., and with great delay and injury to the service; all of which could be avoided by the construction of one dock.

As some gentlemen have been pleased to refer to the number of national vessels which arrived in the port of Philadelphia and have undergone repair at that place, the tables below will give information upon the subject, so far as relates to New York, as well as that city:

 Experiment, schooner, November 7, 1836, from surveying.

There have arrived at Philadelphia, during the same space of time, the Warren, sloop-of-war, Experiment, schooner, and there were slightly repaired.

The result for the last two years shows as great disparity between the two cities.

This table is for a period of eight years, and I have no doubt, upon further examination, a series of years will present the same result. I do not wish to consume the time of the House by any comments of mine upon these facts, but trust the members will draw their own deductions. Thus it will be seen that the Government have been compelled to have repaired at Brooklyn, at great expense, without a dock, in the space of eight years, vessels of war; whereas, if there had been a dry-dock at that point, they could have been repaired, in all probability, at one half the expense.

I present, also, a statement of the aggregate of arrivals of American and foreign vessels into the United States for 1837, by which we may see the great advantages of the State of New York over Pennsylvania or other States, in a commercial point of view:

The arrivals in tonnage into the State of New York is more than ten times as great as Pennsylvania; and, in fact, constitutes one half of the whole tonnage of the United States.

To carry this view of the subject still further, I have had prepared a statement, comprising a period of nine years, showing the number and tonnage of vessels entered into the ports of New York and Philadelphia, from the year 1829 to 1837, inclusive, and the amount of imports, exports, and revenue for the same period.

The last of these totals gives the difference between the two ports.

The value of imports into New York, from the 10th of May, 1837, to the 10th of May, 1838, was $58,814,645, and that of Philadelphia but $7,732,497; and Pensacola, the other place spoken of, only $3,112—the imports of New York city being more than half of all the importation into the United States. This table, though in a condensed form, is comprehensive. The latter line or total of figures, exhibits the difference, the great disparity in the receipt of revenues into the two cities, and, to some extent, the States of New York and Pennsylvania. Now, according to the above tables, if we put the claims of New York upon its commercial as well as agricultural interests, the dry dock should be located in that State. What a disparity does the above present between the two places. With what pride should the Representatives of that great State advocate her superior claims to the favorable consideration of Congress.

I will also show, by the statement below, in parallel columns, the great disparity between the domestic exports of the two States contending for by which our Union was governed for nearly thirty years. Prior to the late war with Great Britain, our tariffs were revised and our taxes levied to supply the actual wants of Government, however they might operate, incidentally, on the internal industry of the country. It was never then designed to raise more revenue than was actually necessary to supply our Federal wants. During the war, large investments were made by our capitalists in manufactures; and when it was over, the principle of our revenue laws was entirely reversed. Our taxes were no longer graduated by the wants of Government, but by the demands of our capitalists for protection; thus substituting the incident for the principal. Our tariffs were revised without any regard to the condition of our finances, and a broad foundation was laid for a redundant revenue. The consequence was a rapid extinguishment of a public debt, funded and unfunded, of $150,000,000. Anticipating this redemption, appropriations in every branch of the public service were increased; and still more extensively to absorb a prospective surplus, new objects of expenditure were sought for, which had been before considered under the jurisdiction of the States. Surveys were authorized, laying the foundation for a Federal system of roads, canals, harbors, and other improvements, sufficient to exhaust any surplus which might possibly occur. Extravagance was deemed patriotic, as designed to perpetuate protection to manufactures. The one was indispensable to the other; and, for a time, the rights of the tax-payer were wholly disregarded.

This attempt to interfere with the rights of the States, and to enlarge Federal jurisdiction, expenditure, and patronage, was partially arrested at an early stage, by leaving to the States the exclusive and constitutional control over their roads and canals. But there still remained other expenditures, which will be noticed hereafter, equally foreign, as the committee think, to the legitimate duties of a confederated Government. But, notwithstanding these, the extravagant tendency of a surplus, and the rapid redemption of our public debt, we have been already compelled to deposit eight-and-twenty millions with the States. Fortunately, however, this association of protection, surplus, and extravagance, is no longer the policy of our Government. Both Houses, by overwhelming majorities, revived our ancient principle of revenue in the act of 2d of March, 1833. The fourth clause of the third section of that act provides that after the 30th of June, 1842, "duties shall be laid for the purpose of raising such revenue as may be necessary to an economical administration of the Government." Believing, as the committee do, that no other policy can be permanently sustained in a confederacy of independent States, they deem it expedient to examine our expenditures in detail, to ascertain what reforms can be introduced to bring them down to the economical standard permanently contemplated by the act of 1833.

Before noticing the permanent expenditures of the Government, it is proper to advert to those of an occasional or temporary character, which have very largely and unavoidably increased the amount of our annual appropriations for a few years past; these are in the Indian branch of the public service. The expenditures for Indian lands and wars have amounted, within a few years past, to about fifty million dollars. The purchase of their lands, and the removal of the Indians beyond the Mississippi, were unavoidably connected with the settlement of the country, however it might affect the various tribes. It is satisfactory to know that their condition has been ameliorated by removal. The addition of thirteen new States to the Union, embracing within their boundaries most of these tribes, made it necessary, especially in latter years, to purchase their lands, in order to advance civilization; to remove obvious obstructions to the settlement and cultivation of the country; to prevent collision, and to preserve the lives and property of the inhabitants of our States and Territories from Indian depredations. These purchases have also been founded, almost exclusively, upon compacts formed with some States more than thirty years ago; on our implied obligation to other States; and on resolutions and appropriations by both Houses of Congress, extending through every Administration of the Government. They were, moreover, justifiable on mere financial grounds. By referring to the documents annexed, it will be seen that we have acquired by Indian treaties, since the 4th of March, 1829, about one hundred and ten million acres. There now remain, of unbought Indian lands, less than thirty-five million acres. No extraordinary expenditure can, therefore, be hereafter anticipated for this object; nor is it probable that there will be such extravagant demands upon the Treasury for Indian wars, owing to the removal of almost all the tribes, and to a change in the plan of operations in Florida, but principally to the recent increase of the Army. One half of the amount expended in these wars has undoubtedly arisen from the extraordinary expenses arising from suddenly calling into the field numerous bodies of militia and volunteers, which we were obliged to do in consequence of the inadequate force of the regular army. The increase of that force will enable Government, in some degree, to dispense with these calls in future; and many millions in our annual expenditures will be saved by preventing Indian depredations, and promptly suppressing them when they may occur.

Owing to appropriations of the character referred to, and to others which will be noticed, there is a very considerable apparent increase of the Federal expenditures in the last ten years. The appropriations for 1829, including those under permanent acts, amounted to about thirty-eight million dollars. In comparing these with the expenditures in 1829, the following items will be found in the former which were not in the latter:

For preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities, $1,000,000
For the same, and for the Cherokee treaty, 6,740,000
For removal of Indians, annuities, &c., $3,060,000
Do., do., in 1829, only, 420,000
	$10,380,000
For appropriations for the Post Office, not embraced in any bill until since 1836, as these expenses are paid out of the postages, 4,560,000
For the protection of the northern frontier, 625,000
A nominal item in the Navy appropriation bill, being a mere transfer of an unexpended appropriation for the gradual improvement of the Navy, to the years 1839 and 1840, 1,500,000
	17,065,000

There has been an increase in almost every branch of expenditure, but principally in the following:

The appropriations for pensions in the year 1838, were, $2,058,500
Do., do., under permanent acts, 1,350,000
	3,408,500
Total expenditures in 1829, revolutionary, $764,492
Do., do., other, 185,102
	949,594
	2,458,906
Harbor, &c., appropriations in 1838, $1,535,000
Expenditures in 1829, 505,000
	1,030,000
Congressional expenses, appropriations in 1838, owing, in part, to the long session, $982,000
Expenditures in 1829, 467,000
	515,000
Light-houses, appropriations in 1838, $663,000
Expenditures in 1829, 291,500
	371,500
In executive, territorial, judicial, and miscellaneous expenditures, 880,000
	$22,320,406

Our naval and military expenses have been greater since 1829; the former owing, in part, to the uncertainty, at one time, of our relations with France, and the latter to Indian wars. But our expenditures have been since then increased in every branch by an augmentation of the amount of commercial credit, which adds to the cost of all our supplies.

In examining into our expenditures there will be found, in many of them, much abuse requiring reform. Two branches do not come annually under the consideration of Congress—the expenditures for the Post Office service and the expenses of collecting our revenue. The former, not being a charge upon the public Treasury, (except for the expenses of the General Post Office,) are regulated by the income from postages, which are annually increasing the number of our routes and the frequency of the transportation of the mails. Of the immense increase in this branch of the public service, some idea may be formed from the increase in the transportation of the mails. It was not, probably, more than 100,000 miles in 1790; 845,468 in 1793; as late as 1863 it was but 3,504,800; it is now 34,580,202 miles. Though not a charge upon the public Treasury, we are bound, as the trustee of the fund, to see that it is administered with economy, in order that our mail routes may be extended to the remotest quarters of the Union. It has been, accordingly, the subject of investigation; the Department has been reorganized, and it is believed now to be well administered. There is charged upon this fund, for the service of the present year, $5,100,000. If it is designed that this important establishment should support itself, there seems to be no reason for discriminating between the expenditures for the offices throughout the Union and of the General Post Office by charging the former upon the fund of the Department and the latter upon the Treasury.

The expense of collecting our revenue from customs amounted, in the first ten years after 1789, to about two hundred and ninety-three thousand dollars annually; for the last ten, ending 31st December, 1837, to $1,232,000; it is now about a million and a half. By referring to the table of tonnage, it will be seen that the amount of tonnage entered from abroad has increased from six hundred and five thousand tons in 1790 to two million sixty-five thousand tons in 1837. The expenses of collecting the revenue was, in 1829, $1,013,000, and, in 1837, $1,492,000. The tonnage entered from abroad was one million three thousand in 1829, and two million sixty-five thousand tons in 1837. The annual amount of revenue is no criterion of the expense of collection; because, although we have relinquished the duty on more than half of our importations, the great increase in this branch of trade creates a necessity for an increased number of inspectors. We have also, of late years, introduced many very complicated provisions in our tariff laws, and added to the expense of collection. But a part of this increase is owing to the neglect of Congress in not limiting, from time to time, the number of officers to be employed; and in permitting the collectors to pay the whole expense of our custom-houses out of the revenue received, without even transferring it to the public Treasury. Had Congress periodically limited the number of our officers, directed the collectors to pay all the money received by them into the Treasury, required annual estimates, and made specific appropriations for this, as in other branches of the public service, it would have operated as a sensible check on the extravagance of some of our collectors.

Although the subject of tonnage is only indirectly connected with the question of expenditures, the committee cannot dismiss it without calling the attention of the House to the fact disclosed in the table annexed, that while the American tonnage entered from abroad increased from 872,949 in 1829, to 1,299,720 tons in 1837, the foreign tonnage rose from 130,743 to 765,703 tons in the same period—a result owing, among other causes, to our unwise taxes on navigation, and to an abuse of credit at home, which enables foreign nations to build, supply, and man their ships cheaper than we can, and slowly to undermine the basis of our naval power.

The legislative expenses of the Federal Government for the first ten years were annually, on an average, about $171,000; the appropriations for the year 1838 were $982,000. A part of this has arisen from the increase in the number of members of Congress; but the most extravagant increase has occurred in the contingent expenses of both Houses. In the first ten years these did not amount to more than $10,000 annually; while the appropriations for the past year were $373,960. Although under the immediate observation and exclusive control of Congress, there is no branch of the public service where there has been more abuse and extravagance. Thousands of documents, in many instances of no importance, are annually printed; and the contingent funds of the two Houses have been, for some years past, charged with the expense of furnishing members with books. There has been, and remains to be, paid, on two contracts alone of this character, $781,023 37, not only to supply those who are actually in Congress, but others who have not been members for many years past. Should such expenditures be continued, this will very soon become an important item; and in any event a large amount will still be required to fulfill contracts for books in no manner belonging to the legitimate contingencies of either House of Congress.

The expenditures of the Executive departments were, in the ten years after specific appropriations were made, about $195,000 annually; the appropriation for 1838 was $795,000. This item has steadily increased with the growth of our country and its various establishments, requiring executive agency and superintendence. Something would probably be saved if there were one contingent fund under the control of the Secretary for all the offices of each department. Our complicated system of accounts, too, was established many years ago; and a more judicious organization of the Departments might introduce greater simplicity and economy. It is impossible, however, to avoid a uniform increase in this branch of the public expenditure, while we continue to multiply our laws at every session, which must be carried into effect by the Executive Departments; and while we rapidly increase, as we have done of late, the number of resolutions in both Houses, calling for information, and frequently involving great labor and expense.

Connected also with the Executive Departments are various expenditures which were very inconsiderable, or did not exist at all, at the commencement of the Government—such as those for the Mint, Territorial governments, the coast survey, arming and equipping militia, the public lands, and public buildings. These, which in early legislation were quite unimportant, now amount to near a million annually.

The expenses of the Judiciary in the first ten years after specific appropriations were made, did not amount to more than about $61,000 annually; the appropriation for 1838 was $484,000. The increased expense for the salaries of judges has not been beyond what might have been anticipated. The expense, however, of the courts of the United States has increased from about $30,000 to $342,000, which is the estimate for the present year. In this branch of the public service, reform seems to be required. While the clerks of our courts are appointed by the judges, and the fees of the former amount to a much larger sum annually than the salaries of the latter, the appointing power may be tempted to participate in the profits of the clerkship, and to sanction the most exorbitant charges. The fees of our district clerks and attorneys ought to be more precisely regulated by law, and the clerks ought not to be appointed by the judges.

The expenses of our intercourse with foreign Powers amounted in early years to about $50,000 annually; the estimate for the present year is $266,484. This expenditure was considerably augmented by the revolutions in what was formerly denominated Spanish America. The estimate for the present year is not, however, so great as the expenditure for 1829, which was $289,140 07.

The current expenses of the Indian department were unimportant and irregular in early years, but all the expenditures in this branch for the first ten years amounted to less than $32,000 annually; the estimates for 1839 amount to $866,960, including some appropriations not for current expenses. This increase is owing almost exclusively to annuities and stipulations under treaties with the Indians entered into since 1789.

Having no military establishment worthy of notice at the origin of the Government, the expenditures in this branch of the public service have of course increased. When it is considered that the settled area of the United States has increased, according to the calculations of a scientific engineer, in the ratio of 210,575 in 1790, to 1,013,664 in 1839, some idea may be formed of the vast extent of our present boundaries; and we may well doubt, notwithstanding the recent increase of the Army, whether it will ultimately be found adequate to protect all our extensive frontiers.

Although we have been more liberal in our naval appropriations, that establishment still bears an unimportant rank in comparison with that of every other maritime nation. The improvement in steam navigation, however, seems to promise a revolution in the mode of conducting maritime war, which may render this difference of less importance as it regards existing navies, and may require new and considerable expenditures in this branch of the public service, which will be noticed hereafter.

The appropriations for roads in 1838 were $540,000. There was no such Federal expenditure in early years.

In the expenses for light-houses there has been a considerable increase, especially within the last two years. The annual amount expended in the first ten years, including the maintenance of the establishment, was less than $35,000. For many years past it was less than $300,000 annually; but in 1837 it was suddenly increased to $1,220,019, and included $921,964 for new light-houses, &c. In 1838 the appropriations amounted to $663,873. The estimate merely for maintaining the existing light-houses in the year 1839 amounts to $394,000. The appropriations for new works of this kind were authorized without proper examinations, and much money has been wasted in this branch of the service. Two years ago Congress directed such examinations to be made before any new work should be commenced. The officers reported in favor of suspending the appropriations for thirty-one of the number of works authorized by the act of 1837. There is a large amount now remaining unexpended in this branch of the service.

The expenditures for fortifications were irregular in the first years; but from 1789 to 1798 the annual average was $108,000. The appropriations for 1838 amounted to $1,015,000; and the estimates for 1839, $1,269,100. This part of the national defense is still in a very incomplete state. The improvement in steam batteries within a few years past renders it, however, a question worthy of inquiry, whether it will not also produce an entire revolution in the plan of harbor defense; and whether it would not be most judicious for the present to confine our expenditures to the armament of the fortifications we have finished, and await the results of future experiments which will become necessary to ascertain whether floating steam batteries are not superior to stationary fortifications in guarding the entrance into and in defending harbors. There are other reasons for suspending new appropriations for 1839. Those existing were not made until the 7th July last, and the act directed that one half of the amount should be expended in the present year; and there remained undrawn from the Treasury on the 1st of January, $704,369 56, besides the balances in the hands of our disbursing officers. Under such circumstances, with a deficient revenue, and while there is a probability that a change will be made in the plan of harbor defense, and that the public money may hereafter be more advantageously expended, the committee are of opinion that it is not expedient to add $1,269,100 to the large amount unexpended and in the hands of disbursing officers.

For the first six and twenty years, the average amount paid annually for pensions was less than eighty-four thousand dollars. As late as 1814, it was about ninety thousand dollars, and in 1815, less than seventy thousand dollars. The late war added about two hundred thousand for invalids and the widows or children of those who had died of wounds received in battle. The whole pension roll of the United States, arising from the revolutionary, Indian and British wars, did not then exceed three hundred thousand dollars annually. The appropriations for the present year amount to $2,500,000; to which are to be added the permanent appropriation of $1,000,000, and unexpended appropriations amounting to $741,000; making an aggregate for pensions in 1839, of $4,241,000, and we have now charged upon the public Treasury forty-two thousand five hundred pensioners. A bill was passed at the last session, without debate, and approved on the last day of the session, which draws from the Treasury, in the present year, $1,372,000; and there are three general pension bills now pending in the House, which would, if adopted, probably double the annual amount appropriated for pensions.

This result, and in so short a period, could not have been anticipated by the framers of our Constitution. The claims of our revolutionary soldiers rested on peculiar grounds. Their services and sufferings were of an extraordinary character, and we had from necessity been compelled to violate our contracts with them. In their case we were warranted in departing from ordinary usage when our means were ample to indemnify them. Pensions to invalids, and to the widows or children of those who are killed or who die of wounds received in battle, form a part of the contract, where such laws exist, between the Government and the soldier; but in granting pensions as we have done, in cases where the soldier was neither killed nor wounded in battle, we violated the pension principle, and charged the public Treasury with half pay to the representatives of all who enlist in the service of Government, whether in peace or in war, in addition to the compensation stipulated for their services. Prior to 1836 there was no departure from the ordinary pension rules, except as to revolutionary soldiers; but in that year provision was made generally for pensions in ordinary cases of death, while in the service, after the 20th of April, 1818, whether of wounds or not.* The same rule was extended to the Navy pension fund, which will be very soon destroyed by such improvident legislation. Prior to 1837, this fund was amply sufficient to provide for our naval invalids, and for the widows or children of those who had been killed in battle. It was invested in stocks, and amounted, on the 1st March, 1837, to the sum of $1,115,230 53; it is now reduced, under the operation of recent laws, to $293,363 09. Should we have no reform in this branch of legislation, it will be difficult to anticipate the amount which may be annually required for this expenditure. If we continue to grant pensions in cases of ordinary death, in peace or in war, to the representatives of those who are employed in the military service, and to all in the naval service, we shall soon follow the example of some monarchies, and extend our pension roll, and with equal justice, to the representatives of all who die in the civil employments of Government.

The committee feel it to be their duty to bring to the special notice of the House the heavy and rapidly-increasing expenditures upon harbors and rivers. This item was unknown in the early legislation of the Federal Government. The first appropriation was made in 1802; but prior to 1816 only $36,449 had been expended upon two works, connected directly and indirectly, with navy-yards and light-houses. In 1816 and 1819 two other appropriations were made amounting to $34,000, both connected with light-houses. A few appropriations were made in 1820, 1821, 1822, and 1823, in the neighborhood of light-houses and navy-yards, amounting altogether to $51,750; and in 1823 two harbor surveys were authorized, at an expense of $350.

After we had adopted the policy of raising more revenue than was required for Federal purposes, and as the period approached for the redemption of the public debt, this was one of the new branches of expenditure resorted to in order to absorb a contemplated surplus. Accordingly, and for the first time in the history of our legislation, an act was passed on the 20th of May, 1826, "for improving certain harbors, and the navigation of certain rivers and creeks; and for authorizing surveys to be made of certain bays, sounds, and rivers, therein mentioned." On the 2d of March, 1827, this was followed by a regular annual bill, "to authorize the improving of certain harbors, the building of piers, and for other purposes." These expenditures immediately increased, in * The act of 1836 did not include all who died in the military service, after the 20th April, 1818, but embraced militia, rangers, sea-fencibles, and volunteers, and one or more special acts were passed establishing the same principle as to the regular Army.

1827, to $82,500; in 1828, to $121,000; and in 1829, to $505,000. In 1838, the appropriations were more than a million and a half, and the estimates for 1839 amount to $1,713,000.

The aggregate amount already appropriated for these works is $8,919,043 66, besides canal stocks, and the debt assumed for the corporations of this District for investments in the same, amounting to the sum of $3,383,490; making an aggregate of $12,302,533 66. The estimates for completing some of these works amount to $4,650,842 21; but, judging by our experience as to former estimates, it will more probably require $10,000,000, besides the cost of some of the most expensive works, for which there are no estimates at all. In addition to this, a bill is now pending (and would have passed the House at the close of the last session but for want of time) which, with the amendments, embraced appropriations for new works amounting to near a million dollars, and involving an ultimate expenditure of probably five million more.

In 1836 this subject was investigated by the Committee of Ways and Means, and a report submitted by one of its members (Mr. Smith of Maine) on the 10th of February. That report states that there was, even at that time, "a real necessity for hesitation, if not of actual reform, in the further prosecution of public works upon the same system which had, of late years, obtained under the Government;" that they were made subservient "to the purposes of the individual wealth and profit of the agents and contractors immediately concerned;" that the appropriation for one year, and for each succeeding year, in many cases exceeded the whole of the original estimate; that many of the works were built over again, and that others were rotten before they were completed. On the 31st of January, 1837, the same gentleman made another report from the Committee of Ways and Means, referring to the former as "explanatory of the unproductive, yet growing, expenditures of the Government upon harbors and rivers, and expressive of serious doubts of the policy of following out this branch of the public service, unless some more certain and efficient and economical system for conducting it could be devised." The opinion of the committee had not been changed by "the experience of another year;" and the report adds:

"Without some curtailment by Congress of the class of works already projected as recipients of its bounty, and without a decisive limitation of its appropriations to works that may justly be denominated of the first magnitude, and of imperious necessity, too, it requires no spirit of prophecy to predict that the operations of the civil engineer department will, in a very few years, rival, in expenditures and numerical strength of agents and operatives, the military and naval service of the Government, and constitute a more alarming branch of public patronage than is to be found elsewhere in the Government. From the peculiar nature of their expenditures, corruption, favoritism, and peculation may be reduced to system more successfully in them than in almost any other branch of the civil administration."

If such was the opinion of the Committee of Ways and Means in 1837, it certainly cannot be changed by examining into the present condition of these improvements.

After an experiment of thirteen years on the one hundred and three works for which appropriations have been made, the following is the result:

Never commenced.....	3
Abandoned.....	1
Suspended.....	4
May perhaps be completed with existing appropriations..	14
Completed.....	20
Not completed.....	61
Total.....	103

Some of the works have been built over twice, and the twenty completed cost but $409,178 25; leaving all the expensive works yet to be finished, and at an expense which cannot even be estimated.

Such is the result of this Federal system of improving our harbors, rivers, and creeks, and building piers for our cities, towns, and villages; and such the prospect before us. The time has certainly arrived when it becomes necessary to inquire whether all these expenditures belong to Federal legislation; and to examine a system which, if made permanent, must entirely change the character of our Government.

The utility of such improvements generally, is not denied, and is not the question. The true inquiry is, under what authority and at whose expense they should be constructed. If it is desirable to make a judicious selection of public works; to secure economy in expenditure; to do justice to those who contribute to their construction, and to insure their completion in some reasonable time, we should certainly confine our Federal, State, county, and municipal authorities within their appropriate spheres of action. We have confided to the Federal Government the high duty of superintending the construction of our works for national defense. By interfering with State, county, city, town, and village improvements, it not only neglects its common obligation to the Confederacy, but mismanages and retards the prosecution of their works. As we have seen, it extravagantly wastes the public money, in many instances, on works which should never have been commenced; on others, of a character strictly local; and in almost every case the work would have been constructed with more economy and dispatch under the superintendence of our State and local authorities, or under the still more vigilant direction of private enterprise.

These appropriations have been, and must continue to be, very unequal among the States. The Union has a common interest in but few of them. It may have in those running through or in the neighborhood of our public lands, which add value to the common property. But it is certainly unjust to apply the money collected in some States to mere local improvements in a distant quarter of the Union, simply because they appertain to the commerce of the country. If every improvement of harbors, rivers, and creeks, and the building of piers, is to be considered national in its character and benefits as an appendage to our commerce, it is difficult to define any limit whatever to the jurisdiction of the Federal Government, or to say to what purpose the common fund of the Union may not be applied. The distribution made during the last thirteen years among the States, proves incontestably the injustice of these expenditures. The whole amount appropriated and invested is $12,300,000; of which $5,190,000 has been granted to a district of country not one hundred and fifty miles from the Capitol. Without inquiring into the importance of the works patronized by the Federal Government, it is sufficient to remark that most of the States have been, at the same time, employing their own money and credit on improvements infinitely more useful and profitable, and better calculated to extend the commerce of the Union. Some of the States have not participated at all in these Federal appropriations, while four States only may be charged with $6,760,000 out of the $12,300,000, and some of the most expensive works remain to be completed in these States. If it is intended to make this system permanent, justice requires that some more just rule of distribution should be adopted.

This system, if permanent, must also very soon prove seriously detrimental to our naval and military establishments, and defeat the main object of our confederation. Such improvements, though generally merely local, are supported in both Houses by a combination of votes, which secures their preference over all other expenditures, however important the latter may be to the defense of the country. With an experience of only thirteen years, we have already a draft of near two millions annually upon the Treasury for such improvements. Should we continue to increase them, appropriations for national defense will become of secondary importance, and will be reduced to increase the expenditures for our congressional districts. Neither the condition of our finances, nor the state of the world, warrants us in applying the public money to objects not connected with our common defense. The countries in our own neighborhood have been disturbed; but, without anticipating any change in our pacific relations with foreign nations, we have other motives for not diverting the common fund; provided for our national defense, into new channels. The fortifications we have finished are unarmed, and the recent improvements in steam-batteries render it certain that a very important revolution is about to be effected not only in harbor and coast defense, but in the whole system of maritime war. Other nations have already supplied themselves with steam-batteries, and we shall neglect one of our highest duties if we do not employ our first surplus money on similar objects. While such is our condition on our maritime border, our vast western frontiers are wholly unprotected. The condition of the States on this side of the Mississippi required the removal of the Indians beyond that river, and the tribes will soon be all in the same region of country. According to the estimates of the Indian bureau at the last session, the number who had been and were soon to be removed from the east to the west of the Mississippi, including those previously there, was three hundred and thirty-two thousand four hundred and ninety-eight, of whom sixty-six thousand four hundred and ninety-nine were estimated to be warriors. Most of these belong to distant tribes, but it is supposed that a large body might unite and make war upon our frontier settlements. We are certainly bound by the highest obligations to protect the States on our borders from an enemy whom we have been compelled to place in their neighborhood as the settlement of the country advanced. We ought surely to discharge this duty, before we appropriate our Federal means to improving harbors, rivers, and creeks, and building piers.

Should these Federal expenditures be permanently continued, they must corrupt the legislative branch, and entirely change the practical operation of our Government from its original and constitutional design. Millions will be annually voted to be disbursed by our public officers, enlarging the patronage of the Federal Executive, and extending its influence to every congressional district throughout the Union. The Federal system of roads and canals proposed and rejected some years ago, however unconstitutional, would not have been more fatal to State independence, nor more consolidating in its tendency, than these numerous appropriations for local objects. Instead of having seventy-five works in operation at the same time, as we have already, we should have our thousands, and those employed in their construction would outnumber all engaged in the civil, military, and naval service. Instead of a confederacy for the common defense of a union of States, we should have a concentrated and consolidated Government, almost exclusively superintending our internal concerns, and interfering with the duties and jurisdiction of our State and local authorities. This revolution, which has already commenced, can only be averted by confining Federal legislation to the few but high duties assigned to Congress by the Constitution.

Without, however, anticipating what may be permanent policy of this Government, the committee adhere to the opinion expressed in its two reports in 1836 and 1837, that the subject demands thorough investigation; and that if it is designed to persevere in it, some "more certain, efficient, and economical system should be devised;" and if the public money must be appropriated to these objects, justice to the States requires a more equal rule of distribution. For the present, the committee are of opinion that the existing appropriations are sufficient, taking into view the condition of the Treasury. Appropriations amounting to $1,535,000 were made as late as the 7th of July last; and one half of every item in that act exceeding $12,000 was directed to be expended in 1839. Of the existing appropriations, there remained undrawn from the Treasury on the 1st January, $977,748 92, besides the balances in the hands of disbursing officers. As the revenue of 1839 will not warrant any additional appropriations, the committee deem it inexpedient to add $1,713,000 more than a million unexpended at the beginning of the year.

In reviewing our various expenditures, the extraordinary increase in some branches, and the introduction of new objects of appropriation, the committee are of opinion that the augmentation of the expenses of the Federal Government is chiefly to be ascribed to the policy of raising more revenue than was required to meet the wants of government, and of interfering with State and municipal duties; and to the increased number of resolutions and bills originating in both Houses, and annually calling for new and heavy expenditures. If all the unsuccessful propositions for appropriations made in Congress during the last session had been adopted, ten or fifteen millions more would have been charged upon the Treasury. The practice, too, of passing almost all our important bills on the last days, and of having them approved on the last day of the session, adds very much to the annual amount of our appropriations. Among other bills, one of those approved on the last day of last session was hurried through the House without any knowledge of its operation. This bill makes a new charge upon the revenue of the present year of $1,372,000. No reform can be anticipated in this onward course of extravagance, whilst almost every new measure of importance is forced through both Houses, without debate or examination, on the last days (or rather nights) of the session.

Should the House determine on authorizing new appropriations for fortifications, harbors, &c., and on charging upon the revenue of 1839 $2,982,000, in addition to an unexpended balance undrawn at the commencement of the year of $1,682,000, besides the amount in the hands of the disbursing officers, it will be necessary to instruct the committee as to the mode of raising the revenue required to meet these expenditures. There is no probability that the receipts from all sources in 1839 will be more than sufficient to meet unavoidable expenses, without the addition of any extraordinary appropriation whatever. The last year's revenue from customs and lands, exclusive of the postponed bonds, which formed part of the receipts of 1837, did not exceed fourteen millions and a half. Although we may anticipate a considerable increase in the present year, it would be very unsafe to calculate on a larger revenue than twenty-three millions from both sources. On that basis the following estimate is founded. The appropriations stated in the estimate are nearly a million less than those submitted by the Departments, and others estimated for have not been reported at all. Those stated below embrace only indispensable appropriations:

STATE OF THE TREASURY FOR 1839.

Resources of 1839.

The ascertained balance in the Treasury on the 1st of January, exclusive of $500,000 for the use of the Mint, is.....$3,200,000
 Receipts from customs.....$18,000,000
 Receipts from lands.....5,000,000

23,000,000

Balance due from late deposit banks, being less than as stated by the Treasurer, owing to anticipated payments.....$2,300,000
 From miscellaneous sources.....400,000

CHARGES UPON THE TREASURY.

Appropriations authorized by former acts, which will be required for the public service, but were not drawn out prior to the 1st January last, according to the Treasury account.....$15,289,000
 Appropriations already reported:

Indian annuities, &c.....$866,960
 Army.....5,348,220
 Pensions.....2,499,019
 Northern frontier.....500,000
 Navy.....5,130,781
 Civil and diplomatic, deducting the nominal appropriation of $3,100,000 for the Post Office service.....2,884,354
 Partial appropriations for congressional expenditures, besides those included in the preceding bill.....549,344

18,078,678

Appropriations under permanent laws for pensions, arming and equipping the militia, &c., including $750,000 for the gradual improvement of the Navy, transferred at the last session.....2,144,000

 For the Military Academy (to be reported).....153,055
 For preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities in Florida, (to be reported,).....1,804,774

37,764,507

Of the foregoing appropriations, there will probably be undrawn at the close of the year, (being the short session, the estimate is less than at the close of the last year).....13,000,000

24,764,507

Certificates for return duties on merchandise destroyed by fire at New York, receivable in payment for duties, as estimated by the commissioners.....400,000
 Treasury notes to be redeemed.....7,712,350

Deduct the resources.....28,900,000

To meet this deficiency, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to sell the remaining bond of the Bank of the United States, amounting, with interests, to $2,380,000, and there remains $2,287,650 of the Treasury notes authorized to be issued by the act of 1838, which have not yet been issued. Should the former be sold, and the limitation of the Treasury note act of 1837 be extended to 30th June, and no appropriations be authorized during the present session but those embraced in the foregoing statement, there would be an estimated balance in the Treasury on the 1st January next of about six hundred and ninety thousand dollars. Even this balance will be reduced by some additions which will be necessarily made during the session to the appropriations enumerated in the foregoing statement. Should Congress authorize the usual amount of new appropriations, and the $3,000,000 proposed for fortifications, harbors, &c., it would be necessary to provide five or six millions for the Treasury, in addition to all the resources and receipts existing or contemplated.

All which is respectfully submitted by the Committee of Ways and Means for the consideration of the House.

PUBLIC LANDS.

SPEECH OF HON. A. YELL,
OF ARKANSAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 20 and 26, 1839.

On the motion submitted by Mr. ROBERTSON, to recommit the resolutions of Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, from the Select Committee on the Public Lands, with instructions to report the following joint resolutions:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled, That, hereafter, the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause separate accounts to be kept of all moneys paid into the Treasury on account of sales of the public lands, to be disposed of in the manner herein provided unless otherwise by law specially directed, viz: He shall, on the first day of July succeeding the next census, and thereafter semi-annually, on the first day of January and July in every year, divide all the said moneys then in the Treasury among the several States of the Union, in the ratio of their Federal numbers: Provided, nevertheless, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prohibit the appropriation of the proceeds of the public lands, or such portion thereof as may be requisite to meet the necessary expenditures of the Government for any year in which the receipts from customs and other sources of revenue shall be estimated to fall below — millions of dollars, and when it shall be deemed proper on that account to apply the said proceeds, by special appropriation, to supply the deficiency and meet those expenditures: Provided, also, That, in the event of a war between the United States and any foreign power, the said semi-annual division shall cease, and be suspended during the continuance of such war: Provided, moreover, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to impair the right and obligation of Congress, whenever it shall satisfactorily appear that benefits from the use of the public lands, or the proceeds thereof, have been heretofore, or shall be hereafter, conferred on particular States, to extend as far as practicable to each and all the States, in their due and just proportions, who may require or be willing to accept them, similar benefits, upon the same or equivalent terms.

Mr. DUNN moved to amend the amendment of Mr. ROBERTSON, by inserting before the first proviso the following:

First paying to the States in which such lands are situate, twelve and a half per cent. of the proceeds of public lands sold within such States respectively.

Mr. YELL said:

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not my intention to consume much of the time of the House at this late day of the session. Time is now precious to all;

and as but a few days will have elapsed before this Congress will have gone the way of all that have preceded it, and live only in the books of history and the recollections of our countrymen, I am admonished of the necessity of brevity of speech and promptitude of action. Sir, the patience of this House is already exhausted, and I know how unwilling all are to listen to elaborate speeches; but the importance of the subject now before me, and the deep interest which my constituents have in its issue, are considerations which will, I hope, plead ample apologies for my now rising to take part in its discussion.

In considering this subject, Mr. Speaker, I occupy a middle or a central position. I do not fully agree with either of the honorable gentlemen who have preceded me. I am not prepared to give my assent to the grounds assumed by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. HARRISON,] who maintains the assertion that the public lands belong to the States in which they lie. In maintaining that position my honorable friend is not singular or alone. He is sustained by such men as Tazewell and Taylor, of Virginia, and Governor Robertson, of Louisiana, and many others; and I must do him the justice to say that, in carrying out his assertions, he has adduced and arrayed arguments and facts difficult to be refuted; so well were they sustained, indeed, that it took my friend from New York, [Mr. PARKER,] with all his admitted ability and ingenuity, two days to demonstrate, even to his own satisfaction, that they were not tenable. Arkansas, Mr. Speaker, entered the Union under the resolutions common to all the new States, viz: "that the new States shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the soil by the United States in Congress assembled, nor with any regulations Congress may find necessary for securing the title in said soil to the bona fide purchasers;" and that we would not tax the public land lying within the jurisdiction of the State. That compact we entered into, hard as it was, without a murmur, and we are willing and bound to preserve its stipulations in good faith. Such, sir, is our design; and we possess too much State pride to be found struggling to undo or violate the stipulations of a mutual compact. Is our example imitated and followed by the older States of the Confederacy? I think not. On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, I find the old States propelled and urged onward by avarice, disregarding all our former practices and compacts; and, in open violation of the public faith, boldly assuming the ground that the public domain should be subjected to the doctrine of distribution, and that it should be divided as a common spoil; thus, in effect and in fact, subverting every principle of equity, justice, and good faith.

In support of the position I shall assume against the resolution, one of the arguments I shall mainly rely upon is one that is advanced and admitted by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. ROBERTSON,] in his attempt to sustain the reverse of my proposition, that Congress has no power to raise money for distribution. That gentleman expressly and warmly repudiates all such doctrines; but, in the same breath, ingeniously attempts to draw a distinction between moneys derived from the sale of the public lands, and those which are collected and received from the ordinary sources of revenue collected from imports.

The resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. Speaker, revives the odious principles contained in the bill commonly called Mr. Clay's land bill, of 1832, without even retaining the advantages or benefits proposed by it, of giving to the new States the twelve per cent. on the amount of sales, but opens the broad principle, and the right of distributing the proceeds among the old States. The position thus assumed by the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia I controvert, because I not only deem it inexpedient, but unconstitutional. The fundamental principles of the party to which I belong assume and assert that it is the policy and the duty of the Government to raise no more money from the people, by any known mode of taxation, than is necessary to its support on the most economical plan, and in no event to raise money to be distributed among the States or the people. The admission of the gentleman from Virginia, that we have no power "to raise a revenue for distribution," either "directly or indirectly," is unqualifiedly correct; and, as it is admitted, I shall attempt to show that the object and effect of the measure proposed would violate that principle, and divert the proceeds of the sales of the public lands from the expressed objects and intentions of the several deeds of cession, made by the States of Virginia, North Carolina, Georgia, and New York, to the General Government, which expressly declare, among other things,

"That all the lands within the territory as ceded to the United States, and not reserved or appropriated to any of the beforementioned purposes, or disposed of in bounties to the officers and soldiers of the American Army, shall be considered as a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become or shall become members of the Confederation or Federal Alliance of the said States, Virginia inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever."

To arrive at the true meaning of the deeds of cession, we must look to the dates of those instruments, and the objects to be effected by them; and by examining these all important points, we find that the deeds of cession made in the year 1783, by Virginia, after the close of the revolutionary war, and during the existence of the Government under the Articles of Confederation, when the States were sovereign and independent, in the exercise of all the rights of sovereignty, and could make a treaty stipulation with the other sovereign States or with the Congress, which then exercised limited power under the then form of Government, which at once set the whole argument of the gentleman from Virginia in favor of distribution at defiance, and render it nugatory.

After the close of the war, we find Virginia, as well as the other States, largely indebted to her soldiery and citizens for services, provisions, and munitions of war, advanced to carry on the struggle for independence, and all dispossessed of the ability to liquidate their just debts. Hence, it was a matter of policy in that State to change that liability to some other quarter, and they made a deed of cession to relieve themselves from the liability thus referred to. The State of Virginia had a claim to the wild lands acquired by her charters under her colonial government, to what was termed the Northwest Territory, which now includes the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and the Territories of Wisconsin and Iowa. The nature of that claim, situated as it was, and being in possession of bands and hordes of hostile Indians, it is not my purpose to examine; but, if I should do so, I do very much doubt if I should not be able to show that, in transferring it to the Federal Government, Virginia displayed quite as much policy and interest and sagacity as magnanimity, or a benevolent devotion to the happiness of a young Republic just merging into existence; and, besides, if an argument were now opened on the subject, and its discussion were now in order, it is not at all improbable that it might be proved that Virginia never had a legitimate claim; by conquest, purchase, or by any other of the rights of possession, to a single acre of the domain she so generously and nobly ceded to the Federal Government.

But, all this aside, Virginia, through her legislative bodies, made a cession of her northwestern territorial claim to the General Government, and that Government agreed to satisfy and liquidate all her military bounties, with an understanding that the surplus, if any, should be applied as a common fund for the benefit of all the States, (Virginia included,) according to the stipulation in the deed of cession before alluded to, and for no other purpose. The obvious intention of this stipulation was, that the surplus should then be applied in liquidating the expenses of those States which were sovereign, and as such had participated in the expenses and sufferings and glories of the war for independence. At that period the several States were supported by a direct tax upon their citizens, and it was to afford them remuneration for their losses that this arrangement was effected. The compact thus made mutually between the State of Virginia and the Federal Government, led to the creation of the fund of which I have just spoken, and it thus virtually became a State fund for the support of the Government, and precisely as much so as it has, since the adoption of the Federal Constitution, become a common fund for the General Government, the mode of taxation having been changed by the formation of the Constitution, and consequently it has ever been considered a portion of the REVENUE to be expended for the benefit of all the States and the nation; and, until this project of distribution was started in 1832, no man, I believe, ever supposed or contended that this fund was to be diverted from the usual application. It must be borne in mind that the funds derived from sales of the public lands were to be applied to extinguish the national debt, which at that time (1783, at the close of the war) was not less than eighty million dollars; and, by reference to the return from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, it will be seen that the whole amount of sales does not exceed one hundred and six million dollars, exclusive of some twenty-eight million dollars expense accrued in bringing this land into market; so that the net proceeds of sales has about extinguished, without interest, the national debt; leaving the cost of extinguishing Indian titles to the public domain, and the purchase of Louisiana and Florida, unprovided for, amounting, in all, to about sixty million dollars, as will be seen from the table:

The national debt, it is true, has been paid; but it was liquidated by appropriating to its extinguishment a portion of the money arising from customs. There was, however, another debt, created by extinguishing Indian titles; to the amount of $60,000,000, which is also to be paid before you can apply the funds from the public lands for any other purpose, even if there were not a constitutional objection. It is admitted that we cannot raise money for distribution by direct taxation, or by revenue from imports. This I admit and assume; then we have taken money out of the public Treasury to extinguish the Indian titles to all the lands we claim under the deeds of cession and treaty; and until that money is refunded, by the application of the sales of the public domain, it is a part of the national revenue, and cannot be distributed!

This fact, this position, I presume, cannot be denied, and will not be controverted; and with these undisputed evidences before me, I feel myself authorized in saying that the question of distribution is settled and cannot be sustained by argument or sophistry; for you cannot do indirectly what you cannot do directly; and that the positions here assumed were so understood, I shall cite to the House an ordinance as early as May, 1785, providing for sales of land in the Western Territory, and directing the proceeds to be paid into the Treasury of the United States, &c. As early as the 4th of August, 1790, Congress enacted as follows:

"That the proceeds of the sales which shall be made of lands in the Western Territory, now belonging, or that may hereafter belong, to the United States, shall be, and are hereby, appropriated towards sinking or discharging the debts, for the payment whereof the United States are now, or by virtue of this act may be, holden; and shall be applied solely to that use until the debt shall be fully satisfied."

And that this was the settled policy of the Government none will deny, until the celebrated project of Mr. Clay in 1832.

You cannot, Mr. Speaker, raise money for distribution; nor can you take money out of the Treasury to pay for lands, and sell them, and distribute the avails of their sale to the States, or make any other disposition of them, no more than you can touch the money in the Treasury without special appropriation made by authority of law. In this place, and at this point, it becomes me to notice another position assumed, but not successfully maintained, by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. ROBERTSON,] whose ingenuity in arguing and advocating abstractions, has long since won for him an honorable distinction. Sir, that honorable gentleman says there is no difference between the lands acquired by cession and those acquired by purchase. In the main, that assumption may be true; there is, however, a distinction which will serve to demonstrate the more clearly the ground that I maintain; that is to say, I contend that the lands acquired by treaty with France and Spain, are without the limitations and restrictions which, in other cases, might require that the proceeds of sales shall be disposed of for the "common benefit of all, and for no other purposes." We are left free to dispose of them as justice and a strict adherence to the principles of the Constitution may authorize; but Congress has acquired no more power to distribute the proceeds of the sales of those lands than it has over the ceded lands; for the assumption of any such power would amount to an open and direct violation of the admitted proposition, that money cannot be raised for distribution. Sir, I need not say that $29,000,000, including interest, were taken out of the Treasury to carry into execution the Louisiana treaty of 1803, and the Florida treaty of 1818; besides this, we have paid not less than $60,000,000 for the extinguishment of Indian titles; the sum total amounting to nearly $90,000,000, independently of the national debt; being, in fact, and in the eyes of the law, so much money in the public Treasury which cannot be vested in lands, stocks, or anything else to change its character, so as to enable it to avoid the constitutional objection.

To tell me that you can take the public money to purchase a territory, extinguish Indian titles, and then divide the proceeds of the lands thus acquired, when it is admitted that the money in the first instance could not be so applied, is to ask me to swallow and adopt abstractions and plunge at once in the latitudinarian construction of the Constitution; in a word, it is to ask me to adopt opinions and dogmas variant and at war with my own sentiments, and in violation of all the principles and political creeds of the party with which I have the honor to associate. Sir, you had as well tell me that you can take the public money for the purchase of a ship, and dispatch her to Europe at the public expense, and there, out of the funds of the nation, purchase blood horses and jacks, and bring them home and sell them at public auction and divide the proceeds of the adventure among the States. If, sir, you can do this, can you not establish a Treasury note bank, or a bank with $50,000,000 capital, and divide it among the States and distribute its dividends? Is there, sir, any distinction between taking the money out of the Treasury and purchasing lands and dividing their proceeds, and taking the same amount for the purchase of stocks and banks and dividing their proceeds? If there is, I acknowledge very frankly my utter inability to appreciate or understand a particle of difference between the two propositions. And, sir, I am at a loss to understand how the gentleman from Virginia, who is a strict constructionist and a lawyer of distinguished preëminence, can possibly bring his mind to the conclusion he has adopted. I am perfectly assured he is candid in taking the ground he has assumed, and I can only account for the singularity of his dogmas by supposing that he is exceedingly anxious to get a little money out of the public crib for the "good old Dominion."

Mr. Speaker, we are often told that much more has been done for the new States than for the old. Sir, I deny and controvert the fact, and boldly declare that the new States have been imposed upon. Restrictions and onerous obligations were placed on us as a condition before we could be admitted into the Union; and those restrictions and impediments have originated a scheme for keeping up a heavy taxation upon personal property in the new States; and yet, sir, we have not had the privilege of taxing the public domain within our borders. Had we that privilege, and could we tax the property of the General Government as we do that of our own citizens, we should have an overflowing State treasury—a treasury, sir, that would enable us to carry out our systems of education and internal improvement.

I will take my own State, Mr. Speaker, and base upon it the grounds that I assume. Arkansas was admitted into the Union three years since. Since her admission she has received from the Government by appropriations about one hundred thousand dollars, which sum was expended in improving the navigable waters of our common country; for our rivers, sir, like our roads, are open to all, have conferred, in a tenfold degree, more benefits on the great body of the American people than on the immediate population of Arkansas. These rivers have been improved, and you have used them to transport troops and munitions of war and provisions to your outposts, Fort Gibson and Fort Smith, on the Arkansas, and to other important points on the southwestern and western border. Without these improvements, the demand and the price of supplies for your Army would have been augmented to the rate of one hundred per centum. What would have been the taxes of the State, provided we had taxed the lands of the Government at the present rate of taxation imposed on the people of Arkansas for the support of her government? That rate is about one cent the acre, including State and county taxation! From House document No. 46, covering a report and estimate from the Commissioner of Public Lands, we find that there yet remain within the limits of Arkansas twenty-eight million two hundred and sixty thousand seven hundred and forty-three acres of land yet unsold, after deducting grants and donations to the State and individuals.

Suppose, sir, we were permitted to tax that land at the moderate sum of one cent the acre, the gross amount would be swelled to the round sum of $280,607. And if we had taxed these lands at that rate for the last three years, or from the day of our admission to the Union, we should have drawn from your Treasury the sum of $841,811, an amount nearly equaling the amount the State and Territory have received since their establishment! And yet you deny my State the poor pittance necessary to establish roads within her boundaries.

From the same document, to which I have made reference, I find that, in all the new States and Territories, there remains unsold the gross amount of two hundred and twenty nine million seven hundred and eleven thousand and seventy-five acres, which, at the very moderate rate of taxation of one cent the acre, if taxed, would yield the sum total of $2,297,100! Some of the new States have been in the Union nearly forty years. I will, however, make an average of twenty years of taxation at the rate I have previously spoken of, and, in that period, the taxation would amount to $47,940,000! As an equivalent for the denial of the right to tax the public domain, the new States and Territories have received—

For salines.....	329,600 acres.
For common schools.....	9,385,000 "
For various other purposes.....	3,385,000 "
Total.....	12,770,000 "

Money received for two per cent. fund for roads leading to the States, to be expended under the direction of Congress.....$1,456,000
For three per cent. fund to be paid to each State for the construction of roads within the same, 2,134,000
For five per cent. fund paid for construction of roads within the States..... 326,700

Within the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, we have sixty-six million acres of public lands, which would yield, if taxed at one cent the acre, about double the amount now proposed to be expended in the opening of the Cumberland road; and yet we are told that the new States are receiving more than their proportion of the public money! Hereafter, I shall advise gentlemen to look to the expenditures in their own States, and bear in mind that the old thirteen States owned and received all the benefits derivable from the Crown lands which lay within their limits, after the revolutionary war; and let them recollect that not one dollar, derived from the sale of them, ever reached the thirteen new States.

One would think, Mr. Speaker, after the compact with the State of Tennessee, in the year 1806-07, that that State was and is bound to pay and satisfy all the North Carolina land warrants. Under that compact the General Government donated to Tennessee, for colleges and academies, two hundred thousand acres; and besides this, the Government was to set apart for common schools the sixteenth section of each township embraced in the whole of that section of country lying north and east of the congressional reservation line, which would have given the State one hundred and seventy thousand acres, instead of the twenty-five thousand acres actually received, leaving unsatisfied and due the State one hundred and thirty-five thousand acres. But even that is denied her! And the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. ROBERTSON,] says that injustice would be done to the settlers by compelling them to remain on the poor refuse lands, and offers the assertion as an argument to prove that the lands should not be ceded! If the gentleman is candid in his position, then why refuse to relinquish to the State of Tennessee and to the other States the refuse lands? Why desire to hold on, and sell them at high prices, to divide among the States, when he admits that it is an injury to the settlers to suffer them to remain on them without price? Avarice, I fear, is a controlling passion, and it is that, sir, which withholds from these States and from the people lands which the gentleman from Virginia admits are not fit for cultivation.

Mr. Speaker, the spirit of avarice and plunder seems now the order of the day; the trials and misfortunes of the poor, who have sought a retreat in the forests of your western wilds, amidst the dangers of climate and the red man, have no place in the hearts of American statesmen. That band of patriotic citizens which have emigrated and settled your wild domain, who opened your roads, and, by their valor, defended your frontier, and who are bound together by new ties as society increases, have been left to contend against a herd of speculators to secure their own just rights, and are now, by this resolution, to be brought in contact with the greedy and voracious States, instead of the heartless speculator.

Mr. Speaker, I have now offered all the arguments that I intend to present in support of the position that Congress has no power, under the Constitution, to raise money from any source for the purpose of dividing it among the States; and I will now proceed to offer my objections to the passage of the resolution upon the ground of expediency. Sir, as a matter of interest and expediency, I protest against it. The state of the national Treasury will not justify it; and, under the present situation of the tariff, the revenue must gradually decrease until the expiration of the compromise act, in the year 1842, at which period the revenue will sink to about twelve or thirteen millions, thus producing a probable and supposable deficiency in the Treasury of money, exclusive of the sales of public lands, of some eight or twelve millions. I need not say that increased duties will follow to supply that deficiency; and, until the country is prepared to suffer itself to be burdened with a high tariff, for the benefit of eastern manufacturers, will it submit to the provisions of the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia? Sir, my people more especially refuse to submit to a tariff of some fifty or one hundred per cent., the burden of which must (as all imports ever do and ever must) fall on the consumers; and at least two thirds of such a tariff would fall upon the new States, whose citizens will be required, individually, to pay the increased tariff.

In this place I take much pleasure in presenting to the House the views of the late President of the United States, General Jackson, who, as a statesman has had no superior, and whose arguments in his celebrated veto message on Mr. CLAY's land bill are so conclusive as to leave not a doubt on the mind of any man, who is not blinded by passion or partisanship, as to the impolicy and unconstitutionality of the distributive system. Thus argued the late President:

"But this bill assumes a new principle. Its object is not to return to the people an unavoidable surplus of revenue paid in by them, but to create a surplus for distribution among the States. It seizes the entire proceeds of one source of revenue, and sets them apart as a surplus, making it necessary to raise the moneys for supporting the Government, and meeting the general charges, from other sources. It even throws the entire land system upon the customs for its support, and makes the public lands a perpetual charge upon the Treasury. It does not return to the people moneys accidentally or unavoidably paid by them to the Government, by which they are not wanted; but compels the people to pay moneys into the Treasury for the mere purpose of creating a surplus for distribution to their State governments. If this principle be once admitted, it is not difficult to perceive to what consequences it may lead. Already this bill, by throwing the land system on the revenues from imports for support, virtually distributes among the States a part of those revenues. The proportion may be increased from time to time, without any departure from the principle now asserted, until the State government shall derive all funds necessary for their support from the Treasury of the United States. Or, if a sufficient supply should be obtained by some States and not by others, the deficient States might complain, and, to put an end to all further difficulty, Congress, without assuming any new principle, need go but one step further, and put the salaries of all the State Governors, judges, and other officers, with a sufficient sum for other expenses, in their general appropriation bill.

"It appears to me that a more direct road to consolidation cannot be devised. Money is power, and in that power, which pays all the public officers of the States, will all political power be substantially concentrated. The State governments, if governments they might be called, would lose all their independence and dignity. The economy which now distinguishes them would be converted into a profusion, limited only by the extent of the supply. Being the dependants of the General Government, and looking to its Treasury as the source of all their emoluments, the State officers, under whatever names they might pass, and by whatever forms their duties might be prescribed, would, in effect, be the mere stipendiaries and instruments of the central power."

And again, the same enlightened statesman remarked:

"I deceive myself greatly if the new States would find their interests promoted by such a system as this bill proposes. Their true policy consists in the rapid settling and improvement of the waste lands within their limits. As a means of hastening those events, they have long been looking to a reduction in the price of public lands upon the final payment of the national debt. The effect of the proposed system would be to prevent that reduction. It is true the bill reserves to Congress the power to reduce the price, but the effect of its details, as now arranged, would probably be forever to prevent its exercise."

The message from which I have read these extracts was so able, so conclusive, that it was not only sustained by Congress, but by an overwhelming majority of the American people. It demonstrates, beyond the shadow of a doubt, that the system of distribution is not only impolitic, unjust, unequal, but that it is unconstitutional.

If it was impolitic and inexpedient in the year 1832 to recognize the system, it is more so now, (in 1839,) situated as the Treasury is; and prudence forbids its adoption. Even if Congress had the power to carry it into effect, it would, if enforced, be destructive to the interests of the new States, and at a single blow would prostrate all future hope of receiving any benefits from the kind action of Congress.

Carry the scheme of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON] into execution, and we are then to be taxed by the tariff one hundred per centum, amounting to about ten million dollars, to make up a deficiency in the Treasury; and, on the other hand, we will receive, under the provisions of the resolution, our proportion of the lands, according to the Federal enumeration of our population, amounting, certainly, by the most liberal calculation to about five million dollars only; thus inflicting a loss on my constituents of about twenty-five per centum upon the whole amount of increased duties, either from direct taxation, which may be resorted to, or by an increased tariff.

By reference to the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury, we find the revenue from the import duties ranging from $38,000,000, in 1833, to $11,000,000, in 1838.

After the year 1841, the revenue from customs will not exceed the foregoing estimate of $13,000,000; and the most economical administration of the Government cannot fall under $18,000,000 for ordinary appropriations, independent of annual extraordinary appropriations; ranging from five to ten million dollars; consequently, without the revenue derivable from the public lands, the deficiency in the Treasury cannot fall short of eight or ten million dollars.

I have now, Mr. Speaker, discharged my duty to my constituents and myself, and the result is left to the wisdom of the country. I soon quit this Hall for the more retired scenes of my adopted State, and in surrendering the trust committed to me by the people of that young and happy State, I feel assured that I have faithfully struggled to serve them; and it is a source of pride and gratitude to me to know that they have generally approved my efforts, and in no instance manifested any other feeling than that of kindness and friendship far beyond my merits.

MAINE BOUNDARY QUESTION.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 27, 1839.

A message from the President of the United States, with a memorandum of a specific character, signed by the Secretary of State and the British Minister, together with various other documents on the subject of the Maine and New Brunswick difficulties, having been received and read in the Senate—

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Maine, said the message of the President and accompanying documents, just now read by the Secretary, were highly important to the nation, but more especially so to the State which he had the honor, in part, to represent. They related to a question of the deepest interest to his constituents, and to measures adopted and pursued by the united voice of the Legislature and the people of the State of Maine for the preservation and defense of her property and rights. He was not sure that he fully comprehended the terms and meaning of the message, and agreement or memorandum, signed by her Britannic Majesty's Minister and the Secretary of State, but so far as he could catch them from the reading at the Clerk's desk, he felt it due to the Senate and to his constituents, to say, frankly, that he feared they would not prove satisfactory to Maine, or produce the effect intended by the framers of them.

The people as well as the Legislature of Maine feel deeply and sensibly the injustice and degradation she has long suffered from an unjust and groundless claim, by a foreign Government, to one third of the territory of that State, and from the exercise of jurisdiction by that Government over a part of the territory, and from repeated arrests and imprisonment of her citizens by that foreign Government, without redress or satisfaction. They are now aroused and excited by the recent avowal of the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick and of the British Minister, that Great Britain claims exclusive jurisdiction over the whole disputed territory, and that that claim will be enforced by military power. They feel that the question of her boundary has already been suffered to remain unsettled too long; that Great Britain refuses to settle it according to the treaty of 1783; and that the time has come when Maine must protect her own property on the disputed territory, or suffer its principal value to be destroyed and abstracted by desperate marauders. The General Government interposes no obstacle to the continued depredations upon that territory, and the honor and interest of Maine have alike impelled her Legislature to adopt measures intended and well calculated to prevent further destruction of the timber upon that territory, as well as to arrest and punish the trespassers. For this object Maine sent her land agent and sheriff, with an armed posse deemed sufficient to arrest and disperse the gangs of trespassers who had bid defiance to her laws, as well as to her power, to stop their depredations.

The land agent and his assistants, after partially accomplishing their purpose, were surrounded by armed men in the night time, forcibly carried to Woodstock, there examined by magistrates of the Province of New Brunswick, and ordered to Fredericton; they were sent off on a horse sled, amid the shouts and jeers of the populace, under a military guard, and imprisoned in a foreign jail; add to such unjustifiable seizure and imprisonment of the land agent and his assistants, the proclamation of Sir John Harvey, denouncing the acts of Maine and her officers as an invasion of her Majesty's province, and threatening to expel by force the posse sent by Maine for the protection and preservation of her property. Then look at Sir John's letter to the Governor of Maine, asserting the claim to exclusive jurisdiction of the whole disputed territory, by agreement between the two General Governments, and threatening to expel from the territory the armed force of Maine, unless the Governor of Maine should voluntarily withdraw it; and connect with it the assertion of the British Minister that exclusive jurisdiction of the disputed territory belongs to Great Britain until the question of boundary shall be finally settled, with the claim of Mr. Sreet, Attorney General of New Brunswick, upon Mr. Jarvis, then acting as land agent of Maine, requiring him to withdraw from the disputed territory, and to surrender the persons arrested and in custody, as trespassers upon the disputed territory, to the authorities of New Brunswick; to be tried in the courts of that province, and you have the reasons and the justification of Maine for the course she has adopted, and is pursuing, and which course is intended to be controlled and restrained by the memorandum and agreement now communicated.

If Maine was right, as all seem to admit she was, in sending her land agent and posse to protect the timber and to arrest the trespassers, then she must not only be justified, but applauded, for promptly meeting the threat of Sir John Harvey (to expel that posse by military force if not withdrawn) by arrangements to support and sustain the land agent and posse by a force equal to the emergency. Can Maine retrace her steps and withdraw her land agent and posse, without virtually yielding to the demand and threat of Sir John Harvey? Would any Senator desire that she should do it? Would any American pardon her if she did do it? Mr. W. did not pretend to speak by authority on this occasion, and would not say how Maine would think or act in respect of the recommendations to her; but as a citizen and representative of that State, knowing something of the feelings and determination of the people and government of Maine, he felt it due to them and to the country to say now, in his place, and upon the first appearance of the memorandum and agreement, as he understood it, (having no opportunity to learn its meaning and intent, except from the reading of it here,) that it would not be satisfactory to Maine, and cannot be carried into effect.

The agreement, as understood, provides that Sir John Harvey will not attempt to expel, by military force, the armed party which Maine has upon the territory; that Maine will forthwith withdraw from the disputed territory; and if, hereafter, there shall be necessity for an armed force to expel notorious trespassers the operation shall be conducted by concert between Maine and New Brunswick. If, by the armed party, was only intended the military force which Maine has ordered to sustain the posse against the threatened attack of Sir John Harvey, then Maine surely would not object to withdraw that force, upon Sir John withdrawing his threat, which threat was the sole cause of sending that force upon the territory; and if such should be the understanding of the parties to the agreement, then Mr. W. had no objection to that part of it; but if it be intended that the land agent and posse shall be withdrawn before they shall have accomplished the objects for which they were sent, it cannot be done. Maine cannot yield to the demand of Sir John Harvey, even by the advice of the General Government, without surrendering her unquestionable right to protect her territory and property from depredation. Again: if Maine were to withdraw her land agent and posse, what security is provided by the memorandum that Sir John will not immediately enter upon the disputed territory and occupy it, by military force or otherwise, pursuant to his claim of exclusive jurisdiction? That claim, though denied by our Government, is not renounced by Sir John or Mr. Fox.

Further, the arrangement as to future trespasses, besides being limited to notorious trespassers, (leaving all ordinary trespassers unprovided for,) is impracticable, and will lead to new collisions. It is vain to expect that two nations, each claiming the whole property, can, for any length of time, exercise a joint, concurrent jurisdiction over it. But if that could be done in some cases, it cannot be done in the case under consideration, for the obvious reason that all the available product of this territory is the timber upon it, and that timber must find a market in the British Provinces. It is for the interest of merchants and others in New Brunswick that this timber should be cut and disposed of through their agency, and that interest is so strong and abiding that we cannot rely upon the provincial authorities to check or prevent the continued abstraction of the timber. What has been may be again; and notwithstanding the boasted efforts of the warden of the disputed territory to stop and punish trespassers in past years, it is known that the number of trespassers has been annually increasing. The agreement provides that whenever an armed force shall be necessary to suppress notorious trespassers, it shall be done by concert between Maine and New Brunswick. Suppose that another year should be as the last has been, and Maine should wish to expel and punish the trespassers: if New Brunswick, for any cause, should not be disposed to concur in measures adequate to the object, what remedy is left for Maine? Her rights are entirely at the mercy of New Brunswick!

But he would not detain the Senate. The arrangement has been made, and may possibly be less objectionable than he had supposed. He hoped it was so; and Mr. W. would gladly embrace, as he believed Maine would also do, any plan which should allay existing excitement, and promise a speedy settlement of the boundary question. That was the great question, and the question which must soon be settled in some way. It had already been too long delayed; in fact, that boundary should never have been suffered to be brought into question. Any temporizing expedient will avail but little; it may give some further opportunity to attempt negotiation, and Maine would not complain; but the time has come when the General Government must bring the question to a termination, by negotiation or otherwise. Maine has already borne and forborne beyond what almost any other State would have done. She has her rights, and knows them; she is yet desirous that the General Government will assert and secure them to her; and, above all, she desires not to disturb or put in hazard the peace of the country. Still, Maine must and will respect herself, and thus acting, cannot much longer suffer an important portion of her territory to be in doubt or abeyance. Whatever territory is hers must be subject to her jurisdiction and to her laws, and cannot be withheld from her much longer. The business and wishes of the people of Maine are peaceful; and it has taken a long period of suffering to bring about the spirit which now pervades almost every bosom in Maine, and that spirit is not to be overcome. She hopes to obtain her rights peaceably; but be assured that delay will soon be regarded denial, and then the gallant spirit and perseverance of her sons will accomplish for her what ages of negotiation have thus far failed to secure.

Mr. PRESTON said that he would not allow himself to participate in the despondency with which the Senator [Mr. WILLIAMS] regarded the condition of affairs on the Maine frontier, or to believe that the recommendatory suggestions in the memorandum signed by Mr. Forsyth and Mr. Fox would be inefficacious in suspending the hostile proceedings in the disputed territory. We have been suddenly and unexpectedly hurried into an attitude menacing the most serious results, and placing us at once, without any previous action of this Government, upon the very edge of war. Indeed, nothing could have been more unexpected to the public mind, or to the constituted authorities of this Government, than the startling events which have astounded us for the last few days. We may well judge from our own excitement how much more intensely agitated are the feelings of those who are in the immediate presence of those events, and participants in them. It is, therefore, most desirable that there should be a moment of pause allowed for our own deliberations, and some time given to the angry parties on the frontier to consider of their position, and to right themselves, if, in a moment of heat, either has fallen into error. This most desirable end the memorandum of Messrs. Forsyth and Fox seems to have in view, and if received by the Governors of Maine and New Brunswick in a corresponding spirit, will leave the adjustment of their differences to the dispassionate discussion of the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, to whom properly and exclusively belongs the decision of the great question of war or peace.

Nothing could be more improper, in every point of view, or more to be deplored, than that a foreign war should be superinduced by a precipitate collision of coterminous authorities, superseding the cautious deliberations of the great nations whose destiny will be so deeply implicated in the contest. The question of foreign war belongs to this Government; and I beg leave to assure the honorable Senator that, whenever the interest or honor of his State shall, in the opinion of this Government, make an appeal to arms necessary for their vindication, I, and I believe the State of South Carolina, will as freely take them up in her defense as if the affront or the injury had been suffered by ourselves. I know, sir, that the State of Maine has been subjected to much, justly calculated to aggrrieve and excite her, and I cannot forbear to add that, in my judgment, the negotiations for her relief have not been urged with sufficient earnestness, or her rights insisted on in a tone as peremptory as their unequivocal character fully justified. Her title to the disputed territory is unquestionable, and obtained, at the last session, the unanimous sanction of this body, after a most careful examination. This would have authorized the most decisive demands from our Government on that of Great Britain; and, if they have not been urged, Maine may have cause of complaint. But, as her claims were the subject of actual negotiation, and her territory, in regard to which that negotiation was pending, was subject to provisional arrangement by an understanding between the Governments, it is certainly due to this Government that it be consulted, if possible, upon any matters affecting these relations; or, if this was not deemed proper, I could have wished, at all events, that it had been thought advisable by that State to have notified the British authorities of the trespass of which she complains, and of the mode in which she intended to correct it. This might have produced mutual explanations, and perhaps cooperation in the correction of the evil; or, if not, the British authorities, by their countenance of the marauders, would have been placed flagrantly in the wrong. That this was possible may, in some degree, be inferred from the prompt and high tone of the British correspondence, and from the preposterous assertion of the claim to exclusive jurisdiction over the disputed territory.

This unwarrantable and most extraordinary assumption in regard to exclusive jurisdiction, may perhaps itself furnish the grounds of a future amicable adjustment of these differences. Sir John Harvey is clearly mistaken. His Government, it is to be hoped, will correct his error, and avow that he has misunderstood his orders. The British Government will not have the hardihood to set up such a pretension; and, as the military operations of Sir John are founded on this mistake, it is clearly the part of wisdom to pause until his Government has an opportunity to rectify it.

However this may be, the recommendatory convention before us is calculated to put the parties in the condition they occupied before the occurrence of these untoward events; to put the rights of Maine again in the keeping of this Government, where the Constitution and the progress of the negotiation deposited them; and, above all, to leave upon the two Governments themselves the high responsibility of peace or war.

I cannot, Mr. President, refrain from commending, in emphatic terms, the spirit of moderation and firmness which has characterized the conduct of the Administration in the difficult emergency upon which we have been thrown. It has my hearty approbation, and I cannot but hope, as I most ardently wish, that a policy commenced under such favorable auspices may eventuate in the reestablishment and consolidation of pacific relations. But if, unhappily, it should be otherwise; why then I pledge myself to the Senator from Maine, and to the country, that I will not stop to count the cost when duty and patriotism demand, as they then will demand, a solemn appeal to the last reason of nations.

Mr. DAVIS said: I believe, Mr. President, I feel as much on this subject as the Senator from South Carolina, who has just exhorted us to temperance, patience, and forbearance, till this question shall be adjusted. But I wish to call the attention of the Senate for a moment to some portions of the history of this negotiation, that we may see where we now stand. The proposition for a mutual understanding was, that the two parties should remain as they were, and that each should continue to hold jurisdiction and possession of the disputed territory just so far as they had already been obtained by the parties, respectively. And now, what is our attitude in regard to this whole business? I took some pains, in the course of the discussion at the last session, to examine this matter through, to see what was the true condition of our diplomatic arrangements, and it will be found that this must be the result of the whole: That Great Britain, on her part, has decisively refused to comply with a demand for a negotiation on the question as to where was the boundary designated by the treaty of 1783. The Government of the United States has again and again urged that certain marks, monuments, and boundaries pointed out by that treaty were to be ascertained; but she says the negotiation on that topic is exhausted, and, though she is willing to negotiate for a conventional line, she will not negotiate in regard to the line of that treaty. Here the matter rested, and Maine was consulted by the United States Government, whether she was willing to have the question settled by determining on a conventional line. To this proposition Maine gave a flat refusal. She would not, in any case, consent to a conventional line, but she was willing, in any way, to determine and settle the line of the treaty. The United States Government now determined that, unless Maine would consent, they had no power to negotiate further, because they had no power to negotiate away any portion of Maine. That is where the diplomatic correspondence places it, as I then showed by letters of Mr. Vaughan, Mr. Forsyth, and other gentlemen concerned in the negotiation; and Mr. Forsyth declared, in regard to the negotiation, that it was perfectly hopeless to renew it, because the British Government had again and again said that they would not negotiate on the treaty of 1783, which was the only basis to which Maine would agree; and whoever will examine the correspondence will see that I am borne out in these statements.

Sir, I am not about to oppose this proposition, or any propositions which may be presented of a pacific character, and which are merely to bring Maine and New Brunswick back to where they stood. But, without regard to that proposition, I will proceed to one conclusion further. Although the plan now proposed may put off, for a time, the evil day; although it may relieve our present embarrassments, and may place us for the time out of the belligerent attitude, yet, I ask, what is the prospect that we will bring this matter to a close, and that we shall escape an ultimate collision? Supposing the two countries now go back to this conflicting jurisdiction, and proceed in the manner in which they have heretofore proceeded, as I have already said, the conflict there grows directly out of this dispute about jurisdiction. Those conflicting jurisdictions run into each other; they have no ascertained boundaries or limits, and hence it is that citizens of Maine have again and again been arrested and dragged into New Brunswick by her civil authorities, and there convicted, pardoned, and sent back. Through all this it has happened that, whenever it was necessary to preserve the peace of the country, the United States Government has stepped in as a mediator, the citizens of Maine have been released, and peace and harmony, for the time, restored as far as they could be. In that course things have gone on till they have created a public feeling, a sense of wrong and indignity which, I think, cannot much longer be endured. Sir, they cannot go forward in the present state of things. If the two Governments think that they can maintain peace and harmony without great zeal and energy in settling this question, they flatter themselves with hopes that will prove vain and groundless.

25TH CONG....3D SESS.

Maine Boundary Question—Mr. Webster.

I have risen, Mr. President, to make these remarks, and to present this piece of diplomatic history, to show the Senate that, if the proposition before us is not followed up by speedy and efficient measures for a final settlement of the question, we should be just as well off without that protocol (the memorandum) as with it. The conflict must come, and these difficulties cannot be adjusted unless the main question is finally settled. The only desire by which I have now been actuated is that the Senate should be acquainted with these facts, and, when they comprehend them, I am fully persuaded that they will arrive at the same result at which I have arrived. I concur fully with the Senator from Maine, who preceded me, that unless something effectual should be done in the settlement of the principal question of territory, the citizens of Maine cannot be quieted, and such an arrangement as that now before us can never preserve the peace of the country.

Mr. RUGGLES said Maine could have no inducement to rush herself, or to draw the country needlessly, into a war; for it was evident that she would herself receive the first, the second, the third, and the last blow in such a conflict. She was on the very frontier that was menaced, and the war would be chiefly on her own borders. Her commerce and all her interests on the ocean would be destroyed at once on the declaration of war. It was impossible to conceive the extent of the mischief that would be done to her interests; and could it, therefore, be supposed that she had set herself in such a position as she now occupied without great consideration, or without being compelled to take it for the preservation of her honor and her rights?

Sir, (said Mr. R.,) what is the aspect of this matter as it now stands? Maine claims the jurisdiction over that portion of the country which is now the scene of the contest; not over the whole disputed territory, but over that particular part of it; or, if she does not claim exclusive jurisdiction, at least she claims a right to that sort of jurisdiction which she has held for many years past, and of which she has never been dispossessed. In maintaining that sort of jurisdiction, she found it necessary to arrest a band of depredators, for the purpose of preventing the destruction of her property. In this attempt she was resisted by them, and by them her agent was seized and carried away; and this act of violence on their part was ratified by the New Brunswick authorities, by whom, also, the demand was made that exclusive jurisdiction over the territory should be conceded to Great Britain. This demand cannot be complied with, unless by yielding a right of Maine which this Government has recognized; that is, a right to a mixed jurisdiction, or the right to be there, at least to protect the property in dispute from ravages by a third party. Sir, she has done no more, but has exercised her authority precisely as she had before, for on several occasions she has driven off depredators from this territory. Maine, therefore, cannot consent, on such a demand as has been made, to withdraw her forces. Yet it seems this Government is now prepared to require it of her; and by what right do they require it? Sir John Harvey is now declaring that he will, by a military force, arrest every person that he may find in that territory, and bring them to punishment. Is there any authority for this from this Government? The government of Maine now calls on this Government to aid her in defending territory rightfully belonging to Maine; and I ask if this is not a case when we may ask the President to call out the forces of the country to repel invasion? That is precisely what the Governor of Maine has done. But the President appears not to apprehend that that case has arisen in which he is to defend the territory of Maine; though he has said that if New Brunswick persevere in asserting by arms a right to exclusive jurisdiction, he would then consider it an occasion in which he would be required to repel invasion. Sir, this is not to recover a territory, but the object is to repel invasion; or, now that invasion is loudly threatened, it ought to be to go against the territory being invaded at all.

As it respects what the President now proposes, I do not know but it may be regarded as a wise measure. Maine is anxious that the whole question should be settled, and she has again and again urged it on this Government. Her citizens in the meantime have been often arrested and imprisoned, her property has been destroyed, and she is now required still to submit to these outrages. If there was any probability that the question would be brought to an adjustment in any reasonable time by negotiation, Maine would not have assumed her present attitude. But it is because she has no confidence in negotiation, that she has at last found it necessary to take the remedy into her own hands; and I now ask, will this Government require her to withdraw her troops after all that State has endured, and the people have been roused to a just sense of their rights and wrongs? And I ask further, whether this Government has a right to call on Maine to withdraw her troops? I do not know but this right may be claimed as within the constitutional powers of this Government to control a State in respect to the possession of her territory. But it is on record that this territory belongs to Maine, by a unanimous vote of this Senate, and from this I believe the Executive does not differ; I believe the whole country is united on this point; I do not know of an individual who has the least doubt that the right to the territory is in Maine. And yet, when we undertake to maintain our rights alone, we are requested to withdraw our troops under a threat. If they can be withdrawn, and the honor and the rights of Maine be sufficiently respected, I am willing that it should be done.

I am this moment informed (said Mr. R. with much concern) that there has been an actual collision in the disputed territory, and that bloodshed has taken place. News has arrived that a battle has been fought, and that fifty of the Maine men have been killed, and nine of the English.

Mr. WEBSTER said: I hope, Mr. President, that this rumor will turn out to be incorrect. It would be melancholy, indeed, if it should be true that a hostile meeting has taken place, followed by such consequences as have been stated. But not at all under the influence of any impression from that rumor, I will make a few remarks on the general subject, and on this communication from the Executive Government; and painful as it is, I must say that I cannot approve of the conduct of the Executive on this important measure since the last session. I will even go a little beyond that, and say what I did not mean to say till the certainty should be developed whether there would be any collision between the parties, because I do not desire to make this controversy with England a matter of party. At the last session, and whenever there was any occasion, I endeavored to set forth the right to the territory as our own, and not to complain of any Administration for the manner in which that right had been either neglected or enforced. But there are two or three things that ought to be stated; and without going at this time further back than the last session, I wish to know what reason has been assigned to Congress why this negotiation has not been pressed to some practical result, or finally broken off. As to the expression of the opinions of Congress, in both its branches, nothing could be more decided than the resolutions of the last year. And what do we learn to have been done in consequence of those resolutions? I ask if there has anything been communicated to Congress at this session in the form or shape of a reason why this matter has not been brought to some sort of a conclusion, or made some degree of progress? When we ask what onward steps have been taken, the answer given to the question is, that nothing has been done; but why, we are not informed. And while nothing has been done here or in London, Maine has undertaken to examine the question whether the lines of the treaty of 1783 are an ascertainable boundary. She has explored the territory by commissioners, and her commissioners come back and tell us that there is no more difficulty in running that line than any others which run due north from a given point. They have found the treaty lines (the highlands) to be as visible and tangible as the Alleghany mountains, or any other highlands, though, of course, less elevated; so that the boundaries of Maine are as clear and as easily ascertained as other lines of division in the country. And yet a negotiation has been going on year after year; and when we ask what has yet been done, even down to this hour, we learn that nothing has been accomplished; that, to all appearances, the dispute is as far from a termination as ever.

And now what Maine has done is to be superseded, New Brunswick and Maine are to withdraw, and all things are to return to the state in which they were ante bellum, and then we are again assured there is to be a speedy settlement of the controversy by negotiation! And so said Spain on a certain occasion, when she did not settle the question for fifty years. Sir, this important matter cannot go on, or rather it cannot stand still, in this manner. Maine cannot be kept, and ought not to be kept, thus in a state of dissatisfaction and neglect.

Sir, I think this matter must be settled, and that it will not permit delay; and I must say that a strong Administration here, and another in England, might long ago have brought it to a close.

The time must come when, if the controversy cannot be terminated by some sort of negotiation; it must be settled otherwise. I believe our right is clear; and, although I am willing to concede much for peace and good neighborhood, I am not willing to delay a final adjustment indefinitely, or at the hazard or in the face of the certainty of border conflicts. I do not wish that Maine should take possession of the territory. The controversy is ours. But if this negotiation is to be prolonged and delayed, postponed and put off, without reasonable prospect of ever seeing an end of it, then I am for ascertaining the treaty boundary by an examination of our own, and if we are satisfied we are right, for making that boundary the line of our possession, and seeing whether we can hold it. When negotiation becomes mere procrastination, and serious dangers in the mean time threaten, a more decided tone ought to be assumed. Depend upon it, sir, the peace of the country is more endangered by these unnecessary and unjustifiable postponements and delays than it would be by holding a more decisive language, and manifesting a more resolute spirit. I do not believe there has yet been collision; I hope there will be none. But I do not wish to see Maine humiliated or disgraced. I believe that if something of her own spirit and feeling had pervaded us here, we should have now been through the controversy. There is yet, I have no doubt, time for pacific adjustment; but England must learn that she has nothing to gain by delay. Delay, while it can benefit neither party, every day endangers the peace of both.

I only wish further to say, in regard to Maine, that she did obtain from Congress, at the last session, a unanimous concurrence of opinion in both branches, strongly in her favor, on the question of her right to the territory. Further negotiation, however, was still contemplated; and now, at the end of another year, she finds that not one single step, not an inch, of progress has been made. I do not blame her for being both dissatisfied and excited.

It is to be considered, also, that, in the mean time, Maine has established, to her own entire conviction, the truth of what we have been contending for; that is, the perfect practicability of ascertaining the treaty boundary.

Mr. W. thought that, if a higher and more energetic tone had been held by our Government in the negotiations on this matter, we would stand upon much more elevated ground at present. He was willing, for his own part, to assume his share of the responsibility of voting to run the line of 1783, and to defend it when run—and to vote it to-night. He hoped that those who had the lead in the administration of our affairs would tell the English Government that this matter must be settled; that, if not settled by the 4th day of July next, we will run the boundary line according to the treaty, and we will occupy the country, and then remove us if you can.

The PRESIDENT promptly called to order, and said if there was a repetition of the noise the galleries should be cleared forthwith.

Mr. BROWN said that he dissented altogether from the opinions which had been expressed by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER,] as to the manner in which the negotiations had been conducted, by the late and present Administrations, in their efforts to bring about a final settlement of this question. The Senator thinks that a higher tone should have been assumed, and more energy exhibited, as if to a want of these qualities was to be imputed the failure of success in adjusting the difficulties which, at this time, threatens the peaceful relations subsisting between this country and Great Britain. He had yet to learn that a want of firmness, or of a proper tone, had been characteristic of either the past or present Administration, in conducting intercourse with foreign nations. He believed that the Senator from Massachusetts, and those who then coincided with him in opinion, had thought very differently at the period of our difficulties with France, when the proposition for a contingent appropriation was before the Senate. Then the complaint was, that there was too much energy; and now it is attempted to cast censure on that Administration, and the present, for exhibiting less, as it is alleged, than the occasion demanded.

Mr. B. believed that every step had been taken under both, called for either by the honor or interests of our country, to prosecute the negotiation to a final settlement, and to secure the rights of the State of Maine. The late Administration, after the rejection of the decision of the King of the Netherlands, had proposed to renew the negotiation, on the basis of the treaty of 1783, which was declined by Great Britain; and a similar proposition by our Government, under the present Administration, had also been declined. What, then, (said Mr. B.,) would the Senator have required of the present Chief Magistrate? To have taken possession of the territory in dispute by a military force? That was the only remaining alternative, and would in itself have been tantamount to a declaration of war, and the assumption of a responsibility which no Chief Magistrate should take, unless previously sanctioned by the authority of the two Houses of Congress. If the Senator had been so fully impressed with the necessity of more energetic measures, why had he not brought forward a proposition at the last session of Congress, giving authority to the President to carry them into effect?

From this it would be perceived that the Executive would not have been justified in proceeding a single step further in this controversy, without the previous sanction of the legislative branch of the Government.

He had deemed it his duty to say this much in defense of the measures taken by the late and present Administrations to bring this controversy to a final settlement, and he would now add a few words as to the aspect which it had at present assumed. Although the question was one involving interests which were of a local character, yet it was not less incumbent on the Federal Government to protect those interests than it would be if the immediate interests of all the States were concerned. It was demanded as well by a proper regard to our national honor, as by the most solemn obligations of the Federal compact itself. If the arrogant assumptions of Great Britain, lately set up by some of her public officers, were persevered in, he did not hesitate to declare that they should be met by the strongest measures of resistance. If she shall attempt to carry into effect, by military occupancy, her claim to exclusive jurisdiction over the disputed territory in Maine, anxious as he knew his constituents were for the preservation of the peace of the country, yet he felt the utmost confidence that they would be ready to unite in supporting the Government in the most vigorous measures to drive the aggressors from her soil.

Mr. WEBSTER said he would only ask the Senator, since he had spoken of censure in regard to the present Administration, could he tell of one individual step taken in this negotiation since the last session of Congress?

Mr. BROWN said the Administration had taken no step, for the very obvious reason that Great Britain had declined further negotiation, and therefore no step could be taken, unless it was that of war.

Mr. WALKER said he trusted that the question of party would not be introduced into this discussion, but as it related to the welfare of our common country, we should treat it in a manner becoming American Senators. If there must be a contest with a foreign Power, he trusted that, instead of finding fault with what had been done, they would endeavor to be unanimous in both Houses of Congress, and that there would be no division of the people of the United States.

Without, therefore, entering into the discussion at all on what ought to have been done by the Administration, there was one thing in which Mr. W. most heartily concurred with the Senator from Massachusetts: that the time was soon to come when a power here ought to be assumed to settle this question, as Great Britain had declined further negotiation as to the only point really at issue, which was to ascertain what was the boundary of the treaty of 1783. Then have we not (said Mr. W.) already avowed what must be the consequences, when we asserted the right of Maine to this territory by the unanimous voice of the Congress of the country? And it becomes us now to declare, that if Great Britain will not negotiate on paper, it is our duty to negotiate from the mouths of our cannon, and by the authority of the two Houses of Congress.

In regard to the withdrawal of the troops from this territory, it is precisely what Great Britain desires, for thus Maine will be kept out of this country, and, so long as that is the case, Great Britain will not negotiate. But if Maine continue in actual possession, as I trust she will, then Great Britain will be compelled to negotiate, or determine whether she will yield or assert her right to a portion of one of the States of this Union by force of arms.

Sir, I hope this will be no party question, but one which will command the power, and result in the honor of the whole country.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Maine, said he was happy to say that the rumor which had alarmed the Senate a few minutes before was without foundation. But Mr. W. would not now have risen but for the remarks of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON,] who seemed to suppose that this arrangement (of Messrs. Fox and Forsyth) would be sufficient. Mr. W. now read and commented on various parts of this arrangement, and came to the conclusion that, after Maine should have withdrawn her troops, she would not be authorized by the arrangement to remove trespassers from the disputed territory, which was a right that she would not be likely to surrender.

Mr. CALHOUN said he did not think this was an occasion to look at the past, or to declare what ought to have been done; but there were two or three propositions on which all would agree, and one was, that a war between this country and Great Britain would be among the greatest calamities that could befall either us or them or the civilized world. The next was, that it ought to be avoided, if possible; and the third was, if it must come, it should come after full deliberation, and a cautious exercise of judgment, both as to the time, and as to the consequences.

And now, what was our condition? We were on the very edge of a war, and how should they remove the present difficulty? If Mr. C. might express an opinion, he would say that the Executive, whatever differences of sentiment might be entertained in regard to proceedings heretofore, had, in this emergency, manifested great judgment, great prudence, and great sagacity. Mr. C. did not think this arrangement could be permanent; but it would get them out of a condition in which they might be compelled to a war without being willing. Mr. C. believed that this, of itself, would be an advantage; for he did not believe that this country or Great Britain desired a war. But he would refer the whole case to the committee without a single word more; and giving this arrangement their sanction and that of the Senate, he trusted these difficulties would be brought to a peaceable termination, to the benefit of our country and of the civilized world.

Mr. RUGGLES adduced further evidence that the rumor mentioned in the course of the debate was unfounded, and that eighteen hundred of the troops of Maine were on the Aroostook.

The message and documents were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and five thousand extra copies of them were ordered to be printed.

MAINE BOUNDARY QUESTION.

REMARKS OF HON. R. BIDDLE,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 1, 1839,

On the bill giving the President additional power for the defense of the United States, &c.

Mr. BIDDLE said he fully concurred in the sentiment expressed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] that it was of the utmost importance to guard carefully against any false movement. We occupied now a high vantage ground, from which we ought not, if possible, to be allured or driven. The subject had come upon us rather unexpectedly in its new aspect. The matter of jurisdiction is a subordinate one. With little time for examination, we are summoned to make an assertion that involves personal veracity, and, perhaps, the peace and dignity of the country. We are asked to take the burden of proving to Great Britain and the world that there is no trace in the diplomacy of the country of ought to countenance the pretension set up by the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick.

On the great question of right there cannot be a doubt. Mr. B. said that, from an early and deliberate examination of the whole controversy, he had been satisfied that our title was perfect to the territory in dispute, and that England had not a shadow of just claim. So decided and earnest were his convictions, that he had long ago startled many of his constituents by adverting to the chances of a war on this subject.

England will hold on to the last moment. A glance at the map discloses the vast importance to her of the debatable ground. It lies between her possessions on the Atlantic sea-coast and the St. Lawrence; and over it is the only route by which troops can be speedily passed from Halifax and St. John's to Quebec. During the late disturbances in Canada, the forces were marched across this territory without our permission, whereas, had it been within the undisputed limits of the United States, they must have either obtained our assent, or resorted to the tedious and dangerous passage by the mouth of the St. Lawrence.

Owing to the delays attendant on the settlement of the principle question, there had been imparted to an incidental point a degree of importance which it did not originally possess or merit. I mean the condition of the disputed territory pending the efforts at adjustment.

During the earlier stages of negotiation there was preserved, with great distinctness, an understanding that each party should continue to possess that portion which was in actual occupancy, but do nothing to extend or fortify its pretensions over what lay in a wild state. Great Britain, however, now alleges that an understanding has grown up, in latter times, by which the temporary guardianship over the whole region has been imparted to her exclusively. This point has recently assumed, as I before remarked, an unexpected importance.

The State of Maine alleges that trespasses are committed on the disputed territory by the cutting of timber, &c., and that the British authorities are not sufficiently alert in restraining this waste. Her Legislature lately, in secret session, took up the subject, and ordered a party to be dispatched to arrest trespassers. The Governor of New Brunswick, Sir John Harvey, deems this an invasion of the exclusive jurisdiction alleged to have been transferred to the English authorities; Maine denies the existence of any such agreement; arrests have been made on the one side and the other, and there have ensued declarations of a purpose to enforce these conflicting claims by arms.

It cannot but be regretted—if war must come—that our clear advantage in the main and original controversy should be lost sight of, or obscured by the prominence suddenly given to a matter incidental, temporary, and of no engrossing importance. The President justly remarks in his message:

"The parties more immediately interested cannot but perceive that an appeal to arms, under existing circumstances, will not only prove fatal to their present interests, but would postpone, if not defeat, the attainment of the main objects which they have in view."

Nor is it to be forgotten that a war, with its burden of taxation, will not long be carried on with vigor and unanimity except on the broadest and most intelligible grounds. The late war was declared for injuries of a flagrant character, affecting particularly the eastern States; yet, owing to our miserable dissensions, we were glad to accept the treaty of Ghent, which adjourned the question of impressment, which gave up every dollar of our demands against England for her long career of spoliation upon our commerce, and which brought upon us this very curse of the boundary question. In the present state of the world, too, a decent respect for its judgment must be maintained, as well as an eye to the opinion which any friendly mediator may form of the pretexts for hostilities. The first years of any wars between this country and a great European Power will always be disastrous to us. We never can be fully prepared at the outset. It is desirable, therefore, that we do not enter upon it except for such palpable wrongs as may warrant and insure our carrying it out, unflinchingly, to any extremity.

I deprecate, therefore, the getting up of this comparatively immaterial issue, more particularly as it is by no means certain that we have on it a clear and indisputable case. On the contrary, it may be feared that a review of the diplomatic correspondence will show that, owing to great looseness and remissness on our part, to say the least, there is color for the pretension advanced by the agents of Great Britain.

How does the matter appear, even on a hasty glance at the correspondence? In a letter from Mr. McLane, Secretary of State, to Sir Charles Vaughan, dated December 2, 1833, he says:

"It is alleged that his Britannic Majesty's officers of the Province of New Brunswick, by the seizure and sale of timber cut by trespassers on the Aroostook, and afterwards in the rightful custody of the agent of the State of Massachusetts, have been the first to violate the existing understanding."

Here, it will be seen, the very question now agitated was brought up more than five years ago. Mr. McLane makes formal complaint that the British warden had taken out of the hands of the State authorities timber seized by the latter as having been cut by trespassers on the Aroostook river. To this complaint the British Minister replied as follows:

WASHINGTON, February 28, 1834.

The undersigned, his Britannic Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, has the honor to communicate to the Secretary of State of the United States the explanation which he has received from the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, of a transaction complained of by the land agent of Massachusetts in a report communicated to the undersigned, in a note from Mr. McLane, dated 21st December last.

The complaint arose out of the seizure of timber cut down without authority upon the disputed territory, and which, after having been seized in the first instance by the land agent of Massachusetts, was taken possession of and sold by the British agent intrusted with the preservation of the disputed territory on the northeastern frontier of the United States.

The explanation of this transaction is contained in an extract of a letter to the undersigned from the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, and the report of Mr. Beckwith, the surveyor general of that Province, which the undersigned has the honor to inclose in this note.

The seizure of the timber, in the first instance, by Mr. Coffin, the land agent of Maine, [Massachusetts] was the exercise of authority within the conventional frontier of the Province of New Brunswick, which could not be admitted so long as the northeastern boundary of the United States remains a subject of negotiation; and it appears that the proceeds of the sales of timber unlawfully cut down are carried to account, and the possession of them will be appropriated to the party to which the territory may be adjudged by the settlement of the boundary question.

The undersigned trusts that the explanation which he is now able to give of this transaction will prove satisfactory to the Government of the United States.

The undersigned has the honor to renew to Mr. McLane the assurances of his most distinguished consideration.

CHAS. R. VAUGHAN.

The Hon. LOUIS McLANE, &c., &c.

The letter of the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, Sir Archibald Campbell, (the predecessor of Sir John Harvey,) thus inclosed by Sir Charles Vaughan to Mr. McLane, is dated Frederickton, January 20, 1834, and contains the following explanation:

"Mr. McLaughlin was appointed to the wardenship of the country with the knowledge and concurrence of the President; and it is not conceived, therefore, that any fair ground of objection can be taken to his faithful performance of the duties of his office. But this Government never has admitted, and never can admit, the right of any agent from Maine or Massachusetts to exercise authority within the conventional frontier of the province while its proper limits remain a subject of negotiation."

Mr. McLane's reply to Sir Charles Vaughan is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
WASHINGTON, March 4, 1834.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 28th ultimo, furnishing the explanation of the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick of a transaction referred to by the land agent of Massachusetts, in a letter addressed to his Excellency the Governor of that Commonwealth, and subsequently communicated to you by this Department, in a note dated the 21st of December last; and to inform you that copies of your communication, together with the documents which accompanied it, will, by direction of the President, be transmitted without unnecessary delay to the Executive of the State of Massachusetts.

I pray you to accept the assurances of my distinguished consideration,

LOUIS McLANE.

Right Hon. Sir CHAS. R. VAUGHAN, G. C. H., Envoy Extraordinary.

Is not this prodigiously strong? Here is a letter written five years ago by the predecessor of Sir John Harvey, appealing to a matter within the personal knowledge of the President of the United States, and broadly repelling any attempt at concurrent jurisdiction against trespassers on the Aroostook by the American authorities. The President orders the letter containing these averments to be transmitted without comment, it would appear, to the local authorities, for their guidance. It is remarkable, that whilst the Governor of Massachusetts, in November, 1833, is found complaining about the pretensions of this warden, there appears no remonstrance subsequent to the date of Mr. McLane's letter transmitting the "explanation" of Sir Archibald Campbell. Thus we are on the edge of a war, in which our manifesto is to state, as a justification to the world, that Mr. Harvey has ventured to repeat what his predecessor not only announced, but acted upon, with circumstances of indignity to the State agents! This unheard of pretension is found not only in the letter-book of his predecessor, but in the archives of Maine and Massachusetts, as placed there by order of General Jackson!

Let us turn now to the memorial of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts in 1836, found amongst the records of this House, and see how it discloses, in every line, a distinct recognition of the agreement, as communicated to her Chief Magistrate by Mr. McLane.

[Doc. No. 199.]

Resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts upon the subject of the Northeastern Territory of the United States, the title to which is still claimed by Great Britain.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS,
COUNCIL CHAMBER, BOSTON, March 18, 1836.

SIR: In compliance with the request of the Legislature of the Commonwealth, I have the honor to transmit to you a copy of a preamble and resolutions lately adopted by the Senate and House of Representatives, on the subject of the unadjusted controversy between this country and Great Britain, relative to the northeastern boundary of the United States. I am well aware that the great importance of this question, in connection with the rights and interests of the people of Massachusetts, will give it the strongest claim to the attention of their Representatives in either House of Congress. In performing the duty devolved upon me by the request of the Legislature, I beg leave to subscribe myself, with high respect, your obedient servant.

EDWARD EVERETT.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS, A. D. 1836.

Resolves concerning the Northeastern Territory of the United States claimed by Great Britain.

Whereas a large tract of the northeastern territory of the United States, belonging in common to the States of Maine and Massachusetts, and lying within the limits of the former State, has for many years past, in consequence of a claim from Great Britain, been surrendered to the exclusive custody of the British Government; and whereas it appears from the report of a committee appointed by the last Legislature of this Commonwealth, to make personal examination into the state of our public lands, that great inconveniences and gross abuses have resulted from so valuable a portion of our domain being left in the hands of agents over whom we have no control: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives in general court assembled, That, in the opinion of this Legislature, it is due to the rights and interests of Maine and Massachusetts that measures should be taken by the Executive of the United States to secure a speedy settlement of this long-protracted controversy, so that these States may be reinstated in the enjoyment of that property which was so long in their undisputed possession, and which is so indisputably theirs.

Resolved, That in case there be a prospect of further unavoidable delay in the settlement of this controversy, it is essential to the ends of justice that measures should be taken by the Executive of the United States to obtain a representation of the interests and rights of Maine and Massachusetts in the agency and guardianship of the territory in question.

Resolved, That his Excellency the Governor is hereby requested to transmit a copy of these resolutions to the Executive of the United States, to our Senators and Representatives in Congress, and to the Governor of the State of Maine.

In Senate, March 1, 1836:

Passed. Sent down for concurrence.

HORACE MANN, President.

House of Representatives, March 12, 1836:

Passed in concurrence.

JULIUS ROCKWELL, Speaker.

Council Chamber, March, 14, 1836: Approved.

EDWARD EVERETT.

Attest: JOHN P. BIGELOW,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

It will be seen that this great Commonwealth here anxiously entreats the Executive of the United States—

1st. To bring the boundary question to a speedy settlement; and

2d. If the settlement appeared remote, at least to annul the arrangement by which two sovereign States had been stripped of the "agency and guardianship" over their own concerns.

Each of these prayers has been disregarded. The latter seems never to have gained a passing notice. It is true that, in the course of a rambling and diffuse correspondence, high language is occasionally found in the mouth of this or that Secretary or Minister, but the stern practical exercise of authority by the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick has gone on. He has been willing to release persons seized, on their quitting the scene of assumed agency; but not one dollar has ever been received in atonement for their seizure, nor the slightest disclaimer of authority obtained from Great Britain. The present hot urgency to obtain the "unanimous" certificate of members of Congress that in their opinion there is no trace of any such agreement as Massachusetts here refers to, looks very like an expedient to avert the odium due to long, gross, unpardonable supineness and imbecility, even at the hazard of placing the quarrel of the country upon untenable points.

The conduct of Maine, too, discloses a perfect knowledge that her hands had been tied. Thus, on the question whether she could cause a survey to be made, the claim is put on this modest ground, in a letter from the Governor to the President of the United States, in April, 1838:

"It is the unquestionable right of litigants, in a court of justice, to make explorations of land in dispute, and if either party declines a joint survey, it may be made ex parte; and surely, the United States have never so far yielded the actual possession to Great Britain as to preclude the right, on our part, to ascertain for ourselves the absolute facts, and to mark out the limits of our claim and our alleged rights."

The Governor communicated his purpose to Sir John Harvey, who replied:

"Of the courtesy of your Excellency's communication, I beg you to believe that I am perfectly sensible; and when, in reply thereto, I inform your Excellency that I shall not deem it necessary to interfere with a mission whose operations shall be confined to the purposes stated in your Excellency's letter, namely, that of merely obtaining topographical information, it is incumbent upon me to add that it will be my imperative duty not to suffer any infringement of the possession and jurisdiction which Great Britain holds in the territory in dispute, until the question of right is decided."

25TH CONG....3D SESS.

Maine Boundary Question—Mr. Howard.

HO. OF REPS.

The Governor, in making this known to the President of the United States, says:

"The answer of Sir John Harvey, although couched in courteous language, according with the well known high and honorable character of that officer, will yet doubtless command your attention and deliberate consideration, as expressing, in frank and decided language, the character and extent of his instructions relative to maintaining the jurisdiction of the disputed territory."

Here, then, was an appeal that might well come in aid of the same object, when urged upon the Executive of the United States, in the second resolution of the State of Massachusetts, in 1836. Yet not the slightest notice appears to have been taken of it; and the President now comes here, in a flurry, affecting to treat the pretension as a portentous novelty that had just dropped from the clouds; and we are asked suddenly to make it an affair of immediate bloodshed.

But it is said that Mr. Fox has not consented to spread out the reasons on which his Government rests the pretension. And do you expect a subtle and accomplished diplomatist, in a case where delay is itself a positive gain, to answer impromptu, and thus dispose of a collateral issue that may, by dexterous management, last for many years? He is under no obligation to point out what stares you in the face in your own records, if you will take the trouble to read them. He will be glad to shift the points of negotiation. The arrangement signed by him may enable the British Government to take high ground, if our special minister shall discover at Downing street, for the first time, that we have been rather hasty in denouncing Sir John Harvey, and driving that functionary from his stand under rather mortifying circumstances, in the face of the disaffected population under his charge. Sir, do not believe that we advance our case by refusing to view the subject in all its bearings. Now is the time for examination. When once engaged in war, I will not consent to look back. I shall go for the country. Such was my feeling in the last war, and will be in the next. But let us not take our ground rashly, and where the enemy might wish to place us. It is the last degree of folly to suppose that there is any advantage in our blindly agreeing to unite in a misstatement of the evidence, which can be so instantly exposed. A candid and intelligent people will lose all faith in us when our blunders are pointed out by strangers, after we have involved them in a war on false or frivolous pretenses.

What then, is our course? To run into a new game of diplomacy about "exclusive jurisdiction?" To shed American blood in an obscure and senseless contest on the Aroostook? Does honor require that we shall compel the President to seek out, during the vacation, any Sir John or Sir Andrew who may enter this disputed territory with notions of duty which we have assisted to put into his head, and before we have endeavored to obtain, in the proper quarter, a modification of the arrangement, such as Massachusetts, in 1836, entreated the President to effect? I cannot think so. We shall be wrong on any such issue. We are right on the great one. Let the President bring it to a close. If he cannot, let him so report and we shall then be ready for the final appeal on broad principles, which all can understand. Mr. B. said that in the course taken on this occasion he had braved what was most formidable to any man in public life—the peril of misrepresentation. He was well aware how much easier and cheaper it would have been to run a race of professions about patriotism, &c., than to take a course which threw the explanation of his conduct on an appeal to reason. He felt strong enough in the confidence of his constituents to take the line which conscience dictated. They were a grave and quiet people, not given to flourishes; but there was a stern determination—a deep-seated and vital principle of patriotism—on which he could rely with more confidence. It should not be through his agency that they got entangled in a rash and foolish war. He would not commit them on pretenses which their own good sense and intelligence would find out, after a while, to be hollow and deceptive. But when the crisis came, he knew that the sound to battle would not fall on cold or timid ears; he knew that stout arms and brave hearts would rally from every workshop and harvest-field; that all would be ready to follow, to whatever distant fields, the proud banner of their country.

SPEECH OF HON. B. C. HOWARD,

OF MARYLAND,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 1, 1839,

On the bill giving to the President additional power for the defense of the United States, &c.

Mr. HOWARD said that the remarks which had fallen from the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BIDDLE] required that he should say something in reply. But before I do so (said Mr. H.) I will advert for a moment to the amendment proposed by another gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. NAYLOR,] which is the question immediately before the House. He proposes to amend the first section of the bill by inserting the words, "or the provincial authorities of Great Britain." As it now stands it authorizes the President to resist any attempt on the part of Great Britain to enforce, by arms, an exclusive jurisdiction over the contested territory. The effect of the amendment is not to restrict this power in the President, nor do I understand it to be so intended, but to define more precisely the contingency upon the happening of which the powers granted in the subsequent sections of the bill are to become operative. But the provincial authorities of Great Britain cannot attempt to enforce this jurisdiction by arms, without doing it "on the part of Great Britain;" and thus the case provided for by the proposed amendment is already reached by the words selected by the committee. There appears to be no necessity, therefore, for any alteration. The intention of the committee was, that all that part of the State of Maine where the present disturbances exist, should be protected from invasion, let that invasion come from whatever quarter it might. As there is no prospect of any attack except with a view to sustain the jurisdiction claimed on the part of the British Government, the phraseology adopted by the committee appears to meet fully the case under consideration, and I hope that the bill may be allowed to stand as it is.

I have listened to the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BIDDLE] with surprise and regret, on account of the acknowledged intelligence of the gentleman, and those lofty feelings of patriotism and national honor which he is known to entertain. His arguments have been carefully considered as he has presented them in his remarks, with a view to see how far they would justify the conclusion to which he came. If I understand his position, it amounts to this, and this only—that the President is not justified in assuming the ground which he has taken, and that this House would not now be justified in assuming the ground proposed by this bill, because the administration of General Jackson permitted the question of this boundary to remain dormant, and thereby gave color to the pretensions now advanced by Great Britain. This is the extent of the argument. Is it not? If I mistake it, I beg the gentleman to correct me. Let us examine it. There are two points involved in it. First, the historical fact, as to the course of General Jackson's administration; and secondly, the inferences which can with propriety be drawn from that course. To sustain the first ground, a former argument of a gentleman from Maine [Mr. EVANS] was pressed into the service in order to show that the claim of the British Government was acquiesced in, or not strenuously resisted by General Jackson. But that same gentleman from Maine has, within a few hours passed, addressed the House upon this very point, and gone into a minute examination of all the correspondence which has ever taken place between the two Governments on the subject, the result of which is, that no warrant can be found, in any part of that correspondence, for the present inadmissible claim of Great Britain. That gentleman [Mr. EVANS] has referred to his argument and explained it. Is he not able to understand his own argument? No one who hears him speak will deny to him the power of understanding the arguments of others, and it would be strange, indeed, if he could not understand his own. That argument was made upon another question, and yet the gentleman from Pennsylvania applies detached parts of it to the one under debate, when the author himself does not think proper so to use it.

Again: the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BIDDLE] refers to some document emanating from the Legislature of Massachusetts, and transfers some of the positions taken therein, adopted without sufficient means of investigation, to an argument in a case where we can survey the entire ground. We have before us the entire correspondence of the two Governments. Heretofore it was apprehended that a portion of it was kept back, and in the part so retained it was feared that our Government had admitted the British claim to exclusive jurisdiction. But we now know that no such admission was ever made, and what we now know the British Government has known all along. There is, therefore, nothing in the documentary history of this affair upon which the pretension of the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick can rest.

But let us suppose that the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is correct, and that the administration of General Jackson is to blame.

Mr. BIDDLE. The gentleman from Maryland knows that I expressly disclaimed any particular reference either to the administration of General Jackson or of Mr. Adams in this matter. I said that that was a question which I could not raise with any foreign Government, and that the simple question was, what was the language which had been held out by any Administration? Had it been such as to lead the Government of Great Britain to believe that this right was conceded? and, if so, was it proper to go to war to set that matter right? I said that if we believed we had, in any way, misled the British Government in this respect, it was a fair matter of negotiation, just as much as the original question itself. The gentleman knows that throughout this whole debate, I have spurned from me anything like party feeling. I spoke merely with reference to the mode in which we should set the matter right.

Mr. HOWARD. I have no desire, Mr. Speaker, to create any false issue between the gentleman from Pennsylvania and myself. I am endeavoring to meet his argument fairly, as it is with the logic of his speech that I wish to deal. When we touch a question involving the honor of the country, I am sure the gentleman from Pennsylvania would be one of the first to spring forward in defense of that honor. I do not believe that we have in any way misled the British Government. The documents are all before us; and where can any reason for such an opinion be found? It is possible that the British Government may have misconstrued the action of ours in the Madawaska case, and supposed that, because they were permitted to exercise jurisdiction in that settlement, therefore they could claim it upon the banks of the Aroostook. But the Madawaska settlement was made by emigrants from Nova Scotia before the American Revolution; and, as far as I know, there has been an uninterrupted jurisdiction ever since by the British authorities. The course pursued by the United States Government in that case was strictly in conformity with its present course; and, if the British Government has confounded the two cases, it is its own error. The Massachusetts document does not seem to be aware of the different results which would be produced by applying the same principle—that of uti possidetis—to the facts relative to the Madawaska and Aroostook settlements. But the British Government had means of information which the Legislature of Massachusetts had not; because not only the entire correspondence, but also the reports of the conferences between the Ministers of the two Governments, must have been before it. There is nothing upon record, in my opinion, which will show that our doctrine or language has ever been inconsistent with the position now assumed by the Secretary of State. To return, however, to the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BIDDLE.] I still understand him to maintain that, if the British Government had any foundation for the belief that this question of exclusive jurisdiction was conceded, the House ought not now to pass the bill under consideration. To this argument I wish to reply.

What will be the position of the question, if the House should refuse to pass the bill? Will negotiation ensue? It will not. There is neither time, nor opportunity, nor disposition to negotiate under Sir John Harvey's menace of invasion. We are told by the President (who has taken his stand firmly and decisively) that if the invasion of the State of Maine is persisted in, he will consider the case as coming within the scope of his power to bring the forces of the General Government to her aid. After this public announcement of his opinion, even if he were disposed to recede from his ground, he cannot. There is not, however, the slightest reason to suppose that any circumstances would induce him to change a position, not only maturely examined, but intrinsically correct. Refuse to pass this bill then, and where are you, and where is the country? Should Sir John Harvey proceed to execute his threat of attacking the troops of Maine upon the banks of the Aroostook, it will be the duty, as it is within the power, of the President to call out the militia. What says the Constitution of the United States, and what say the laws already in existence? The Constitution says:

"Congress shall have power to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions."

In virtue of this power, Congress has passed this law, (1795, chap. 277:)

"Whenever the United States shall be invaded, or be in imminent danger of invasion, from any foreign nation or Indian tribe, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth such number of the militia of the State or States most convenient to the place of danger or scene of action as he may judge necessary to repel such invasion, and to issue his orders for that purpose to such officer or officers of the militia as he shall think proper."

This power the President says he means to exercise. Pass no law, then, make no appropriation of money; adjourn, and leave the President to his executive power, unassisted by any further legislation; let the Representatives of the American people refuse to sustain the Chief Magistrate in the lofty ground which he has taken, and what will be the consequence? You send him into the field with the militia which he has avowed his determination to call out, crippled by your refusal to aid him in the struggle which every consideration of national honor calls upon him to make—crippled, but not entirely disabled. He will call upon the militia of Maine, New Hampshire, and Massachusetts to carry the flag to the invaded frontier. He will use all his power, defective as it is without your support, to vindicate the rights and honor of the nation; and if he fail to do so, it will be because you have refused to assist him. Do you desire this? Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania desire it? You may deny the appropriation, if you choose; and what then? The President will appeal to the patriotism of those States from which the militia will be called out, and say to them: "The Representatives of the people of the United States have refused to give a dollar to enable me to discharge my high duty. But no matter; call your militia out, and raise the funds upon your State credit to pay them, and we will appeal hereafter to Congress for your reimbursement." Will they not do it? The members from those States can answer the question. I see it answered by their expressive countenances. You may leave that portion of the country to its fate, turning away with cold indifference; but when the hour of trial comes, the people there will not shrink from their duty.

What, then, will you gain by refusing to pass this bill? You cannot negotiate. The case is not fit for it. A high officer of the British Government has avowed his determination to invade a part of the country which we all believe to be rightfully under the jurisdiction of Maine. Will you permit the invasion to go on, and the territory to be occupied by a hostile force, and then begin your negotiation for its removal? All that can be done in the way of negotiation has already been done by the Secretary of State and the British Minister. But the latter says he has no power over Sir John Harvey. With whom, then, could you negotiate, if you were inclined so to do? The British Government is three thousand miles off, and the question of invasion will be decided one way or the other before you could hear from the other side of the Atlantic. This state of things is not brought about by any fault of ours. We gave the British Government no reason for issuing such orders to the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, if it did issue them. The alternative of resisting, or submitting to, an invasion, is forced upon us, wholly against our will, and we have but one course to pursue. Let us take our stand by the side of the President, and leave the consequences to those who have brought on the crisis so hastily that we have scarcely time enough to do more than follow the natural instinct of self-defense. I trust, most earnestly, that we shall yet be able to preserve peace; but it is not to be preserved by indecisive measures. The United States is not an antagonist with which any nation is desirous to court a war, nor will any officer of the British Government lightly encounter the responsibility of placing the two nations in an attitude of hostility to each other. If the invasion goes on, and the President summons forth the militia to repel it, there is, at once, a state of war, for war can be waged by militia. I hope for peace. As long as it can be preserved with honor, let us cherish it. But peace is sometimes lost through an over-anxiety to maintain it. We are on the defensive, and therefore can, with propriety, insist upon our rights. The people of the State from which I come have no other interest in this boundary question than that which belongs to them as members of the Union, and probably no other part of the country would suffer more inconvenience from hostilities, if they should finally be forced upon us. But, I much mistake their character, if they are not always prepared to bear their full share of all consequences which may follow from the maintenance of the rights and honor of the United States.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania has called this a "new issue," and deprecates putting the boundary question upon any new issue. I, for one, do not wish to avoid that new issue, because the question upon our side is so clear that the people can at once understand it. The boundary question is clear enough after being studied; but you must have maps and books and documents to comprehend it. The arguments used by both parties before the King of the Netherlands fill a large folio volume. It is true that their essence can be compressed into a much smaller space; but with all this condensation, how much more simple and intelligible is this "new issue" which is deprecated? In five minutes any man of the most ordinary intellectual powers can understand it. In fact, it is rather felt than understood by argument. The statement of the case is enough. You have only to go to a householder, whether he resides in a costly mansion in one of your large cities, or a plainer dwelling in a valley of the mountains, and tell him this: "You and your family have been living in this house for thirty years. One of your neighbors claims your land; and, without waiting for the case to be decided, is coming, with the bayonet, to drive you out into the street or the woods. What will you do?" The answer would be, in the language of this bill, "arm and resist!" Force shall resist force. Sir, every man in this country can understand this new issue. There is no argument necessary to explain it. If we take our stand upon it, it is impossible that we should go wrong.

But it is said that the passage of this bill is unnecessary, because the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick must have misunderstood his orders. I hope he has. Perhaps it is so. But at best, it is only a chance that he has, and another chance that he will think so. And are we to estimate chances in such a prospective legislation as that now before us? What are the chances? two to one, three to one, or four to one? And after we settle this calculation, we have to decide what ratio would justify us in omitting to provide for the defense of the country. What are the facts upon which the calculation of chances is to be founded? An intelligent British officer, high in the confidence of his Government, asserts that his orders are plain and preempory. Is he able to comprehend his orders? And if so, has he firmness to execute them? Gentlemen must calculate these chances as they choose; I can furnish them with no data. But then it is said that he will yield to the powerful interference of the British Minister at Washington. No doubt that influence will receive, as it merits, great and careful consideration. But his orders from his Government are before his eyes, and, after all, it is a chance whether he may not prefer to abide by what he believes to be their import. We are doing nothing offensive in this bill. It cannot be too frequently repeated that its character is wholly defensive.

But it is asked what necessity is there for the first section of this bill, if the President has already the power to call out the militia, in case of invasion, under the act of 1795? The question is easily answered. It is to reinforce the authority of the executive branch of the Government by showing, that in the opinion of the legislative branch also, a case of invasion, under the Constitution of the United States, would arise, if the movement of Sir John Harvey is carried on. It is to show that upon this point the American Government is a unit, prepared to act with all the power which the people of the United States have put into its hands. And here let me say, that at the proper time, I shall move to fill up the blank in the appropriating clause, under the instructions of the committee, with the sum of $10,000,000.

I am aware that much objection exists to the second section of this bill, which proposes to raise twenty regiments of regular troops, if the contingency provided for in the first section shall happen. After stating the reasons which induced the committee to recommend this measure, it will be for the House to judge of its expediency. The bill, it will be perceived, contemplates an early call of Congress by the President, in case the border difficulties increase. There is an express provision to this effect; and, indeed, without it it is scarcely to be supposed that the President would willingly encounter the very serious troubles that would beset him, without calling the legislative power to his aid. But the case is expressly provided for. Should the emergency arise, and a new Congress be convened, one of the first measures which it would adopt, in the opinion of the committee, would be the passage of a bill just like this second section. If a collision should ensue between the United States and Great Britain, the severity of the struggle is too apparent to be overlooked for a moment. The war would not be like the last.

There are now hovering over our frontiers from fifteen to eighteen thousand regular troops, the choicest of the British army. Whether all this force is brought there to quell the Canadian revolt, or to bear upon the settlement of the boundary question, it is impossible to say. But there they are reported to be. The line between us and Canada will become the field of battles, not of two or three thousand men on each side, but of five or ten times that number. The military power of Great Britain will be concentrated to one spot; and we must prepare, in case of need, to meet it effectively. Regular troops must be resorted to, and the sooner the better. It is cruel and unwise to march militia alone into the field for a campaign against regular troops. As auxiliaries we must always rely upon them; but we ought to have in the field an equal number of regular troops with our adversary, man for man. If the contingency shall happen, upon which this bill is to become effective, and a special session of Congress shall be convoked, the time which intervenes between the summons and the meeting can be advantageously employed by the Secretary of War in filling up the ranks of the regiments by recruiting with the money which you are asked to place at the disposal of the President. But still, if any other species of force shall be more acceptable to the House than that suggested by the committee, I will yield to their judgment. As to the opinion expressed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BIDDLE,] that this is meant as a threat and bravado on the part of the committee, I utterly disclaim any such view.

Mr. BIDDLE. I certainly had not the slightest idea of applying such an expression to the course of the honorable gentleman from Maryland, [Mr.

HOWARD,] or the committee of which he is chairman; or of imputing to them the calculation that, by taking an apparent stand, we might produce an impression on the British Government which might probably compel it to make a closer and a more speedy examination into this subject. I do not believe that such results would follow; and I do not wish, therefore, that we should seem to occupy a position which would deprive us of the high vantage-ground which we now possess. I concur in the views taken by the President, (whose whole course in this matter meets my entire approbation,) that it would be deeply to be deplored that, on a question of a mere temporary character, we should be drawn into a war, and thus disturb the other great question which remains to be adjusted. It is to carry out the policy of the President—to prevent the question assuming this character; to prevent its turning on an incidental point—that I would wish that we should maintain our stand on that where we are indisputably right, and thus avoid being placed in a position which probably could not be rendered easily intelligible to the country and to the world. This report seems to me to pledge the country to go to war on this point; that is to say, if our people are driven out of this territory, the President shall not make it the subject of negotiation, as heretofore, or give notice to the British Government to disclaim the act, but shall at once employ the military in a war. This would produce a state of things which I believe both Governments are anxious to avoid. I wish the action of the House to be such as that the country shall not go to war upon this present incidental question, as a substantive ground of defense; that we should not make that the subject of military operations.

Mr. HOWARD. We have had a proof to-day that the debates which take place here are recorded and referred to even by high authority. I wish, therefore, to say that it becomes these two Governments to speak to each other in the plain language of sincerity, such as one high-minded gentleman would use to another. This is the ground upon which I wish to put this bill. There is no threat meant. The nation which could so far forget itself as to threaten, or attempt to threaten, the English, must have previously lost sight of the distinguishing characteristics of that people, so powerful and so proud. But if war will come upon this point of exclusive jurisdiction, it must come. We cannot avoid it. Let the attempt be made to enforce this claim, and war will exist as speedily as the militia can be mustered. Let us say so plainly. It is not our fault; we do not desire it; on the contrary, we will do much, very much, to prevent it. If the British Government will go as far as we will to preserve peace, we shall have peace. But upon the question now before us, it is proper that we should speak and act according to what we mean to do. It has been said that the American people will not go with us on this question of jurisdiction. I believe they will. There is a deep feeling in the American character which requires to be stirred in order to be seen, and which is unaffected by the agitations of the surface. The party questions of the day do not penetrate to the bottom. But show to the people that the national honor is at stake, and you will hear from all quarters the hum of the multitude preparing for the emergency. There is a lofty sense of honor which will not brook indignity. We have existed long enough as a nation to find much in our history to be proud of; and if we should ever lose that feeling, everything else worth having will go with it.

There is something more in our relations with Great Britain which I mention with deep regret. It is, that, unfortunately, there are topics in those relations which involve the sectional feeling of every grand division of this Union. I will not go into the particulars of those points which especially affect the East, the West, and the Northern border, where, if some of our people have sinned, they have also been sinned against. The South, too, is assailed in its tenderest point. Sir, if you print and circulate one hundred thousand copies of this document which I hold in my hand, (the correspondence relating to the brigs Enterprise, Encomium, and Comet,) and thus explain to the people of the South what the Bahama Islands are now, and are likely to be hereafter, the dissatisfaction will be great indeed. It becomes both Governments to set about the task of placing their relations to each other upon a better footing, and to do so with an earnest and anxious desire that some, at least, of the difficulties which now exist should be removed. This desire must be felt practically. The differences will thicken if permitted to continue. The interests and feelings of the two nations incline them strongly to peace; and, in fact, it is a duty which they both owe to the civilized world, that peace should be preserved.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I express a sincere hope that the powers proposed by this bill to be vested in the President will not have to be exercised, and an equally earnest opinion that, as they are only contingent and defensive, we are required by the highest considerations of duty to pass it.

LANDS IN TENNESSEE.

SPEECH OF HON. E. H. FOSTER,
OF TENNESSEE,

IN THE SENATE, January 23, 1839.

The bill to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants and perfect titles to certain lands therein described, and to settle the claims to the vacant and unappropriated lands within the same," being taken up—

Mr. FOSTER said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The documents that accompanied the bill now under consideration sufficiently explain the facts and principles upon which I propose to urge its adoption. These documents have been long since printed and placed under the eye of every Senator; and if I could persuade myself they had received an attentive notice, I should not feel the necessity of any additional defense. But, sir, considering the great importance of the measure in its bearings on the peace and tranquillity of a large body of my constituents—now too long tormented in the uncertainty of their homes—I cannot think of hazardous success by submitting their claims to a silent vote of the Senate. Sir, I shall detain you but a little while; a few brief remarks will serve to recapitulate facts. This done, I cannot bring myself to doubt the ready acquiescence of this honorable body in all the measures proposed by the bill in question.

At and before the close of our revolutionary war, the State of North Carolina found herself embarrassed with a heavy debt—a double debt, sir, of money and of gratitude—created by her struggles in that war, and by the valor and patriotic exertions of her citizens. This debt was the more alarming, since all hope of pecuniary assistance was vain and fruitless. Poor as she was herself, North Carolina was as well off, perhaps, as any other State of the Confederacy. They were all then loaded with similar chains, and would have presented to her solicitations the plea of equal poverty. Left then, sir, to her own exertions, North Carolina did not give out by the way. She still resolved to redeem her faith, and, if possible, to reward the sufferings and the patriotism of those among her citizens who had aided in achieving our liberties.

Mr. President, beyond an outer ridge of the great Appalachian range, stretching west to the Mississippi river, and compressed on the north and south by the waste lands of Virginia and Georgia, (now the rich and flourishing States of Kentucky, Alabama, and Mississippi,) North Carolina owned a territory of great fertility, exceeding in extent four hundred, and measuring in breadth about one hundred and twenty miles. The eastern extreme of this territory had received a considerable impress of population long before the close of the war. Its hardy citizens had participated in the memorable battle of "King's Mountain," and, both before and afterwards, by their own unaided courage and exertions, had frequently and successfully encountered a powerful horde of neighboring savages. Such, sir, was the growth and vigor of this youthful, but bold community, that, soon after the peace, in imitation of the brave "OLD THIRTEEN," they declared independence of a "venerable parent," and the gallant ancestor of an honorable member of the Senate, [Mr. SEYER, of Arkansas,] from a liege subject of North Carolina, became the first and the last Governor of the rising State of "FRANKLAND." How this brave little republic—this "imperium in imperio"—struggled to maintain her sovereignty against powerful foes, internal as well as external; how, in the almost utter absence of the precious metals, she collected her revenues, and disbursed her civil and military lists in the rich furs of the country—the skins of the racoon and fox, the mink and the beaver; and how she at last gave over the unequal conflict, and quietly submerging into the "territory of the United States south of the Ohio," lost her brief, but memorable existence, I shall not now repeat. A portion of her short annals was once before introduced into your discussions here, and, if I mistake not, in the hands of a great master, illustrated, whilst they happily enlivened, the debate of the grave topic then pending before you. Simple, sir, as these things may seem in the eyes of some people, subjects of scorn and derision with others, I always recur to them with pleasure, as the proud memorials of the valiant and enterprising stock who first peopled Tennessee and the West, and whose sons, some of them, traveling further and still further into the wilderness, have grown up with new States, and return now amongst us in the midst of these walls, bearing on their foreheads high and enviable honors. But, sir, let me return to my subject.

The great domain, Mr. President, of which I was speaking, constituting the rich valleys drained by the Cumberland, the lower Tennessee, and the Mississippi, with their countless tributaries, was at the period in question "a howling wilderness." On the report, nevertheless, of the adventurous hunter, who in the joys of the chase had skirted this distant wild, and traversed its pathless waste, it was an inviting region—a land of promise—"flowing with milk and honey." Nature had lavished upon the soil her rarest gifts of production, and stocked the mountain, the lowland, and the river, with a rich profusion of game. Thither, sir, the eye of enterprise was speedily turned, and dangers told and untold served to whet the appetite without cooling the ardor of the fearless emigrant. Once penetrated, the wilderness soon began to blossom, and the sound of the ax and the rifle echoing from the hills, and mingling in strange melody with the distant moan of the bison and "the wolf's long howl," gave notice to the wandering savage that the white man had arrived. In the spirit of magnanimity, characteristic of the age, and with a feeling of liberality only equaled by the great and invaluable services it was intended to reward, the Legislature of North Carolina determined to devote the fairest portion of this country to the redemption of her revolutionary debt. In the eloquent terms of the noble declaration, it was offered up "as some effectual and permanent reward for the signal bravery and persevering zeal of the continental officers and soldiers in the service of the State."

Mr. President, when we consider the condition of the country, and the peculiar habits of the people who bestowed this noble gratuity, the price of blood and human suffering; and when we reflect on the sentiment of generous profusion which taught our ancestors to believe that the great debt of justice and gratitude would be best discharged by placing few restrictions upon the individual appropriation of the rich and princely inheritance they had given, we shall be the less surprised to learn (what I shall presently disclose) that, in its tedious consummation, this great and benevolent measure has, in one way and another, absorbed all the valuable public domain within the limits of Tennessee, leaving nothing behind but shreds and patches, altogether unworthy the attention of Congress, and incommensurate with the expense of preparing it for market. At this early day in the legislation of North Carolina necessity forbade, or experience had not taught, the advantages of dispatching the surveyor, the enterer. It was reserved, sir, for another, and a compass and the chain-carrier, in advance of the higher forum, to conceive and mature a system of land policy calculated, in its effects, to guard the public, whilst it protected the purchaser. And just here, sir, suffer me to say that the first development of such a system has more than immortalized the pen that drew the memorable ordinance of 1785. Thither we trace the origin and foundation of all our subsequent legislation on the important subject of the public domain; and to the bold conceptions which gave birth to that system, with its posterior improvements, the nation and the people are mainly indebted for the silent but secure operations of laws preventing impositions, and forever removing the distressing evils of conflicting titles. Unlike any of the new States, Kentucky, perhaps, excepted, Tennessee never enjoyed the advantages of this system. The early laws of North Carolina, the peculiar character of the obligations created by the great military donation to which I have already adverted, and the engagements of Congress, under the cession of 1790, to respect and observe all existing stipulations, denied my State these advantages. North Carolina had adopted her land policy long before the commencement of the Revolution; it was, in fact, coeval with the first settlement of the colony; suited at first to the perilous condition of the country, and in a long succession of years accommodating itself to the popular will, it grew with her growth, and strengthened with her strength.

With us, sir, in the security and the improvements of the age, a survey always precedes the entry and appropriation of public lands. Under the old régime of all or most of the States and colonies, the entry had precedence, and the "warrant" for the survey was issued after the claimant had selected his ground, and delivered its locality to the proper officer of the Government; a grant followed the survey, and the title was perfected. After the military donation, sir, the "warrant"—a term technically used to describe a State certificate for vacant lands—precedes the right to enter and appropriate. Sir, this new instrument was a "carte blanche," so to speak, for its amount in acres upon all the vacant territory of a State set apart for the officers and soldiers of the Revolution. The holder of the "warrant" went forth into the forest in search of soil, confined to no lines, and restricted by no surveys, unless it might be the lines and surveys, real or ideal, of some brother hunter who had gone in advance and waked up the game. Sir, in the early settlement of Tennessee, as it often happened, this was no ordinary adventure. The rifle and his faithful dog were the indispensable companions of the land locator. Every inch of ground, with every tree and covert, was an ambush, compassed round with the barbarian foe, and it not unfrequently turned out that the soldier who had periled life in every form for his warrant, afterwards lost it in the rash effort to secure a home to his liking. Mr. President, may I not appeal to you for a thousand facts in proof of this assertion? Yes, sir, you have "trod the wine press," and will testify to the probable truth of my story. Sir, in those days, the dangers of which I am speaking reached the lonely cabin of the peaceful settler as well as the more hardy adventurer of the woods. Men guided the plow with loaded rifles strapped to their backs; and how often has it not happened within the morning and the evening of the same day, in the life and death of its best and only defender, that the house of joy has been turned into the house of mourning.

Mr. President, the preceding details, tedious and uninteresting as they may be, are necessary to the just elucidation of my subject. They lead the mind to an easy comprehension of a topic otherwise not a little complicated, and enable Senators to grasp both the justice and propriety of sanctioning the provisions of this measure.

Sir, the year 1783, memorable for other great events, is further signalized in the history of my story as the epoch in which the State of North Carolina gave an honest but baneful form to the beneficent provisions of the "act for the relief of the officers and soldiers of the Continental line." It was declared:

"That each and every person or persons entitled to land by virtue of the aforesaid law shall, on application to the Secretary of State, obtain and receive from him a warrant of survey for such quantities of land within the limits of the lands reserved by the aforesaid law for said officers and soldiers, he, she, or they, by the aforesaid law, shall be entitled to, which shall be directed to Colonel Martin Armstrong, who is hereby appointed surveyor for that purpose, and is authorized and required, by himself or deputy, to execute and return the same into the Secretary's office within the same time and in the same manner as is required in other cases."

Sir, these loose and unguarded provisions, consistent, nevertheless, in many respects, with the antecedent practice of this State, constituted the fruitful source of incalculable mischiefs, and in their consequences, have swallowed up, at last, the entire valuable portion of the rich domain I have endeavored to pencil.

In the science of political economy, as in mechanics and every other art and science, first attempts are generally rude, defective, and imperfect; untaught by lessons drawn from experience and mellowed by practice, the mind of man too often wanders into absurdities, and, in its best intended efforts, gives sad proofs of the utter weakness of all human sagacity. Who among men has not looked back in repentant shame and regret upon some deed of short-sighted policy which self-sufficiency had at one time vainly dignified by the flame of wisdom? And thus it is that time, which, in its slow but certain progression, tests all things, frequently compels us, while we may consecrate the motive, to deplore the mischiefs of hasty and unguarded measures; and a signal proof of this is to be found in the benevolent law from which I have just given you a short quotation. Unaided by any counsels save his own, unchecked by the supervision of some watchful eye, untrammelled by any particular obligation other than the ever-doubtful morality of the best among mankind, in an hour of temptation—is it at all to be wondered at that, in the execution of such a law, vast and incalculable frauds should have been perpetrated by the negligence or contrivance of a secretary, or by the villainies of those who had the confidence of his office? Sir, since the passage of the law, how many million acres of land warrants have issued, no man can count. Like the heads of the fabled hydra, they have multiplied as they were stricken off; and, to this day, if you had any valuable territory left, I fear you would have no right to hope that any modern Hercules had appeared to destroy the Lernean monster. Yes, sir; they came upon us like the locusts of Egypt, settling down upon the land, and devouring every green thing before them. Swarm followed swarm in quick succession, until, having overrun the "military reservation," and exhausted the whole territory—"north and east of the line," they swept away over the rivers and the hills, and, lighting down on the lands of Congress, have covered almost every acre of valuable public domain within the limits of Tennessee.

But let me not be understood, Mr. President, in this hasty but faithful sketch of facts, as intending the least censure upon the Legislature or the people of North Carolina. In all that I have said, and in anything I may say, nothing is more distant from my feelings than unkind aspersions on either. Sir, the government and the people of that noble old State, in common with the authorities of Tennessee, have lamented abuses neither of them could remedy. The evil, great and destructive as it has been, found its origin in the unguarded provisions of the act of 1783, and its principal consummation within the first few years of the administration of that law.

Turning, sir, from this general view, I beg Senators to accompany me in a nearer approach to the subject; and I propose, sir, to bring up an array of facts which, I persuade myself, must carry conviction to every unprejudiced mind, and seal the success of the bill under discussion. I invite you, sir, to open the map of Tennessee. Placing your eye upon a point in the south boundary of the State where it is intersected by "Elk river," running north to the immediate neighborhood of Columbia, thence westward with Duck river and the military line to the Tennessee, and down this last river to the Kentucky line, you cut west Tennessee proper into two great divisions. With the territory lying east and north of this line, and stretching off to the mountains, we have now nothing to do. More than thirty years ago it was abandoned by Congress, and has long since fallen a prey, in all its valuable portions, to the insatiate element it was vainly designed to satisfy. Since the compact of 1806, between Congress,

North Carolina, and Tennessee, the territory south and west of the line I have just now described has been familiarly called by its descriptive title, "the congressional reservation." It contains the only Government domain lying within the limits of Tennessee, and by an accurate estimate falls short of seven million acres of land.

But again: subdivide the "congressional reservation" by the line of the Tennessee river, in its whole length through the State, and you have two sections of very unequal areas—not more unequal, however, than they are dissimilar in soil, surface, and topography. With the exception of the east and northeast portions, the whole face of the subdivisions lying on the east of the Tennessee river is traversed by a waste of unfruitful hills and steep declivities, separated by deep and narrow valleys. Through the largest portion of this region nature, for the most part, waxes in naked poverty; the scant and flinty soil mocks the hopes of the husbandman, and defies his hardest toils. A thin and scattered population breaks at times the dull monotony of the woods; or, it may be that the eye of the traveler, weary in search of a smoke from some lonely cabin, lights at last upon the fire of some modern Nimrod; and under the hospitable tent of the hunter accepts the best and only refuge the forest affords him. Sir, honorable gentlemen can form some idea of the character and value of these lands if they will be pleased to turn to the documentary proof lying on their tables.

On the testimony of the public surveyors, (who, to my knowledge, are men of probity, and intimately acquainted, I dare say, with every part of the country,) there were, in the year 1828, one million five hundred thousand acres of vacant and unappropriated land lying within the particular section of which I am now speaking. Of these, not more than one hundred thousand acres were valued at the inconsiderable sum stipulated in this bill. All the balance were worthless—utterly poor and worthless. In the words of one of the witnesses, all the valuable lands in his district had been entered; "those remaining vacant were of a very inferior quality, lying in small detached parcels, scattered everywhere, in various shapes and forms; he did not know of a tract of fifty acres of good vacant land in one body within his district, as most generally pieces of vacant land fit for cultivation lie in small tracts of five to twenty acres, surrounded by hills or lands not worth the taxes." In the language of another witness, equally competent and credible, the lands in question are the "poorest within the reservation." "There remains," he adds, "a very small portion worth the expense of procuring a patent; those which might be considered fit for cultivation lie only on water-courses and in narrow slips, and might be purchased at a small price, for the sake of the timber, by the owners of contiguous lands." To speak in the strong and emphatic expressions of this witness, "all the lands in this district, except such as lie on the water-courses, are altogether sterile and unfit for cultivation."

Mr. President, if this be a faithful picture of the region over which I have just glanced so hastily, what shall be said of the other great section of the "congressional reservation?" In that extensive country lying between the Tennessee and Mississippi rivers, there are seventeen counties, many flourishing towns, villages, and hamlets, and a wealthy, dense, growing, and intelligent population. Sixteen years ago it was little better than a wilderness. Occupying less than a fourth of the whole map of the State, it numbers, at this day, more than a third of our entire population. Two members of Congress provide for its interest in an opposite wing of this Capitol, and it is represented in the State Legislature by eighteen members—Senators and Representatives. In contemplating this beautiful country, its comparative geological peculiarities strike us with the greatest surprise and astonishment. Intersecting, in its course, both the south and north boundary lines of the State, the channel of the Tennessee river, within that circuit, seems to have searched out and swept around the extreme verge of our limestone formation. Beyond its left bank, westward to the Mississippi, scarce a stone or a pebble is to be found; and, with slight varieties in the east and southeast corners, this great section, turn which way you please, presents to the eye an unbroken surface, occasionally diversified with gentle undulations, but nowhere rising into hills and precipices. The rivers and smaller water-courses—narrow, deep, serpentine, and sluggish—flooding for ages their neighboring bottoms, have created great and extensive swamps and marshy lowlands which the wants and the enterprise of a score of generations to come will not be likely to reclaim. In other respects, nature appears to have dealt out her bounties with a partial hand. Throughout half, or more, of this fine country, the soil, sufficiently deep and based upon a clay foundation, throws upwards from its virgin bosom a rich and luxuriant variety of forest growth, and rewards the labors of the plow with an abundant harvest. And here it is that wealth has found its pleasant home, and, reposing on its own good fortune, can have no interest beyond a generous hope in the fate of this important measure.

But, as if to heighten effect, by the suddenness and rapidity of the change, here more than anywhere else, we are frequently doomed, in one short day's journey, to contrast the extremes of barrenness and fertility. Lights and shadows, alternately flitting before the eye, expose, in the great variety of soil, a checked panorama, and group before us the rich man's ample possessions, and the humble, but hopeful, abode of the industrious occupant. A little further on, and humility enjoys its own undisturbed dominion. There are large coterminous tracts of country too sterile or too unfruitful for the cupidity of the land warrant, and yet good enough for the poor man's refuge. And here, sir—here, amid extensive barren wastes, clothed with a stunted growth of wood and verdure—here, retiring poverty has found a thousand "little islands" of fertile soil; small, Mr. President, they are, but sufficiently large to encourage the industry, reward the toil, and support the rising household of the humble, but thrifty, adventurers who have searched out and seized upon them.

Such, Mr. President, are the geographical outlines of the "congressional reservation," and such the character and condition of the vacant and unappropriated lands upon which the bill before you proposes to operate. What considerations can there be of policy and humanity opposed to its passage? In either point of view, I boldly and confidently avow it, the reasons are, all of them, on the side of the measure. Nearly fifty years have elapsed since North Carolina conveyed this country to the United States, and within that period Congress has purchased, paid for, resold, and given away an empire of lands. States and Territories have been peopled around her, until Tennessee, then the most distant frontier of the inhabited Union, is now, in the march of great events, the center, if not the very center, of our great social system. To this good day, no attempts have been made, direct or indirect, to exercise any Federal supervision over these lands; and but for the reminiscences yearly brought up here by the supplicating occupants and their faithful advocates, you would long since have forgotten your paltry interest in this broken inheritance. You are reminded of it this day, sir, only to be convinced by evidences as "strong as proof of Holy Writ," that any effort on your part to reach the property by the only mode known to your statutes will involve an expense far exceeding the whole value of the estate. In the absence of all positive testimony, the system of appropriating the public lands in Tennessee, as already described, abundantly establishes this important fact.

The land warrant, as before observed, was a written bond on the State for its amount in tillable acres. And when hundreds and thousands were daily and for years in the race, every man his own unbridled provider, could it have been otherwise? Land hunting soon became a distinct and profitable profession. Hence, sir, in the legal vocabulary of the day, the land "locator" was as familiarly known by his name as the attorney and clerk of the court by their respective titles. It was the business of this active undertaker to traverse the country in every direction, and to scan, with practiced eye, all the advantages of water, soil, and situation. As the quantity of good lands diminished, the field of his less successful labor expanded. The most unfrequented woods were examined, and the tops of the hills and the mountains, with their deepest gorges, were explored. The information thus acquired became the merchandise of this agrarian broker; and its rapid demand, at the highest prices, by the owners of land warrants, seldom failed to enrich the shrewd and frugal "locator." Nowhere was this system carried to such high perfection as it was in the "congressional reservation." Long before the land offices were opened in that district, numerous detachments of rival land-hunters, headed by veteran chiefs, broke into the silence of the then unsettled wilderness, and scoured the country to every point of the compass. Some of them, more skillful and lynx-eyed than others, are said to have mapped out and centered the principal counties, as they were subsequently established by the Legislature. Certain it is the preparations were so admirably completed that, when the anxious day arrived, an "avalanche" of warrants was precipitated upon the country, and covered everywhere, in wild confusion, the "fat of the land." From that hour to this, now eighteen consecutive years, with slight intermissions, the fierce havoc has been constantly kept up. Warrants have been divided, and again subdivided, and so carefully fitted, squared, and dovetailed, as to reach almost every acre of valuable arable land worth the price of the instrument, without including the worthless adjacent soil. Sir, on the statement and authority of an honorable gentleman, once a surveyor in the country, and a man of unimpeachable veracity, I submit to the Senate that, in the progress of this searching system, "there are hundreds, and perhaps thousands of tracts of land in the 'congressional reservation' having from twenty to forty corners and offsets."

Mr. President, if my story be true, can it be that policy or cupidity would insist on a survey and sale of the public domain in Tennessee? But I desire to satisfy everybody; and happily, in the documentary proofs before me, and in other evidences now on my table, I have it in my power to throw a flood of light on the subject, which must convince incredulity itself.

Sir, nineteen years ago, my State caused the "congressional reservation" to be divided into seven districts, numbering from seven to thirteen, inclusive. Public surveyors were appointed by the Legislature for each of these districts—men of skill, probity, and integrity; and among other detailed duties, these sworn officers were required to subdivide the whole "reservation" into sections of "five miles square." They were particularly instructed to note "the quality of the land, and the mountains or other remarkable objects touching or crossing the lines of the sections." In the discharge of their official duties, these surveyors necessarily acquainted themselves with the quantity, quality, and relative value of the lands within their respective districts. I hope, therefore, I shall not be charged with offending against the strict law of evidence, by insisting that their testimony is of the highest grade, and signally entitled to the belief and confidence of Senators.

Mr. President, I pass by the statements of the surveyors of the seventh and eighth districts, having already, in a prior part of my argument, sufficiently adverted to their reports. From the next in number, the ninth district, we are told that, "owing to the mode of appropriating lands, the good soil yet remaining vacant consists of mere skirts and scraps, from the sale of which the General Government can realize little or nothing. The purchase of these lands," the surveyor adds, "must be mostly by poor men, who have little to give; in fact, their situation would not be much bettered if they were to obtain them for nothing; the gift would be too well calculated to make them always poor." On the evidence of the surveyor of the tenth district, "all the valuable lands have been appropriated by North Carolina military land warrants; such as are still vacant lie in detached parcels, and are generally very poor." From the eleventh district, we learn that "the greater portion of the vacant lands consists of river swamp, lying too low to be reclaimed; there are," in the words of the witness, "some high lands, but they are generally poor, and lie in detached parcels; so much so, there is no hesitation in saying that it would cost the United States more money to bring them into market than could be realized from the sale." Equally strong and conclusive are the declarations from the twelfth district. In the opinion of the officer there, "the amount of sales would not half pay the expense of preparing the vacant lands for market, as they lie in detached parcels, and the most valuable parts are in the smallest bodies." In the last remaining subdivision, the surveyor contents himself on the general subject by stating that the vacant lands within his district, "fit for cultivation, are in small detached parcels."

I cannot dismiss this branch of my argument, without bringing before the Senate a witness of more imposing character than either of those already produced; made so by the voluntary act of the Government; appealed to by the United States; and, by all the rules of evidence, not to be discredited or disregarded by the party at whose instance he is made to speak. In April, 1829, the Secretary of the Treasury, acting under orders from the House of Representatives, caused a subordinate of his Department, among other things connected with the same subject, to institute an inquiry into the estimated value of the unappropriated public lands lying in the "congressional reservation." Under these instructions, the Commissioner of the General Land Office addressed himself to the then Secretary of State for the State of Tennessee; and the information could not have been sought for in higher or more competent quarters—the individual thus selected, possessing in an eminent degree a clear and scrutinizing mind, added to the weight of his credibility the double advantage of a thorough acquaintance with the objects of your research. In his able, concise, but unanswerable report, in reply, he concludes all he has to say, in the following expressive language:

"No one at all acquainted with the true situation of the country, can, for a moment, doubt the impracticability of laying off and selling what remains (of these lands) upon any system like the present, as practiced by the United States, without positive loss to the Government."

Sir, after all this, I forbear to multiply proofs; but, on the general worthless character of these lands, I must say, and I say it respectfully, whoever doubts now would not be persuaded, "though one rose from the dead."

But, Mr. President, the precedent—good men, otherwise friendly to the measure, express great fears lest the passage of this law should set an example, not hereafter to be disregarded by Congress, in its general policy, tending to involve the Government in a system of profligacy calculated to destroy the national domain, and to rob the old States of their just and equal participation in our rich inheritance of public lands. I honor and respect such fears; but it does seem to me at the same time, that a moment's reflection on the character and provisions of this bill, with the proofs that have followed it, should remove the misgivings and calm the apprehensions of the most watchful and fastidious advocates of the rights and interests of the old States. I deny both the application of the argument and the supposed analogy. Tennessee does not ask a donation of these lands; a cession, without a fair consideration and a just equivalent; she does not approach you in the attitude of a beggar, an humble suppliant for favors, great or small. Sir, it was this morning, in a casual conversation with an honorable Senator on my right, [Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi,] himself a native of my State, I was congratulating myself with pride and gratification, how seldom it was that prayers, petitions, and memorials reached these Halls from the honored people whose unworthy servant I am. No, sir, Tennessee asks no unbought favors—she unfolds the truth, acknowledges your right, proves the value of these rags and patches of a once noble inheritance, and pointing to her hardy sons who are content to dig a scant but independent living from the barren soil to which you have clung so long, she openly proposes to take your property, and pay its value into the public exchequer. Where, then, the danger of the precedent? If it be wrong for the Government to sell any portion of the public domain at a fair price, then, indeed, there may be danger in the precedent this bill may set. Sir, in mercantile language, this is an "old concern" and ought to be "wound up." If it has been without "profit" to you, it has also been without "loss." Your factor, your agent, my suffering State has borne all the expenses of the "establishment," and she appeals to you now to "auction off" the odds and the ends, the broken wares, with the dusty, dingy, moth-eaten fragments of an ancient "invoice." Shall she be any longer refused?

Mr. President, I have omitted of purpose many of the dry details which connect themselves with the history of the appropriation of the public lands in Tennessee. But, as some exculpation of my State, I beg to remark that her government has at no time participated in the right of originating and issuing land warrants; and I add, what must strike the Senate with still greater surprise, that for ten years after Tennessee was a sovereign State, and an equal member of the Confederacy, North Carolina exercised the exclusive power of perfecting titles by giving grants for the lands lying within our limits. This last anomaly—so far as I know, without a precedent in the history of any other State, vexatious in practice and humiliating in its character—was ingrafted upon the cession compact of 1790. The foul blot continued to tarnish her escutcheon until the high contracting parties, by the triple agreement of 1806, authorized Tennessee to issue grants, perfect titles, and settle claims to all the vacant and unappropriated lands lying within her boundary.

From that day to this, the State whose servant I am has discharged, as faithfully as could be, the important trust confided to her by the General Government and the government of North Carolina. Her statute-books are swollen with laws regulating the adjudication of land warrants, and the fair and equitable appropriation of the great estate placed in her keeping. In the execution of the task, surveyors, registers, commissioners, clerks, and entry takers, all have been more or less pensioned on her civil list, until, in the lapse of years, she has incurred heavy costs, and expended incalculable sums. Sir, her highest executive magistrates, through a long succession of three-and-thirty years, have found ample labor for much of their time in executing the grants which, in uncounted thousands, have crowded their tables. In proof of this, I hold up this good and weighty volume, [Laws of Tennessee,] filled up, page upon page, and line upon line, with necessary and indispensable enactments on the subject of these lands.

For all these services, Mr. President, Tennessee asks no pecuniary recompense. The soil has escaped, it is true, without price to her, but its bold tenantry are hers. In war and in peace, always with the foremost in defense of our blessed institutions, they are hers—in the eloquent words of the Roman matron, "her jewels." So far as they are quieted, Tennessee is satisfied. Would that I could say they were all in peace. But I cannot. Within the limits of the "congressional reservation" there are hundreds, nay, thousands, of humble, honest, thrifty, industrious occupants, who have no right to give the endearing title of "home, sweet home," to the lonely "cabins" in which they have dwelt so long. Improved as these distant fields have been by the sweat, the labor, and the hardships they have lavished upon them, consecrated to their religious feelings by the neighboring "meeting-house," and the pious but unpretending "man of God" who has so long and so tenderly ministered to their comforts, doubly hallowed by the lowly graves which entomb the bones of husbands, wives, children, friends, and relatives, these people linger in love where pampered wealth would scorn to fix its abode. Sick, more than sick, with "hope deferred," they now approach you. Ready, able, and willing to pay the just value of your property, they implore your title. Can honorable Senators refuse the meritorious demand? Heartless, cold and heartless, is the cruel policy which would repel the humble request, and answer "no."

Mr. President, I thank honorable gentlemen for their kind attention. I have done. On this, the first time my voice was ever heard within these walls, and the last, as it may be, it will remain with me as one of the proudest, happiest recollections of my life, that it was raised in the cause of humanity.

DÉFENSE OF WESTERN FRONTIER.

REMARKS OF HON. W. S. FULTON,
OF ARKANSAS,

IN THE SENATE, February 26, 1839.

The bill to set apart a belt of land on the western borders of the States of Missouri and Arkansas, as bounty lands, to be granted to settlers engaged for a term of years in defense of the frontier, being taken up—

Mr. FULTON said, that at this late period of the session, he felt that it would be impossible to obtain the favorable action of both Houses of Congress upon the important bill just called up, being for the first time reached upon the Senate's Calendar. A somewhat similar measure had been warmly pressed at the last session of Congress, and had unfortunately failed to receive the sanction of the Senate. A measure, however, of a like character having at this session received the support of a majority of the Senate, (he alluded to the bill for the armed occupation of Florida,) had induced him to hope that if time had been afforded for the consideration of this bill, and to have enabled its friends to demonstrate its importance, and the great necessity of such a measure, particularly at this time, as a cheap and efficient means of defense of the western frontier, he had flattered himself that this bill also would have obtained the support of a majority of the Senate. He regretted exceedingly that time was not allowed for its consideration, and it was the more to be deplored, as the aspect of affairs was becoming somewhat warlike.

The occupation by British traders of our territory bordering on the Pacific, and the extensive trade which is carried on by them with all the Indian tribes, as well those within our acknowledged limits as those inhabiting British territory, have given to that Government a power and an influence in that quarter of the most alarming and vexatious character. They can at any moment instigate the savages, even to the very borders of Arkansas and Missouri, to make war upon the frontier. The indiscriminate slaughter of the whole population of both those States might take place before the Government could be informed that war had commenced. The fact that the very counties in Arkansas through which this belt of land proposed to be set apart in this bill runs, contain, many of them, at this moment, a large population, demonstrates conclusively the fearless character of that people. They merely ask the Government to give them strength sufficient to enable them to resist the hosts which may be brought against them, and they will be content.

We were now within two or three days of the end of the session, and he believed it would be impossible to pass this bill, or even to consider it, without defeating many bills now receiving the final action of the two Houses of Congress; he, therefore, most reluctantly felt constrained to yield to the wishes of his friends, and would abstain from asking for the consideration of the measure at this session. He moved to lay the bill upon the table.

FRIDAY, March 1, 1839.

The bill to provide for the protection of the northern and northwestern frontier being taken up, as in Committee of the Whole—

Mr. FULTON said he rose to offer an amendment to the bill now before the Senate, providing for the appropriation of $120,000 for the defense of the southwestern frontier. The system of defense proposed by the Department of War, at the last session, for that frontier, asked an appropriation of upwards of seven hundred thousand dollars. This system of defense did not find favor with Congress, and a small appropriation of $80,000, merely to keep the works of defense from total destruction, had also failed in the House after having passed the Senate. The consequence has been, that the military works upon that frontier are in a most ruinous condition. He spoke from personal knowledge, when he said that the defenses and quarters, as well as all the other structures, at Fort Gibson, were in the most decayed situation. They are all falling down; and, as a work of defense, this fort would afford but little security to the troops, and as a post, even the health of the troops will be greatly endangered if things are permitted to remain as they are.

Mounted troops are also indispensable in an Indian country; and, in order to make these efficient, not only the men, but the horses, also, should be taken care of. Proper structures ought to be furnished for both the horses and their provender. This amendment proposes what is considered requisite for these objects.

The proposed appropriation will be barely sufficient to enable the Department to keep up existing works, and to make such improvements as are absolutely necessary to place the frontier in a temporary state of defense. And when the exposed situation of the inhabitants is considered, and the obligations which this Government is under to them to afford them adequate protection, it would seem impossible to suppose that Congress would refuse the necessary appropriations to enable the Department to do its duty. He hoped the Senate would adopt the amendment which he now felt it to be his duty to propose to the bill under consideration.

This amendment failed. On the next day Mr. BENTON proposed an amendment for the same object; when

Mr. FULTON said that he had failed in his proposition the evening before, for an appropriation for the defenses of the western frontier, as he was led to believe, for the want of the estimates from the Department of War. He was happy to be now able to furnish the Senate with a letter from the Secretary of War, which he hoped would satisfy every Senator as to both the necessity and importance of the appropriation now asked for.

Mr. F. then read the following letter:

DEAR SIR: I regret exceedingly that the sum asked for to be applied to the defense of the western frontier should have been refused; and, still more, that those who are so deeply concerned in this measure should not unite to carry it through. With the sum now available, (provided the $50,000 which was carried to the surplus fund is reappropriated,) and that proposed by the Military Committee, $80,000, the frontier may be placed in a respectable state of defense, if the application of the money be left to the proper officers of the Government.

The sum I propose will be applied to the works at Fort Gibson, Fort Smith, fort on the Illinois, Fort Leavenworth, fort at Table Creek, fort near the forks of the Des Moines, and to the completion of the road already commenced by order of Congress. I most earnestly hope the money will be appropriated.

Yours, truly,
Hon. W. Fulton, Senate.

J. R. POINSETT.

The amendment was then agreed to in committee; but when the bill was brought into the Senate, it was lost—yeas 13, nays 18.

ARMED OCCUPATION OF FLORIDA.

SPEECH OF HON. W. MONTGOMERY, OF NORTH CAROLINA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
January 21, 1839,

In the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the bill making appropriations for prosecuting the war in Florida against the Seminole Indians.

Mr. MONTGOMERY said that this was a bill to make an appropriation to support and pay an army in Florida, who had, he regretted to say, by their repeated failures to answer the purposes they were intended to answer for the country, lost the confidence of the nation; and, instead of adding laurels to the country, had disgraced it, and done more to injure our military standing in the estimation of other nations, than could, he feared, ever be repaired. In all the bloody conflicts that this country has had from its foundation up to the Seminole and Creek wars of late, our military officers and soldiers had not only nobly and successfully sustained their own and their country's honor against an equal force, but often against a force vastly outnumbering them, and with great advantages over them in other respects. As proof of this, he would refer to the battles of the Revolution, and also the many bloody conflicts with the savages since that period up to the late Creek and Seminole wars.

Armed Occupation of Florida—Mr. Montgomery.

In all our struggles we have been more than conquerors, until this Seminole war, which has cost the nation fifteen millions of money, or more, in maintaining an army, outnumbering, ten to one, the enemy, and furnished with better supplies than any army in this country ever had, and with the advantages, too, of three of our most experienced generals of the regular army. And what has been the mortifying result? I will tell you, Mr. Chairman, what has been done. We have many victories upon record here, from the pens of our officers, some of which I have on my desk before me; while the enemy, the savage Seminole, has not only the original battle-field now in possession, but vastly more of our territory and soil under their command than when we began the war upon them. But, what is far more disgraceful to our army, and mortifying to our feelings, the enemy has the scalps of many of our unoffending frontier inhabitants in their possession; for it has so happened that while the frontier was counting on protection from our army, sent there for that purpose, they have afforded the frontier no protection at all, by not deterring the savage from his inhuman butcheries, nor pursuing and punishing them after they had committed them. Thus, while the Government, always willing and ever ready to discharge her duty justly towards all her citizens, has sent thousands of men and millions of money to defend and protect the frontier inhabitants from the Indian butcheries, we have had, in return, from our officers, victories upon paper, while the Indians had victories on the battle-field, and the accounts of the scalping of our women and children, and the burning of their homes, sometimes with the bodies of the slain victims in them.

These scenes have so often occurred, in the face of our Army, during a period of several years, and under circumstances leaving no justification for the Commanding Officer of the regular Army, that I confess, Mr. Chairman, I am compelled to declare here in my place, as a Representative in part of the good people of the nation, that I feel, when I am again called upon to vote millions of money to sustain and support an army whose officers have, by their repeated failures, either to conquer the enemy or give protection to the inhabitants of Florida, I should at least make known my sentiments. No man living can be more willing than I am to vote for men and means to prosecute a war to protect our citizens and their rights; and I have voted for all the appropriations to support the war in Florida; and I am again willing to afford all the means necessary to prosecute that war to a successful and speedy termination; but, Mr. Chairman, I feel that I am voting money to support officers (for, as to the soldiers, both regular and militia, I have the utmost confidence in them in all respects) that have proved, by their conduct, that they are incompetent or unwilling to do their duty; and by detaining them in command in Florida, and sending them the means of prosecuting the war, we are actually taunting the people of Florida with but the name of protection. I am willing to furnish the means of protecting the Floridians; but I am unwilling to put them in the hands of these officers of the regular Army, who have, by their conduct, proved their incompetency properly to use them, and in whom, I again repeat, I have lost all confidence. I have always doubted the efficiency of any officer, after he has spent some five or ten years of his life in time of peace in perfect idleness, walking the streets of one of our large cities, and living upon the luxuries only to be had in them. Take an officer who has been thus fed, and send him into the backwoods, where he has nothing but a soldier's backwoods fare, and he is forthwith unmanned, physically and mentally; and the thoughts of his former city dinners, his sparkling champagne, his evening walks and dances, nine times out of ten, unfit him either to fight himself, or to command others in fighting; and just so long as you depend on such men to command your Army, just so long will you have such failures as you have had in Florida.

I will proceed, Mr. Chairman, to show, from the public records on file, and other proof, that there are just grounds strongly to suspect that this Seminole war has not been prosecuted, by some at least of those high in command, like any other war ever before heard of; for, if one of the generals there is to be believed, in a late communication to the Hon. THOMAS H. BENTON, of the Senate, it never was the intention of the Government, or of any general there, to kill these Seminoles, but only to catch them; for he declares this; and I now send to the Chair, to be read by the Clerk, a letter which proves this fact. It reads thus:

LOCUST GROVE, NEAR LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY,

DEAR SIR: I have received your letter of the 5th instant, with a copy of the bill to provide for the armed occupation and settlement of Florida. If the plan which you propose can be carried out, the Indians may be gradually destroyed, or forced to submit; and I know of no other measure likely to rid the country of them, unless, by following the example of the British Government in their war with the Maroons of Jamaica, we employ the blood-hound. The only doubt I entertain as to the complete success of the plan arises from the apprehension that the quantity of good land south of the twenty-eighth degree of north latitude is not sufficient to induce settlers to occupy it; north of that degree, the country is generally equal to the southern countries of Georgia and Alabama; but south of it, the good land is confined to a few detached spots along the coast on both sides of the peninsula; and fresh water can rarely be obtained on the gulf coast south of Charlotte's harbor, even where the land is fit for cultivation. Between the mouth of the Withlacoochee and Tampa Bay, there is a considerable body of excellent land; there is also good land near Colap Kilaga; and between the Ocklawaha and St. Johns rivers I have no doubt healthy situations for stations or residences may be found; and as to the country north of the Withlacoochee, it is quite as healthy as the greater portion of the western and southwestern States; and the whole sea-board is as healthy as any part of our Atlantic sea-board south of the Delaware. I would advise that the planters and farmers be urged to return to the plantations and farms which they have abandoned, and the whole country north of Tampa Bay be settled as soon as possible. The coasts of Florida afford as valuable fisheries, in proportion to their extent, as the banks of Newfoundland; and though the country south of Tampa Bay affords but little inducement to the cultivator, a population sufficient to confine the Indians to the interior might find near the coast abundant support by combining fishing with cultivation. A supply of fresh water could be obtained from the adjacent islands.

The posts to be occupied by the troops must depend, necessarily, upon the number and position of the settlements. There should always be a sufficient force in the neighborhood of each settlement to serve as a rallying point to the settlers, and to unite with them either for purposes of protection or pursuit. There is a small body of good land on New River; also on the Miami river near Cape Florida, which was occupied previous to the war. Two or three hundred inhabitants might support themselves comfortably on that portion of the Territory. No part of the United States is more healthy. A light-house is necessary in that neighborhood; and so valuable is the commerce that passes that part of the coast, and so numerous the wrecks in consequence of the difficulty of the navigation, that, to protect the crews and property cast on shore, the country should be settled, and military posts be established on New River and near Cape Florida.

There is a body of excellent land near Cape Sable, the most southerly point on the peninsula, which would support several hundred inhabitants. This it would be highly advantageous to occupy as soon as possible. A military post should be established and maintained at the cape. Posts will be necessary at Indian River inlet, at the head of Indian river, at New Smyrna, and at one or two other points between the latter post and St. Augustine. A post should be established at Punta Rasa, south of Tampa, and the mouth of the Suwannee; those points, of course, to be determined by the settlements that may be made on or near the coast. The posts across the country from the Gulf to the Atlantic should not be considered permanent, but be changed as the settlements in the interior be advanced to the south. I have read the letter of Surgeon General Lawson, and agree with him generally in his views. As to the war which we have carried on in Florida, it differs not only from any ever before waged by this country, but from any other of which we have an account in history, unless the Maroon war in Jamaica be an exception. The object has been, and is now, not to beat and compel the enemy to make peace, but to catch them. No force employed against them, either in the former or present Seminole war, no matter by whom commanded, has ever been able to catch them; and my decided opinion is, if they ever be caught, it must be with their own consent; and that consent will hardly be given until they find the white man in their way. Let them be crowded by settlers, and that which has invariably occurred throughout the whole history of our settlements will occur again: they will not only consent to remove, but will desire it as the greatest benefit the nation can confer upon them.

With high consideration and respect, your obedient servant,
T. H. S. JESUP.

HON. THOMAS H. BENTON,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate.

Will any man now doubt that great injustice has been done to the Government and to the people of suffering Florida, when the general who had under his command eight thousand nine hundred and ninety-three men, sent there by the Government, with all the necessary means and munitions of war, and placed under his command, as we all supposed, to chastise the savages in the usual way, for these daily murders committed on the frontier people, when we are here told, in this letter, that "the object was not, nor is it now, to beat and compel the enemy to make peace, but to catch them;" and, I suppose by way of clearing his own skirts of all blame for not catching them, he says:

"No force employed against them, either in the former or present Seminole war, no matter by whom commanded, has ever been able to catch them; and my decided opinion is, if they ever be caught, it must be with their own consent."

Was ever such language heard before from any officer holding even a corporal's command, much less from a commanding major general of the United States regular Army? Great God! what will this nation and the world say, when they see this declaration made by this high officer? If he was acting under instructions from the War Office, when he was only trying to catch the Indians that were daily killing and scalping the Floridians, I want to see them.

I have seen some of the letters from the War Office to that general, and no such instructions were in them. If he was only sent there upon a trapping expedition, not to beat and compel the Seminoles to make peace, but only to catch them, why was he not furnished with traps and snares, and such other materials as were suited to his objects and intentions? Why was he furnished at an expense of millions of our money, with cannon, powder and balls, muskets, bayonets, &c. & why did he, in a letter dated "Headquarters, Volusia, Florida, December 12, 1836," directed to the Adjutant General, Washington city, (to be found on page 53, in document No. 78,) call for double-barreled guns? Are these the kind of officers that we are to send a large army of men under, with all the implements of war, at an expense of millions annually, to defend our frontier inhabitants against the Seminole warrior, with his unerring rifle and his bloody scalping knife and tomahawk; and after a total failure to stop these murders, then we and the suffering and bleeding Florida frontier are tauntingly told that these generals were only trying to catch these murdering Indians, and that if ever they are caught, it will be by their own consent. Meaning, I suppose, that after all the hellish murders perpetrated, if the Seminole has been fully satisfied and drenched with the innocent blood of the Floridians, that then he will come forward and voluntarily be caught in some trap or snare that our noble general, who may then have the command of some eight or ten thousand men, may have set for him. Great God! what sympathy for a bleeding frontier, and what patience and forbearance for the Indians! Sir, my blood boils in my veins, when I think of such conduct. I hope I have the usual portion of good feelings for all men; but I would never wait to catch an Indian who would murder my wife or my children, or any of my neighbors. I would dispatch him in the quickest way possible in my power. Yes, sir, I would, if I had the power to do so, command a legion of fiery dragons to go forth and consume them instantly. That would be my kind of catching; and I say that the general who goes to fight Indians with any other feeling is unfit for the service; and as soon as that fact is known, he should be at least disbanded and stricken from the army forthwith, as unworthy of the name of a soldier.

Mr. Chairman, I had intended to have begun with the disastrous and unfortunate war, and brought before this committee and the country some of the many facts that are on record as proof that the fault was in the commanding officers. But my friend from Alabama, [Mr. CRABB,] who has preceded me in this discussion, has so ably and so appropriately noticed the operations under the two first generals that commanded there, (Scott and Gaines,) that I am relieved from that part of my remarks which were intended to apply to their operations. I will only say, that I most heartily concur with him in believing that the failures under these commanders were solely attributable to their personal bad feelings towards each other. I believe with the honorable member from Alabama, that had the first commander been allowed to remain there with half the force and means that has since been sent there, he would have terminated the war long since, not by catching but by killing the enemy.

I will commence with the campaign in 1836, and give some extracts from the letters, &c., of the commanding general, (T. S. Jesup.) In Doc. 78, second session Twenty-Fifth Congress, the following extracts are to be found:

VOLUSIA, December 5, 1836.

The pay of the regular troops, including the officers, should be doubled, to secure them the ordinary comforts during their service in Florida. Let me entreat you, as you regard the best interests of the service, to impress upon Congress the necessity of putting the army upon a better footing. I wish nothing myself, and, if justice can be done to my brave companions, I will cheerfully serve out the campaign without pay or emoluments. I shall commence operations immediately, with the utmost vigor which the means at my command will permit, and shall keep you constantly advised of my progress.

With high consideration and respect, I am, sir, your obedient servant,
TH. S. JESUP.
Hon. B. F. BUTLER, Secretary of War, Washington City.

VOLUSIA, Florida, December 9, 1836.

This, you may be assured, is a negro, not an Indian war; and if it be not speedily put down, the South will feel the effects of it on their slave population before the end of the next season.

Unless the army be placed on a better footing, it will disband; discharges are numerous, and no soldiers reenlist. The officers cannot subsist on the miserable pittance now allowed them; they should, upon principles of common justice, be placed on a footing with corresponding grades in the Navy. You, sir, will command their gratitude, and render an important service to the country, by taking the lead in this matter.

Assure the President that whatsoever promptness and energy can accomplish shall be done.

With high consideration and respect, I am, sir, your obedient servant,
TH. S. JESUP.

Hon. B. F. BUTLER,

VOLUSIA, December 12, 1836.

Without a strong corps of wagon-drivers, muleteers, and laborers, it is almost impossible to act efficiently in this country. The southern militia do not labor for themselves, and consequently cannot or will not labor for the public. The regular troops are on constant fatigue duty, and a road leading from camp, and on which we are to march to-day, requiring repairs, I sent instructions to General Armstrong last night to move forward with his brigade and cause the necessary repairs to be made. He replied that it would be impossible, as his men would not work. I shall, therefore, be compelled to put this labor also upon the regular troops. At the same time that I consider southern volunteers inefficient for many purposes, it is due to them to say that they are efficient whenever rapid marches are to be made, or an enemy to be fought. Add to them such a corps as I propose, and you make them efficient for every purpose.

I am, sir, most respectfully, your obedient servant,
TH. S. JESUP,
Major General commanding.

Hon. B. F. BUTLER,
Acting Secretary of War, Washington City.

How will southern militia like this reflection? Is it a fact that the southern militia do not work? They can answer.

VOLUSIA, December 12, 1836.

Cannot something be done for the Army? The officers should be placed on a footing with those of the Navy; and all officers or soldiers who are serving, or have served, in Florida, below the rank of major general, should have grants of land.

It is impossible to obtain an accurate return of the troops—of course, no return can be made.

If I had one thousand volunteers or militia to take the place of the Tennesseans immediately, I should be able to terminate the war in sixty days. The prospects are flattering, even now; but I am not sanguine of success. The country is not so difficult as it has been represented, but the difficulties which we find arise from the entire destitution of every kind of supply.

To pursue the Indians in the swamps, I must have good double-barreled guns; and to enable me to keep the field a sufficient length of time to render any service, I must have portable soup. I shall order both.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,
TH. S. JESUP.

PORT ARMSTRONG, January 19, 1837.

I am happy to find that you have recommended a bounty in land to the soldiers; it should, in strict justice, be extended to the regimental and junior staff officers.

With high consideration and respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,
TH. S. JESUP,
Major General Commanding

The Honorable B. F. BUTLER,
Secretary of War, Washington City.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE SOUTH,
FORT DADE, (FLORIDA), March 26, 1837.

SIR: I have the satisfaction to be able to report that the Seminole chief Yaholoochee, (Cloud), who commanded at the Waco, is at Tampa Bay with his family; and he has about two hundred of his people in a camp near that post.

The principal chiefs on the St. Johns, Tusculum and Emathla, (Philip), have sent messages to me; they will obey the order of Micanopy to emigrate. Philip sent his son, who informed me that his father had required Abiaen, (Sam Jones,) chief of the Micasauksies, to join him and accompany him on his visit to Micanopy.

The war is, no doubt, ended, if a firm and prudent course be pursued; but a trifling impropriety, on the part of the white population of the frontier, might light it up again. The negroes rule the Indians, and it is important that they should feel themselves secure; if they should become alarmed, and hold out, the war will be renewed.

I shall send one battalion of the Indian warriors serving in Florida to Mobile so soon as it can be mustered and paid, and transports be obtained.

The Alabama drafts will be sent off as soon as they can be paid; transports have been provisioned for them. The naval garrison furnished by Commodore Dallas for Fort Foster, has been relieved, and ordered to join the ship whence it was detached.

I shall discharge the volunteers and militia force as rapidly as the circumstances of the service will permit; and shall take measures to have the ordinance and other stores not required in Florida taken to the most convenient arsenals and storehouses.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
TH. S. JESUP,
Major General commanding.

Brigadier General R. JONES,
Adjutant General, Washington City.

TAMPA BAY, May 17, 1837.

We committed an error in regard to these Indians, in the attempt to remove them before the country was required for white settlers. In all other cases of removal, a white population has been pressing upon and crowding out the Indians before they were required to leave the homes of their fathers; here, there was no population pressing upon them, and they have never felt the necessity to go. Besides, the negroes rule them, and the arrival of several Floridians in camp, for the purpose of looking after and apprehending negroes, spreads general consternation among them. Those that were in camp fled, and carried the panic with them, and we cannot now induce them to return.

I am, General, respectfully, your obedient servant,
TH. S. JESUP,

Brigadier General R. JONES,
Adjutant General, Washington City.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE SOUTH,
TAMPA BAY, June 5, 1837.

SIR: I have the honor to report that this campaign, so far as relates to Indian emigration, has entirely failed.

The Seminole chiefs were, I believe, sincere in their intentions of fulfilling the provisions of the treaty; but they have no influence over their people, except for purposes of mischief. The warriors, I understand, have degraded Micanopy, and placed Sam Jones, the Mickaukey chief, at the head of the nation. Micanopy, Juniper, and Cloud met me in council on the 1st instant; they were to have come in again on the 2d, but failed; and on the night of that day they were seized by a force of armed warriors and removed to the interior. I succeeded in securing a number of their negroes, and have sent them to New Orleans.

The season is too far advanced for the renewal of offensive operations. All, therefore, that can be done is to place the troops in such positions as shall at the same time cover the frontier, and give reasonable assurance of health. The garrisons of Forts Mellon and on the St. Johns, and Foster, on the Hillsboro', must be withdrawn, in consequence of the unhealthfulness of the sites; and Fort Dade, on the Withlacoochee, must also be withdrawn, from the difficulty of supplying it during the wet season.

The negroes whom I seized say the Indians will not renew the war, unless attacked. This may be true; but we cannot trust them. The best security for the frontier will be complete preparations to repel attack.

Emigration I consider impracticable. The Indians, generally, would prefer death to removal from the country, and nothing short of extermination will free us from them. Not a single first-rate warrior has surrendered since the commencement of the war; nor has a single instance occurred of a Seminole having proved false to his country.

The difficulties presented by the country are great, but those presented by the climate are greater. Many of the posts necessary to success during the season of operations must be abandoned early in the summer, to preserve the lives of their garrisons; and the consequence is that, at the commencement of every campaign, nearly all the interior depots have to be reestablished.

If operations are to be renewed in the fall, it is important that early preparations be made, and that the officer who is to conduct them have everything in readiness to take the field by the 1st of October. I will write to you again in detail on this subject. In the mean time, I desire you to present my most earnest requests to the Secretary of War and the General-in-Chief that I be immediately relieved from the command of this army. It is known to the members of the late Administration that I was placed in command not only without solicitation, but contrary to my known and expressed wishes.

I am, sir, most respectfully, your obedient servant,
TH. S. JESUP,
Major General commanding.

Brigadier General R. JONES, Adjutant General.

Thus we see that those Indians that were caught were let out of the trap, and again set at liberty to use the scalping-knife and tomahawk upon the frontier inhabitants.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE SOUTH,

FORT HELLMAN, GARY'S FERRY, July 25, 1837.

GENERAL: I have received your letter of the 11th instant. On the 5th of June, in closing my official report to you, I asked to be relieved from the command of this army. I made this request to disembarass the Government, supposing that public opinion, when all had not been successfully accomplished that had been expected, might demand my recall; and I was unwilling that any considerations, personal to myself, should for a moment embarrass the service, or interrupt or influence the plans of the Government.

VOLUSIA, December 5, 1836.

The pay of the regular troops, including the officers, should be doubled, to secure them the ordinary comforts during their service in Florida. Let me entreat you, as you regard the best interests of the service, to impress upon Congress the necessity of putting the army upon a better footing. I wish nothing myself, and, if justice can be done to my brave companions, I will cheerfully serve out the campaign without pay or emoluments. I shall commence operations immediately, with the utmost vigor which the means at my command will permit, and shall keep you constantly advised of my progress.

With high consideration and respect, I am, sir, your obedient servant,
TH. S. JESUP.

To the Hon. B. F. BUTLER,

TAMPA BAY, June 10, 1837.

The troops and all officers below the rank of major general should receive double pay while serving in Florida. And the general who is to command should be immediately required to make his arrangements to take the field by the 1st of October, and should be unrestricted as to means. If the war be carried on, it must necessarily be one of extermination. [Signed as above.]

TAMPA BAY, June 16, 1837.

Should the Indians remain in this Territory, the negroes among them will form a rallying point for runaway negroes from the adjacent States; and should they remove, the fastnesses of the country would be immediately occupied by negroes. I am very sure they could be confined to a small district near Florida Point; and would accept peace, and the small district referred to, as the condition for the surrender of all runaway negroes. I throw out these hints for the consideration of my official superiors, without pretending to offer an opinion as to the propriety of adopting them; and I am, sir, most respectfully, your obedient servant,
TH. S. JESUP.

The Hon. J. R. POINSETT,
Secretary of War, Washington City.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE SOUTH,
VOLUSIA, November 21, 1837.

SIR: I have a sufficient force for every purpose, either in the field or coming on. Supplies are abundant for all immediate purposes; and all required for future operations can be obtained as they may be wanted.

The Indians are already driven from more than fifteen million acres of land, worth $20,000,000; and in less than a month we shall drive them off from five to ten million acres more. The St. Johns is navigable for steamboats fifty miles above Fort Mellon; and the country, I understand, is more valuable the further we go south.

Colonel Mills has joined, from Fort King, with three hundred volunteers, and Colonel Twigg, with four hundred dragoons, has just returned from a reconnaissance of the country between the St. Johns and the Ocklawaha, north of the road from Volusia to Fort Armstrong. I shall proceed on the 23d or 24th, at the head of this force, south of the road, and sweep the wide country between the St. Johns and the Ocklawaha to Fort Mellon.

General Eustis is at Fort Mellon, and Lieutenant Colonel Bankhead has been sent forward to establish a post forty or fifty miles above.

Congress, I perceive, are alarmed at the expenses of the war; they have gotten the country into it, and they will find that they must make three or four such appropriations; at the least, before they get clear of it. They broke the army down in 1821, and are responsible for all the Indian difficulties which have since taken place. Had they left it as it was in 1818, it would have been competent, with the two regiments of dragoons since added, for every purpose of defense, as well as for the suppression of every hostile movement on the part of the Indians.

I hope that the huckstering views of certain prominent members will not be allowed to influence the policy of the country, or prevent the appropriations necessary to carry it out.

As to the removal of the Seminoles, I believe now it can be effected, so far as the main body are concerned, though I have no doubt the present generation will have passed away before the whole be driven from the country. But the Cherokees will give trouble, if prompt measures be not adopted in regard to them before the 1st of May. A war with them, however, cannot last a month, if proper dispositions be made in time. All the difficulties of our Indian wars have resulted from delaying preparations too long.

I will write at least every week.
And I am, sir, with high consideration and respect, your obedient servant,
TH. S. JESUP.

Hon. J. R. POINSETT,
Secretary of War, Washington City.

I ask the attention of this committee and of this nation, to the recorded facts contained in the above extracts, to prove what I have said, that the regular Army has become useless and totally inefficient, and should be disbanded. I was disposed to make all reasonable allowances for the country, hammocks, &c. But the failure has been too great for all. We only want a Jackson there a short time to settle the whole matter. Our military establishment is a heavy expense. Since Maine Boundary Question—Mr. Cushing.

HO. OF REPS.

1817, it has cost us the sum of $143,517,094 76; of which $66,331,192 96 has been expended upon the Army alone, and $77,185,904 80 upon fortifications, &c. That portion of this vast expenditure which supplies arms for the soldiers, I approve, and would extend it until all the militia of this country had a good musket in their hands.

By the returns made from the States and Territories, we have one million and a quarter of militia. Drill them, and put arms in their hands, and the combined civilized world cannot conquer us. I am opposed to any distinction in the military force of the country. Your regular Army look down with disdain upon our militia, and often treat them with contempt. This is well calculated to create bad feelings, and destroy the efficiency of our militia. Disband your standing Army; make private citizens of them in times of peace, and expend half or one third of what you annually pay them, to improve and encourage the militia; and when men are wanted to fight, you will have a sufficient number of volunteers to expel any enemy that will ever present itself.

In 1821 our Army was reduced from ten to six thousand; in 1837 increased to eight thousand; and in 1838 to about twelve thousand, and a large increase of pay to some officers. I thought I saw in this most unjustifiable increase a tendency towards a military despotism, that would soon rule this Government. I believe that your Army officers have done more to increase the expenses of this Government than all other classes of our population. I have seen enough at the present session of Congress of the hanging on of military officers, from generals down, around and about this Hall, asking and begging members to support and carry through allowances for themselves that law and justice had rejected. I witnessed it with pain and mortification. It reminded me of the extracts above from the commanding general in Florida, who scarcely ever forgot to put in his letters to the War Office either some dictation to Congress what she should do, or beg the officers there to press Congress to allow double pay or bounty in land to all under a major general. This was beginning so near his own dear self, that it might be supposed he would not complain if he should be also included among those that should have "double pay," "bounty land," &c., and all, too, before they had "scarcely caught a single Indian."

I am admonished, Mr. Chairman, that time is too precious to dwell longer upon this subject. I have discharged a part of what I thought my duty. I will vote for this bill, hoping that some protection may be afforded the suffering people of Florida, who, I do think, have been by the officers of the Army wretchedly slighted. I would prefer putting the means afforded by Government into the hands of the people of Florida, and allow them to use it for their own protection, and disband your regular army that are there, from which we hear but little of late. The last account of them was that they had got down near Deadman's bay. I hope they have not fallen into it. I see the Indians are advancing west upon the settlements, and doing almost daily mischief. I am for calling out a volunteer force sufficient for destroying them, and of quieting the Territory, and securing to the inhabitants peace and security. We are morally and politically bound to do so, and I will go all lengths to effect the object.

MAINE BOUNDARY QUESTION.

SPEECH OF HON. CALEB CUSHING, OF MASSACHUSETTS,IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 3, 1839.

The House having resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. LINCOLN in the chair) on the bill reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs—

Mr. CUSHING obtained the floor, and, after yielding it for some explanations made by Mr. SALTONSTALL, Mr. C. referred to his wish and endeavor the last evening to bring before the House the resolves on this subject just reported in the Legislature of Massachusetts, and proceeded to say that his chief object in rising at the present time was to discuss the precise merits of the question under consideration, and to defend the views of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and then addressed the House, in substance, to the following effect:

Without dwelling (said Mr. C.) on my personal relations to this question, I desire to state here, what indeed is already notorious to everybody, that it is my fixed determination to stand by the State of Maine and the Government of the United States in the positions they have respectively assumed, at whatever hazards to myself. If the pretensions of Great Britain should unhappily force the United States into war, I shall not stop to dispute which of the two, my native land or its foreign enemy, is in the right; but I will be found in the tented field, where death is to be met, or honor won, at the cannon's mouth.

But I do not believe that the calamitous issue of a war between the United States and Great Britain is to follow, now at least, immediately, upon the events which have taken place in Maine. I hope and trust that Sir John Harvey will not dare to attempt the execution of the menace he has uttered, to invade the United States upon the false pretense of the right of Great Britain to the exclusive jurisdiction and possession of the Aroostook. I hope and trust he will pause over the crisis his rashness has brought on; that he will hearken to the counsels of prudence which go to him from the Minister of his Government here; and that he and his arrogant pretensions will be disavowed by that Government, in view of the storm of indignation they have aroused in the United States.

At the same time, I disagree with those who would make light of these events, and who think it neither a grave nor a perilous contingency when the Governor of New Brunswick threatens to march his foreign mercenaries into the State of Maine, and that State is in arms as one man, and clad in all the panoply of war, to repel the invader and defend her soil from desecration. Whether there shall be war or not depends not on us, but others; which renders it the right and the duty of the United States to take such an attitude as will show to the world that, while anxious to avoid war, if it may be with honor, we have no such dread of Great Britain, or any other Power, as to trundle to it for the sake of a peace to be purchased with ignominy. Peace, indeed, thus obtained, would be the worst of disasters to the whole country; since it would be a perpetual invitation to the aggression and insult of foreign States, and would leave to us nothing of independence but the name.

Sir, it is my most anxious desire to shun each of these alternatives, both war and all its calamitous consequences, and peace bought with the degradation of the nation. It has been most unjustly imputed to me that I am unfriendly to Great Britain, because I have, on this question, and on other questions existing between the United States and Great Britain, withstood the unjust claims of the latter, and exposed the tendency to encroach on us, and to aggrandise herself at our expense, which marks her policy in North America. These things, it is true, I have done; but I have done them, not from unfriendliness to Great Britain, but in the discharge of a solemn duty towards my own country. If I perceive the United States the subject of aggression in various quarters, must I conceal it? May I not speak out? Shall it be suffered to go on, year after year, unrebuked? May not an American Representative here, in the Halls of our own Congress, raise his warning voice to the people, that they may interpose betimes, and arrest the progress of injury? Are we to be perpetually engaged in the domestic conflicts of party, and never to look at the foreign relations of the country? Not so. This very question proves how wrong it is to allow such things to fall into neglect. And if I have labored to fix the attention of Congress and the country upon particular acts of Great Britain injurious to the United States, I have not, either in language or in fact, exceeded the zeal which is every day manifested among ourselves, when the interest of one of the States of the Union comes in conflict with that of another, or of the United States.

One thing more in this relation. After the full explanations just made by my colleague, [Mr. SALTONSTALL,] I have not a word to say in regard to the general tenor of his remarks last evening. But there is an observation of his which I must controvert, in order that this debate may transmit to future times a just idea of all the facts involved in it. I cannot concur in the approbation of the character of Sir John Harvey, as gathered from the documents before us. He may be a meritorious and gallant officer, for aught I know to the contrary; and such is the testimony concerning him of distinguished officers of our own Army, who were opposed to him in the campaigns of Upper Canada during the last war with Great Britain. But the conduct of Sir John Harvey in the late events, as apparent in the documents before us, I feel bound in justice to the States of Maine and Massachusetts to say is, in my estimation, anything but honorable to him.

Sir John Harvey stands self-convicted, upon his own showing, in the first place, of gross and culpable neglect of duty in regard to the trespasses upon the disputed territory, which were the immediate cause of the troubles there; and it may well be questioned whether he did not designedly connive at them, either on account of the profit the people of New Brunswick were deriving therefrom, or in order to strip the land, and thus reduce the value of the thing in dispute. Great Britain arrogates to herself the wardenship of the disputed territory. She undertakes to prevent trespasses upon it. Has Sir John Harvey done this? On the contrary, it was the fact of the territory being overrun with depredators which wearied out the patience of Maine, and caused her Government to send a sheriff with his posse to put an end to the strip and waste of the land. Had Sir John Harvey taken any measures to prevent these trespasses? Far from it. In his communication to Governor Fairfield of the 13th of February, the very letter in which he pretends that the territory, the claim to which is in dispute, "shall remain in the exclusive possession and jurisdiction of England until that claim shall be determined," and in which he says that "my instructions do not permit me to suffer any interference with that possession and jurisdiction, until the question of right shall have been finally decided"—in this letter what does he say in regard to the trespasses, which, upon the assumed premises, it was his duty to prevent?

"I have given directions for a boom to be placed across the mouth of the Aroostook, where the seizing officer, protected by a sufficient guard, will be able to prevent the passage of any timber into the St. John in the spring."

Why did he not place a boom there before? Besides, the mouth of the Aroostook is in the Province of New Brunswick. The States of Maine and Massachusetts do not wish to have the timber wasted by depredators. They do not wish to have it sold, and the proceeds held by Great Britain. Sir John Harvey should have taken care that the trespasses were not committed, as he might have done if he had chosen, the supplies of the trespassers being obtained in New Brunswick, as well as the timber carried there for sale; and yet, in another communication to the Governor Fairfield, that of the 18th of February, he says:

"I beg leave to assure you that the extent to which those trespasses appear to have been carried, as brought to my knowledge by recent occurrences, will lead me to adopt, without any delay, the strongest and most effectual measures which may be in my power, for putting a stop to, and preventing the recurrence of such trespasses."

Here is not only a distinct admission of the magnitude of the trespasses, and of the necessity of arresting them, but of his total neglect of the subject, if he had not willfully shut his eyes to what could not possibly escape his notice if he had chosen to look. Does such conduct as this entitle Sir John Harvey to commendation?

But I have a more serious charge to bring against the Governor of New Brunswick. What is the spectacle now before us? We see the State of Maine in martial array. Her militia has been summoned to the field by thousands. She has flung out her banner to the wind. Her young men are marching to the frontier; her old are gathering munitions of war and taking counsel for the public defense; and the whole population of the State, with unanimity unexampled, has risen up en masse for the defense of their rights and their honor. Meanwhile, alarm pervades the country. The Government of the United States has been invoked to the aid of Maine. Congress and the Executive are absorbed in the consideration of the question. Irritations have been aroused between the people of the United States and Great Britain. A flame has been kindled, which, it may be, blood only can quench. War—war between two nations allied in blood and interest; which, if it should break forth, would have many of the features of civil war, may be the lamentable consequence. Whose fault is this? To whom is the immediate blame imputable? To Sir John Harvey, and Sir John Harvey alone. If, as he pretends, the custody of the disputed territory belonged to him, he should have prevented the trespasses; and the omission to do that is the first fault. But he is, above all, to be blamed for the near approach of the country to war, because of the arrogant pretensions and gasconading threats in his communication of the 13th of February. It was the claim on his part to the exclusive possession and jurisdiction of the Aroostook, and his menace to invade the State of Maine in the assertion of that claim, which summoned her people to arms. I cannot follow those who censure the Governor and the Legislature of Maine for undertaking to drive off the trespassers, or for the language and acts of indignation which the subsequent menace of Sir John Harvey occasioned. These were the acts of the whole people of Maine. They are approved in the resolves of the State of Massachusetts produced here last evening. On the other hand, Sir John Harvey's pretensions have been promptly repudiated and denied by the Government of the United States. But, above all, he has been pointedly condemned and disavowed, in advance, by the British Minister, in the Memoranda signed by him and the Secretary of State, in which Sir John Harvey is expressly told to stop, and is implicitly told that he has exceeded his instructions, and will be disavowed by his Government. Under these circumstances, Sir John Harvey, it seems to me, deserves unmitigated censure for the part he has played in the recent transactions.

Now for the merits of the bill before the committee. It has been discussed as a war measure. Such is not my view of it. I regard it as a peace measure. If it contains provisions implying preparations for war, it also contains provisions which make a tender of peace. We hold to Great Britain the olive-branch of peace in one hand, though in the other gleams the thunder-bolt of war. But, in fact, all its provisions are pacific, because they are provisions of mere self-defense in case of attack. There is nothing aggressive in them. We have been threatened with invasion. We have been threatened with invasion, coupled with pretensions the most odious and unbearable which can be addressed to a free people. If Great Britain undertakes to execute these threats, if she actually invades the United States, then, but not otherwise, the President has authority by the bill to array the physical force of the country to resist and repel such invasion.

This is the principle of the bill, as set forth in the first section, which section, instead of enlarging the power already possessed by the President to repel invasion—to do which, he may, by the act of 1795, call into the field any number of men—in fact restricts that power, by specifying the particular assailants against which, and the precise circumstances under which, the said bill is to have effect.

Objections have been made to the second section, because it provides for the enlistment of regular troops in case of invasion before the next Congress can be convened. Whether this kind of force, or volunteers, should be authorized, is a question of economy and expediency, of which it is for the House to judge.

No objection seems to have been made to the section which places the whole naval force of the country in commission; which is, indeed, small enough for the present exigencies of the country.

Nor can the contingent appropriation proposed in the bill be refused, and mere resolutions expressive of the general opinion of the House be adopted as a substitute for the bill, in the manner proposed by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Wise,] without rendering the whole measure futile and of no avail.

But, independently of these questions, a general objection has been taken to the measure by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BIDDLE,] and more especially to the ground assumed by the bill, of resistance to any attempt, on the part of Great Britain, to enforce by arms her claim to the exclusive possession and jurisdiction of the disputed territory in Maine.

This, it is true, is an incidental issue—the claim of Great Britain, or of Sir John Harvey, to the exclusive possession of the disputed territory—and so far differs from the main issue—that of the ultimate right to the territory. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has done full justice to the latter question, and has declared in decisive terms his conviction of the immovable right of the United States, and of the futility of the claim of Great Britain, to the territory in dispute. Such, indeed, is the declared opinion of every other gentleman who has addressed the House on the subject; and if the question of peace or war stood on that main point, there could, I presume, be but one sentiment in Congress and the country as to the duty of the United States to defend, at all risks, the rights of Maine and Massachusetts. But is it safe or wise to take issue on this incidental point of the controverted right of possession ad interim, pending the negotiation as to the ultimate right of sovereignty? That is the question.

In the first place, it is to be remembered that, when there is a controversy of long standing between two nations, the immediate cause of war is very likely to be some subordinate fact, happening in the progress of the controversy. That is one of the evil consequences attending the protracted discussion of conflicting international claims. The parties become embittered on both sides; they are each prone to regard the acts of the other with jealousy and suspicion; their peace depends not so much on the original merits of the diplomatic question between them as on the accidents of daily collision.

And this consideration affords an answer to the suggestions made out of doors—not, I believe, in this debate—of the inconvenience of having the peace of the whole United States subject to be put to hazard by the excess of zeal of any one of the States whose interest is more immediately affected by some pending national controversy. I do not admit that, thus far, the State of Maine has done wrong; or exceeded its constitutional powers, in this matter. And to the practical inconvenience here suggested, my reply is, that it exists in all such cases; and where two nations have a grave question, of long duration, between them, they are always liable to be involved in war by the acts of individuals, or of inferior officers, military or civil, or, as here, of a single State, by reason of incidental difficulties growing up out of the main one, for which the whole country is and must be responsible, though its Government may not have been the immediate party. This inconvenience is not peculiar to the United States, or imputable altogether to the separate action of either of the States.

Secondly, supposing this incidental issue to be less favorable to us than the main one, that is our misfortune, not our fault. Who raised this issue? The United States or the State of Maine? By no means. The State of Maine did that which it had a lawful right to do; it sent a posse to the Aroostook to drive away the trespassers. Thereupon, Sir John Harvey, in the spirit of arrogance common to military Governors of remote colonies, sets up the claim of New Brunswick to the exclusive possession of the territory in dispute, and marches his troops to invade the United States. The State of Maine resists this claim of exclusive possession, the United States resist it. They must do this; they have no alternative left them but resistance to a false claim, or a tame acquiescence in it, which would be disgraceful to the United States, and would but prompt the continued aggression of Great Britain. And if Sir John Harvey proceeds to execute his threat, and to march his troops into Maine, that State would be recreant to herself if she did not muster to the defense of her soil, and the Federal Government would be false to its obvious and imperative constitutional duty, if it did not prepare also to back the State of Maine in the defense of her soil, which is at the same time the soil of the United States.

We do not propose by this bill any act of aggression against Great Britain upon this incidental point. Still less do we undertake, by aggression in regard to this point, to bring on a resort to arms to enforce a settlement of the main point. The bill is a purely defensive measure; and we have no choice in this matter. We must, of necessity, withstand aggression in the thing, and upon the issue presented to us by the aggressor. And if Sir John Harvey presumes to invade the State of Maine in the assertion of this claim, and he is upheld in this by his Government, the fact that it is an incidental question, or that the right in it is less incontrovertibly with us than upon the main question, will, in no sort, weaken the strength of our cause in regard to that which, after all, would be the true ground of hostilities, namely: the unfounded and iniquitous claim on the part of Great Britain to the ultimate sovereignty of one third of the State of Maine, a claim which is denounced and repudiated by us on all hands.

But is this an issue unsafe or unwise to be joined by the United States? I cannot admit that it is.

To begin, the question of possession is one which, from its nature, is peculiarly intelligible to everybody, while that is not the fact as to the question of right. To understand the question of right fully, it needs to examine a vast body of documentary matter, in which the proofs are contained; it needs to read and study the treaties and diplomatic correspondence between the two Governments; it needs to throw off the mass of chicanery and of disingenuous pretensions and of perversion of fact and argument under which the ministers and agents of Great Britain have succeeded in burying the simple merits of the case; it needs to grasp a complex question, and to be master of it in all its parts and its general whole. Not so in regard to the question now presented—whether the United States will repel invasion undertaken by Great Britain while the right is in controversy. That is the familiar case of a trespass committed on my land by a grasping neighbor. Whether he can make out a good title in law, and oust me by the judgment of a competent tribunal, is a thing requiring, perhaps, much discussion, and by wise and learned men, before it can be properly determined. But if, pending the suit, he enters my close, and undertakes to drive me out and hold exclusive possession of it regardless of all the presumptions of right, that is an act of aggression which every one understands at a glance, and which would justify me in repelling force with force. And that is the issue, plain, intelligible, practical, which Sir John Harvey has presented to the State of Maine, and which the Executive has met in the documents before us, and which Congress is called upon to meet in the first section of the bill reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

That Great Britain has no such right of possession, unless conferred upon her by express agreement of the United States, is admitted by every one, because the assumed ground of right is the odious pretension which I had occasion to comment upon a few days since, that, whenever Great Britain chooses to lay claim to any part of the United States, she is thereupon to be taken and intended as being constructively in possession of the parts so claimed, in virtue of her being mother country, and former sovereign of the country; and, as such, to enter upon the exclusive jurisdiction of it until the claim be settled. Such a claim of right, arrogant and unbearable as it is, no citizen of the United States will deign to listen to or entertain for a moment.

Has Great Britain ever, in fact, had the exclusive possession and jurisdiction of the territory in dispute? Never. Whatever rights she may have claimed, whatever acts she may have performed, in the valley of the Aroostook, certain it is that acts have been continually performed by the States of Massachusetts and Maine wholly incompatible with the supposition of the practical exercise of exclusive jurisdiction on the part of Great Britain. It may be that McLaughlin, the British warden, has seized timber there; but neither he, nor anybody else from New Brunswick, has ever, before the late affair, undertaken to seize men who acted for and represented the State of Maine. All such arrests have taken place in the Madawaska country. It may be that McLaughlin has protested on paper against acts of sovereignty performed by the State of Maine, as in the case cited last evening by my colleague, [Mr. SALTONSTALL.] But what does this amount to? Does it make out a case of the practical exercise of exclusive jurisdiction? Far from it. It is only one side of the case. To show a claim to jurisdiction on paper, or even isolated acts of jurisdiction, goes a very little way towards proving in behalf of Great Britain the practical fact of exclusive jurisdiction and possession. To understand the whole case, we must look into the acts of Maine and Massachusetts.

Now, it is truly stated in the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, that, in pursuance of a resolve passed in 1806, Massachusetts, in 1807, granted a township on the Aroostook, near to the meridian line which divides Maine and New Brunswick; and in 1808, ten thousand acres west of the former, after surveys and plans. I refer to these old grants to show that the exercise of sovereignty on our part is no recent thing. This, and what has been done since by one State or the other, is stated generally by Governor Fairfield as follows:

"In reply, I have to say that the territory bordering on the Aroostook river has always been, as I regard the facts, in the possession and under the jurisdiction of Massachusetts and Maine; that, more than thirty years ago, Massachusetts surveyed and granted large tracts of it, which have ever since, in some way, been possessed by the grantees, and those claiming under them; that the rest of it was surveyed by, and some of it divided between, Massachusetts and Maine, soon after the latter became an independent State; that both States have long been in the habit of granting permits to cut timber there without being molested from any quarter; that many persons have purchased these lands of Maine, and entered into their actual occupation; and that, in various other ways, Maine has exercised a jurisdiction, which may fairly be regarded as exclusive, over this territory."

In confirmation of all which, I have before me the last report of the land agent of Massachusetts, giving an account of the construction of a road to the Aroostook at the joint expense of Maine and Massachusetts, and detailing many particulars of the acts performed by him in arresting trespassers on the disputed territory. I have also the report of the land agent of Maine, referring to the same facts, and stating the arrest of sundry trespassers by his order last year, and by regular civil process returnable at Bangor. And the same report contains the following conclusive fact:

"Near the mouth of the Little Madawaska, I met Captain McLaughlin going up the Aroostook, with six men. Captain McLaughlin informed me that he was sent up by the Governor to cut up the timber, and take off the teams of the trespassers, if he could in no other way break them up. I informed him what I had done; he said he was glad, and would most cheerfully cooperate with the land agents of Maine and Massachusetts in stopping the trespassers."

Here we have McLaughlin himself offering no claim to exclusive jurisdiction, making no complaint of the acts of jurisdiction performed by Massachusetts and Maine, but, on the contrary, commending their acts, and pledging himself to cheerfully cooperate with their land agents. I have also before me the report of a recent geological survey of this tract of country, made by the State of Maine; it being a limestone region, of great value for the cultivation of wheat, and on that account attractive to settlers. These documents show, moreover, that Maine was under no obligation to give notice to Sir John Harvey of her late movement for the arrest or expulsion of the trespassers, and committed no breach of courtesy or of right in omitting such notice. And whether or no the facts amount to proof that Maine has had the exclusive jurisdiction and possession on the Aroostook—which is not the question—they do at any rate absolutely exclude the conclusion claimed by Great Britain.

It is impossible, therefore, that the Legislature of Massachusetts, in passing the resolves of 1836, which complain of the surrender of the possession of the disputed territory by the United States Government, as cited by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BIDDLE] and my colleague, [Mr.

SALTONSTALL,] could have meant to say that Great Britain did in fact exercise exclusive possession on the Aroostook. They could not have meant this, because they knew it was not so. They had the acts of each State before them to show the contrary. The particular inducement of the resolves was undoubtedly the acquiescence of the Government of the United States—a culpable acquiescence, I think—in the acts of forcible jurisdiction performed by the authorities of New Brunswick in the Madawaska country; and the particular object of the resolves was to put an end to the separate wardenship of that country, assumed by Great Britain without formal notice to the United States, and not resisted as it should have been when made known incidentally to our Government. It was, indeed, a subject, the diplomatic relations of which were at that time involved in doubt, in consequence of the procrastinations and other errors which our Government had suffered in the management of the negotiation; as I well know, from having had occasion at that period, to address a series of printed letters on the subject to the Governor of Massachusetts, as the means of replacing the facts in the public mind, and recalling them to general attention.

Whatever room for misconception the particular phraseology of those resolves may afford, there can be no doubt now as to the present views either of Massachusetts or Maine. The resolves just reported by a joint committee of the Legislature of Massachusetts are in the following clear and emphatic words:

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS, 1839.

Resolves Concerning the Northeastern Boundary.

Resolved, That the present state of affairs in relation to the northeastern boundary, as communicated to the Executive of this Commonwealth by the Governor of the State of Maine, furnishes a strong reason for again asserting our rights, and for reconfirming the positions heretofore assumed by the Legislature of this State against the unwarrantable claims of Great Britain, and in favor of strong and vigorous measures by the Government of the United States for a speedy adjustment of the existing difficulties in such a manner as shall protect Massachusetts and Maine in the possession of the large tract of territory guaranteed to them by the treaty of peace of 1783.

Resolved, That the active measures authorized by a resolve of the Legislature of the State of Maine, passed January 24, 1839, for the prevention of depredations upon the lands of Massachusetts and Maine, were required by the exigencies of the case, and a wise regard for the preservation of their interests in those lands, and were similar in character to measures adopted by the land agents of Massachusetts and Maine in October last, and recognized and approved, through their agent, by the Government of the province of New Brunswick.

Resolved, That the claim by Great Britain to the exclusive jurisdiction of the whole of the disputed territory, as recently asserted by the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, and his avowal of a determination to sustain that claim by a military force, and his denial of the right of the State of Maine to protect from the lawless depredations of trespassers the lands which have long been in the actual possession of Massachusetts and Maine, call loudly for the immediate interference of the Federal Government; and that the crisis has now arrived when the honor of the nation demands the adoption of decisive measures for the protection of her citizens, and for the preservation of the rights and interests of two of the members of our Confederacy.

Resolved, That this Commonwealth will cooperate with the State of Maine in all constitutional measures for the preservation of the interests of both States in the lands in the disputed territory, and for the speedy adjustment of the existing controversy.

Resolved, That his Excellency the Governor be requested to transmit a copy of these resolutions to the Executives of the United States and of the State of Maine, and to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

These resolves, and especially the second and third, cover the whole ground of the questions raised in this House.

Neither the general right of jurisdiction, nor the practical fact of possession being in Great Britain, it only remains to consider whether she has a temporary right of possession by agreement of the United States. This our Government positively denies. It challenges investigation of all the correspondence between the two Governments as the conclusive means of settling the question.

Instead of putting his hand on the pretended agreement—which he could readily do if it existed—Mr. Fox contents himself with protesting against the denial of it which Mr. Forsyth had made, and refers the point to his Government. Nay, further, he proceeds to negotiate a sort of informal convention with Mr. Forsyth for stopping the threatened movement of Sir John Harvey. Certain it is that no such agreement exists.

Whether the proposals made on the one side and accepted on the other, or the acts or omissions of our Government, were such as to justify misconstruction on the part of Great Britain; and what is the true construction of those proposals, acts, and omissions, is a question which I will not presume to enter upon, after it has been so fully discussed by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. EVANS,] observing, only, that Great Britain might as well misunderstand or fall into delusions concerning any clause of treaty between us, as this agreement: that we are not to suffer for the errors she may commit in this way; and that the attempt on the part of Great Britain, to enlarge the actual agreement beyond the obvious import of the words, or to set up, instead of it, another agreement which was never made, only tends, it seems to me, to aggravate the injury of her whole conduct in this matter, and to give to the United States additional cause of complaint.

For there is not, never was, and cannot be, any reasonable doubt as to the respective rights of the parties, nor more especially as to this particular part. What right has the Province of New Brunswick to interfere in this matter at all? I have before me a copy I procured some time since of a map, entitled "Map of the British Possessions in North America, compiled from Documents in the Colonial Department," and on the bottom of it purporting that it was "ordered by the House of Commons to be printed, 29th June, 1827." It is contained in a volume of the Parliamentary papers for that year. On it is the meridian line which divides Maine from New Brunswick, running due north, from the source of the St. Croix, thence to the St. John, crossing the St. John, and proceeding north to the head of the Ristigouche. This line leaves the whole of the disputed territory west of New Brunswick, and out of the limits of that Province. It even carries the northwest angle of Nova Scotia to the north of the St. John, as we say it should go, and nearly to the point to which we claim. Such is the representation which the Colonial Department itself gives of the boundaries of New Brunswick; which is confirmed by the curious fact that the commission granted to the Earl of Durham as Governor General of New Brunswick, in 1838, which I find in the public papers, describes that province in correspondence with the map referred to, and, indeed, just as we have always contended it should be described. Now, I demand what right the authorities of New Brunswick have to cross the meridian line, which every book, map, and commission, which I have ever seen, like these now before me, lays down as the western limit of that province? There is but one answer to be given to this question. Great Britain has been dishonest in the matter. She prefers a claim to a part of the State of Maine, to which she knows in her own conscience she has not a shadow of rightful pretension. This claim is contradicted by so many of her own acts, that the advocacy of it involves her in a labyrinth of deceit and falsehood. She cannot print a map touching the disputed territory, she cannot issue a commission, even at this day, which shall not give the lie direct to this groundless and unjust claim—a claim as dishonorable to her as it is insulting to the United States.

There is but one other topic involved in this measure upon which I desire to be heard at this time. The Committee on Foreign Affairs have proposed an appropriation for a special embassy to England. They have done this to manifest the indisposition of the United States to go to war, if it may be honorably availed, and the willingness of Congress, provided Sir John Harvey shall abstain from any aggressive acts in the mean time, to try once more the effects of negotiation, before drawing the sword in defense of the rights of Maine. But I desire to say that, in assenting to this feature of the bill, I did not, and do not mean to be understood as holding out any encouragement to Great Britain that this controversy is to be kept open by renewal of the evasive and fruitless negotiations of the last ten years. No more delays—no more procrastinations—no more of the diplomatic chicanery by which Great Britain has so long sought to obtain from the United States by maneuver what is not hers by any just right, and what she cannot extort by force. When the question was first started by her, it was in the shape of an offer to buy of us this territory. Thus it stood at Ghent. She did not pretend, at that time, that it belonged to her under the treaty of Paris. Next we heard of it as a thing of doubt and question merely, to be made the subject of negotiation and investigation. Then it was magnified into a positive claim of ultimate sovereignty, and a claim of immediate possession by revival of mother-country jurisdiction. Next it becomes an assertion of actual possession. Finally, through one stage of encroachment after another, that which in the outset was merely an expression of the wish of Great Britain to purchase this territory, because it was convenient and desirable to her, has swollen into an attempt to enforce by arms a pretended right of sovereignty and ownership, coupled with exclusive possession and jurisdiction in anticipation of the settlement of the question of title.

Maine Boundary Question—Mr. Saltonstall.

It is time to put a stop at once and forever to this career of encroachments. I would have the President, if, in the exercise of his executive discretion, he sees fit to send a special minister to Great Britain, to send a minister who will speak to that country in the language of decision and firmness becoming the present attitude of the United States. I would have that minister say to Lord Palmerston, in such phrases of diplomatic courtesy as he may choose to employ, but so there shall be no mistake as to the meaning: "Sir, this thing has gone on long enough. Great Britain does not possess one jot of title or right to the territory in Maine she claims. Such is the opinion of the President; such is the unanimous opinion of both Houses of Congress; such is the opinion of the whole people of the United States. This claim, set up on the part of Great Britain in the spirit of encroachment which distinguishes her acts on this continent, and pursued by contrivances and pretexts which are so signally dishonest that they would consign a private individual to disgrace, must be relinquished. The affair has reached a crisis irreconcilable with the continuance of your pretensions, and the continuance of amicable relations. The United States are devoted to peace, and deprecate the calamities of war, and especially a war between them and a people allied to them by blood, and by all the ties of a close and beneficial intercourse; but they cannot and will not submit to have Great Britain presume that she may seize, at will, upon the territory of the Union. Be not self-deceived. This is the true state of the question between us, and on you who raised and have persisted in it—on you, in the face of God and of man, does the responsibility for the issues of it rest."

Sir, I shall detain the House no longer; and, in conclusion, I have only to add that, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I cordially approve of the able report of the chairman in all its parts, and shall continue to give all the support in my power to the provisions of public defense here presented to Congress, and the measures which it may devolve on the Executive to adopt in vindication of the rights of the United States.

SPEECH OF HON. L. SALTONSTALL, OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 2, 1839,

On the subject of the Northeastern Boundary.

Mr. SALTONSTALL said he rose under unfavorable circumstances, on account of the time at which the important subject was brought forward, and the symptoms of impatience which had been shown. He should not have attempted to address the committee, but that no one from Massachusetts had taken part in the debate. I shall (said Mr. S.) present my own views, from the best consideration I have been able to give the subject, on my own responsibility. There has been no consultation among the Representatives of that State.

It is not necessary for me to remark the deep stake Massachusetts has in this subject, not only as a member of this Union, but her separate interest as joint owner of the whole disputed territory—a territory which embraces ten thousand square miles, and six million acres of land. I shall differ from my friend who has just set down, [Mr. MENEFEE.] There is no honorable member who would not go with that gentleman to the utmost extent, if it was a clear case that national honor required resort to national arms. Who would dare to raise his voice, in such a case, against immediate recourse to arms? Who would not risk his person, his all, in such a cause? But is this such a case? Has the crisis arrived? That is the question. Whether Congress ought now to take a course which is all, or may be considered to be all, but an actual declaration of war?

The importance of this question can hardly be overstated. When has one so important arisen? It comes forward at the last moment of the session. It requires days and nights of anxious thought; yet we are called upon to act at once. The main question between the two nations all here understand, it was placed in such a clear light by the report in the Senate last year. The controversy is of long standing. For a long time it excited but little attention. When the treaty of peace was made, that whole territory was a wilderness; the population of the District of Maine was only a few thousands; there were only a few scattered settlements along the shore east of the Kennebec. But it has gradually become a question of magnitude and importance to both parties: to Great Britain, as securing a connection between her Provinces; and to us, as embracing a large extent of territory eligible for settlement. Our claim, under the treaty of 1783, has shared the fate of other deferred claims; it had become obscured, but it is now understood. It is easily understood. I believe it to be perfectly well founded. It is not more complicated than many land causes, and, in my judgment, from what examination I have been able to make, no jury of intelligent, disinterested men could hesitate upon it. I mean our claim under the treaty of 1783. I go heartily, therefore, for that part of the bill which provides for sending a special Minister to England. Its success, however, will depend much upon the character of the Minister. This question should not be affected by any considerations of party; it should be elevated far above them. Such a man as might and ought to be selected might present our rights in a manner which would be irresistible. I believe the Government of Great Britain could not meet and answer the argument such a Minister might prepare in the quickest passage ever made across the Atlantic. Still, it is to be considered and treated as a serious question between two nations.

The great, the main question is, what is the true boundary line under the treaty of peace? The question was originally one of construction merely, depending on the terms of the treaty. It has been delayed, until a question, exceedingly simple at first, has become a long-standing national controversy.

At the last session of Congress, application was made for an immediate survey of the boundary line. A distinguished citizen of Maine was here for the purpose of pressing the importance of an immediate settlement of this question, which was becoming one of exciting interest in that State. A bill was introduced to provide for surveying the Northeastern boundary line of the United States, according to the provisions of the treaty of peace of 1783. That bill was committed in the Senate, and the able report was made to which I have referred, with resolutions expressing an opinion, without a doubt, in favor of the justice and validity of the title of the United States to the full extent of all the territory in dispute; that it was practicable to run the line according to the treaty, and "an earnest desire that the pending negotiation should be brought to a close, and the final decision of the dispute made as soon as practicable." The report stated that the important preliminaries of a convention between the two Governments, for the purpose of exploring and surveying the disputed lines of the treaty, had been adjusted, and expressed a confident hope that the pending negotiation might be productive of the most happy results, and that the bill, therefore, "ought not to pass."

The Government of Maine was determined to show that she was in earnest. The attention of Congress was brought to the subject; it was fully examined, and made the subject of a legislative report for the first time.

This controversy was therefore left, as it was before, the subject of negotiation; and it appears, from the executive report on the subject of our territorial relations with Great Britain, that, as a national question, (and it is one,) it remains unchanged. Nothing has been done by the General Government, but Maine has appointed commissioners to explore the territory. The Legislature had passed a resolve providing that if the bill then pending before Congress should fail, and no decisive movement was made by the General Government, either alone or in conjunction with Great Britain, the time would then have arrived for Maine to assume an independent attitude, and to commence the work of ascertaining, running, and locating the northeastern boundary line; and, in that event, it was made the imperative duty of the Governor to appoint forthwith the commissioners for that purpose, and "cause the same to be carried into operation." Three commissioners were accordingly appointed, with instructions to explore a particular part of the disputed territory. A communication was made by the Governor of Maine to the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, containing the substance of the instructions. The answer of Sir John Harvey, (Governor Kent states in a message in January last,) although couched in courteous language, according with the well-known high and honorable character of that officer, will yet doubtless command your attention and deliberate consideration, as expressing, in frank and decided language, the character and extent of his instructions relative to maintaining the jurisdiction of the disputed territory.

The commissioners went on and explored the country, and made their report. This was the first act on the part of Maine after the proceedings in Congress.

What was next done? An armed body of men was sent into a part of the disputed territory to seize trespassers, and this has been followed by the proceedings between the Governments of Maine and New Brunswick which have produced the present crisis.

The Governor of New Brunswick sets up the claim to exclusive possession and jurisdiction of the disputed territory, according to his instructions, and, as he states, under an agreement between the United States and Great Britain. On the part of our Government it is denied that there ever was such an agreement. The President has so stated in his message. I believe there has never been such an agreement explicitly made. But is it clear that it may not be supposed by the Government of Great Britain that there was such an understanding? I will not say that Great Britain had a right to suppose so; but have not the course this subject has taken and the conduct of our Government been such as might lead to such a supposition?

This claim is not now set up for the first time. It is a claim of some years' standing. It has been made known to our Government, officially, from time to time; and how has it been treated? Has it at all times been denied—been instantly repelled?

Let me call the attention of the committee to some documentary evidence upon this subject. I first refer to Massachusetts documents of 1833, parts of which were referred to by one of my colleagues, [Mr. LINCOLN,] whose official duty as Chief Magistrate of Massachusetts caused him to examine this whole subject for many years.

In October, 1833, the Secretary of State, Mr. McLane, transmitted to him, by direction of the President, a copy of a note from the British Minister, accompanied by a letter from the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick to him, and, also, of a letter from Lieutenant J. A. Maglauchlen to the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, "complaining of the conduct of certain land agents of the States of Maine and Massachusetts in the territory in dispute between the United States and Great Britain," and he adds:

"I am instructed to state that it would be a source of regret to the President should this complaint prove to be well founded; and in causing it to be communicated to your Excellency, it is his earnest wish that the necessary steps may be promptly taken by the proper authorities of Massachusetts to enforce a due obedience to the terms of the existing arrangement between the Government of the United States and that of Great Britain in regard to the disputed territory."

The subject of complaint was, that our land agents had permitted persons to cut timber, and that they had entered into contracts for opening two roads, which would intersect the Restook river. I do not contend that there is anything, so far, to show what was the existing arrangement, or that it was understood by our Executive to be as extensive as that now set up. But let us proceed.

The next communication, a copy of which was inclosed, is one from Mr. Maglauchlen to Sir A. Campbell, Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, stating the grievances of which he complained:

Restook, September 28, 1833.

SIR: I feel it my duty, as the officer in charge of the territory in dispute between the Government of his Majesty and that of the United States of America, to bring under the early consideration of your Excellency a subject which I am fearful may shortly lead to a misunderstanding between the two countries.

Since I had the honor of the appointment of warden of the territory, I have endeavored as much as possible to prevent trespasses from being made by the cutting of pine timber, &c., and which, I am happy to say, has been generally effected, as it is well known that there are now large quantities still standing adjacent to the line from Mars Hill to the Great Falls, which would otherwise have been removed. And the only timber of any consequence that has been manufactured, was on the Restook river, by persons settled there, without any intention of making a business of it, but each getting small quantities (and in many instances of land they held in possession) for the maintenance of their families, which were actually in want, owing to the crops of the last year being destroyed by early frosts.

The subject to which I must now beg the honor to call the attention of your Excellency is that of an infringement of the understanding between the Governments of Great Britain and the United States, during the settlement of the question of boundary by the land agents of the States of Massachusetts and Maine, who are not only holding out inducements to the subjects of both countries to cut pine timber on the territory in my charge, by paying them a duty of two shillings and sixpence a ton, but have entered into contracts for opening two roads to intersect, one fifty miles from its confluence with the St. Johns, and the other thirty miles, both of which are either to be completed this fall or early in the next season.

It is unnecessary, and probably might be considered improper on my part, to animadvert on the conduct of those agents, but your Excellency must be well aware of the trouble it occasions in the performance of my duty; and certainly there does appear something exceedingly inconsistent, that the land agents of these States should attempt to counteract the wishes, nay, I may almost say, the instructions of both Governments to an officer who has been appointed to prevent collision between them.

I have the honor to be, &c., &c.,

T. A. MAGLAUCHLEN,
Warden of the Disputed Territory.

His Excellency Major General Sir A. CAMPBELL.

This letter was communicated by Sir Archibald Campbell to the British Minister, and by him to our Government. Is there nothing here to show that the Governor of New Brunswick considered the UNDERSTANDING as extending over the WHOLE territory? Here we have the title "Warden of the Disputed Territory," and his claim of jurisdiction over the whole, with the assertion that the land agents of Massachusetts and Maine had counteracted the wishes, nay, he might almost say, the instructions of both Governments to an officer who was appointed to prevent collision between them. But this is not all. This subject received the prompt attention of the Governor of Massachusetts, who acknowledged the receipt November 1, 1833, accompanied by a distinct protest against this claim of exclusive jurisdiction:

"I cannot but earnestly protest against the authority of any appointment on the behalf of his Majesty's Government, which may be regarded as a claim to the exclusive protection of this property, or be deemed an acquiescence on the part of the United States in interference, under color of a 'Wardenship of the Disputed Territory,' with that direction to its improvement which the governments of Massachusetts and Maine respectively may see fit to give their agents."

Can it be pretended that this claim was not then brought directly to the notice of our Government, and that it was asserted to be by an arrangement between the two nations? The Governor of Massachusetts had no difficulty in understanding the extent of the claim, and his protest distinctly informed the Secretary of State that he did so understand it.

The land agent of Massachusetts was immediately called on for information by the Governor, who says:

"I have already written to Mr. McLane, protesting against the right of his Majesty's provincial officers to interfere with any directions which the government of the States of Maine and Massachusetts may think proper to give to their agents in the management of their property in the territory over which the British Government has recently extended her extraordinary and unfounded claim; but at the same time expressing a willingness to respect the wishes of the General Government in abstaining from any facts of exclusive occupancy during the pendency of measures to bring the subject of controversy to an amicable issue."

In that officer's reply to the Governor, November 8, 1833, he states:

"As to the charge of holding out inducements to the subjects of both countries to cut pine timber on the territory in dispute, so far as concerns my agency, it is entirely groundless. I have received repeated applications for permits to cut timber, and I have invariably answered that I would not grant any until the dispute should be settled, and if any timber was cut I should order it seized. Winter before the last, I caused some timber to be seized upon the Aroostook river, and a short time after, the same timber was seized by the British—I think by the same person that prefers this complaint, or pursuant to his orders. The timber was afterwards sold, and the amount, whatever it may have been, went into the hands of the officers of the colony of New Brunswick. It is apparent, therefore, that our interest is to prevent timber being cut, rather than to induce the cutting."

This letter was transmitted to the Secretary of State November 15.

Another complaint was made by the "warden" to the Lieutenant Governor November 22, 1833, who transmitted it, through the British Minister, to our Government. The subject was the opening of a road to the Aroostook river. Sir A. Campbell writes:

"Your Excellency is aware that the territory thus virtually awarded, though often claimed as American, has never ceased to be under the recognized jurisdiction of Great Britain, and the provincial Government would be scarcely justified in continuing to look tamely on at this systematic and unprovoked violation of our rights."

This was communicated by Mr. Vaughan to our Government.

All this took place in 1833. Was not this claim of exclusive jurisdiction brought to the notice of our Government? And did they instantly repel it? Is there any evidence of this until long afterwards?

Are gentlemen ready to rush into war at once on account of this claim, as a false and groundless pretense? In the present state of this question, with the obscurity there is about it, instead of doing or encouraging any act which may tend to bring on war between these two great nations, with all its tremendous evils, should we not anxiously desire to give time for explanation?

The resolutions of the Legislature of Massachusetts of March, 1836, forwarded to the National Executive (Doc. 199, Twenty-Fourth Congress, first session) leave no doubt as to the understanding of that Legislature on this point. They are as follows:

Whereas a large tract of the northeastern territory of the United States, belonging in common to the States of Maine and Massachusetts, and lying within the limits of the former State, has, for many years past, in consequence of a claim of Great Britain, been surrendered to the exclusive custody of the British Government; and whereas it appears, from the report of a committee appointed by the last Legislature of this Commonwealth, to make personal examination into the state of our public lands, that great inconveniences and gross abuses have resulted from so valuable a portion of our domain being left in the keeping of agents over whom we have no control: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives in General Court assembled, That, in the opinion of this Legislature, it is due to the rights and interests of Maine and Massachusetts that measures should be taken by the Executive of the United States to secure a speedy settlement of this long-protracted controversy, so that these States may be reinstated in the enjoyment of that property which was so long in their undisputed possession, and which is so indisputably theirs.

Resolved, That, in case there be a prospect of further unavoidable delay in the settlement of this controversy, it is essential to the ends of justice that measures should be taken by the Executive of the United States to obtain a representation of the interests and rights of Maine and Massachusetts in the agency and guardianship of the territory in question."

Comment on these resolves is unnecessary. They have been ably considered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BIDDLE.] This claim, and the surrender of the disputed territory to the exclusive custody of the British Government, is the very grievance complained of. That is the ground of the resolutions. It is stated to be the very object for which the speedy settlement of the "protracted controversy is demanded," "so that these States may be reinstated in the enjoyment of that property which was so long in their undisputed possession." And it was resolved that it was essential "to obtain a representation, &c., in the agency and guardianship of the territory in question. To what does that refer? Clearly to the whole "disputed territory."

Mr. S. then referred to the message of Governor Kent, in January last, and to a letter of his to the President of the United States, in April, 1838, in which he says:

"Maine feels that the time for decisive action has come; that she cannot be satisfied to have the claim to absolute and exclusive jurisdiction of a large part of her territory longer tolerated and acquiesced in."

He also referred to the protest of the "warden," after notice was given that the commissioners were going on to explore, &c., against "any act implying sovereignty or jurisdiction on the part of any Government or State, or of the citizens or subjects of any Government or State, exercised within the territory in dispute, and known by the name of the disputed territory, until the right to that territory shall have been decided by negotiation between the two Governments."

Do not these documents show that five or six years ago, at least, the Government of New Brunswick claimed the absolute and exclusive jurisdiction of the whole territory, and that a "warden" was appointed under the authority of the British Government, with supervisory power over the whole—not the Madawaska settlement merely, but the whole—and that this was made known to our Government?

Let me not be misunderstood. My object is not to bring reproach on a past Administration, or any of its officers. No; let this debate be free from all party taint; but a subject of this vast importance ought to be fully examined and considered.

At the time of the late movement there had been no recent change of circumstances. Nothing had been done by the United States or by Great Britain since the close of the last session of Congress. The late movement on the part of Maine has produced the present crisis. It is deeply to be regretted; and I must fearlessly say that, in my judgment, it was indiscreet—unfortunate, to say the least of it. Might not the consequences have been foreseen? Would not a different course have effected the object, without risking such consequences?

Sir John Harvey has the reputation of being an honorable, as well as a gallant officer: might there not safely have been a communication with him, or with our Government, as to the trespasses? Both parties are to be considered as jointly interested in the territory in dispute. The course taken proceeded, I have no doubt, from a deep sense of injury. Their interests had been neglected; they have made complaints, and have given intimations of the course they should feel compelled to pursue. It is still possible, I trust, that the course taken will not lead to the consequences some apprehend; it may lead to a settlement of the boundary question. Should that be the case, it will be fortunate.

The first step was a secret session of the Legislature, and the passage of the resolve which led to the expedition. Any one knowing the state of feeling on this subject, on both sides of the line, might well apprehend what would follow. The people of Maine have great spirit and courage; they will do what they say—I know them well; therefore, I look at the present state of things with the greatest concern. There was a secret session—then a posse. Who ever heard of such a posse before? It had the appearance of a military expedition. They still remain at the Aroostook, where they are intrenching themselves—for what? To disperse trespassers?

This course may embarrass the boundary question, by bringing forward, prominently, a new and collateral one, as stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Maine Boundary Question—Mr. Evans.

A great and new question is now presented, whether an indiscreet step of a State shall involve this nation in a great and tremendous war? War between these two nations will be no child's play; all say, that once begun, it will be long—that it may be of ten years' duration; ten years of strife, of suffering, and of bloodshed.

What, then, should this Government do? We should do nothing which may have a tendency to excite unnecessary irritation, nothing which may unnecessarily tend to produce war. I have no fears of being reproached with want of spirit and courage. Great Britain knows well with whom she is to contend; that we are of her own blood, her own race, who have not degenerated, but who have taken a new start in the fresh soil of this new world. Her own experience, also, has taught her that it is not from fear that we are inclined to a pacific course. No; it is from other, from higher considerations; from our abhorrence of war between these two kindred nations, as a great and terrible calamity. And at this time, when we have been hoping that the facilities of intercourse between nations, and the improvements of our day, had produced more enlightened views and better feelings on the subject of war, we had flattered ourselves that there had been great change, a great advance in true civilization, and that the history of the next two hundred years would not be written in blood, like that of the preceding. Who would resort to war, except literally as the last resort—war between two great nations, bound together by the strongest mutual interest, as well as by the indissoluble ties of common ancestry, language, literature, and religion?

Some things in this debate have surprised me. No one, I trust, desires war: why, then, connect this with other subjects? Why connect it with the dispute at the mouth of the Columbia river, or any other difficulties? And what reason is there to suppose that Great Britain has sent armies into Canada or the West Indies, or fleets to the Gulf of Mexico, for the purpose of military warfare against the United States? May it not have been thought wise to guard against the possible effects of abolition in the West Indies? And are not their sixteen thousand or twenty-five thousand troops in Canada necessary to keep those colonies from disturbance? And has England discovered no confidence in this Government? Her whole Canadian frontier has been in a state of alarm on account of incursions from our territory; and yet it has not disturbed the friendly relations of the two nations.

Think of the connection between these two nations, our constant intercourse, our mutual commerce, more than between any other nations on the globe, our competition in the arts, commerce, and manufactures. Is it surprising that there should arise occasional causes of difficulty and irritation? Will they not happen among the most honorable men in the transactions of business?

But, Mr. Chairman, the question now is, what shall be done in the present emergency? Shall we leave Maine alone in this contest? No; she must be protected. Is it expedient to pass this bill? I believe the provisions of the act of 1795 are sufficient for the occasion. That authorizes the President to call out such part of the militia as he may deem necessary to resist invasion, or in case of imminent danger of invasion. I know this imposes the whole responsibility upon the President. I am willing, therefore, to go further—to go for the first section of the bill, or for a resolution to the same effect. I hold that Maine is to be protected. Why? Because there has not been such an explicit arrangement or understanding as is asserted. There is some misunderstanding of the matter; and I believe it will be found either that Sir John Harvey has mistaken his instructions, or that they were founded in misapprehension, and that the British Government will be satisfied that there was no such agreement, express or to be implied from the diplomatic intercourse between the two Governments.

MAINE BOUNDARY QUESTION.

REMARKS OF HON. GEO. EVANS,
OF MAINE,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 1, 1839,

On the bill giving the President additional power for the defense of the United States, &c.

Mr. EVANS said he rose to make a brief reply to the honorable member from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BIDDLE,] who had taken very decided ground against the bill and against the whole policy on which it is founded. Perhaps (said Mr. E.) I shall not be able to follow very closely the order of his argument, and very likely many things which he has uttered may escape my recollection altogether; as, not intending to participate further in the discussion upon the subject of our border troubles on the northeastern frontier, I took no note of the honorable gentleman's course of remark. I had hoped that, after the exposition which I offered a day or two since of the state of affairs on that frontier, the rights and the honor of Maine might be safely committed to the hands of those who might be supposed to be somewhat calmer in their feelings than the Representatives from that State could be when they were in hourly expectation of intelligence that its territory had been invaded by a foreign enemy and the blood of its citizens poured out upon its soil. The direct allusions, however, which have so frequently been made to me by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and to the measures recently adopted by the State I represent, leave me no alternative but again to trust myself to the indulgence of the House in defense of the measures proposed by this bill. I hope not to weary its patience long.

The first objection stated by the honorable member to the general scope of the bill is, that it is a hostile measure—a measure of war; and, indeed, he regards it almost equivalent to a declaration of war. Accordingly, he presents in fervid colors to our excited imaginations the pictures of catastrophes and calamities necessarily incident to such a state. The confagrated villages—fields furrowed by the heavy cars of artillery, and wet with blood; and the desolations which war every where spreads around, are arrayed before us in all the force and eloquence for which the honorable member is so distinguished. Now, sir, it is precisely because I wish, most earnestly, to avoid these calamities and desolations—because I desire, of all things which my heart can compass, to preserve the peace and happiness of the country, that I desire this bill to pass. It is a measure of peace. It will preserve peace. It will prevent, if it come not too late, collisions that must inevitably lead to war. Let me assure the honorable gentleman and the House, that, if the sentiments he expresses be carried out, there will be actual war long before we are prepared for it, and which I see no honorable mode of averting. What are those sentiments? What does he propose? What will he do? Nothing! Nothing, whatever. And this he calls peace! Is he aware of the present condition of affairs in Maine and on the frontier? If so, what course does he recommend to be pursued? He offers no amendment. He points out no method of averting the perils in which we are involved. He suggests no step to be taken; and this is peace! It may be peace, but what sort of peace? Sir does the honorable gentleman seriously consider the condition of things—the State of Maine in arms—with its panoply on—the panoply of right and justice, and solemnly pledged to themselves, to their country, and to the world, not to lay down their arms in the face of any human enemy, until the occasion which summoned them to the field is removed? Such is the position which Maine has assumed. It is a position she will maintain at all hazards. She will redeem all her pledges. The occasion which has compelled her to assume this position is an expected and threatened invasion of her territory on the part of a high-minded and gallant officer of the British Government, acting, as he avows, in obedience to explicit instructions from that Government, for the purpose of arresting and suppressing the exercise of civil authority by the State in the territory which Congress unanimously has affirmed to belong to her.

Maine is prepared to meet that invasion, come when it may, as becomes her character, and in fulfillment of her pledges; and Sir John Harvey is doubtless prepared and preparing to attempt it as becomes a soldier, and a distinguished one, of a brave nation; and in such a state of things the honorable member from Pennsylvania advises us to do nothing, from the apprehension that it may lead to war. He would say to Great Britain, "We offer no protection to Maine; she has taken her ground, let her defend it." Will such language as that lead to peace? Sir, if the General Government had come long ago, when it ought to have come, to the protection of the violated rights of Maine; if it had acted with promptness and energy, and a becoming sense of what was due to itself and to that State, does anybody suppose that these lofty and constantly augmenting pretensions on the part of the British Government would have been made and persevered in? I am as desirous of peace as any man can possibly be. My State is so. She has every reason to desire it. With more than three hundred miles of maritime frontier, indented with capacious harbors and rivers, and studded with thriving villages, which must be laid in ashes by the torch of war; with three or four hundred miles of inland frontier, accessible in almost every point from the neighboring provinces; with scarcely a man or a gun to defend themselves, which you have furnished, what has Maine to gain by war? Nothing, sir, nothing. She knows it, and she desires peace; and she knows that the way to preserve peace is to assert your rights, and to cause them to be respected, as they always will be respected, by a proud and gallant nation, if asserted in a spirit becoming a nation no less proud and gallant. If language suitable to the occasion had been held at the commencement of these aggressions, and had been persevered in, who can doubt that the whole matter would long ago have been amicably settled? And, now that we have been driven back—back—back, until we can yield no longer, are we to be told that the way to preserve the peace of the country is to do nothing? Such, sir, is not the voice of this nation, if it have any remains of the spirit which once animated the bosoms of our fathers. No error can be more fatal.

The honorable gentleman, sir, referred to some of the incidents in the late conflict with Great Britain, to demonstrate the hazards of a state of hostility with that nation. He spoke of a portion of the State of Maine having been in the possession of the enemy, and more than intimated that it had not been defended with the bravery becoming a people now so ready to appeal again to the sword in vindication of their rights, and that what had once happened might again occur in the chances of war. Certainly it may, sir. But if, at the period to which the honorable member refers, he had been a citizen of that exposed country, instead of being safely lodged behind the mountains; if he had seen it left wholly undefended by the General Government, without a man or a gun or a dollar furnished for its protection, but, on the contrary, with thousands of its men drawn off to fight your battles elsewhere, on the land and on the ocean, leaving their own firesides unprotected, without a State government even of its own to call out and direct its energies, he would hardly have thought it worth while, at this distance of time, to search in the volume of history from which he read for the fact that some small portions of the territory of that State, very sparsely settled and wholly without defense, were compelled to yield to the naval supremacy of Great Britain; and, least of all, would he have deemed it just to remind us of it as a matter of reproach. Was Maine the only State whose soil felt the tread of a hostile foot in that conflict? Were her small, defenseless villages the only ones which capitulated? or did the British arms show themselves elsewhere, leaving behind them proofs sad to remember—no less of their prowess than of less honorable modes of warfare? Such scenes may happen there again in the course of human events, or may happen elsewhere; and, for one, I do not desire to keep them out of the reach of our calculations. If they must come, let them come; but I desire to avert them; and, as the best means of doing so, I desire to pass this bill, or some other equally strong—equally prompt. Let our Government say to Great Britain: "this is our affair, and not the affair of Maine alone; we will take it in hand; we will settle it;" and, in my judgment, the whole controversy ceases. I urged this argument last year. If anybody does me the honor to remember or to refer to what I then said, he will perceive the great stress I then laid upon a movement, some movement, of the General Government upon the question of boundary. I then urged, with what zeal I could, that the peace of the country depended upon decided, efficient effort on the part of the General Government. I say so now; and every day confirms the truth of the argument. So much, sir, I have felt it necessary to say in proof of the pacific character of the bill now under consideration. Nothing can be clearer to my mind than that peace will be subserved by it.

But, sir, the gentleman says that we are not only to be right, but that we should always have it in our power to show to the country, and to the world, that we are right; so that, in the event of future hostilities, the responsibility shall not attach to us of disturbing the peace of the nations. Certainly, I admit that. He then proceeds to show, from the correspondence between the two Governments, pending the negotiation, that there is, to say the least of it, a very plausible pretext for the claim advanced by Great Britain, of exclusive jurisdiction over the disputed territory. He has done me the honor to read very largely from a speech made by myself, last session, in support of the same idea; and I freely admit, sir, that as the case then stood, there was much, too much foundation for the argument which he now urges. The documents did show, unfortunately, that there had been not a plain, specific agreement on our side, but an acquiescence in the claim of the British Government—a yielding to their repeated assertions, upon the ground of some previous informal understanding to that effect. I certainly then thought that this claim had been too often and too strongly asserted without being met by a stern and decisive rebuke from our Government. I endeavored to set forth the consequences of yielding tacitly to its avowal; and I urged upon the General Government to repudiate and to deny it. Denial had not then been given. But how stands the case now? We have the solemn assurance of the President, and of Mr. Forsyth, that no such informal arrangement or agreement has been made. Great Britain has been distinctly advised of the misconceptions under which she labored before. We have obtained, what it was my purpose last year to obtain, an assurance that our territory had not been given up, by agreement, to the exclusive jurisdiction of Great Britain.

Now, sir, I take the word of our own Government to be true in this respect. I stand by it. I hold them to it, now and hereafter; and however, up to this hour, the documents may have furnished plausible grounds for belief in the existence of such an arrangement as is suggested, they furnish it no longer. Why, then, can we not vindicate ourselves to the country and to the world, if we say to Great Britain she shall not, under pretense of an agreement which we deny to exist, attempt to possess herself of the entire control of the territory in dispute? If we are likely to be put in the wrong at all, it has already been done. The wrong consists in violating a subsisting agreement; and the President has already most emphatically declared that no such agreement has subsisted. The question is one, if I may so speak, of veracity between the Governments. Our own asserts most distinctly that it has never entered into such arrangements as are set up by Great Britain as the foundation of Sir John Harvey's proceedings; and I am content with the assertion as I receive it. I am not for going back to see how the case stood before this plain disavowal, and while a contrary assumption on the other side was permitted to remain unrebuked. The proofs, therefore, upon which I relied last year are all done away with, in the only way they could satisfactorily be met, by the distinct declaration of our own Government. The British Minister, when called upon for evidence of the agreement which he had alleged to exist, fails to produce it; but, on the other hand, in the memorandum or protocol which he has entered into with Mr. Forsyth, admits that it is a matter upon which the two Governments have not understood each other. If that be so, and if Great Britain be now distinctly informed that her claim of exclusive jurisdiction is inadmissible upon the pretense of a former agreement to that effect, and she still persists in enforcing it by arms, upon whose head will rest the responsibility of disturbing the peace of the world? Surely, not upon ours. We can yield to no such invasion without dishonor and disgrace. We must repel it, or we shall stand condemned, in the face of all nations, of miserable pusillanimity.

But, sir, there is much in the documents referred to by the gentleman, and which I cited last year, to fortify the position now taken by our Government. On the 8th August, 1837, Mr. Stevenson held this language to Lord Palmerston upon this very question of exclusive jurisdiction:

"The undersigned, moreover, does not presume that, pending the negotiation, and whilst efforts are making for the peaceable and final adjustment of these delicate and exciting questions, her Majesty's Government can claim the right of exclusive jurisdiction and sovereignty over the disputed territory, or the persons residing within its limits. In such a claim of power on the part of Great Britain, or its provincial authorities, the undersigned need not repeat to Lord Palmerston, (what he is already fully apprised of,) the Government of the United States can never consent to acquiesce in the existing state of the controversy."

And again, on the 10th of November of the same year, language still more decided. He says:

"To repeat the assurances, heretofore given, that such proceeding can be regarded in no other light than a violation of the rights and sovereignty of the United States, and entirely irreconcilable with that mutual forbearance which it was understood would be practiced by both Governments pending the negotiation.

"The circumstances under which these recent attempts to enforce jurisdiction have been made, show that, in the most favorable aspect in which they can be regarded, they were wholly indefensible."

"By what authority, then, the Provincial Government of New Brunswick felt itself justified in exercising such acts of sovereign power, the undersigned is at a loss to conceive; unless, indeed, upon the ground that the jurisdiction and sovereignty over the disputed territory, pending the controversy, vests exclusively with Great Britain. If such should turn out to be the fact, it can hardly be necessary again to repeat the assurances which have been heretofore given, that, in any such claim of power, the Government of the United States cannot acquiesce."

"Upon the consequences which would unavoidably result from attempting to exercise such jurisdiction, it is needless to enlarge. It must now be apparent that all such attempts, if persevered in, can produce only feuds and collisions of the most painful character."

"It is under this view of the subject that the undersigned has been instructed again to remonstrate against these proceedings of the authorities of New Brunswick, as a violation of the rights of Maine in the person of her agent; and to protest in the most solemn manner against the future exercise of all such acts of jurisdiction and sovereignty over the disputed territory, or the citizens of the United States residing within its limits, until a final adjustment of the controversy takes place."

"It cannot be expected, if the authorities of New Brunswick still persevere in attempting to exercise jurisdiction over the disputed territory, by the arrest and imprisonment in foreign jails of citizens of Maine, for performing their duty under the laws of their own State, and within what is believed to be her territorial limits, that measures of retaliation will not be resorted to by Maine, and great mischief ensue."

"Indeed, under existing circumstances, and in the nature of human connections, it is not possible, should such a course of violence be continued, to avoid collisions of the most painful character, for which the Government of the United States cannot be responsible, but which both Governments would equally deplore."

Now, sir, who does not perceive that, if any agreement for exclusive jurisdiction in Great Britain subsisted, the time to produce evidence of that agreement, and to have asserted her right under it, was in reply to this decided, strong, significant language of Mr. Stevenson? It was not done. No exception was taken to it. If any informal arrangement or understanding has grown up by silent acquiescence on our part to strong assertions made by British Ministers from time to time, it is, in my judgment, a sufficient answer that their assent to these distinct admonitions of the American Ambassador utterly repudiates the whole arrangement, whatever it was. By these declarations of Mr. Stevenson to Great Britain, we are solemnly pledged and committed as a nation, in the face of all mankind, to repel this claim of exclusive jurisdiction, if attempted to be executed, even at the hazard of the highest human responsibilities. Sir, I could go back still further, and show that similar and equally strong admonitions had been given to Great Britain on several occasions. They have been often warned if they attempted to maintain entire sovereignty over the whole territory, it would be resisted. They are now about, by military force, to attempt it; and how can this nation honorably refuse to maintain the position it has so often taken? A word or two more, sir, as to the precise character of this informal arrangement, with a view to show how, step by step, it has been the occasion of renewed aggressions under the influence of its ever-changing form. At first it was nothing more than that neither party should exercise acts of sovereignty, or maintain exclusive jurisdiction in the disputed territory, of course extending to any part or every part of it; but that each should practice forbearance or moderation, not seeking to obtain possession, nor to strengthen its claim by occupation. This Maine thought hard enough upon her, but as it seemed to be equal in its operation, she finally acquiesced. Next, Great Britain claimed the arrangement to be, that neither party should seek to extend its jurisdiction, nor exercise it where it had not been enjoyed before; that each should remain in the exercise of authority where it had been previously exercised. This Maine regarded still more objectionable, as it required of her to admit the jurisdiction of Great Britain in some portions of the territory to which she was convinced her own title unquestionably extended; but she was compelled to yield to this also, under the arrangements of the General Government; it being clearly implied that, in some other portions, Maine had hitherto exercised jurisdiction, and should be continued unmolested in the enjoyment of it. This was, indeed, distinctly asserted. As long ago as 1829, Mr. Van Buren, then Secretary of State, in a note to the British Minister, said:

"More than twenty years ago, large tracts of land lying westward of Mars Hill, and northward on the river Restook, were granted by the State of Massachusetts, which tracts are held and possessed under those grants to this day; and the United States and the States of Massachusetts and Maine, in succession, have never ceased to exercise that jurisdiction which the unsettled condition of the country in that region, and other circumstances, admitted and required."

But the next advance of the British Government was a more sweeping one than all which preceded it, being no less than a claim to entire and exclusive jurisdiction over the whole territory—every part and parcel of it, the Massachusetts grants and all—upon the extraordinary argument that, having been in possession of the whole prior to the acknowledgment of our independence, and never having marked off what she granted by the treaty of 1783, she retained the possession and sovereignty, actually or constructively, to this day. If we yield to this assumption upon this argument, and also acknowledge ourselves bound by the agreement that neither party shall seek to extend its jurisdiction, what part of the territory, I desire to know, will be left to Maine? What has become of those ancient grants where, as the President said in 1829, she had never ceased to exert her authority? Does not everybody perceive that, if this new stretch of authority on the part of Sir John Harvey be acquiesced in, not a foot of the territory will remain in our possession? The whole is surrendered. I say, sir, a new stretch of authority. Practically it is so. I do not mean that the claim is a new one, nor the argument on which it rests. But the attempt by force and military power to arrest the civil authorities of Maine where they have hitherto prevailed, is a new one. Hitherto they have been content to claim jurisdiction, and to remonstrate against its exercise on the part of Maine, but we have heeded neither their claims nor their remonstrances. I speak now of that portion of the disputed territory which is the theater of present operations, and which is about to become the seat of war—the Aroostook region.

The grants made by Massachusetts, referred to by Mr. Van Buren in the extract just read, were situated in this very region; and it was upon one of the identical "tracts" there spoken of that the land agent of Maine has recently been arrested.

25TH CONG....3D SESS.

Maine Boundary Question—Mr. Evans.

Ho. of Reps.

I wish this to be clearly understood, because it shows that Maine is making no new pretensions—advancing no new claims—disturbing no previously existing arrangement. The possession and jurisdiction of the Aroostook country has always been in her, however it may have been protested against and claimed by Great Britain. This possession has been more than once acquiesced in by Great Britain. In 1833, the authorities of Maine and Massachusetts opened a road to the Aroostook river, running fifteen miles, or more, within the territory, sold timber, surveyed the land for settlement, and did other acts of a similar character. Sir Archibald Campbell, then Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, entered his protest against these proceedings, and called upon the General Government to cause them to be stopped. Being assured that it was not the intention of the States to extend the road to the St. Johns, nor to interfere with the Madawaska settlement; and as Mr. McLane remarked to him, "that no part of the road now constructing by that State is believed to be within the territory of which the British Government has ever been in the actual possession since the treaty of 1783," the Lieutenant Governor contented himself with simple remonstrance. Why did he not then assert his jurisdiction over the Aroostook? Why not arrest the agents of the States? Why not stop their surveys and settlements? Plainly because the actual possession of the country had never been in Great Britain since the treaty. Being in us, Sir Archibald Campbell did not deem expedient or proper to invade it by force. The honorable member from Pennsylvania does not keep in view the precise localities of the territory. He confounds the possession and jurisdiction which Great Britain actually has, north of the St. Johns, in the Madawaska country, with that which she claims south of it, in the Aroostook region. Maine has complained very much, and I have heretofore complained in her behalf, that the British possession of the former section should have been permitted to continue. But, unfortunately, these complaints have been unheeded. When the honorable gentleman, therefore, tells us that we have hitherto acquiesced in the jurisdiction of Great Britain; that she has arrested our citizens, which we have not resented; that she has broken up the operation of our laws in incorporating towns, &c., I reply that all this occurred in the Madawaska settlements, and furnishes not the smallest pretense for the invasion of the Aroostook. Our possession here has ever been as distinctly admitted practically by them, as their possession north of the St. Johns has been by us. As a further proof of this, let me call the attention of the House to what occurred less than two years ago, showing, explicitly, that no act of sovereignty—not the smallest—on the part of Great Britain, would be tolerated by our Government upon this territory.

In 1835, a company was incorporated by the Provincial Legislatures of New Brunswick and Lower Canada, for the purpose of constructing a railroad from St. Andrews to Quebec, and a route was surveyed, and plans made, running directly across the Aroostook country, and the territory south and west of it, which is now the scene of military operations. These facts having been made known to our Government, Mr. Forsyth, on the 23d of March, 1837, called the attention of Mr. Fox to the subject, as one "which, from its high importance, demands the prompt consideration of his Majesty's Government." After reciting the circumstances, Mr. Forsyth, strongly protesting against the proceeding, uses phrases of this sort:

"The object of the association from its inception was objectionable." "Still more unjustifiable was the acts of sovereignty giving to this company corporate powers over property known to be claimed by citizens of a friendly and neighboring State." "The undersigned is directed by the President to inform Mr. Fox that the prosecution of the enterprise above referred to will be regarded by this Government as a deliberate infringement of the rights of the United States to the territory in question, and as an unwarrantable assumption of jurisdiction therein by the British Government."

And he called for the prompt adoption of such measures as should put an end to the prosecution of the measure.

On the 24th of August following, Mr. Fox, having received the instructions of his Government, replied to Mr. Forsyth's letter thus:

"I am now enabled to inform you that, in consideration of the arguments and observations contained in your note, her Majesty's Government has been pleased to direct the colonial authorities of Lower Canada and New Brunswick, respectively, to cause all operations connected with the above mentioned project within the limits of the disputed territory to be immediately discontinued."

Can anything be plainer than this? The "arguments and observations" which induced the British Government immediately to discontinue the proposed movements were nothing more than a direct and emphatic denial of her right to exercise "an act of sovereignty," or undertake "an unwarrantable assumption of jurisdiction." An assumption of jurisdiction is the phrase, plainly implying that no jurisdiction on her part had existed. It will be seen that the act of sovereignty then complained of was one of the lowest forms in which it could be manifest—the incorporation of a company by legislative authority; no act done upon the territory. Yet this was justly regarded as "unjustifiable" and not to be permitted, and Great Britain promptly yielded to the force of the argument, and asserted no right of jurisdiction. But now we are threatened with the very highest and most rigorous exercise of sovereignty known to the public law—military power, stern, unmitigated authority, the sword and the bayonet. These are to come, bearing the ensigns of sovereignty; and the royal banner is to be unfurled as incontestable proof of the supremacy of British authority there. Shall we now submit to it? Shall we tamely, basely yield, and for what? Not on the ground of agreement, for our Government has now repudiated that entirely. On the ground of the original jurisdiction of Great Britain still remaining in her, because she has never set apart and marked off the territory granted to us by the treaty of 1783? Is this Congress prepared for one moment to tolerate a sentiment like that? Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania, for one instant, give countenance to it? What, sir, do we hold our independence, or any of our rights, the smallest of them, by grant, by concession from Great Britain, or from any other human power? May the gracious gift be retracted whenever it shall please the royal donors to resume it? No, sir; we hold our rights as a nation, all of them, the lowest as well as the highest, by the blessing of God upon our arms—by the valor and wisdom of our fathers—by conquest, by power: conquest which has been acknowledged and admitted; power which has been maintained and respected.

The idea that the treaty of 1783 was in the nature of a grant by Great Britain to us is not new. It was started at the treaty of Ghent, or subsequently in the negotiations at London, upon some question connected with the fisheries. The distinguished member from Massachusetts, [Mr. Adams,] who is so familiar with the whole subject and argument, will correct me if I am wrong. It was then insisted that, as the treaty of 1783 was a grant of privileges to us, this grant was abrogated by the war of 1812; and that the treaty of peace of Ghent would not revive the privileges thus abrogated by the war; but that we could obtain them only by a new grant and a new concession, qualified and limited at the pleasure of Great Britain. A principle so utterly subversive of our national character and independence even, was most successfully met and repelled by the honorable member from Massachusetts, [Mr. Adams,] and by the American Government. It was again met and refuted by Mr. Clay, in 1827-28, then Secretary of State, upon this very question of jurisdiction in the disputed territory. We are now to meet the argument plainly and practically, face to face. Will you yield to it because it is to be asserted by the edge of the sword? Will you be driven from the position you have so often taken? Will you admit the jurisdiction and sovereignty over all the disputed territory to be rightfully in Great Britain? I hope I have succeeded, to some extent, in satisfying the gentleman from Pennsylvania that, notwithstanding what appears in the correspondence between the two Governments, Great Britain will not be able to make out so plausible a pretense of an agreement as he has supposed, touching that part of the territory now more immediately in controversy. If he still relies upon my remarks, made under other circumstances last year, let me remind him that I was then met on this floor, and, in the judgment of some, refuted, on the very point whether the correspondence in fact warranted any such pretense. The President assures us, in his message of the 26th ultimo, that he has caused to be prepared an abstract of all the correspondence upon the subject; and he says:

"Instead of sustaining the assumption of the British functionaries, that correspondence disproves the existence of any such agreement."

Will the honorable member from Pennsylvania wait until this abstract is printed, and then judge how far his present opinions are well founded?

But he wants us now to stand up here in maintaining the assumptions of the British functionaries against the express declaration of our own Government. If the British Government have had plausible pretexts before, they have none now, they are explicitly admonished; and if they persevere in attempting military occupation, they do it with their eyes open. Are we to encourage them to do it? Are we to put ourselves in the wrong in advance? Are we to say to her, go on if you will, expel Maine if you can, we shall not interfere: there is much in the diplomacy to justify your course, and, if we resist you, the world will be apt to think we are wrong? God forbid that such sentiments, by implication even, shall ever be attributed to this Congress.

As to the idea that the bill under discussion commits us to a course we are not already pledged to pursue, I confess I was not a little surprised to hear the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, while expressing strong disapprobation of the bill, say he heartily approved of the message of the President. In my judgment, the measures proposed by the bill are in strict accordance with the message. What says the President?

"If the authorities of New Brunswick should attempt to enforce the claim of exclusive jurisdiction set up by them, by means of a military occupation on their part of the disputed territory, I shall feel myself bound to consider the contingency provided by the Constitution as having occurred; on the happening of which a State has the right to call for the aid of the Federal Government to repel invasion."

Does the bill say anything more? Nothing. It simply confers upon the President power, by men and money, to furnish that protection against invasion which the Constitution renders it imperative on him to furnish. He is to judge of the emergency. He has judged; and the bill simply provides that when that emergency arrives, he shall have the means of performing his high constitutional duties. The President is pledged in the face of the country and of all mankind. The nation is already committed. If the bill be a war bill, war is already commenced. If it be offensive and hostile, it is too late to recede. Our ground is taken—plainly, distinctly, and openly. I submit to the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania whether he wishes to hold forth to the British Government a divided sentiment in our Government on the great propositions involved in this controversy? While one department has boldly and manfully taken its position in resistance of the extraordinary and fatal principles which lie at the bottom of their assumptions, another branch—and that the popular branch—is willing to concede away the very foundation on which our independence stands—to concede that our rights, our national rights, rest upon grant, upon concession? Has he well considered to what results such admissions, however faintly made, will lead? We have strong proof in the debates of this day of the importance of every word uttered upon this floor bearing upon our foreign relations. Did the honorable gentleman [Mr. Biddle] listen, did the House attend, to the document produced by my honorable friend from Maryland, [Mr. Kennedy?] And did they appreciate the effect which every word we utter in this Hall is calculated to have upon the British Cabinet and British counsels? In the apprehension that sufficient attention was not bestowed upon it, allow me, sir, at the hazard of repetition, to advert to it again.

You will well recollect, Mr. Chairman, that in 1835 a resolution was moved by yourself, [Mr. Lincoln, of Massachusetts,] calling upon the

25TH CONG....3D SESS.

Maine Boundary Question—Mr. Evans.

HO. OF REPS.

President to communicate, if not incompatible with the public interest, information respecting the negotiation concerning the northeastern boundary. On that resolution a debate sprang up, in which you, sir, largely participated, and in which I took a much humbler share. The document read by my honorable friend [Mr. KENNEDY] informs us that these proceedings, little important as they were, were communicated with great minuteness to the British Government. A newspaper, containing the debate, was forwarded to the Duke of Wellington, and his attention was particularly called to the fact that, of the eight members of the House from Maine, three only voted in favor of the resolution, and five against it. Thank God, I was not one of the five. Sir Charles Vaughan reminds the Duke of this circumstance, and of the "apathy" which then appeared to prevail in Maine on the subject, and of the willingness thus manifested by the State to submit the whole matter to the General Government.

This was at the period when propositions of the most dangerous and exceptionable character, so far as our rights were concerned, were passing between the two Governments; propositions for an adjustment, founded upon a departure from the true north line of the treaty, wholly unknown to Maine at that time, and to the country. Sir Charles R. Vaughan, taking fresh courage from the apparent acquiescence of Maine, in the then state of the negotiation, and the readiness which five out of eight of its members here manifested to submit all to the General Government, pretty distinctly suggests to the Duke the propriety of extending his jurisdiction over the whole territory. He called his attention to the small majority by which the resolution was voted in the House—to the fact that the President had declined to communicate the information sought for, and, throughout the whole letter, evidently endeavored to impress upon the mind of the Duke of Wellington that the question was one to which very little importance was now attached in this country. With this evidence fresh before us of the eagerness with which our proceedings, our speeches, our votes even, are watched by British eyes and British ears, I ask the honorable member from Pennsylvania to consider with how much more courage and zeal that nation will be likely to push her pretensions, when she finds a course of argument pursued here calculated to strengthen them on the principle she has asserted?

Mr. BIDDLE here interposed. He could hardly believe it possible he had been so much misunderstood. So far from admitting the British claim of right, he had expressly denied it. He had maintained the right to be in Maine; but the ground he had taken was this: that our Government, by its acts, had countenanced the belief on the part of the British authorities that we were disposed to admit their claim, and that, such having been the case, we ought not too hastily or too harshly to resent their so understanding us.

Mr. EVANS resumed. He was very far from wishing to misunderstand the gentleman. I am considering (said Mr. E.) the effect of his argument, and of the course he desires to pursue, upon the counsels of Great Britain. The gentleman desires that this bill shall not pass. He thinks it equivalent to a declaration of war. He is, therefore, of opinion that the authority of the General Government should not be interposed to prevent Great Britain from taking military occupation of the disputed territory; in other words, that she shall be allowed to take such possession, if she pleases; and upon the ground that our Government has given sufficient pretext to Great Britain to adhere to her pretensions, by acquiescence in them on our part. Now what I desire to submit to the honorable member's consideration is this: whether such a course of proceeding would not be an entire submission to her claim—to her claim by agreement—agreement founded on her original jurisdiction never surrendered; whether the use of such an argument is not calculated to stimulate her to persevere? I do not assert that the honorable member has advocated here the justice of the British pretensions. I am well aware that he strongly avows the ultimate right to be in Maine. But that only renders it still the more dangerous to surrender even temporary possession and jurisdiction to Great Britain. If the right to the territory be so incontestably ours, how unspeakably hazardous is it to concede for one moment that she has a right to maintain sovereignty over it, until she chooses to set it apart as a grant to us? I desire to carry out the consequences of even the feeblest admissions, coming from a source so discerning and sagacious as is the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania; and I again put it to the House to consider what course Great Britain will be likely to pursue, if, in this Congress, her extraordinary pretensions find the smallest favor?

I again repeat if the House reject this bill, it will be a virtual surrender to those pretensions. The Executive is committed—deeply committed; and if we do not sustain him, we abandon the high, impregnable ground on which our rights stand. But suppose, in point of fact, there has been any such agreement respecting jurisdiction as the British Minister asserts. How long is it to continue? Is it to be forever binding? Can neither party abrogate it? May we not, whenever we please, inform the British Government that we rescind it—that we claim jurisdiction ourselves, and shall exert it? And if, after such notice, Great Britain attempt to reinstate herself by arms, may we not resist her, without being charged with a violation of her rights in so doing? How are our rights ever to be maintained and respected, but by a plain enunciation of them to the world, and a significant warning that they are not to be invaded with impunity? Is this bill anything more? We have repeatedly asserted our undoubted right to the territory; we have warned Great Britain that she has no pretense of sovereignty or jurisdiction, either by agreement or by virtue of her ante-revolutionary possession and ownership, or in any other way, and we have more than once or twice or thrice assured her that any attempt to enforce it would be resisted. She is now about to enforce it. She leaves us no alternative. With what face, then, can it be said that this is a hostile movement? It is no otherwise hostile than the other party chooses to make it so. It is purely defensive. It is to resist an incursion, and the setting up of authority which the British Government has been for years admonished would be resisted whenever attempted. It looks to military preparation, indeed, but it looks also to peace. It provides for raising troops and for the means of war, but it also proposes an embassy of conciliation and peace. If it grasps the sword with one hand, it extends the olive branch in the other. I heartily approve this latter provision of the bill. I rejoice that we thus manifest our strong solicitude to preserve the relations of peace and amity, and our willingness to resort even to so unusual a mode of diplomatic intercourse, with a view to that object. I have much hope from it. If some person shall be selected for this important mission known to this country and known to Europe, commanding the confidence of all parties and sections here in his ability and integrity, one able to present our claims to the consideration of the British Cabinet in that strong and unanswerable manner which their inherent justice admits of, I cannot doubt the result. Most happy shall I be if such a one is selected for this station, and if his efforts for peace—peace without the sacrifice of our rights or our honor—are crowned with success.

If I have omitted to notice any fact or argument employed by the honorable member from Pennsylvania, I am not aware of it. Possibly it may be so; and if so, I shall regret it. I desire to vindicate this bill and the State of Maine in every particular where I think defense necessary or practicable.

I now put to the honorable gentleman this question: what will you do in the present exigency? Will you make no demonstration in behalf of our rights? What can you then expect but that the most arrogant demands of Great Britain will be renewed and insisted on? Will you do nothing? Will you leave Maine to herself? Such is the course already predicted by one of the British presses in this country. The United States, they say, will abandon Maine to the consequence of her own folly. We are now to see how that is. I have already told you that Maine is in arms, determined to maintain her rights. She is solemnly pledged on this subject; she cannot retreat; she will most certainly maintain herself in the position she has taken. Will you stand by and see her cut down? Will any man say that is a result which this nation can witness without disgrace and dishonor? You may look coldly on if you will; but come or not come to her defense, she will stand. I say to her,

"Stand! the ground's your own, my braves;
Will ye give it up like slaves?
Or do ye look for greener graves?"

The question for you is, whether she shall be left alone battling for her rights?—whether you think that is the way to preserve the peace of the country? You may see her trod in the dust by military power which she cannot resist, if you will. You may see her cut off from the Union, and incorporated with the colonial possessions of a foreign Power; but you shall not see her quailing before the enemy, nor abandoning the high ground she occupies, while she can lift an arm to uphold her flag. You are bound, pledged, committed to her defense. You may recede, this House may recede if it will; and if it does, this nation recedes from its most solemn obligations. Do it if you will. Stand by, as all Europe did, calm, cold spectators, while Poland was crushed to the earth by an overwhelming military despotism, but take with you the judgment which the world and history and impartial posterity will pronounce upon you, as it does upon all Europe, that you were recreant to your duty and your honor.

Mr. SALTONSTALL followed Mr. EVANS on the same day, in a speech, of which a report was published in the Globe of the 19th of April.

After Mr. S. concluded this speech,

Mr. EVANS replied, at some length, vindicating the proceedings of Maine, and advocating the bill. He denied that Mr. SALTONSTALL had spoken the sentiments of Massachusetts, and proceeded in an argument to show that the movements now made in Maine were undertaken for the benefit of Massachusetts as well as Maine, and were only carrying out a course of measures commenced last year under the joint direction of the agents of both States, &c.

SATURDAY, March 2, 1839.

The same subject being resumed,

Mr. SALTONSTALL rose for the purpose of explanation. From what he had heard in reply, he must have been misunderstood—he knew the course of his remarks had been misstated. He was desirous that the views he had taken on a question so important to his own State and to the country should be distinctly understood.

The committee have been cautioned (said Mr. S.) not to suppose that I have correctly represented the opinions of Massachusetts. I did not undertake to give the opinions of Massachusetts, but my own views, on my own responsibility. My allusion to my situation as a Representative of that State, so deeply interested in this question, was a mere introductory remark; and offered as a reason for my taking part in a discussion in which so many were desirous to engage.

Comments which I was surprised to hear have been made on my remarks upon the proceedings of the Chief Magistrate and government of Maine. On that subject the course of my remarks was this: I glanced at the history of this controversy from the beginning, and upon the main question—our rights under the treaty of 1783—I expressed an opinion as clear and decided as has been or can be given, that the right to the territory in dispute was in the United States. I referred to the proceedings under that treaty, to the treaty of Ghent, to the subsequent proceedings, and particularly to the resolutions adopted by Congress at its last session; and I endeavored to call the attention of the committee to the precise state of the claim at the time of the recent movement in Maine.

As to the claim of the Governor of New Brunswick to exclusive possession and jurisdiction, my general view was similar to that so ably presented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BIDDLE.] I did not contend that there had, in fact, been an agreement or understanding between the Governments of the two nations, as has been assumed by Sir John Harvey, but I referred to various documents to show that the claim had been asserted for several years—that an officer, with the title of “warden of the disputed territory” had claimed jurisdiction over the whole territory in dispute pursuant to an understanding between the two nations—that this had been communicated to our Government at times when it either had not been denied and repelled, or had been neglected in a manner which had a tendency to lead the Government of Great Britain to suppose there was such an understanding. It was known to the governments of Massachusetts and Maine that the government of New Brunswick did claim exclusive jurisdiction. I then referred to the recent proceedings in Maine. She had sent an armed body of men to enter upon part of this territory, and they were still in possession, with a military force to sustain them. This measure I considered to be indiscreet, unfortunate; that it had a tendency to produce the consequences which have followed; it might embarrass the great question upon which negotiation was going on between the two Governments; and there was danger that it might precipitate us into war. I did not speak disrespectfully of the character of the Governor of Maine, or call in question the purity of his motives, or present him in contrast, in any respect whatever, favorable or unfavorable, with the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick.

25TH CONG...3D SESS.

Maine Boundary Question—Mr. Smith.

The part I have taken in this debate—this course of remarks, it is said, will strengthen the claims of a foreign Government against the rights of our own. In a question of this momentous importance, are we not to inquire into the truth—to state facts, and to reason upon them, from an apprehension that what is here said may find its way across the water, and have an injurious influence abroad? Is free discussion to be restrained by such considerations? Is it not our duty to examine this great question fully? To discuss it freely? The more important a question is, the more emphatically this is our duty. If we cannot debate here with perfect freedom, if facts cannot be honestly stated and commented upon, let us close our doors.

But the immediate question is: what is now to be done? Shall Maine be left alone? Must she contend single-handed? No. I said she must be protected. There has, in fact, been no such agreement for exclusive possession as that set up; it is a misapprehension. And I expressed my belief that when the attention of the British Government should be called to the subject, it would so be found. I did not think, therefore, that war would grow out of this controversy. My opposition to the bill was chiefly on account of the second section, which authorizes the President to raise an additional army. I was ready to go for the rest of the bill, although I was inclined to believe that the provisions of the act of 1793 were sufficient.

So much I have thought it my duty to say here now, that I might not be misrepresented here or elsewhere.

MAINE BOUNDARY QUESTION.

SPEECH OF HON. F. O. J. SMITH,
OF MAINE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 2, 1839,

On the bill giving the President additional power for the defense of the United States, &amp;c.

Mr. SMITH said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I participate of the anxiety which I know to be common with the members of the committee, and especially with the Representatives of Maine upon this floor, that this bill shall pass, and pass at the earliest moment practicable.

For one, sir, I feel but little concern as to the particular shape which the bill shall assume in becoming a law, if so it be that sufficient of the sinews of war—of money and of arms—shall be put by it at the command of the Executive of the country, to maintain the rights and protect the honor of the citizens of Maine.

If it shall be the pleasure of the committee and House to put at the command of the Executive only the militia of the country until Congress shall again convene, superadded to the regular Army now provided by law, I am contented. If it shall be the preference of the committee and House to give him a larger number of select troops than now constitute the regular force of the United States, instead of the militia alone, so much the better. But I repeat, my great anxiety is that enough of the one or the other of these forces shall be granted to maintain the rights of the State of Maine, and that enough of the revenues of the Government shall be at the control of the Executive to sustain those forces under all emergencies that may occur. Beyond this, looking to the mere details of the bill, I feel indifferent as to what may be the preference of the House.

Sir, I have listened to the debates of the committee upon this great subject with intense interest, and determined to do so in silence on my part, until persuaded that one view, and I believe the true view, of the position in which Maine is now placed, has been, in a measure, overlooked. I wish to call the attention of the committee to a few simple and well substantiated facts, which will illustrate to all, not only the rights of that State, but the actual position in which she now stands before the country and the world, in the defense of her rights. I am rejoiced at the unanimity with which several leading and fundamental points in her case have been understood and conceded throughout the debates upon this floor. It is agreed, sir, upon all sides, that Maine is clearly right in her claim of absolute title and property to the whole territory in dispute. Your own records—the records of this as well as of the other branch of Congress—place this fact high above dispute on the part of the Federal Government. And your records not only prove the claim of Maine to be right in the abstract, but they prove also the unalterable conviction of this Government that it is not involved in mystery—that it is legible upon the face of the country in dispute. Allow me to read to the committee one of the resolutions passed by this same Congress, at the last session, within this Hall, and passed unanimously, as your Journal shows:

“Resolved, That, after careful examination and deliberate consideration of the whole controversy between the United States and Great Britain, relative to the northeastern boundary of the former, the House of Representatives do not entertain a doubt of the entire practicability of running and marking that boundary in strict conformity with the stipulations of the definitive treaty of peace of 1793; and entertain a perfect conviction of the justice and utility of the title of the United States to the full extent of all the country in dispute between the two parties.”

It is further agreed and conceded on all sides, and it is a fact alike beyond dispute upon your own Journal, with that to which I have just adverted, that Maine has been delayed in her claim, thus admitted to be right and just and on all sides, for years and years, by the Federal Government. The second resolution of this branch of Congress, passed upon the subject at the late session, and passed, too, unanimously, thus establishes this great cause of complaint on the part of Maine:

“Resolved, That, considering that more than half a century has elapsed since the conclusion of that treaty, (of 1793) considering the extraordinary delay which has hitherto marked the negotiations and proceedings of the two countries in their endeavor amicably to settle the controversy; and considering the danger of mutual irritations and collisions upon the border of kindred and friendly nations from further procrastination, this House cannot forbear to express an earnest desire that the pending negotiation should be brought to a close, and the final decision of the dispute be made as early as practicable.”

Sir, I do not desire to go behind these proofs, to ask where, or upon whom, falls most largely the blame of thus delaying Maine in the realization and enjoyment of her acknowledged rights for years and years. I am content to have it brought home to the sense of this committee and of the country, at this juncture, that Maine plants herself, at the onset, in demanding the strong arm of this great Republic for her support, upon two indisputable facts:

1st. That her claim is a righteous one, and of no difficult ascertainment.

2d. That she has been unjustly delayed for years and years by the Federal Government, as well as by Great Britain, in the adjustment and enjoyment of it.

I proceed now, sir, to call the attention of the committee and of the country to the position which Maine has taken in reference to her territory, and with arms in hand is determined to maintain, and the authority which she has from this Government for that position. Her true relations to this Government, as now put forth in her present position, appear to have been, to some considerable extent, overlooked in this debate; and I wish it to be understood distinctly, for one, that I vote for the bill before you in reference to the position which Maine occupies, in fact, at this moment, and which she has the undoubted authority of this Government for occupying; and that I do not vote for it with a view of securing to the State the support of the Federal Government in reference to any new position which has been marked out for her by others. In a word, sir, if the bill is to be executed when passed into a law, only to sustain Maine in her rights to the extent of the recent protocol, or arrangement, made for her by the Executive of the General Government, through the Secretary of State, with the British Minister, then, sir, I do not hesitate to say that I am opposed to it, and would never give my vote for it. I would resist it as a violation of the rights of Maine, clearly expressed and defined upon the records of this Government; I would treat it as an abandonment of Maine to shame and dishonor, in the hour of her peril and conflict with a foreign Power.

If the bill is to be thus construed, it forces Maine from the righteous stand she has taken, or leaves her to maintain herself by her own arms alone. I claim to have that State protected and defended, through this bill, to the full extent of her present position and undertaking, and on the ground that in nothing has she acted beyond the express warrant of the only understanding which had been entered into between the United States and the British Government on the subject of the disputed territory, and to govern the parties immediately interested, during the pending of the dispute. Of that only understanding I hold the recent arrangement of the President, through the Secretary of State, with the present British Minister, to be a palpable violation, and an act of injustice to Maine. And I here repeat, that if this bill be avowed as having for its purpose only the support of Maine to the extent of this recent arrangement, I would never consent to vote for the bill, much as I desire to see Maine protected by the broad shield of the Federal Government. I ask the committee to reflect for a moment what the understanding between the two Governments of the United States and Great Britain has heretofore been, and what position Maine has a right to take, and has taken, as I understand both her Governor and her Legislature, in the documents they have sent here. The whole is comprised in the compass of a very few lines, which I will here read.

In 1832, July 21, in consequence of some border disturbances, Edward Livingston, then Secretary of State of the United States, wrote, on the subject of this disputed boundary, as follows, in behalf of this Government, to Mr. Bankhead, the then acting Minister of the British Government in this city:

“Until this matter shall be brought to a final conclusion, the necessity of refraining, on both sides, from any exercise of jurisdiction beyond the boundaries now actually possessed, must be apparent, and will, no doubt, be acquiesced in on the part of his Britannic Majesty's provinces, as it will be by the United States.”

After due deliberation by the British Government, Sir Charles Vaughan, the British Envoy to our Government, under date of April 14, 1833, thus acceded to the proposition of our own Government, which I have just read:

“Her Majesty's Government entirely concurs with that of the United States in the principle of continuing to abstain, during the progress of the negotiation, from extending the exercise of jurisdiction within the disputed territory beyond the limits within which it has hitherto usually been exercised by the authorities of either party.”

Sir, here is presented the plain understanding and the only understanding that Maine has ever been apprised of as existing between the Federal Government and Great Britain on the subject. And although Maine was not consulted in the making of this understanding, no man can say that she has violated it in one title of its length, or breadth, or depth. Although her rights extend far beyond it, she claims not in her recent measures to be sustained by this Government beyond the terms of it. But she does claim to be protected in acting up to the terms of it. She has acted up to the terms of it—her present position marches up only to the terms of it; and while not seeking to go beyond, she will not, she cannot, without infamy upon her name, fall back from her position thus taken, or retract one step in support of it which she has thus made. It is unjust to ask her to do so; it would be dishonorable to her, after what has transpired, to submit to any such request, from whatever quarter emanating.

And yet, sir, what is the proposition of the Executive? What is the arrangement attempted to be made for her in the protocol of the national Executive with the present British Minister? Read it. I ask the committee to pause upon it. I confess I can regard it only as a palpable departure from the terms heretofore agreed on between the two Governments, as I have already shown them to have been, and a surrender of the rights of Maine to the new and unwarrantable encroachments of the British Government. It provides as follows:

"Her Majesty's officer will not seek to expel, by military force, the armed party which has been sent by Maine into the district bordering on the Aroostook river; but the government of Maine will voluntarily, without needless delay, withdraw beyond the bounds of the disputed territory any armed force now within them; and, if future necessity should arise for dispersing notorious trespassers, or protecting public property from depredation by an armed force."

What shall be done, sir? Shall Maine, in that case, as she has done now, wield her jurisdiction untrammelled, and according to her own sense of right or expediency, over the Aroostook country? No, sir; far from it. The President's new arrangement for Maine is that, under a recurrence of depredations like those which Maine has undertaken to stop and punish,

"The operation shall be conducted by concert, jointly or separately, according to agreements between the governments of Maine and New Brunswick."

Yes, sir; whether the operation be conducted jointly or separately, it must be—it shall be only—conducted as the result of concert between the two governments of Maine and New Brunswick, and according to terms which the latter will first assent to! And this divided jurisdiction is all that in future is left to Maine over the Aroostook country, which, according to the understanding heretofore entered into, and now to be abrogated, was, until now, yielded to her exclusive jurisdiction.

The Aroostook country, now the immediate theater of British aggression, is a portion of the disputed territory that has at all times heretofore been within the exclusive jurisdiction of Massachusetts and Maine. In claiming exclusive jurisdiction over it now, as Maine does, and as I trust she will persist in doing at all hazards, she is not "extending the exercise of jurisdiction within the disputed territory beyond the limits within which it has hitherto usually been exercised by" her authorities; but the British Province is doing this in direct violation of the existing agreement between the two Governments of the United States and Great Britain.

Under such circumstances, is it just towards Maine to force her to fall back from her position, founded in right and in express stipulation, too, and to receive into her acknowledged possessions and territory a concurrent jurisdiction on the part of the British Provinces? Sir, let who will go for it, I go against it.

Mr. Chairman, Maine is either right or she is wrong in her position. If she is right, she properly asks and expects to be sustained by her sister States and the Government. If she is wrong, then say so to her, and leave her to her fate. She claims to have exclusive jurisdiction of so much of the disputed territory as is known by the name of the Aroostook country—the same that is now threatened with invasion—not only by treaty stipulation, but by long-continued possession, and by your late agreement of 1832 and 1833, also, with the British Government; and if she be right in this, will you compel her to retire ignominiously before the threats of Sir John Harvey, or to fall back and receive into that territory a concurrent jurisdiction on the part of the British Province? If it be clear that she asks now no more than she has always possessed exclusively, will you force her to submit to a partnership possession of it with Great Britain? And if she will not submit to this humiliation, will you refuse all support to her?

Sir, such a policy adopted towards Maine would change not only her rights, but her uniform relations towards both this Government and the British Government. And will you thus treat her citizens, when they have, in confident reliance upon your authority, with a chivalrous spirit and patriotism which I trust will ever characterize them, left their homes, their families, bidding defiance to the frosts and the snows of their climate, and taken the field in defense of their wonted and heretofore acknowledged possession? Will you abandon them, when they have sworn in the face of the world, upon the altars of the God who made them, not to retreat, not to retract one inch of their rightful possession? Will this Congress, with their own records before them, thus consent virtually to take sides with, or countenance the pretensions of the enemies of Maine, and the enemies of our common country?

Too much of the argument already made upon this floor has aimed at only a resistance of the British Government to exclusive jurisdiction over the Aroostook country. I know it is exclusive jurisdiction that Sir John Harvey is putting forth. But, sir, this course of argument winks out of sight the true claim and position of Maine, which forbids even the admission of concurrent jurisdiction with the British Province over this portion of the disputed territory. It is an exclusive and not a divided jurisdiction that Maine claims, and so the House and country should understand it.

If she backs out from this claim, or submits to receive the concurrent jurisdiction of Great Britain within that portion of the disputed territory known as the Aroostook country, she yields to dishonor, and will be unworthy of your support.

Sir, I do not, I will not believe that she will do this, or that she is capable of it; for by every document that has emanated from her Governors and Legislature for the last ten years, and most of all by her present Governor and present Legislature, she stands pledged to herself, to her country, and to the world, to risk all that she has, to sacrifice all that she is, or hopes to be hereafter, rather than do this deed of dishonor.

I am not mistaken in thus presenting to the committee the claim and position to which Maine finds herself thus strongly pledged. And to prove this incontestably, I will refer to the recent exponents of Sir John Harvey on the one side, and of the present Executive of Maine on the other, of their respective positions.

In a letter of Sir John Harvey to Governor Fairfield, dated February 13, 1839, the former says:

"Sir: I have just heard, with the utmost surprise and regret, that without the courtesy of any previous intimation whatever to this Government, an armed force from the State of Maine has entered the territory, the claim to which is in dispute between Great Britain and the United States, and which it has been agreed between the two General Governments shall remain in the exclusive possession and jurisdiction of England until that claim be determined."

"It has been my duty, on more than one occasion, to apprise the Executive Government of Maine that my instructions do not permit me to suffer any interference with that possession and jurisdiction until the question of right shall have been finally decided in discussion between the two General Governments."

Such is the position of the British Governor. It goes for an exclusive jurisdiction over the Aroostook country, which "will not suffer any interference with that possession." It claims, moreover, an agreement between the United States and Great Britain, by which the whole disputed territory is yielded to this same exclusive jurisdiction of the British Province.

This pretension was met by Governor Fairfield in the following manner, under date of February 19:

"Now, sir, I cannot hesitate to say that, in my opinion, your Excellency is laboring under an entire misapprehension in regard to the facts. No such agreement, I am persuaded, has ever been made between the two Governments. I have looked in vain for it among the numerous documents which have grown out of this question, and have never heard of any recognition of it, verbal or otherwise, on the part of the officers of the General Government. If, however, such an agreement exists, your Excellency can undoubtedly point it out. At all events, such an agreement can never be recognized by this State. A decent self-respect will ever forbid it, if there were no other considerations in the way."

"Your Excellency entreats me immediately to recall the forces now upon the territory; and then adds, 'It is proper that I should acquaint your Excellency that I have directed a strong force of her Majesty's troops to be in readiness to support her Majesty's authority, and to protect her Majesty's subjects in the disputed territory, in the event of this request not being immediately complied with.'"

"In reply, I have to say that the territory bordering upon the Aroostook river has always been, as I regard the facts, in the possession and under the jurisdiction of Massachusetts and Maine; that more than thirty years ago, Massachusetts surveyed and granted large tracts of it, which have ever since, in some way, been possessed by the grantees, and those claiming under them; that the rest of it was surveyed by, and some of it divided between Massachusetts and Maine, soon after the latter became an independent State; that both States have long been in the habit of granting permits to cut timber there without being molested from any quarter; that many persons have purchased these lands of Maine, and entered into their actual occupation; and that in various other ways Maine has exercised a jurisdiction, which may fairly be regarded as exclusive, over this territory. Under these circumstances information was received that a body of armed men had gone into this territory, and were cutting vast quantities of the timber, defying the power of this State to prevent them. On these facts, being communicated to the Legislature, the two branches immediately directed the land agent to take with him a sufficient force to arrest these depredators, and to break up their enterprise. The party of the land agent is now in the territory, engaged in executing the trust with which it was charged, and, with my consent, will never leave it while the protection of the property of the State from plunderers renders it necessary for them to remain. If your Excellency chooses to send an armed force to attempt their expulsion, I can only say that this State will endeavor to meet such an attempt as it will deserve. I have no threats to make, no boasts to indulge. If Maine does her duty, as I trust in God she will, nothing that I could say in advance would add to the glory of her career. If she proves recreant to her duty, and tamely submits to be expelled from her territory by a force that she could successfully resist, nothing that I could say would tend to diminish the measure of her ignominy and disgrace."

In a communication of the Governor of Maine to the Legislature of that State, referring to the seizure of the land agent of Maine and his assistants, upon the Aroostook territory, by provincial authority, it is again said:

"No palliating circumstance for this outrage can be found in even a pretense that the place where it was committed is within the concurrent jurisdiction of the two Governments, much less that the British Government have had exclusive jurisdiction. Lands even higher up, and beyond this, were surveyed and granted by the State of Massachusetts more than thirty years ago; and Massachusetts and Maine have long been in the habit of granting permits to cut timber upon the Aroostook lands, without being, to my knowledge, molested from any quarter, to say nothing of the sale and actual occupation of the land itself."

In the same Governor's letter to the President of the United States, on this subject, under date of February 16, 1839, it is said:

"These gentlemen have been seized upon territory which is regarded by Maine as having always been within her exclusive possession and jurisdiction, as will appear by a few of the facts alluded to in my message."

"I will only add, that in this State there is but one feeling upon this subject, and that is of deep indignation at the outrages that have been perpetrated, and a fixed and unyielding determination not to submit to the degrading terms proposed by the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick—that of withdrawing from the Aroostook territory, and abandoning our soil to foreigners, and our property to a band of armed plunderers."

Sir, with the evidence before the committee of the plain understanding between the United States and Great Britain, that Maine should retain her exclusive jurisdiction over so much of the disputed territory as had been within her possession, and that Great Britain should retain her exclusive jurisdiction over such portion of the disputed territory as her Province had been accustomed to exercise exclusive jurisdiction over, and that neither party should extend its jurisdiction beyond such limits; with this evidence before the committee of the exclusive jurisdiction which Maine has for years, and Massachusetts for years anterior, exercised over the Aroostook; with the recorded evidence, also, of this as well as of the other branch of Congress before us, that the title of Maine to the whole fee of the soil is absolute, and founded in the most unquestionable justice; with the evidence, yet further, of the determination of Maine not to yield one jot or tittle of her claim to either the fee or the jurisdiction of this portion of the disputed territory, until the dispute shall be settled, if ever—how is it to be expected, or can it be called just, that Maine should back out from this soil, under any pretense of compromise, or by any application of force, and consent to receive into it the equal and concurrent jurisdiction of the British Province? I say, sir, that if she be true to herself; if she be true to her own fame; if she regard the oath she has taken in the face of the world in appealing to arms against such a retreat or submission, she will not do it. No! I do most solemnly believe that any arrangement for this, consummated by the President of the United States, or any other Power, will be a virtual abandonment of the rights and honor of Maine. If Maine submits to it, what may not the country expect her submission to? Her sister Republics will pronounce her capable of being driven into any terms which the Federal Executive may demand her assent to. This bill, I trust, aims at no such humiliation for her. If the exclusive jurisdiction of Maine to the Arrostook country be in any way disturbed or invaded by the provincial government or by Great Britain, then will the contingency contemplated by this bill have occurred. Upon any other construction of the bill, or of the duty which the Federal Executive will owe to Maine under it, I would sooner see the bill defeated than passed.

Sir, allusions have been made on this floor to the conduct of the local authorities of Maine, and in a quarter where it should have been said last, if at all, however just the sentiment may be regarded by this committee or the country. The late proceedings of the Governor and Legislature of Maine have been pronounced rash, unfortunate, and precipitate; that Maine has been plunged needlessly into difficulty, and the peace of the nation put in jeopardy.

Sir, if I would make an issue upon such imputations, at this period, or if it was the duty of Maine to fall down at the footstool of the Federal Government to apologise for any proceeding of rashness or precipitancy on her part, she might well turn and prove herself the accuser of the Federal Government, and, from its records, prove upon it negligence in the extreme towards the rights and honor of Maine. If Maine has been rash, this Government has been still more culpably negligent. If fault there be anywhere, the first fault attaches not to the authorities of Maine. If blame is to be traced to its source and origin, it will not be found resting with, or proceeding from, Maine. I make no accusation other than to say, as I have said before, that Maine has been for years neglected in her boundary, and her troubles and her dangers have been forced upon her against her earnest endeavors to avert them; but, being thus forced upon her, she is endeavoring to meet them as becomes a free and independent Republic.

It has been said, sir, that our country is not prepared for war; that our shipping will be driven from the ocean; our cities and towns will be sacked and destroyed by the enemy; that our harbors and sea-coasts are unfortified; that our frontier is defenseless; that our western lakes are without a single armed ship to maintain the honor of the country for a single day there. All this may be a good argument addressed to our apprehensions; but it is not one that looks to the rights or to the honor of the nation. Grant that we have none of the bulwarks adverted to; grant that we are less prepared for war, in these respects, than we could wish to be: is it not true, nevertheless, that we are as well prepared as we ever have been—as well prepared as we can ever hope to be, until war shall be upon us? Sir, our preparation for war is not, it never has been, in armed ships, in fortified towns, or in a standing army. Such preparation is not consistent with the characteristic economy of our institutions. The preparation for war upon which the United States have relied heretofore in all times, and upon which they will rely at all times hereafter, more than upon all things beside, consists in the righteousness of their cause, and in the settled determination of the people to sustain and defend it at all hazards.

Sir, this preparation is now felt throughout this country upon the present emergency. And, if our Republic should exist a thousand years, and should continue throughout that period to add to her physical strength, to enlarge her prosperity, to develop her resources, and to add to the number and chivalry of her population, in the same progression as has characterized her march, in these particulars, since the 4th of July, 1776, she will still be, comparatively, as destitute of armed ships, of fortified towns, and of a standing army, as she is at the present moment. Maine, sir, is unprepared for war. With her three hundred miles of sea-coast, she has not a fortification upon it which might not be successfully stormed, as now circumstanced, by an ordinary gun-boat. With her three or four hundred miles of interior frontier, she has not so much as a log cabin fortified, besides the one erected within a few days by the determined spirit of her own citizens. And yet, sir, she has the preparation of a righteous cause, and the determination of a brave people engaged in her support, and these make her strong in her preparation for war; and with this preparation she has taken the field in defense of her rights and her territory. From that field she will not be driven.

SPEECH OF HON. R. H. MENELEE,

OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 1, 1839,

On the bill giving the President additional power for the defense of the United States, &c.

Mr. MENELEE said that the debates on this question had been characterized by such ability and fullness of detail as to spare him the necessity of going at length into the particulars of the controversy between the two nations, or even into the main points on which the title of the United States to the territory in dispute is founded. He proposed but to state the conclusions to which he had come respecting this controversy—conclusions drawn from an anxious and solemn consideration of all the information attainable through the protracted correspondence between the two nations, their debates in Parliament and Congress, or other sources within his reach, and to express his opinion upon the measures which the existing emergency demanded.

That the whole territory in dispute belonged rightfully to the United States, under the treaty of 1783, he did not for one instant hesitate with the utmost confidence to pronounce. It is demonstrable; it has been already demonstrated. Nor, sir, (said he,) do I hesitate, with equal confidence, to pronounce that the claim to that territory on the part of Great Britain is altogether unfounded, and attempted to be supported by arguments too untenable and frivolous, in my opinion, to comport with either the dignity or candor of a great nation. The right, therefore, being most manifestly with the United States, the party who contests it on the palpably insufficient grounds assumed by Great Britain must be held answerable before the world for whatever evils so unfounded a pretension may tend to produce. All nations are tenacious of territory; and territorial disputes are, from their nature, more likely than almost any other to engender mutual irritation and exasperation, in which both parties are liable to err. But the fault, and consequent responsibility for it, all lie with the party which, by the assertion of an unjust claim, thus exposes both to such consequences. It is in this view only that I now consider the question of right to the disputed territory, and not as furnishing a reason for the measures proposed now to be taken by the United States; for these measures flow from other reasons than those of conviction of this right, and of a fixed resolution to maintain it. They flow from an emergency which has lately arisen—new and peculiar.

Great Britain, sir, claims exclusive jurisdiction over the disputed territory until the dispute shall have been settled. Such a claim, urged merely in negotiation, would, I think, be unreasonable enough. Assuming that the right is doubtful, (which it is not,) it is manifest that the claim, merely as such, of one nation is entitled to no higher respect than of another. It cannot be presumed, in advance of negotiation and adjustment, that the claim of either is superior. Independent Powers must, in this respect, be regarded as equals. To concede that the undivided pretensions of either shall be invested with a validity and force denied to the other, is to concede away, in some sense, an essential attribute of sovereignty. Yet Great Britain, by her claim to exclusive jurisdiction over the subject of dispute until it shall have been adjusted, arrogates to herself, undoubtedly, this inadmissible superiority over the United States. Nor is the reasoning by which this claim is attempted to be maintained less objectionable than the claim itself; a reasoning founded on the assumption of the principle so humiliating to the United States, that their independence, nationality, territory, were derived from Great Britain by grant imparted by the treaty of peace of 1783; and that, therefore, Great Britain is to be presumed to remain in possession until there has been a transfer in fact. Sir, the treaty of 1783 granted nothing—neither independence, nationality, nor territory; that treaty but acknowledged them. For the foundation of all their inestimable rights, the United States point not to the treaty of peace, but to the glorious war of independence which preceded it—to occupation; and to the deeds of the noblest ancestry that ever bled in the cause of freedom—to conquest. Sir, I repeat, Great Britain granted nothing; she but acknowledged and recognized what the United States had themselves accomplished—without her and against her.

This claim, therefore, to exclusive jurisdiction, until the termination of the controversy, if urged by Great Britain, on the general reasoning hitherto advanced in its support, in the most unexceptionable form of negotiation, it would be the duty of this Government, under every obligation of interest and honor, to repel. But, sir, Great Britain of late reposes her claim to exclusive jurisdiction upon another foundation, which, if existing as represented by her, exhibits it in an imposing if not irresistible light; which is, that the United States, in the progress of the negotiation, had conceded, by explicit agreement, the right now contended for. This alleged agreement is asserted, in positive terms, both by the provincial authorities of New Brunswick and the British Minister here. Sir, I (in common, I believe, with the whole country) was surprised, absolutely astounded, by this announcement, so confidently made, and from sources so respectable, of the existence of such an agreement. If this Government had so agreed, the nation was of course bound, in faith and honor, to respect the agreement, no matter how injurious to our interests or humiliating to our character. Sir, I cannot express the intensity of the solicitude I felt to hear the response which our Government should make to this alleged agreement. Could it be possible that any Administration had been so unmindful of interest, and regardless of honor, as to have made such a concession? This suspense was of short duration. I now rejoice, sir, profoundly, and with patriotic thankfulness, (as doubtless the nation does too,) over the prompt and unequivocal assurance of our Government that no such agreement does, or ever did, exist. The British Minister is respectfully but earnestly invited to point to the alleged agreement. He has failed to show it; he cannot show it, nor can his Government. Sir, it does not exist, and we are left to hope that its existence has been urged under an unintentional misconception of the negotiations between the two Governments. Unsupported, therefore, by this pretended agreement, the claim of Great Britain to exclusive jurisdiction is thrown back upon the untenable and wholly inadmissible reasoning in which it originated.

But, sir, if the grounds which this Government has invariably assumed in resisting the claim by Great Britain to exclusive jurisdiction needed additional support, it is furnished by an explicit understanding between the two Governments that neither party should exert exclusive jurisdiction pending the negotiation, but should be confined to the portions of the territory in dispute, then in the possession and under the jurisdiction of each, without the right to enlarge their then existing possession or jurisdiction in any respect whatever. This understanding (unlike the agreement set up by the British functionaries) admits of being pointed to and shown. It has been shown. The correspondence shows it. Nor can its existence be contested. This understanding, by itself, arms the United States with an argument against the claim of Great Britain (if the question is to

25TH CONG...3D SESS.

Maine Boundary Question—Mr. Fillmore.

But, sir, it appears that argument and negotiation are to be discontinued by Great Britain, and the more cogent instrumentality of arms to be substituted in the enforcement of this claim to exclusive jurisdiction. It is announced, officially and unconditionally, by the provincial authorities of New Brunswick that they have peremptory instructions from the British Government to enforce this claim by arms, if arms be necessary, and that those instructions shall, at all hazards, be executed, if the powers of the British arms in all the provinces are adequate to their execution. Sir, this new manifestation of purpose wholly alters the aspect of the controversy. It proposes to deprive the United States of the advantages which they obviously possess under an original view of the respective claims of the two nations, unaffected by any agreement or understanding. It proposes to trample under foot an explicit understanding, solemnly and formally recognized, forbidding the pretension now urged. It proposes, finally and worst, to withdraw the adjustment of her claim from the field of reason and negotiation, and to adjourn it over to the field of arms! This, sir, is the new position which Great Britain has chosen to assume. It is altogether her act. She has a right to assume that or any other position she pleases with respect to this controversy; we cannot prevent that. The question now, sir, is, "How shall the United States meet this new position?"

Mr. Speaker, I am fully sensible of the comparative insignificance of the territory in dispute. I have, I trust, duly weighed the deep calamities of war in any form, and especially between two nations as powerful and as closely connected in commercial and other relations as Great Britain and the United States. I know that this nation is unprepared for war. I believe I have soberly weighed all the motives to peace; nor have the dangers to which war must ever expose institutions like ours been unconsidered. All these things have been calmly and resolutely looked in the face; and, in the full view of them all, I stand in readiness to repel the pretensions of Great Britain by reason and negotiation—peaceably, if she is disposed to reason and negotiate peaceably; and in perfect readiness to repel her pretensions by arms, if she is disposed to compel us to that resort! Sir, if Great Britain persists in backing her pretensions by arms, but one alternative is left us—dishonor or war; and, sir, dishonor the spirit of this nation will not endure. Choice of peace or war is with Great Britain. She will manifest her choice of war by persisting to execute the instructions avowed by the provincial authorities. For, sir, to the peaceable execution of these instructions this country cannot submit, and never will submit; it is the price of its honor to submit. In such an event war is inevitable; on our part a righteous war, upon which the smiles of the God of battles may be confidently invoked. If Great Britain wills war, let war come! This nation, armed in the righteousness of such a cause, has nothing to fear—all to expect.

In the present posture of this controversy, sir, there is no occasion, nor is it proper to animadvert upon the course of our own Government for several years past, in the conduct of these negotiations. That unjustifiable delays have been submitted to, may probably be shown. False steps on minor points may have been occasionally taken to our prejudice. This would but afford cause of complaint by the nation against its own Government; whilst, at the same time, the position of Great Britain is rendered, by that cause, still more indefensible. Nor would this be an appropriate occasion for arraying the wrongs—still unredressed—which this country has suffered from Great Britain by encroachments on other portions of our territory, or the unatoned outrage upon our territory and the lives of our people in the affair of the Caroline. These are subjects which stand open for discussion on their own merits, and in the mode which becomes them. The present emergency alone is now to be looked to, and provided for—by itself and for itself; and the measures of legislation taken by Congress should regard the emergency in that light. I am happy, sir, that the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which these momentous subjects were committed, have so regarded it. I agree with them generally in the reasoning of their report—entirely agree with them in its tone.

With respect, sir, to the bill reported by the committee, I regret that it is not, in my opinion, wholly free from objection. The second section, providing for so large a contingent augmentation of the regular force is, I think, unnecessary at the present moment. It confers vast discretionary powers upon the President. Those powers may not be abused, it is true; but it is no less true that they are liable to abuse, and may be abused. It is in seasons like this that free nations are most apt, in their efforts to guard against dangers from abroad, to forego their accustomed jealousy of power, by erecting precedents of discretion which plant the seeds of fatal dangers from within. I trust that the committee themselves will, on reflection, perceive the inexpediency of this provision, and decline further to press it.* Nor should I have recommended, as the committee have done, a special embassy to England. I am not sure that the present posture of affairs is such as, in strict delicacy, to require or even warrant it. Yet in the spirit of forbearance and peace which I hope may ever characterize the counsels of this country, I shall interpose no resistance to the measure, and shall be happy in the expectation that it, amongst other measures, may conduce to a speedy termination of this unfortunate controversy, peaceably and honorably to both nations.

I have but to add, sir, the expression of my unaffected and profound desire for peace; and at the same time, my conviction, not less unaffected and profound, that the enforcement by arms of the late pretensions of Great Britain, as threatened by her provincial authorities, is incompatible with honorable peace. If Great Britain, in violation of our rights, in disregard of our own solemn engagements, shall precipitate a war, this nation, I believe, will, as one man, brace itself for the conflict. Other gentlemen better understand than I do the spirit existing in their respective sections of the Union. The nation has, in the history of the past, a guarantee that the region in which Kentucky is situated will be found promptly obedient to the calls of the national honor. Satisfy them that peace is dishonorable, and they are for war. They will not inquire how much or how little territory is involved in the dispute; they will not surrender an inch, if it involves a sacrifice of the national honor. They will never consent to graduate honor by interest. They fought the battles of the country in the late war, from the Thames to the Balize, over questions wholly maritime, in which they had no direct interest. Yet, sir, the national honor demanded that war; and maritime in its origin as it was, it found nowhere in the Union more ardent and steadfast votaries than were found a thousand miles in the interior. Sir, as they were prompt then, so they will be prompt now to vindicate to the utmost, and to the last extremity, the honor of the country. They will not now calculate, as in times past they never have calculated, the sacrifices which such a contest may involve. They regard the maintenance of the national character and honor as paramount to all other considerations; for they see in it the only means of enjoying, in security, any of the inestimable blessings which Heaven has plainly reserved for their country. For this they deem no sacrifice too dear. Money, property, blood—count and measure it all—it is yours, freely—if the vindication of the national honor demands it!

SPEECH OF HON. M. FILLMORE,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 1, 1839,

On the bill giving the President additional power for the defense of the United States, &amp;c.

Mr. FILLMORE said it was with extreme reluctance that, in his feeble state of health, he said a word to protract this debate; nor should he have done so, but that he felt that his own constituents might have as deep an interest in the results of this bill as the inhabitants of any portion of the United States. This bill, if he could credit what had been said by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. EVANS,] or read by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. HOWARD,] was neither more nor less than a contingent declaration of war with Great Britain. In such an event his constituents had a deep and obvious interest. It was true, that on the face of the bill, and in the wording of the first, second, and third sections, it seemed to be contemplated that our collision with that Power would be confined chiefly to the frontier of Maine; but such would not turn out to be the fact. If resort was once had to arms, the matter would not end by a brief skirmish in Maine. That little tract of territory, cold and barren as a Siberian desert, was of but small value, but for the timber it contained. That would not be the battle-field on which this contest must be settled; the scene of conflict would extend along the entire northern frontier of the Union, and its chief seat would be upon the great northern lakes. If it was true, as the gentleman affirmed, that even the President himself did not fully appreciate the urgency of the crisis, what must be the consequence, upon that crisis, of passing a bill like this? What did the bill contemplate? What was the very first step it proposed? It went at once to commit us to war de facto. The first section went on the supposition that Great Britain would enforce the claim she had set up by a resort to arms. Was there any reason to suppose that this would be done? The gentleman from Maine had told the House that it would be attempted at once, and that a collision has already taken place.

Mr. EVANS. What I said, and what I now say is, that if Maine shall be left alone by this Government, she will be attacked; but it is my opinion that if this bill passes, no such attempt will be made, and that the bill, instead of producing, will prevent hostilities. I repeat the declaration that I look to it as a measure of peace, and my only fear is that it may come too late. The moment the provincial authorities find that if they advance they meet you and not Maine alone, rely upon it they will wait for advices from their Government.

Mr. FILLMORE. The gentleman then concedes that it is probable collision may have already taken place. We are, then, acting on a contingency, with little time to deliberate, and none to retract any step we may take. Suppose there shall be a collision before the result of our deliberations is known. Congress will be defunct, and what will be the duty of the President? To wait till he can lay propositions before the Government of Great Britain? To pause and negotiate, and then go to war? No. The nation is irretrievably committed, and it will be his duty at once to expel the invading force. No alternative is left him. There is no chance or space for repentance or advice. We have assumed that the act of Sir John Harvey is the act of his Government, and the President is at once to proceed to hostilities. I am not prepared to say that even this may not be necessary. From the little examination I have given to the subject, I have no doubt whatever that Maine is in the right. The only question is as to the manner and the time in which her right is to be enforced. In this question the whole country is interested, and especially the people of my own district. It appears to me that the Committee on Foreign Affairs have directed their attention exclusively to the interests and rights of Maine, and have, to a great extent, overlooked the great interests of other portions of the Union in this matter. Ought they to have forgotten the defenseless position in which the whole northern frontier would be placed in case of a war? I am surprised to find not one solitary provision in this bill for the defense of a lake frontier of fifteen hundred miles, with not a single fort upon the whole line, nor a single armed vessel owned by the Government. Is it right thus to make a contingent declaration of war, and make no provision whatever for the defense of that frontier, at the same time that ample provision is made for the sea-coast?

* The section was rejected by the House.

It may be said that we entered into a treaty with Great Britain in 1817 or 1818, limiting the number of armed vessels that should be maintained by either Power on those lakes. I admit it; but Great Britain has not invariably felt herself bound by that convention, for she has at least, I am informed, an armed steam vessel in her employ on Lake Ontario, two or three on the upper lakes, and one on Lake Champlain, by which, during the season of navigation, every lake town from Buffalo to Detroit may be utterly destroyed in less than one week, while we have nothing prepared to resist. I have been struck very forcibly with the singular, and, to me, unaccountable omission in this bill to make any provision for a case of such imperious necessity. I believe we have not one piece of ordnance on that whole frontier that could be pointed against an invading foe. I beg pardon of the House for asserting that we are wholly defenseless. I have just been told by the honorable gentleman from Michigan, who sits near me, that the Government, in its magnanimity, has given to the State of Michigan one nine-pounder. [A laugh.] All I ask of this House is, that, if they deem it necessary to the national honor to make a contingent declaration of war, they will insert in this bill some provision for the defense of the northern frontier that shall at least put us on a level with the Atlantic cities. We ask no more. I know there is not time to erect forts; but I ask, while the President of the United States is authorized in this bill to equip and employ the whole naval force of the United States for the defense of the sea-coast, will not Congress authorize him, at the same time, to purchase, arm, and equip the necessary number of steamboats for the defense of our northern frontier? Surely, it is the duty of the House to do so. Will they apply a torch which must set our whole northern frontier in a flame, and make no provision for our defense?

It is true we have a bill authorizing the erection of forts along the boundary line of Maine, and another for repairing the dilapidated works on Lake Ontario; but, from the report of the War Department, after sleeping a Rip Van Winkle sleep of thirty or forty years, it seems they have at length waked up to some apprehension of our exposed condition, and they now propose to commence at Fort Niagara a fortification now comparatively useless, and to proceed thence eastwardly, as if there was nothing west of that point worth defending. I shall be pardoned for saying that there are more people west of a meridian line drawn through Ontario, inhabiting States which border upon the lakes, than existed within the whole limits of the United States at the time of the Revolution; but it seems that war is to be declared, and all this portion of the Union is to be abandoned to its fate. Why this odious distinction?

Mr. HOWARD, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, complained of the view taken of this whole case by the gentleman from New York. The gentleman seemed to complain very heavily that there was nothing in this bill for the defense of the northern frontier, by water; but he would take the liberty of calling the gentleman's attention to the third section of the bill, which empowered the President to put into requisition the whole naval force of the United States, and employ it for the national defense; and though the bill contained no special authority for the erection of steam batteries, yet there was such a provision in another bill now before the Senate. The power of the President must, of course, depend on the amount of money placed at his disposal; he might employ a portion of the Navy on the lakes, as well as on the ocean; and vessels of war might be built and launched upon the lakes.

Mr. FILLMORE read the third section, as follows:

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That, in the event of either of the contingencies provided in the first section of this act, the President of the United States shall be authorized to complete the public armed vessels now authorized by law, and to equip, man, and employ, in actual service, all the naval force of the United States."

The honorable chairman of the committee says that the committee understood that the northern frontier might be defended in one of two ways: the President might fit out the vessels of the Navy, and employ them in the defense of the lakes. Now there is one objection to this: those vessels may find it very difficult to ascend the Niagara falls. It is said that a certain Secretary of War once directed vessels to be built on Lake Ontario which were to be used on Lake Erie, entirely forgetting that the falls were interposed. It certainly will not answer to fit out vessels on the Atlantic which are to be used on the lakes. The bill only allows the President to complete vessels already commenced. It is true that we had some vessels of war on Lake Erie, part of them built by ourselves, and another portion consisting of those taken from the British by Perry; but, after the last war, these vessels were sold to private citizens, and they are now navigating the lakes as merchantmen. The Government has not a single vessel upon that lake moved either by sails or steam.

I will not enter further into this argument. I trust it is quite sufficient to apprise the House of the actual state of the case to induce them to make some provision for the defense of the northern frontier. It surely is not necessary for me to refer to the exasperated state of feeling which has for some time prevailed on both sides of the line, or to remind the House that, with all the exertions of both Governments, it has been scarcely possible to preserve the national peace. If war shall come upon us without previous preparation, we have nothing else to expect but to see our cities and our villages laid in ashes, and our citizens murdered. Let me not, however, be misunderstood. We are fully ready to stand by Maine in the maintenance of her just rights. We are willing to bare our bosoms to the shafts of war whenever the honor of the nation shall require it. All we ask is that you shall make what provision is in your power for our defense. Put us upon the same footing with the Atlantic coast. The British Government has in the Canadas eighteen thousand troops, among the best that the world affords, and there is no preparation on our part for defense. True, we have the militia, prompt and brave, and ever ready to meet and repel an invading foe; but how are we to transport them to the spot where their services may be required? You have scarcely a single vessel in Government employ, and you urge an argument our treaty with England; but I pray gentlemen to remember that as soon as the two nations get to blows, all treaties are at an end. Mr. F. asked, in conclusion, that his amendment might be read, and it was read accordingly in the following words:

Add to the third section as follows:

"And to build, purchase, or charter, arm, equip, and man, such vessels and steamboats on the northern lakes and rivers whose waters communicate with the United States and Great Britain, as he shall deem necessary to protect the United States from invasion from that quarter."

This amendment was agreed to.

REMARKS OF HON. HUGH LEGARE, OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 1, 1839,

On the bill giving the President additional power for the defense of the United States, &c.

Mr. LEGARE said that he agreed with the gentleman who had just taken his seat, [Mr. MENEFEE,] in the sentiment that, of all things in the world, a war with England was most to be deprecated and most to be avoided, if it could be avoided without a sacrifice of the national honor and character; and, if Mr. L. considered this bill as a war measure, he should not be its advocate. But, so far from believing it to be a war measure, he held with the gentleman from Maine [Mr. EVANS] that, if any measure was calculated to avert war, it was a bill of this character. The measure proposed was no new thing in modern times. On the contrary, the experience of a few years past was full of similar instances. How often had the most formidable military forces been raised by the nations of Europe, not for the purpose of waging war, but only as a sheriff raises his posse to execute a writ; so these armies had been raised to carry into effect the law of nations. The French had raised armies and had battered down fortresses, and yet it was not held to be war. The Powers of Europe stood by and saw the decree passed by their mutual agreement carried into forcible effect. The thing was done by military force, with colors flying and drums beating, and by the discharges of parks of artillery; but still it was not war; and it was this very array of battle by which the peace of Europe was preserved. Gentlemen, therefore, need not be so much alarmed, as if the House, by passing this bill, was resorting to a war measure.

Before, however, he entered into the argument, he must first be permitted to say that he had regarded the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BIDDLE] as somewhat singular in the position he had taken. True, the gentleman had retracted what he had remarked as to the braggadocio style of the proceedings of the House.

Mr. BIDDLE said that he had retracted nothing. He had only restated what he said when up; and he still thought it premature in this Government to put on military array because the British Government had assumed a position for which our own conduct did certainly give them some pretext.

Mr. LEGARE. The gentleman admitted that the Committee on Foreign Affairs had not had in view a direct resort to war, although he was not without apprehensions that the measure they advocated might lead to such a result. The gentleman certainly would be greatly mistaken, if he supposed that the committee were either disposed to deal in the language of a braggadocio, or had the remotest desire to precipitate hostilities. For himself, Mr. L. could say that he had ever been the uniform advocate of peace. The members of the committee would bear him witness that even in our difficulties with Mexico, when her conduct gave us a just pretext for war, and our superiority in power presented a temptation to engage in hostilities, he had uniformly opposed a resort to arms. The committee had, indeed, prepared a manifesto to the world, exhibiting a list of our national grievances, and the ground of our just complaints against the Mexican Government; yet they had, without hesitation, recommended a reference of our difficulties to the arbitration of a third Power; and they would be disposed to do the same thing now did the time allow it. The House had been told that it was a great pity that they were called to pass so suddenly on a question out of which might grow such grave and important issues. And if the House were under obligations to discuss at large the whole question of our northeastern boundary, its past history, present state, and its whole merit, there might be something in the objection. Yet the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] had maintained that the question between us and Great Britain was so simple that an envoy who had never studied it might make himself completely master of the subject during the shortest voyage that ever was made across the Atlantic. Mr. L. had thought, at one time, that the gentleman was going to say our Government had given up possession of the disputed territory; but when he said he would go for the first section of the bill, he did admit that Maine had never abandoned her claim to the possession of the soil. It was true that neither the General nor the State Government ever had abandoned the possession of the territory, nor the claim to jurisdiction over it. But now a subordinate foreign functionary writes to the Governor of Maine that he has power to oust her from the possession of it by the force of arms.

The question was a simple one. The facts were all in our own possession, and could at any time be established. Indeed, he had never heard them disputed until this evening. Maine, then, being established in an undoubted ascertained right, and her people flying to arms as one man, the question was, whether that House had any other choice than to do its duty in support of what was just, and leave the results to Heaven. Could there be any doubt what the law of nations required under such circumstances? What was the language of that law? [Mr. L. here read a passage from Vattel.] There was the law, so laid down that none could misunderstand it. In this case the question of property was wholly immaterial; the question of possession was the only one to which we were to look. As to the property, indeed, nothing could be more clear; the question was fully discussed in an able report made to the other House by its Committee on Foreign Affairs. If any man wanted light on the whole controversy, there it was to be found. If any man had a lingering doubt upon his mind, let him read that document, and be convinced, as he soon would be, that there was nothing at all in the claim of Great Britain. The answer as to the question of boundary was spoken by Nature herself. Men might dispute about what constituted a highland, and what was a hill, and what was a mountain; but if there was any height of ground from which the streams run in opposite directions, into the St. Lawrence on the one hand, and into the Atlantic on the other, it was enough. The words of the treaty were answered. The everlasting, unalterable face of Nature herself, bore witness to the agreement between the two nations as to their boundary. The claim set up by Great Britain was a mere fetch—a pretext to get hold of a piece of ground which it was very desirable for her to possess. Under circumstances like these, was it possible for this Government to go further than to admit the ground of uti possidetis? We had given up to her the jurisdiction on the Madawaska. Must we go further than this? Shall we admit that the uncontested possession of the whole territory, not only on the Madawaska, but on the Aroostook, shall suddenly be taken by an armed force? The question whether Governor Fairfield had done amiss or no, in the step he had taken, was of comparatively little consequence. He had violated courtesy, but had not violated his official duty. He had done nothing more than drive off trespassers from a portion of territory of which his State had possession. Could there be any right in a foreign Government to enter it by force of arms, and drive him off, for that is threatened? Sir John Harvey had written to Governor Fairfield, giving him warning that he should enforce the exclusive possession of Great Britain by the employment of her military strength. It was a gross violation of the law of nations, and was not to be submitted to.

25TH CONG....3D SESS.

Maine Boundary Question—Mr. Adams.

Mr. L. said that it was not in the spirit of war he said this. He admitted that we must not pre-judge the question; but this nation could not treat with any foreign Power with a hostile foot upon her soil. Her first language to that nation must be—"Go back! withdraw your foot! and then we will send an ambassador."

Mr. L. said that nothing could be more deprecated by his constituents than a war with Great Britain; yet, when it was necessary to the honor of their country, none would be more ready in doing their whole duty. That necessity was the only question. They scorned the spirit of bravado; but, in their name, he should vote for this bill, if it were only to satisfy the British Government how deeply this country was interested in this question of jurisdiction, and as a means of giving greater solemnity to the negotiation in regard to it. He deprecated a resort to arms. To enter into a war for its own sake, was now too late for the spirit of the age. Within the last thirty years they had all seen contested questions of the most serious nature and the most threatening aspect dissipated into thin air, when the armies of both parties were raised, embodied, drawn out, and on the very edge of contest. He hailed it as one of the happy auguries of the future age of the world, that the united influence of commerce and Christianity had so often triumphed over the spirit of war, and even bade fair to banish it among men.

Under the influence of these feelings, Mr. L. would adjure gentlemen on all sides of the House not to go into those exciting topics which connected themselves with this subject, and which were so well calculated to stir up embittered feeling, and thus render incurable the breach between two great nations, whose kindred, origin, language, laws, and commerce ought to link them together in bonds of indissoluble amity and friendship.

SPEECH OF HON. J. Q. ADAMS,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 2, 1839,

On the bill giving the President additional power for the defense of the United States, &amp;c.

Mr. ADAMS said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I had entertained the hope that I should not have felt myself called upon to say one word more upon the subject now before the committee. I had hoped (and I still cherish the hope) that the immediate occasion for the passage of this bill, for the action of this House upon the matters to which it has reference, had passed away. That immediate occasion was of the most alarming, I may say of the most terrific character. It was no less than a direct menace from a commanding officer of the British Government, in a province adjoining one of our own States, of an immediate invasion of the United States by him, under the express and positive orders of his Government. Sir, the thought of war, even with the weakest nation, is a dreadful thought; but when contemplated with one of the most powerful nations on the face of the earth, I have no language to express the feeling with which the thought comes upon me, that such an event is impending over my country. And yet that was the attitude in which the subject was first presented to this House. Connected with this great and terrible idea of war, the first question which every patriot has to settle with himself is, with whom is the right; and, after that, he is called upon to meet every calamity of which human nature is susceptible, even to the loss of his own fortune and life—of the interest and the welfare of his family—of everything, in short, that is dear to man. He must meet it with an unflinching eye. And this was our position not more than four days ago. I say I cherish the hope that that hour has passed away for the present; that, in consequence of the agreement made between the minister of her Britannic Majesty and the Secretary of State here, an actual suspension of hostilities will be carried into effect. And that is all which is required to prevent that immediate collision to which we had looked. A suspension of hostilities, that is all we can now expect; for, sir, the officers of the British Government, military and diplomatic, are directly at issue with us on the very point upon which those hostilities were to commence, and are to commence, if at all. They are at issue, and that issue was first stated by the Governor of New Brunswick—was confirmed by her Britannic Majesty's Minister here—and was directly taken by the Secretary of State of the United States. Now if that issue were to be brought to the conflict of arms which three or four days ago seemed so immediately probable, I presume we should not have had the discussion which has already taken place on this bill. I presume there would have been some appearance of unanimity in the opinions of this House, as to what was to be done to defend the country from hostile assaults. But, sir, the aspect of the public question between us and Great Britain has changed since then—changed in consequence of the agreement made here—an agreement which, if there is time for it to reach the territory of the British Province before actual collision takes place, will, I presume, prevent collision until such time as the British Government shall be heard from.

Now, there is, behind this probability, a prospect of collision which we have just had—an old long-standing controversy in relation to territorial boundary. The question now is what will be the aspect of that controversy when the British Government shall have been informed of what has taken place here? I suppose I cannot possibly doubt that the British Government will recede from the ground that has been taken by their officers, military and diplomatic, and that that Government will not pretend to rest their determination to appeal to the God of battles for a decision of this controversy on the pretension of an agreement between them and the Government of the United States, that they should have that exclusive jurisdiction which is finally to inure to the party to which the territory shall be allotted. They will not do so, because they cannot produce any authority of such an argument. I trust, therefore, that they will recede. Probably they may make an argument which has been made for them in this House—certainly they will not make it with more ability—that, although there was not an explicit agreement, as stated by the British Minister here, still there was an understanding, an acquiescence on our part, in their assertion of that exclusive jurisdiction which they have constantly maintained. I say that, if they meet us with such an argument as that, it will be impossible for them, I defy them, to present an abler argument than has been made on this floor. If they should make that argument, and adhere to it—if they should put the assertion of a determination to maintain jurisdiction by force of arms upon that argument—and most especially, if they put it on the ground that, by a forcible expression of indignation on the part of the Legislature of your and my native Commonwealth, Mr. Chairman, the failure to sustain, with proper spirit, the right of our own country, had been denominated a surrender of this question—if, I say, the British Government shall convert that single expression of indignation into an argument to prove that this right had been surrendered, as has been argued here, then, we should be under the necessity of meeting them by another argument, to show that the foundation of their appeal to arms would, in that case, be as false as that which their officers have now taken in their behalf.

I believe that the British officer who has taken this ground has done so under a misapprehension; but how far that misapprehension extends, it must be left to future time to discover. It is quite possible (I do not say probable, though perhaps I might do so) that the instructions of this British officer have been drawn out in such language that he will be fully justified in the construction he has put upon them, and that they were so drawn out for the purpose of experiment. An experiment upon what? Upon the understandings of the members of this House; an experiment upon the spirit of the people of this country; an experiment whether we will endure, on any ground whatever, the assertion of a determination to settle, by force, the question which we have been so long and so unsuccessfully endeavoring to settle by negotiation. I repeat the expression of my belief that the British Government will disavow the construction given to his orders by the Governor of New Brunswick; but I do not undertake to say that they will not pretend that there has been an agreement on our part that exclusive jurisdiction of this territory, in the interval, until the settlement, should be held by them. It is quite possible that they may do so; and I confess that what I heard yesterday on this floor was so plausible, so ably urged, that I should not be surprised if the British Government should take a leaf from the reports of our debate of yesterday, and cast it in our teeth, as their argument for giving a new order to their Governor to take possession of the territory, not upon the pretension which he has now set up, but upon the argument which has been made in their favor upon this floor. I should not be surprised if this argument which has been urged upon us for doing nothing, for leaving the State of Maine to her fate, should now be taken and held forth by the British Government to say "No; we disavow the allegation of the express agreement; but you have endured it so long that you have surrendered the point, and there is your own evidence in the act of one of your own legislators, and you shall not resume it. We will take military possession of the country; it is too late for you to pretend to dispute the claim; you have surrendered it; we will keep and maintain it." That, sir, will be another experiment.

Now, to this experiment on the part of the British Governor of New Brunswick, the State of Maine, in words as strong, as clear, as unequivocal, as inflexible as human language can supply, has said that she is not prepared to submit; and the question is, whether we shall now say that we will not submit to that experiment nor any other having the same conclusion; that this question is to be settled by force, and not by hastening a little the languid course of Spanish negotiation, or, according to an old Roman proverb, putting it off to what was by them called the Greek Calends. Spain never settled anything by negotiation. "Mi venga la muerte de España." "Let my death come from Spain, for then it will be long enough."* I, for one, am not disposed either to endure experiments, or to submit for any great length of time to protract the settlement of the matter by negotiation. And there, I hope, is the moral lesson which will be learned by both Governments—that it is time to bring this negotiation to a close; and I shall vote for this bill, for every provision and every word of it, unless some objection should be raised of which I am not at present aware. I shall vote for it as an additional notification, which I hope will be accompanied, from the British Minister here, with an account of the proceedings of this House, like that which the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. KENNEDY] read for our information yesterday. I hope that Lord Palmerston will have an opportunity of reading what was said yesterday and to-day, and what will be done to-day, as accurately as the Duke of Wellington had of a much less agreeable debate that we had here three or four years ago, in which I took no part, but in which you, Mr. Chairman, took a distinguished part. I say that I shall vote for this bill to meet the contingency here contemplated, if it shall come, as we may hear to-morrow or the next day; and this being the last day we have left, we must come to some determination; we must make some provision for this time of difficulty and danger. I shall vote for this bill, therefore, not because it is probably the best that could be passed, if we had time to discuss the whole subject, but because it puts us in a state of defense. It is arming.

There is no kind of pretension that this is a war bill—it is arming—it is defense, from beginning to end—the defense of our territory—the defense of our soil. There is nothing in the slightest degree offensive in it, and therefore my ears are rather deaf to any intimation as to what this great nation may think of us if we do pass this bill—how she may take offense. Every independent nation upon earth has the right to arm, without giving offense to any other nation. All that any other nation has a right to inquire of another nation arming herself up to the teeth is, why? for what purpose? Is it offensive to her? It is the right of a neighboring nation to put this question, and if the answer is, we are arming in self-defense, the other party has not a right to say a word. The right to arm in self-defense is a right of peace, and is the best of all preservatives of peace, as has been said by others here, and as is known to every man having any acquaintance with the relations of peace and war between nations. So far from this being an offensive measure, it is, as another gentleman has remarked, an explicit offer of the olive branch. It authorizes the President to send a special minister to England. Now if I were to make any objection to any part of the bill, it would be to this. I am disposed to take rather a stiffer tone, and to say: let England send her special minister here; still I do not say that I oppose the proposition. But I do say that if I were at the head of affairs, I would not do this thing. It is a quarrel of England's own seeking or of her officer's. Let her disavow his act—there is no occasion to send a special minister for that. The minister resident there is quite competent to put that question to the British Government. Still, however, the tone of peace is very proper to be indulged in upon all occasions, wherever it can consistently; and I therefore shall not oppose this particular provision, though I repeat, that if I were to oppose any part of the bill, it would be this. As to the arming part, I shall go so far as the bill goes, or so far as it is the intention of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs to propose.

I must apologize for the extremely desultory nature of the observations I have made, or may make before I resume my seat; for, in reality, the aspect of this question has so changed, from hour to hour, that I have not had time to arrange the ideas I would present to the committee. I must therefore say what I do say in the most desultory manner. I had not intended to have said a word, and should not have done so but for the argument which we have had here upon this floor. And, sir, I regret to say (although I have no wish to find fault with the Administration) that, even in the letter from Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Fox, it is stated, in terms, that the President regrets that Maine should have taken the stand she has done. It is true the expression is so couched that it may be explained away to the State of Maine in a satisfactory manner. The President says he regrets that Maine felt compelled to resort to these measures. I regret that the expression is there, and I hope that it does not indicate, on the part of the Administration, the slightest intention of deserting Maine in any point or title of this controversy. I take this occasion to say (and this is the principal ground on which I have said anything) that I, for one, instead of regretting that Maine has taken this stand, admire and revere her for having done so. If she had any sense of self-respect, she could not have done otherwise; if she had any sense of her own right she could have taken no other ground. And, sir, that ground has been deliberately taken—it is not now taken for the first time. The present Governor of Maine has been made responsible, but I do not hold him as the first who has taken this ground. It was taken by the last Governor last year; and if political considerations are to be suffered to come at all into this discussion, the Governor of Maine of the last year and the Governor of the present are of different politics. I speak of your internal, inferior, little politics, as compared with the politics of the great world of mankind, to which this subject belongs. If I understand rightly, every step which has been taken by Maine has been taken by the unanimous vote of her Legislature. If this is not so, I desire some member from that State to correct me.

Mr. EVANS was understood to say (though but imperfectly heard by the reporter) that the resolution which gave rise to this proceeding was passed unanimously in both Houses, and that all the other proceedings were, with a single exception in the Senate, approved of unanimously.

Mr. ADAMS. Well, sir, if there was a single exception, we may allow a little fluttering of the heart to one individual out of a large body of a Legislature in two branches, as to the consequences which might follow their determination; and yet we may find that determination the only one consistent with the rights and the honor of the party aggrieved. I say that the act of Maine was deliberate; that all she has done was deliberate. She has been supported by two Legislatures—those of the past and present year. What she has done, then, has been done with deliberation. That is one of the qualities which belong to firm and consistent action. If there was any exception at all, it was hardly sufficient to prove the rule. Sir, it was that determination which shows the spirit to meet an enemy; and it was that spirit which, while it acts, is conscious that there is an enemy to meet. Is that a qualification to be disavowed and regretted by the President of the United States, or by this House? Is it the deliberation with which Maine has acted, is it the firmness which she has manifested, that is disapproved? To my mind, that firmness constitutes one of the greatest commendations of her action. What was that firmness? Why, it required the facing of a deadly enemy; at all events, it involved the possibility or the probability of such an event. And it was not facing that enemy as we, if this bill is passed, shall show that we are willing to face him; because how few of us here have any prospect before us of the calamities which may befall Maine, if this deliberate valor on her part is followed by that which was intended! Who does not know that Maine herself must suffer through every one of her veins, if this thing comes to the issue of battle? It is, therefore, in the prospect of immediate terrific danger that she has come to this deliberate purpose. And am I here, in my place, to declare that this was indiscretion; that it was rashness; that it is drawing us, without necessity, into a war? Let who will say so; I cannot. And now, where is this indiscretion, this rashness? What is it that Maine has said, and followed up by a large appropriation of her Legislature, and by a declaration of her Governor that he will call forth ten thousand of her sons to maintain it? What, I ask, is it? It is that she will defend her right of territory—a right which you, sir, and every individual here, say is unquestionable; that she will defend it against the threatened military occupation of a foreign Power. No, sir; far from regretting the act of Maine, I shall esteem her and her people higher for it during the short remnant of my life. It is the very act to which I, if I had been one of her citizens, would have advised her to the last hour of my existence.

In addition to all its other recommendations, I believe that this act was absolutely necessary, and necessary, if for no other reason than to do away with that which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BIDDLE] has this day explained to be, in his opinion, a delusion into which the British Government has fallen, in consequence of our having surrendered, or having been said by one of the Legislatures of the States to have surrendered, this question of jurisdiction. The gentleman argued that this surrender, by the failure of the General Government firmly to sustain our right whenever questioned before, was equal to a forfeiture of that right; and that, I take it, is to be the British argument, if we are hereafter to have any argument upon the subject. If the British Government are to maintain the act of their Governor, if they will not disavow their pretensions, it must be on the ground that we have been so tamely acquiescent in her usurpations for a series of years, that those usurpations have now got to be rights upon which she is determined to stand. Now, sound logic even, in different minds, does not always come to the same conclusion from the same premises. My conclusion from these premises (admitting them, to a certain extent, for I do not wish to look back) is, that it is incumbent upon us to remove that delusion; to wipe it off; to give the British Government to understand what is the true state of things; to admonish them that they must not construe our tameness in times past into an indication that she may extend her pretensions further, until, going from delusion to delusion, she finally comes to consider that she has an undisputed right to this territory. This experiment of the Governor of New Brunswick is a great step to that further delusion into which I wish to prevent the British Government from falling, so as to send them back to the original stage of the controversy, and say to them, "These experiments prove it to be necessary that we should settle this matter soon; we desire that there should be no more delusions, no more experiments."

Sir, in my opinion, this bill is one of the best arguments that we can use for that purpose. It will show not only that you do not intend to countenance these delusions, but that you mean to put an end to them. The bill is suited not alone to the extremity in which we have been placed within the last few days, but to the possibility of any other experiment, in case any other should be tried. It is suited to the possibility that the British Government, countenanced by what has been said on this floor, as they were countenanced by what was said here three or four years ago, instead of setting up the pretension now acted upon, may say, "It is true there never has been such jurisdiction, but you, by your acquiescence, have countenanced the idea that there was, and we will carry it through." If gentlemen, as a substitute for this bill, will offer something equally firm, equally efficient, equally good as an argument, I will take it; but the bill, as it stands, is good enough for me. If a special minister is to be sent to the British Government, I would give him this bill at the head of his instructions; I would tell him to make its contents known in extenso, as the diplomats sometimes say; to send it to Lord Palmerston, and ask him to meditate as much about that as the Duke of Wellington did about a dispatch from Sir Charles Vaughan upon a debate which took place here some years ago.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that I have said all I intended to say as to the right of the question, as to the actual existence of the claim to jurisdiction on the part of Maine, as to all the facts and materials which go to the support of our most just right. That subject was so fully, so clearly, so unanswerably set forth here yesterday by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. EVANS,] that I certainly can add nothing to its strength. I hope that his argument was listened to by all the members of this House with as much assiduity and attention as I listened to it myself. If I had any doubts on the subject before, I certainly could have none after hearing that argument.

In lieu of this bill, I understand that certain resolutions have been offered here as adopted by the Senate. I do not know that there is anything inconsistent between the bill and the resolutions, saving the one that carries, at all events, a face of censure upon Maine. I would as soon vote to set fire to this Capitol as I would vote for any resolution bearing the slightest mark of disapprobation towards any one thing that Maine has done in this controversy. I would do what the Legislature of Massachusetts has done, or what I trust she has done—pass resolutions assuming and indorsing all that Maine has done, and declaring in the face of the world that this nation will unanimously support her in all steps which she may find it necessary to take, consistent with the Constitution of the United States, in the same system of measures. In reference to the other resolutions, I say I do not know that there would be any inconsistency in voting for them as well as for this bill; though I confess that the resolutions, so far as regards the indications of what this House and this nation will do, are, after all, but words. Still I am willing to vote for them. They show a good disposition, and so far they are well enough. But this bill, set forth in extenso, is the rule of instructions which I would adopt, and which I hope will be adopted by this House unanimously, or as nearly so as possible.

Mr. LEGARE. Mr. Chairman, I have risen simply for the purpose of dissenting, in the most emphatic and solemn manner, from what I understand to be the drift of a part of the argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS.] I understood him to say that he disapproves of what appears in the message of the President of the United States to be an intimation of doubt whether Maine ought to be allowed to carry out her claims to their utmost extent without the consent of the General Government; and I understood him also to add that a certain resolution just passed by the other branch of Congress is obnoxious to censure on the same ground. Now I say, on behalf of my constituents, and I believe I speak the language of the whole South, that you must be very careful to make precisely the distinction which I had the honor of pointing out last night, and upon which the President bottoms his course of policy; that is to say, the distinction between defending Maine against an arrogant, I had almost said an insolent, pretension of a foreign Government, and permission given to Maine—a carte blanche—to enforce her claims against that Government, and thus put herself as much in the wrong in relation to that Government as I believe that Government is now in the wrong towards her and us. I do most anxiously beg this House to make the distinction.

Mr. ADAMS. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEGARE] has certainly misapprehended what I said, or intended to say. I did not mean to say that I was for giving to Maine a carte blanche to do what she pleased in the progress of this controversy; nor was it in reference to any future action of Maine that I made the remark as to my regret that, in this public document, it is said that the President regretted, not what Maine might do, but what she had already done. I spoke with reference to the past action of Maine; and when I said that I would indorse and assume what she had done, and would declare to her and to the whole world that this nation would support her in the measures which she had taken, I added at the time the words "in anything she did consistent with the Constitution of the United States." I say I distinctly added these words, or words equivalent in import. This was all I said. I did not undertake to say that Maine would do that which she had no right to do. I did not presume any such thing. I say I will support her in what she has done, and I regret that the President of the United States has used the language he did.

Mr. LEGARE. The momentous nature of this occasion must plead my apology for urging that the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] to whose venerable authority in such matters this House has always manifested so much deference, will make a more full explanation than he has just made. His remarks, however, furnish us of the South—who are willing to sustain and uphold the State of Maine so long and so far as her cause is righteous, and so far only—with an opportunity of declaring to her that we do not mean that she shall go beyond possession, and claim to enforce the mere right by arms. She, then, must be quiet for some time, at all events. In the abstract, I admit, I think her claim very clear. England does not think it so clear; and, in a contest involving such mighty consequences, it is presumptuous—nay, sir, it is criminal, in one member of the Confederacy to act without reference to what the other members may think. It is here that a warning voice ought to be addressed to Maine. We are bound to protect her, and we are willing and ready to do so, come what may. But, sir, I will never consent that any State in the Union shall cut short, by the voice or under the influences of passion, a question which the Constitution of the United States means to be decided here, and here alone, with all the form and solemnity of legislation. That will not do; and whatever we may do here, I trust that the President of the United States will know that we have voted with this understanding alone.

One word more. I declare that I would not trust the President of the United States with the tremendous contingent power vested in him by this bill, did I not believe from his character that he will be discreet in the use of it, and had he not himself avowed that such was his purpose.

REMARKS OF HON. H. EVERETT, OF VERMONT,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 2, 1839,

On the bill giving the President additional power for the defense of the United States, &c.

Mr. EVERETT said she should not have risen again in this debate but for some remarks that had fallen from the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS.] He did not know which to express most strongly, his regret or his astonishment at those remarks. That gentleman has been justly considered as the great champion of the freedom of debate in this Hall; and yet, sir, on this occasion—a question of vital importance—on a question which may compromise the peace of the nation, the tendency of his remarks—their moral effect—would be as effectually to foreclose debate as the famous gag-resolutions of December. And is it come to this? Are gentlemen, who deem it their duty to examine, in good faith, the grounds of this controversy, to ascertain, while there is yet time, before the die is cast, whether our quarrel be just? Are they to be held up to public odium as taking sides with the enemy—as furnishing him with arguments and pretenses for aggression? If they should attempt to allay excitement—to express a hope that the peace of the country may be preserved without the menacing attitude of war, are they to be represented as enemies of their country? I trust, not, sir. I trust we may here freely deliberate on every measure that shall be proposed, whether of peace or of war. However much I might differ from those gentlemen, who may have questioned the propriety of the course pursued by the State of Maine, yet I fully accord to them the right so to do, and on this occasion I cannot question the purity of their motives; no one can doubt their sincerity or their patriotism. What, sir, because a measure is recommended by the Executive, shall we refuse to deliberate? Shall Congress surrender the power of declaring war to the Executive?

Never, sir, never. But the enemy may hear our debates! And shall the fear of this restrain all debate, but on one side? Why, if there is this danger, was not the message confidential? Why are we not sitting with closed doors? Is it the sole object, the only legitimate object of this debate to furnish additional excitement to the country, already in high excitement from other causes? Is this the only duty required of us? Will the people be satisfied with this? Will they not require at our hand a true representation of the state of the pending controversy? And I cannot but again repeat my regret and astonishment that an attempt should have been made to trammel the freedom of debate on this all-important subject. I do not say that the honorable gentleman has, in direct terms, denounced any who have taken part in this debate as enemies of their country, or that he intended to exhibit them in that odious light; but that such obviously was the tendency of his remarks.

What, sir, is the present state of the controversy, and what the measures we propose to adopt? The controversy originated between minor parties—the Governor of New Brunswick and the State of Maine—not on the right of property to the territory itself, but on the right of exclusive jurisdiction, until the right of property should be determined. This right of jurisdiction was claimed by both parties, and both were preparing to support their claims by arms. In this state of threatening hostility, the higher powers interfered—the Federal Government and the Government of Great Britain. The latter rested her claim to jurisdiction on an alleged agreement with the United States. We denied the agreement, and called on the British Minister for the proof, and he referred the subject to his Government. The point in issue between the two Governments was the alleged agreement. Thus stood the controversy, as stated in the message of the 26th. On the next day the Secretary of State and the British Minister entered into an arrangement for the suspension of hostilities, until the final settlement of the territorial dispute, or until the Governments of the United States and Great Britain should come to some definitive conclusion upon the subordinate point upon which they are now at issue. Such is the arrangement they recommend to the Governor of New Brunswick and the State of Maine. And, in this state of the controversy, what is necessary now to be done by Congress? In my opinion nothing, or, at most, nothing more than to pass the fourth and fifth sections of the bill before us, provide funds for any contingency, and for a special mission. Had such been the recommendation of the President, who can doubt it would have been adopted? It is true that the arrangement is, in terms, only recommendatory, yet who doubts that it will be acceded to by the Governor of New Brunswick? He will never take the responsibility of involving his country in war against the earnest recommendation of the minister of his Government. We ought to act on the presumption that he will accede to it, and surely that Maine will accede to it; that they will both voluntarily accede to it. And, I ask, is it policy to superadd a menace to one of the parties? May not its tendency be to wound the pride of the one, and to add encouraging excitement to the other? I very much fear its effects on both. And what is the measure now proposed?

The first section of this bill authorizes the President to call out the militia for a purpose not authorized by the Constitution; if not, it is wholly unnecessary. If the attempt to take possession of the disputed territory by an armed force is an invasion of the territory of a State, then this section is unnecessary; if not an invasion, then the calling out of the militia to resist the attempt is not a case within the Constitution. It is the act of making war, and cannot be delegated. To Congress alone belongs the power to declare war. The second section authorizes the President to raise an army of twenty regiments, on a contingency, of which he alone is the judge. For one, I should be unwilling to delegate this authority, even if we had the power; and more especially as Congress may be convened in sixty days. And of what possible use would it be, during this short interval, to grant this power? If raised, they would certainly be more effective than militia. But they could scarcely be begun to be raised within that period. And what is the object of thus hastily raising this army of twenty regiments? Merely to meet the possible contingency that the Governor of New Brunswick will refuse to accede to the arrangement; a bare possibility, if it is to be left to his voluntary action. But, should this contingency happen, is not the power to call out the militia sufficient for the occasion? Is it not the only power you can effectually use until Congress shall convene? What is this section, then, but mere menace? Why pass it? What good purpose can it serve? But, sir, if it be among the possibilities that this bill should be used, in the tone, temper, and manner indicated by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Adams,] it would form a decisive objection to its passage. I understood him to say that he would have this bill placed at the head of the instructions of the special minister; and that the instructions, thus headed, should be ordered to be communicated in extenso to the British Government! War would be the necessary consequence. The feeblest Government on earth would refuse to negotiate under such a menace, thus presented. If, I repeat, it is among the possibilities that this bill should be used in this tone, temper, and manner, it would form, in my mind, an insuperable objection to its passage; and I cannot but repeat my regret and astonishment that such a purpose should have been indicated.

I cannot bring myself to believe it possible for two nations to be brought into conflict on a mere collateral question; on a question, too, which seems for the present to be put at rest by the arrangement already made; and I have again to express my regret that the great point of the controversy—the right to the territory—has not long ago been brought to a close. To the two Governments it belongs to settle that controversy; and when the President shall inform Congress that all negotiations are at an end, it will then take immediate measures to put the State of Maine in possession of all that belongs to her.

MAINE BOUNDARY QUESTION.

REMARKS OF HON. J. L. TILLINGHAST, OF RHODE ISLAND,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 2, 1839,

On the bill giving the President additional power for the defense of the United States.

A suggestion having been made by Mr. ROBERTSON that some alteration might be made in the first section of the bill to make it conform to a suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Adams] respecting the phrase "her claim to exclusive jurisdiction."

Mr. TILLINGHAST said he had marked that passage in the bill with a view to submit to the consideration of the House, or to the committee who reported the bill, the propriety of substituting some form of expression that would more strictly conform to what he believed to be the state of the facts before them. He did not desire to insist on a verbal amendment, unless it should prove acceptable to the committee and the House as a modification, but asked their attention to an alteration by striking out the words "to enforce by arms her claim," and inserting in their place "or by any power or functionary acting for the Government of Great Britain, to enforce by arms any claim;" so that it might read, "to resist any attempt on the part of Great Britain, or by any Power or functionary acting for the Government of Great Britain, to enforce by arms any claim to exclusive jurisdiction over that part of the State of Maine," &c.

Great Britain had set up a claim to the territory, which claim was now under negotiation; but the question now is upon another supposed claim, namely: a claim to the immediate exclusive jurisdiction.

By the present terms of the bill it seemed to be assumed that the Government of Great Britain had set up and asserted to our Government a claim, as her claim, to this exclusive jurisdiction pending the negotiation; it seemed to be implied, also, that she was preparing to enforce that claim by arms. Now, although it was evident that a belief was entertained by provincial and diplomatic agents of Great Britain, that an agreement existed between the two Governments far more extensive than the real arrangement, and conceding to the British authorities the exclusive jurisdiction over the whole disputed territory until the controversy should be finally adjusted, (as to which, it was not difficult to perceive how they had been led to and left in such a belief,) and although Sir John Harvey, as Governor of New Brunswick, had manifestly acted under such a belief, yet, in any of the documents or correspondence to which the House had access, all of which he had carefully examined, he had not found that Great Britain had asserted to our Government this distinct claim, and thus made it her claim, and one which she was to stand to and abide by, unless the recent note of Mr. Fox could be viewed in that light. But, in that note, Mr. Fox does not so much appear to intend to set up a claim, as to refer to what he supposed was a fact, to a supposed agreement by which the parties were to be governed; and when the existence of such an agreement is explicitly denied by our Government, he does not thereupon assert a claim to the jurisdiction as the claim of his Government; but, after protesting, to save all rights, he says, in effect, that he is not prepared with evidence of such an agreement, and that he will not commit his Government by any declaration of its intentions in that particular until he receives its specific instructions. So, he thought, the note of Mr. Fox must be construed. Certainly, it seemed to him, there was nothing in that note or in the subsequent pacific and satisfactory step taken by the British Minister, which indicated that hostile intentions were entertained by the British Government. And, he would add, that after due reflection upon the present feelings of the people of the two nations towards each other; upon the deep sense which both appeared to entertain of the necessity of peace to their highest and best interests; and upon the pacific and friendly dispositions which there was every reason to believe were felt, and which up to this moment were mutually manifested by both Governments—few, if any, could seriously suppose that a state of war between the two nations was about to arise from the matter now in question. He believed the difficulty would be adjusted, as it ought long since to have been, by negotiation. And he was not disposed to place Great Britain, in the negotiation, upon ground in advance of that which, he believed, she actually occupied. If she had such a claim, which her Government was prepared to stand by as her claim, he preferred that she should bring it forward by and for herself, and distinctly assert it to our Government. He would not appear to concede, by the terms of the bill, that she, as a nation, had made or adopted the claim, when it might turn out, and, if there were no undisclosed transactions, he thought it must turn out, that she might not choose to make it.

SIXTH CENSUS.

REMARKS OF HON. A. P. GRANT,
OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 28, 1839,

On the bill to provide for taking the Sixth Census of enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States.

Mr. GRANT said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I rise not for the purpose of making a speech, nor do I intend to discuss the merits of this bill. I am by no means ambitious, especially at this late period of the session, of being numbered among the debaters upon this floor, nor do I consider it important to my private interest to publish a book for distribution among my constituents. With them I have no particular accounts to settle—no reflection to secure—no peculiar position to explain, and were I inclined to follow the example that has just been given us, and waste some hours of the vastly precious and important time of this House, in a discussion upon matters and things in general, it would be without excuse. Being aware, as I am, of the vast amount of business now lying upon your table undisposed of, and how much the public interest is suffering for want of the early action of Congress, I should be recreant to my own duty, and faithless to those whom I was sent to represent, should I contribute my voice to any further waste of time.

When I took a seat in this Hall, in marking out the course I should pursue, I resolved to engage in no debate, unless under extraordinary circumstances, except upon some question immediately affecting my constituents. Thus far have I lived up to the letter and spirit of this resolution; and I would not now, at this late hour of the night, trespass upon the indulgence of the House, did I not consider that, after the very extraordinary remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. Graves,] to be longer silent would be criminal. To me, sir, the course taken by the gentleman has been entirely inexplicable. Yes, and without excuse. No one, who has listened to his political tirade; to his repetition of the often-refuted calumnies annually published against the Administration, but has been convinced of the latitude for which they were intended. When I called the gentleman to order, he was animadverting upon the New York elections; supposing he had wholly forgotten the bill under consideration, I desired to set him right; but I must concede to him great consistency for making a long speech without devoting any part of it in particular to the question before the House. How deeply interested the gentleman may be in the approaching Kentucky elections, or what account he may be called upon to settle with his constituents, I know not; yet I envy not the honor or situation of the representative who has a constituency that are to be satisfied only with such labors, with such trash. The gentleman desired a reconsideration of the vote fixing the pay of the marshals of Tennessee at $200, avowedly for the purpose of reducing them to the same aggregate amount with the fees paid to the marshals of Kentucky. But no sooner does the motion prevail, than we find the gentleman abandoning the subject and each of the States, soon ensconcing himself in the room occupied by the investigating committee in the city of New York, and there listening to the testimony relating to the amount of taxes imposed upon office-holders to carry on the New York elections. The next moment we find him reading from some printed book, which purported to contain an account of that investigation. What this book can be, or where he procured it, is beyond my knowledge. It is known to us all that the proceedings of that committee have not been made public, nor are they published in any other manner than in their journal. Whether the majority have extended to the gentleman a favor that has not been granted by the minority to any of their friends, and furnished him their journal, I am not informed; nor am I disposed to complain of any advantage which that gentleman may have over myself in keeping himself advised of the proceedings of that committee.

Mr. Speaker, I have risen for another purpose, and with a different object. The gentleman, not content with his visit to the city of New York, and his attack upon its Democratic citizens, has poached upon my fallow ground; has gone into my district, and most grossly assailed the Administration for retaining in office a man by the name of Smith, as postmaster at New London, who, he says, is guilty of various high criminal offenses, and has fled from Massachusetts under an indictment for forgery.

Mr. GRAVES remarked that it was not in Mr. GRANT's district, but in Mr. FOSTER's, and that he had so expressly charged.

Mr. GRANT. Sir, I believe I know my own district; and most certainly should feel not a little mortified were I not as well acquainted with its limits and my own constituents as the gentleman from Kentucky. He has laid the venue of this transaction at New London, Oneida county. That place, sir, is in my district; and, although in the county where my colleague [Mr. FOSTER] resides, I am well acquainted with its location, and with many of its highly respectable inhabitants. We are told that these charges are known to my colleague, [Mr. FOSTER,] that they have been made known at the Post Office Department, and substantiated by proof; and that this Mr. Smith, with all his sins upon his head, is still retained in office. I regret much the absence of my colleague, who, were he here, could, and I have no doubt would, give a perfectly satisfactory explanation of this matter. But, sir, as to myself, I disavow all knowledge of the charges thus sweepingly made against this postmaster, and aver that this is the first time that I ever heard of them. I go further: I give no credit to their truth; and in this conclusion am greatly strengthened by my confidence in the able and indefatigable individual who so faithfully presides over the General Post Office Department. I believe this to be one of the thousand and one calumnies that are daily heaped upon the Administration.

Mr. GRAVES inquired if the gentleman from New York intended to charge him with uttering a calumny?

Mr. GRANT. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has told us that proof of these charges has been furnished to the Postmaster General; and upon that proof he has been called upon to remove Smith, but has not done so. Now, sir, I wish the gentleman expressly to understand, that I allege neither that the charges are true or false, nor do I care by whom they are uttered; but if the gentleman pretends that proof of the truth of these charges has been furnished to the Postmaster General, and he has refused to dismiss Smith, this I deny; this I charge to be a calumny. I feel warranted in this expression, from my confidence in the integrity, ability, and faithfulness of that distinguished public officer, the Postmaster General. With Smith I am not acquainted, but know full well that he would have been removed at once had such charges been substantiated against him. Had Smith possessed the character that has been charged upon him, and efforts been made to effect his removal, is it to be supposed that I could have held a seat upon this floor for two years without having heard of these proceedings? It is possible, yet scarcely possible, but far from being probable, that such a state of things would have existed without my knowledge.

But, Mr. Speaker, there are other portions of the gentleman's remarks that filled me with greater surprise, and fell more harshly upon my ear than any to which I have alluded.

The honorable member has seen fit to avail himself of this occasion to make a rude, gross, and wholly unprovoked attack upon a high-minded, honorable, and distinguished individual residing in the northern part of New York, (Mr. Gillet), who formerly was a member of this House. What possible connection this part of his speech has with the bill now before us, I must confess my inability to discover. That I may not be wrong in my quotation, I call upon the gentleman from Kentucky to know whether he used the language I have taken down, as I wish to use the very words used by him. In speaking of this gentleman, he remarked "that he did not know what office he had the capacity to fill."

Mr. GRAVES admitted that he made use of such or similar words.

Mr. GRANT. He also informed us, in a sneering, sarcastic manner, evidently designed to reflect upon Mr. Gillet, that when he returned here last fall, he was surprised to find him strolling about the Capitol, and had the curiosity to inquire his business, and then learned that he held some office as Indian agent under the Government, with the pay of eight dollars per day.

What should have called forth such remarks from the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GRAVES] I am entirely unable to conceive, and why he should assail such an individual at this time, and in a place where he knew Mr. Gillet could not in person make any defense, is, to me, matter of great wonder. Sir, I envy not the honor or the happiness of any man who will take advantage of his privileges upon this floor to gratify private malice, or will attack the character of a private citizen, who, by your rules, cannot be admitted within the bar of this Hall.

In the selection of his victim, however, the gentleman could not have been more unfortunate. The character of the individual thus assailed requires no studied eulogy at my hands, and I can assure the gentleman that no remarks of his, here or elsewhere, can affect that character in the slightest degree in the estimation of those to whom Mr. Gillet is personally known.

Mr. Gillet is not a constituent of mine, but resides at some distance from me; yet it has been my good fortune to be one of his acquaintances, and it is with pleasure I am able to state that I am well and intimately acquainted with him. Sir, I desire to make no unfair or invidious comparisons, nor do I believe I disparage the hopes, standing, or ambition of any one, when I state my conviction that no man who holds a seat upon this floor possesses talent, integrity, and industry in a more eminent degree than Mr. Gillet. Twice was he elected, with a most decisive vote, a Representative to this House, and of him truly it is said, that no man ever possessed more fully the confidence of his constituents. So popular was he in his own district, and so justly were his talents and public services appreciated, that had not a practice existed in our State, where a district is composed of two counties, to take the member alternately from each, he would have been continued as a Representative to this day. His successor is from the other county in his district.

But really, we are gravely told that this individual is without capacity—that he has not the requisite qualifications to discharge the duties of any office? Can the gentleman from Kentucky be sincere in this declaration? Does he suppose that any man who knows Mr. Gillet will believe him? And by whom are these charges made? Are they preferred by a man who was a member of this House at the same time with Mr. Gillet? I understand that both of these gentlemen were members of the last Congress. Will the gentleman please advise me whether this is so?

Mr. GRAVES replied in the affirmative.

Mr. GRANT. Then, sir, this avowal only adds to my surprise; and I must further inquire of the gentleman where he kept himself during the period that Mr. Gillet was so industriously and efficiently engaged in the business of this House? Did he ever listen to his able speeches, or ever read his elaborate, comprehensive and able reports? Does he know to what committees he was assigned, and the labors he then performed? If so, all must have escaped and passed from him like the visions of a dream. No man ever discharged his duties with more scrupulous fidelity. No man ever labored with more untiring zeal or disinterested devotion for the interest of his constituents, nor were the efforts of any individual more justly appreciated by those whom he immediately represented. His published speeches and reports displayed a comprehensive mind and great research; and of the latter, there are those still on the files of this House which would do credit not only to any member on this floor, but to any statesman in our country. And yet a man is found who will rise in his place, and on an unimportant motion to reduce certain fees allowed to the marshals of Tennessee, declare that this individual has no capacity—is incapable of discharging the duties of any office. To such a man, and under such circumstances, I say the charge is made either from ignorance or wantonness.

The SPEAKER interposed, and called the gentleman from New York to order.

Mr. GRANT. Mr. Speaker, I design not to violate any of the rules of this body, nor give offense to any of its members; but I cannot refrain from expressing my mind in language that is not to be misunderstood.

Does the gentleman wish to know why it is that Mr. Gillet is occasionally to be seen in and about this Capitol? If so, I will explain to him, and will assure the gentleman that Mr. Gillet has the same right to stroll about this Capitol, at the tune of eight dollars per diem, as he has himself. Possessing the confidence of the President for capacity, integrity, and general fitness, Mr. Gillet some time since was honored with the appointment of United States Commissioner, to treat and to make treaties with the Six Nations of Indians, in the State of New York, and is here in the discharge of his public duties as such commissioner. I can also further inform the gentleman, if he is not already aware of the fact, that the confidence of the President has not been misplaced, and that his duties have been discharged with great credit, ability, and faithfulness.

Mr. Speaker, I am admonished that already I have consumed more of the time of the House than I intended, and yet trust there is a sufficient excuse in the peculiar occasion that so unexpectedly called me up. I will add no more, except the earnest hope that we may at once proceed to dispose of this bill.

NOTE.—Mr. GRANT, we understand, immediately called at the Post Office Department, and ascertained the facts in the case of Smith, who had been removed more than a month before. The next morning, after the reading of the Journal, he rose, and, alluding to the debate of the preceding day, asked leave to make an explanation. Objection was made, and he moved to dispense with the rules, which was negatived. It is believed that Mr. GRAVES was one of those who voted against suspension. Having given utterance to calumnious charges, he had not the justice to permit the truth to be told.

INTERFERENCE IN ELECTIONS.

SPEECH OF HON. A. CUTHBERT, OF GEORGIA,

IN THE SENATE, February 20, 1839,

On Mr. CRITTENDEN'S bill to prevent the interference of certain Federal officers in elections.

Mr. CUTHBERT said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: When I obtained the floor on Saturday last, my health was much better than it has been since; and though I had made some little preparation, so far as regards embodying my positions, I have, ever since that day, been suffering under severe indisposition—too severe to permit me to give that attention to the subject which its importance deserves. This I regard not so much on my own account as on the account of the Senate; and I have therefore determined not to keep back the debate, but to proceed in the condition I am in.

I think the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] will himself admit that the evil should be great and evident, and that its influences should be powerful and dangerous, to justify so extraordinary a corrective as that proposed by him. For the purpose of diminishing the patronage of the Executive, the bill introduced by him proposes to disfranchise a large portion of the citizens of the United States, to divest them of the rights and privileges secured to them by the Constitution, and inherited from their ancestors, and to subject them to fine and imprisonment, and perpetual disqualification from holding office under the Government.

The question is, does such an evil exist. Do we feel that in America such extraordinary mischiefs flow from the influence of patronage, that the liberty of speech, which is not only sweet liberty itself, but the guardian of every principle on which liberty is founded, should be sacrilegiously invaded? The question is fairly stated. The remedy should only be used where some great evil exists, and the inquiry should therefore be made, does the evil exist? For the reason that the discussion on this subject has been very ample, and that the bill has been strictly examined in all its details, I shall content myself with only stating general principles, and confining myself to the example cited by the Senator from Kentucky, and inquire whether there is any parallel in this country, so far as the results flowing from the exercise of patronage are concerned, with the country from whence we derived our origin. The example of England has been exultingly appealed to by the Senator; England, England, is all that we hear from the gentleman. English philosophical writers have been quoted; English orators have been appealed to, and English statutes have been paraded before the Senate in support of this high-handed and extraordinary assault on the liberty of the citizen. Is it so, that that which is good in England must necessarily be so in America? Is the structure of society the same in both countries; and do the institutions of England rest on the same foundations as ours? No; a strong contrast may be found, not a similitude; not an agreement, but a wide and essential difference of laws and customs of the two countries from each other. I have no doubt but the Senator, like myself, is conscious that the glorious institutions of his country, though some evils may exist in them; stand as a mark of admiration for the rest of the world. If so, then has he, incautiously, perhaps, been betrayed by party feeling into the introduction of a measure which brings his own country into comparison with a country and state of society which cannot be compared with her without disparagement.

Mr. President, perhaps we could judge this case more clearly if, in a simple manner, we inquired under what institutions of Government, and under what state of society, patronage becomes a powerful principle, capable of producing such great effects as to require an extraordinary remedy; also, under what form of Government, and in what state of society, it is a principle that works mischief, and is therefore to be counteracted by means dangerous to the best principles of Government. Let us then bring this English example, that has been so admired, into comparison with ours in regard to this matter.

What are the institutions of that Government, and what is the structure of society in that country, where patronage is a formidable principle to be met by powerful means, lest it should overturn public liberty? It is that Government, and that state of society, in which the Government is in the possession of a particular class of society, and that class not the most numerous, who are in their feelings and opinions to be influenced by such patronage. This is the first condition of society in which patronage is so powerful that it should be watched with jealousy. The next condition of that society is this: that the executive or patronizing power should have the means of drawing to itself the products of the labor of the producing classes; and the third condition of this society is, that there should be those establishments in the country which would enable the Executive so to extend that patronage as to keep down the governed class. If any one of these conditions fail, patronage is necessarily feeble; if they concur, it is hardly to be resisted; and in England these conditions all concurring, patronage has there overcome all resistance.

The Government of England is in the hands of a class—perhaps I should say the aristocracy and the fund-holders—and the Government being in the possession of this class, not the most numerous, patronage may influence the suffrages of that class to accomplish its measures and sustain its power. The peculiarity of England is this: that while it has a powerful aristocracy, this class has great necessities to meet, for which it must depend on the Government. When I say this much, every Senator's thoughts anticipate what is to follow. The principle of primogeniture is established in England, and runs through all her laws, customs, and habits, because that principle is necessary to maintain in rank, influence, and splendor, the aristocracy, which has possession of the Government. That very principle which throws this class in servile dependence upon the Government makes it its most zealous and efficient supporter. The eldest son inheriting all the property of the parent, there is thrown upon society a vast number of younger children, who must either be provided for by the Government, or left in a state of destitution, which would bring that aristocracy into contempt. The principle of primogeniture, therefore, which is the strength of the aristocracy, is also their weakness, because the younger children, inheriting no patrimony, must find some other means of procuring subsistence, or they are thrown in servile dependence upon the Government. That means is found in the numerous and lucrative offices in the gift of the Crown. These are the commissions in the army and navy—the church livings of various degrees of emolument—numerous places in the law—offices connected with their vast colonial possessions, together with hundreds of sinecure places, altogether unknown to our simple and economical institutions.

The next question is: has she the revenue drawn from the productive labor, and the proceeds of the property of the great body of the nation—has she means by which the Executive, in procuring power, can, in this manner, contribute to the support of, and entirely sustain, this numerous class, with their families? She has always had $300,000,000, drawn from the productive classes, for her annual revenue. For the taxing power being in the hands of a powerful aristocracy, in consequence of the limitation of the right of suffrage, by which the laboring and productive classes, from whom the taxes are drawn, are denied a voice in assessing them, this aristocracy, who are, in fact, the tax consumers, have an interest in levying a sufficient amount to support the numerous offices which are to be filled by those connected with them. At the very moment that the Ministry are boasting of their economy; at the moment that the complaint is made that the economy of the Government is so strict that it is pining to the quick, this unproductive class is entirely sustained from the proceeds of the labor of the productive. The second condition is therefore answered. The first was, that the Government should be in the possession of a few who are to be influenced by its patronage. The second was, that the Government should have the means of approaching them with patronage. And the third condition was, that the Government should have those establishments which might become the instruments by which to reach the patronized aristocracy or governing class.

What furnishes the agency? The offices, by which the Government is brought into contact with the class which is to fill them. There is the army, with its numerous commissions; a powerful navy, of which ninety ships are in commission at this moment, when two or three ships-of-war are sufficient to protect our lucrative commerce in all parts of the world. There are also her vast colonial possessions, which afford a means of powerful patronage. Then there is the bar, with its numerous places, and the church, with places more numerous still. Turn your eyes where you will, and you behold the land covered with the priesthood of the national church, from the mitred bishop to the parish priest, supported from the national revenue, directly or indirectly under the patronage of the Government, and composed almost exclusively of the younger sons of the privileged class. The Church of England is one of the most potent instruments of patronage to the English monarch.

Give me a governing class small in their numbers, and that class wielding the power of the Government not only without regard to the interests of the great body of the people, but with an express inclination to keep them in a state of depression, and prevent them from acquiring the power of overturning their monopoly, and I can easily show that they possess a patronage utterly destructive of liberty. Give them the means of operating on the productive classes by their numerous interested agents, and what follows? They will proclaim that the strictest economy is exercised in the administration of the Government. When their interest requires it, the people will be assailed with appeals to their passions and their prejudices. War, horrid war, will be proclaimed as necessary for the honor and interests of the nation. That horrid god, with bloody jaws and furious eyes, will be invoked to the aid of the governing class in maintaining their supremacy over the governed. Who ever heard of a plan for educating the people proposed by their aristocratic oppressors? Who ever heard this class urge that war was to be avoided; that it made widows and orphans; that it was the cause of physical pains to those who entered into the combat, and of demoralization to all? The contrary feeling proceeds from false honor, and it was that feeling which the governing class sought to infuse into the governed. Shall the nation submit to insult? Shall the pride of Britain submit to an indignity? and shall we not always be prepared with large means, not only to repel aggression and chastise insult, but for final triumph, by having the means of giving the first and effectual blow? By such arguments as this, a state of things was produced which enabled the Government to contribute to the support of the younger sons of their aristocracy, and by which means they were not only supported, but supported in a degree of pomp and luxury suited to their high pretensions. Thus, having put the Government in the hands of a few, you have all that is desired to perpetuate their power, and enable them to support it from the products of the labor of the productive classes.

Mr. President, to these three great conditions in the Government of England, there are two auxiliary conditions, powerfully contributing to their strength. The first auxiliary is, that the Executive or patronizing power should be hereditary. This being the case, parties are not formed whose interest it is to counteract Executive usurpations. This power being unchanging, that principle by which those seeking office counteract the influence of those in office is entirely lost. No one who desires office dares to insult that Executive, by questioning the justice or propriety of his appointments, as such an act would condemn him to despair of ever holding office himself; it would only disappoint his own wishes. The next auxiliary principle is this: where it is difficult to procure the means of subsistence, there patronage requires new vigor. Where it is difficult to procure subsistence, where all the employments of active life are filled up, there the pursuit of office is one of great anxiety and perseverance. How is it in England? There the liberal professions are all filled to overflowing. The bar, the church, the medical profession, are all overstocked; and in mercantile pursuits, the business of trade, and even of labor, where the whole day of toil barely procures bread enough to sustain life, there are hosts of eager, anxious competitors jostling each other. In the manufacturing districts, where the laborers ask only for employment and bread, they have been answered with steel. Armed troops rush on them, and cut them down with savage butchery, while no resource is left them but passive submission. Thus all the professions and employments of life, the church, the bar, the medical profession, the army and navy, with all the employments afforded by commerce and the arts, are filled up with eager and anxious competitors. Here, then, is a condition of society in which the desire for, and necessity of, employment is so strong as to make patronage a powerful principle.

Now, sir, how will these principles apply to our country. Can from two and a half to three million voters be influenced by the limited expenditures of this Government? A whole nation to patronize itself! An idea too ludicrous, too absurd, to need a refutation. In our country suffrage is essentially universal—the exceptions being so trifling as to allow me to consider it so. Patronage is then to be applied not to the governing or governed class, but to scattered individuals of an entire people. How situated then would that Administration be, which would think of applying its patronage to an unworthy purpose? Most of us do not see the Federal Government by the means of its officers. Many of us at our homes may cast our eyes around, and taking the whole horizon in view, hardly see a spot in which even a little postmaster may be found. And here, with this limited patronage, is an Administration which is so usurp the liberties of the people, by means of such patronage! Reason cannot comprehend it—the absurdity is too great to allow of its being refuted.

Gentlemen say that there are certain points in the Union where patronage is concentrated. In Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, and Boston. What then? Has the Administration carried the elections in these cities by means of its officers? Far different is the state of facts. The Administration has held all this concentrated patronage in vain. Can it be believed that, in a city like New York, where three hundred thousand people are roused to the highest state of excitement in what they believed to be a struggle for their liberties, they could be controlled by a few office-holders? The idea is too absurd. When such a population is roused by those influences which agitate freemen, you could no more resist them with your handful of office-holders than a feather could resist a storm. To test this matter by fact, let us inquire, what has been the history of patronage under the American Government. And here I set out with stating this principle: where there is a calm and tranquil state of society, where there are no violent struggles of parties, patronage may exercise some influence; but where there is a severe party struggle, and one which is continued with regard to principle, the power of patronage ceases. As in the calm and unruffled waters the feeblest swimmer makes his way, while in the raging torrent the boldest is lost, so it is with patronage in the two extremes I have referred to. In the one, it may to some extent be exercised, but in the other it is overwhelmed by the more powerful and irresistible force of popular excitement. In the latter case patronage, so far from being of service to the party in power, operates indirectly against it; for the assistance that they may derive from the few holding office and struggling to retain it, is more than counterbalanced by the exertions of the many who seek to oust them from their places in order to obtain office for themselves.

Under the administration of Washington, patronage was exercised without danger; and when I mention that sacred name, every man must understand that he needed no patronage; and therefore I pass over his administration. The first Adams created the means of increasing his patronage, and rendering it efficient by the establishment of our Army and Navy. His administration ended with his first term, and such was the odium, in which he was held that he was driven from the Executive chair with an obloquy which has clouded his early and well-earned fame. Mr. Jefferson succeeded him in power; and what was the first act of his administration? He abolished patronage; he destroyed the means by which his own power might have been strengthened; and, recognizing the people as the rightful source of power, he carried out triumphantly and successfully the principles upon which the Government itself was founded. And what was the consequence? He was reelected by the almost unanimous voice of the American people. His name is embalmed in the memories of a vast majority of his countrymen. His opinions are to this day cited as authority by every friend of civil and religious liberty, and the doctrines that he inculcated will maintain their ascendancy so long as our Constitution shall endure. Mr. Madison succeeded as the friend of Mr. Jefferson, and the inheritor of his principles. He was, like him, a foe to an increase of Executive power, and, like him, opposed to extravagant expenditures, and dangerous constructions of the Constitution. In his administration the war with Great Britain commenced, and the question was, shall we sternly and manfully maintain against a foreign foe the rights bequeathed us by our ancestors; or shall we, weakened by faction, suffer defeat and disgrace? Of course patronage under this Administration was necessarily increased.

Mr. Monroe came into power after Mr. Madison. Now mark this as a peculiar period in our history. The consciousness that in a good cause we had foiled the proudest nation in the world gave strength to the Administration, and tended almost to the entire abolition of party distinctions. Those who did not rejoice in the triumphs of the war were but few. There were some Federal leaders, it is true, who did not rejoice in our triumphs; but such were the feelings of a vast majority of the people, that they were glad to renounce their party, and witness, without a struggle, its total extinction. Such was the state of things during Mr. Monroe's administration; and patronage, though it operated on some, produced no injurious effects.

Well, sir, another Administration came into power, and of that Administration the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] was the mainspring. I think I do not err in stating that the general impression was, that patronage would enable that Administration to continue in power; and then, for the first time, was the attempt made to patronize particular sections of the Union, by the imposition of a protective tariff, and splendid systems of internal improvement. Then, for the first time, did the nation attempt to patronize itself; and what was the result? I mention these things in no invidious feeling for the Senator from Kentucky, but merely as the illustration of a principle. This Administration, in spite of its new sources of patronage, was ejected from power and General Jackson came in with an overwhelming majority. What then? Did he use the influence of patronage for the purpose of supporting himself in office? It would be absurd to suppose that his administration was sustained by such an influence. It is well known that, during the continuance of his administration, the fiercest struggles were carried on by the two contending political parties of the country; that the passions of men were highly excited, and that the contest for certain great principles, which finally triumphed, was the main support of General Jackson and the party who went with him. No, it was not the influence of office-holders, but the support of the great body of the people, originating in an attachment to certain great principles which they believed he would carry out. The policy of his administration proved how absurd and ridiculous was the charge. Was he so infatuated as to desire patronage, while he lessened its influence by exhibiting unworthy individuals as the subject of it, as I have heard charged against him on this floor? No. General Jackson's administration was supported on principles far higher than any influences that patronage could produce, and the suffrages of a free people have shown their confidence in its wisdom and success. The corrupting power was in other hands, and he foiled it by the power of the free principles he encouraged.

Mr. President, the name of General Jackson never escaped my lips within this Hall, whilst he continued in the Chief Magistracy. Neither I nor friend of mine received benefit or favor at his hands; and I may declare that, during that period, I was a stranger to the presidential edifice. He is no longer in office, and I will explain what there was in his character to carry to such a height his influence with the citizens of the Republic. They believed him, sir, to be a man of large sympathies, capable of embracing the entire American people; that his heart flowed out in love and kindness to each individual of the nation, of whatever station and degree, to him who lived by honest labor as to the opulent and influential. They believed that it belonged peculiarly to his nature to revolt with generous indignation against wrong and injustice, and to come to the aid of the weak and oppressed against the arrogant and powerful wrongdoer. They were possessed with an innate confidence that in administering the Government he was wholly bent on the general good; that his measures to this end were selected with great sagacity; and that he was endowed with a lofty inflexibility of temper, which enabled him to prosecute those measures with constancy, undiverted by seductive biases, undeterred by open intimidation and violence. They felt that in gathering to him, they were only rallying to the support of their own cause, their own rights and interests. They attached themselves to him, individually, as we attach ourselves to a tried friend, giving him entire credit for honesty, a quality which they are not in the habit of considering as very common amongst politicians. To crown all, their patriot pride was kindled when they beheld in him the high-spirited guardian of the national honor, whether in battle or negotiation, when they turned to that glorious day on which, under his auspices, the American people were first hailed as a great nation by the proudest of European monarchies.

De Tocqueville is quoted—all that is foreign is quoted—in opposition to the principles of this distinguished patriot. De Tocqueville declares that, whilst General Jackson was himself powerful as a chief magistrate, his strength must be the weakness of his successors. The effect is justly observed; and the observation may be extended to every Chief Magistrate who has exercised great power, or, in more proper phrase, has enjoyed high authority in the Republic; but has the true cause of this effect been assigned? The true cause will be brought into view if we examine into the sources of the power, or, as I have preferred to say, the authority, of those Chief Magistrates whose sway in our Confederacy has been felt to be largest. These sources are the attachment and confidence of the people attracted to the President by an earnest persuasion of his disinterestedness and respect for popular rights; and this disinterestedness and respect for popular rights is manifested in his yielding, through positive enactments of law recommended by himself, portions of the executive power, and in his limiting the exercise of that power by practices which he introduced into the administration of the Government, and which became a part of the common law of the Constitution. In fine, his strength rests not on executive prerogative, or the positive enactments of law, but on a prevailing influence with the people. The people believe that, in supporting him with constancy and animation, they are only sustaining that policy on which they have themselves decided, and those measures which they approve. He is not controlling, by power, a passive or resisting mass, but is the adviser, leader, and champion of a willing people.

I have glanced at the circumstances in the condition of our own and the Government of Great Britain, which show that the effect of official patronage in the two countries, so far from being the same, must, in a great degree, be different. In England the dispensing power of Government favor is in hereditary hands. The fountain of honor and wealth, so far as it is drawn through the machinery of Government out of the productive industry of the country, is an hereditary sovereign. To him, therefore, all whom the honors, power, and emolument of office can influence, turn their eyes. Around the throne, then, which is independent of all elections, rally the aristocracy and their dependents—the whole plebeian train of the army, navy, of fund-holders, of corporations, and monopolies of all kinds—all, in a word, who live on taxes levied by the Government, or through the privilege of taxing the people themselves. This immense body, although a minority of the nation, by that concentration of interest which draws them to the support, and puts them under the sway, of a hereditary executive, controls, by having its whole force directed by a single will, the popular power which acts without concert. The hereditary executive is a citadel which establishes patronage in a stronghold, beyond the reach of the people. All its influence, as well as interest, tends to hold the people in subjection. How differently does the principle work with us! The sovereign power here is in the people themselves. They dispense the patronage of this Government—the Presidency itself is a part of this patronage, which is disposed of every four years by their votes; and all the secondary offices, from those of the Secretaries downwards, down to the lowest executive, depend on the breath of the people. It does not stop here. Congress and the State Legislatures are annually and biennially extinguished and restored by the same power. In short, the whole system of government, State and national, with all the functionaries that put the machinery in motion, are, in some degree, brought within the original power which created the whole, by the wise provisions of the establishment itself.

Our Government may be said to resemble the operations of nature in the change of the seasons. In a year everything seems to perish, and all is reanimated and renewed in the course of a year. So far as the fruits of the Government are sought in its patronage, the will of the people is looked to as the fructifying power, as naturally as is the light of the sun by the husbandman, as the source of abundance in his fields. The public suffrages have no sooner conferred the employments of the Government with their much-sought honor and emoluments on the body of functionaries selected, than instantly the spirit of supplanting them animates doubly as many more. In this way, as patronage here proceeds from the people, its influence is found to operate as powerfully on persons out of office to get in, as on those holding office to keep in; and it operates on greater numbers, for there are always more expectants than incumbents. Hence the Executive patronage in this country is neutralized. He has a power above him. His place is sought, with all it dispenses, by other aspirants and their partisans, and the great patron—the people—is found alone to hold that sovereign inheritance and disposal of the advantages of Government, which, in other countries, bring the official corps to the footstool of the throne. The issue, which the verdict of the people decides in every election, is, who of the candidates for public favor is most entitled to their confidence and rewards; who most capable, honest, and faithful to the Constitution. Those who are out of office, and seek to obtain it, assail those who are in.

But I object to this bill on another ground. It is a monstrous precedent for a Republic to strip whole classes of their natural rights upon pretexts of expediency. If office-holders are excluded from the right of reasoning as to how votes should be given, because they are interested, will not the argument apply to take from them the right of giving their own votes? If one class of people are not permitted to vote because they are supposed to be under an improper influence, may not the exclusion, upon the score of expediency, be extended to other classes?

And now let me address myself to the Senator who has introduced the bill before the Senate. He professes, and no doubt sincerely, to apprehend that undue influences, left to their growth, may hereafter become strong enough to oppress public liberty. Would he not, then, be rendered unhappy, supposing that, by his will, he could make this bill a law, if, by doing so, he should incur the hazard of being reproached by posterity with having himself prepared the way for invasions upon the public liberty—with having himself opened the avenue through which had entered legislation pernicious to the freedom of the citizen? There are certain great principles essential to public liberty, and equally connected with public order, which should be regarded as sacred; not merely not to be rudely assailed, but to be left unapproached. If always held inviolate; if never impaired under pretenses of expediency; if cherished and fostered in education, in public discussion, in every mode, they fix themselves in the mind and heart of the citizen, and grow into his nature. The national mind is thus prepared to feel, with quick and keen sensibility, every injury done to these principles; and should they be profanely touched, replies through the entire people with an indignant and angry vibration. By a consensaneous impulse, the citizens rise in generous rage to arrest the tyranny and rebuke the assailant.

So much for public liberty; now for public order. Under the security of these well-established principles, which are never to be violated, the citizens rest secure and tranquil, not liable to be worked into factious fury by the experience or dread of wrong and oppression, which are to be prevented or retaliated by equal wrong and oppression. But let it be conceded that the great principles on which the rights of the citizens rest may be impaired by being limited; that, under the pretense of expediency, exceptions may be made to their operation, and how fatal a change is wrought! The principle once violated, how shall its integrity be restored? the sacred limit overleaped, where will you reestablish it? Having yielded the only true and definite line, how can you replace it? Having admitted that expediency may prevail in one case, you must admit that it may prevail in another, if it be only sufficiently high and powerful. Having abandoned the hold upon principle, you are reduced to the weighing of motives of expediency. The feelings of the people become callous from repeated violations of principle; the only sure rule and guide having been abandoned, their ideas become confounded. Precedents of arbitrary legislation and administration are pleaded, while one act is made to justify another. Precedent! precedent! precedent! let the American people shun with its baneful influences. If this reasoning be good in general, with what force does it apply to that liberty of speech which is not only so precious in itself, but, as I have said, the guardian of every other good principle?

I would say more, but I am exhausted?

INVENTION OF STEAMBOATS.

SPEECH OF HON. E. RUMSEY,

OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 9, 1839.

The House having agreed to consider the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to present to James Rumsey, jr., the son and only surviving child of James Rumsey, deceased, a suitable gold medal, commemorative of his father's services and high agency in giving to the world the benefits of the steamboat.

Mr. RUMSEY said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I am thankful for the courtesy extended in taking up this resolution at the present time, and will endeavor, if my feelings will permit me, to make some remarks upon it. They shall be very brief; and, as I have not been a trespasser upon the time and patience of the House, I trust I shall not be considered intrusive, and venture to hope that I may be favored with a friendly and indulgent hearing. I would gladly avoid saying anything; for it ever gives me extreme pain to attempt to speak upon a new theater; and neglecting, as I have, from a belief that this opportunity would not occur, to make any adequate preparation, I feel and know that I cannot, in a manner worthy of your attention, illustrate the history of the invention of the steamboat, and do justice to the memory and claims of James Rumsey. But, standing in the relation to him which I do—that of nephew—it would be expected that I would not be wholly silent. I wish it distinctly understood that, except so far as my sensibilities are involved, I have no interest in this matter, even if anything more substantial were contemplated than is proposed by the resolution. To something (inconsiderable in any event) I may have had title; but that, remote, contingent, valueless, as it was in my eyes in a pecuniary point of view, I have relinquished to one more meritorious than myself.

Mr. Speaker, it was not at my instance or suggestion that this matter was presented here. I was aware that among many, very many, respectable and intelligent men, the claim of James Rumsey to originality in the application of steam to navigation stood preëminent, and I apprehended that that claim might be weakened by the adverse action of this body, of whose inaptitude to adjudicate in cases of this kind I was not ignorant. I foresaw the difficulties that would environ and embarrass the subject. That from the lapse of time, the loss of papers, the death of witnesses, much testimony, once easily attainable, was forever gone. I supposed, also, that many might believe—erroneously, however, I think—that whatever success the individuals on whose memorial this resolution is based might obtain, whatever recognition of the title of their ancestor to the distinguished honor of participating in the introduction of the steamboat they might elicit, would detract from the reputation of another. I knew, too, that gentlemen's engagements and duties here were usually too great and onerous to allow them opportunity to investigate a matter of this kind, in which the feelings of a few citizens were chiefly concerned. But whether wisely or unwisely, it is here, and it is for the House to dispose of it in accordance with its views of propriety and justice.

I wish to premise that I have no intention to attempt to derogate from the just fame of Fulton. To him, in common with his warmest admirers, I cheerfully accord the good fortune and the glory of vanquishing incredulity, and broadly demonstrating the practicability and utility of steam as an agent of navigation.

How vast and incalculable are the results of this triumph of genius! How beneficial its influence upon the social intercourse, the agricultural industry, the commercial prosperity, the general improvement, the safety and permanence of the Union! The whole nation, in its magnificent onward march, has received new energy and animation from it. The great valley of the West, more especially, through the agency of steam in transporting a mighty commerce on its numerous rivers, has, in a few years, been accelerated to a point in population, in power, in wealth, in comfort, and happiness, which it would not otherwise have attained in ages.

The steamboat, and another kindred application of steam—to land travel—to the honor of which, too, our country would, in all probability, have had undisputed title, had it pleased this Government to have favored the memorial of another ingenious American, Oliver Evans, a Pennsylvanian, I believe; he—I speak from information, for I have not examined the record—petitioned Congress to patronize him in making an experiment, nearly fifty years ago, and long before the railroad was attempted in Europe, which was not until 1802 or 1803; but, like projectors generally, he merely incurred a laugh. I say, Mr. Speaker, these two inventions, by nullifying time and space, by mingling us together as one people, by bringing the parts, even the most remote, of our wide-extended country into early and facile communication; by the wind-like rapidity afforded for exchanging the various productions of the mind, of the soil, of the work-shop, are exercising important influences upon the intellectual and moral development, upon the advancement of all the interests, upon the wealth, the power, the glory, the security of the Republic, and will push us forward to an elevation unapproachable without them.

To Fulton I have readily assigned the honor of finally overcoming an unbelieving and sneering world, and compelling it to see and acknowledge the useful application of this wonderful agent—steam—to the propulsion of vessels. But if there was another American citizen who, at a much earlier day, conceived this great idea, originated this grand design, and, in the prosecution of it, expended his time, his labor, his little fortune, his health and his life—who actually constructed two steamboats, one in America and one in England; on the first of which he made a public experiment which, all things regarded, was most encouragingly successful; and with the other was nearly ready, after surmounting numerous obstacles of a pecuniary kind, for a public exhibition, when arrested by sudden death; if the attention of scientific and ingenious men were attracted to the subject by the opinions and operations of this other citizen; if the practicability of steam navigation was actually demonstrated by him, if Fulton himself, by his association with him in London, and consequent acquaintance with his plans and discoveries, was advanced in knowledge, was led to reflect, and ultimately to act: if all this were true, would it be unfair to say that this other citizen was, in some and no small degree, auxiliary in giving to the world this important invention? And that it is all true, I think, must be admitted by every one, on a fair and candid examination of the subject. I know that gentlemen's engagements here are too numerous, of too exciting and engrossing a character, to enable them to examine minutely a matter of this kind, in which, it may be thought, the feelings of a few individuals are alone concerned; though, to my mind, the public justice is, to some extent, involved. I will not do violence to the patience of the House by entering into any minute and prolix detail. I have not the strength to go so extensively into the subject as to do it justice, even if this was a fit theater, which it is not, for such extended disquisition. I will but briefly recapitulate a few facts, which, from the information laid before the committee, I know to be correct.

James Rumsey was a native of Maryland, from which State he removed, in early manhood, to Shepherdstown, Virginia, where he turned his attention exclusively to engineering and mechanical pursuits—superintending for a time the operations of the Potomac Company in improving the navigation of that river—suggesting many novel views in mechanism, and making various improvements in milling and the application of water power. As early as July or August, 1783, as appears by the testimony, he conceived the idea of navigation by steam; and from this time to the hour of his death, his whole soul was absorbed in this great subject.

It will be recollected that at this early period the mechanic arts, and, more especially, that branch embracing steam machinery, were in their very infancy in America. There was no steam machinery in it. There were no practical artists capable of fabricating any. Even in England, although some progress had been made by Watt, the steam-engine, and its great appendage, the boiler, or generator, were rude, imperfect, comparatively inefficient. Rumsey had to invent, to originate everything—to procure from different places, and different work-shops, and, though not a practical mechanic, often to fashion and modify with his own hands the various parts of a work even now difficult and complicate. From the inexperience of workmen, and the total absence of all the tools and machines now collected in engine factories, his progress was necessarily expensive, slow, embarrassed, and all execution so imperfect as to preclude the possibility of more than partial success. Under these most disadvantageous circumstances, he succeeded, in the autumn of 1784, in making a private, but very imperfect experiment, in order to test some of the principles of his invention. And, notwithstanding much of his machinery was so utterly defective as quickly to fail in many parts, and to require renewal and reconstruction throughout, yet so well convinced was he of ultimate success from this experiment, that, at the October session of the Virginia Legislature for that year, he applied for, and obtained, an act guarantying to him the exclusive use of his invention in navigating the waters of that State. This will be seen by reference to the statutes of that Commonwealth. About the same time, also, he communicated his invention to General Washington, as appears by a letter of that personage, the original of which was before the committee, dated November, 1787, to the late Governor Johnson, of Maryland. It seems that he did not earlier make this communication to Washington because he had not matured and digested his plan, or tested its truth by any, even partial, experiments. And when he did make it, so new, so bold, so original and unheard of was it, that Washington declares in that letter that he considered it "rather as an ebullition of his genius" than as anything likely to be available.

In the beginning of the next year, (January, 1785,) he obtained a patent from the General Assembly of Maryland for navigating by steam the bays and rivers of that State; and immediately afterwards commenced preparations for an experiment on a larger scale. Through the whole of this year he was deeply engaged in building a boat, and procuring, improving, adapting, and testing the several parts of his machinery. He did not, however, from the causes which I have before mentioned, get ready for a public trial until the year following, (1786,) which, all things considered, was eminently successful. This experiment was made on the Potomac, near Shepherdstown, Virginia, in the presence of hundreds of spectators. It is proven by various witnesses. It is described in the letter of Mr. Bedinger, and certified by Dr. Alexander, of Baltimore, for whose high respectability I refer to such of the delegation from Maryland as are acquainted with him. The gentleman near me [Mr. JENIFER] says there is no one more worthy of full confidence. In this trial, he succeeded, notwithstanding the unavoidable imperfection of his machinery, in propelling his boat against the current by steam alone four or five miles an hour. There was long in possession of one of his family an ancient pamphlet, with high evidences of authenticity upon its face, which I have often read, and the general contents of which, I know, are recollected by many persons in Kentucky, containing the approbatory certificates of numerous gentlemen who witnessed this exhibition; amongst them, that of General Gates, as mentioned by Mr. Bedinger. This pamphlet has been lost or mislaid, and those interested have been unable to repossess themselves of it, or to obtain another copy.

But, independent of this mass of testimony, the proof before the committee as to this experiment is so clear, so ample and conclusive, that no one can read it and doubt. The results of this trial were by no means discouraging. So far from it, that, says Doctor Alexander, who was on board, "every person present believed that Mr. Rumsey had accomplished all his wishes." The first efforts of Fulton in America, more than twenty years after, were but little more successful. It was not until after repeated trials—great and extensive modifications and improvements, requiring much time and money, and testing to the utmost the liberal patronage of Livingston—that he succeeded in obtaining a velocity reasonably useful. And even the utmost rapidity with which he navigated his boats was far, infinitely far, behind that which subsequent improvement has achieved. I speak not this in disparagement of Fulton. It cannot be so understood. Great inventions, requiring complicate machinery, are never perfected and seldom made eminently useful at once. High excellence is rarely attained until the mechanical world has tendered its offerings—poured in its contributions through a long series of years. Time, labor, money, repeated modifications and experiments—the conjoint suggestions of practical and theoretical mechanics, are all prerequisite and auxiliary to the perfection of a great invention. Take, for instance, the printing press of our day, throwing off thousands of accurate impressions in an hour. From its wondrous celerity in multiplying copies, and, through the agency of steam on the land and the water, scattering them far and near, it may almost be compared, in its capacity for the diffusion of intellectual light, to the sun in the heavens, in his capacity for shedding physical warmth and radiance upon the world. And yet the press of our day—all admirable as it is—is but the rude wooden type and clumsy apparatus of the great German inventor, in a beautiful, improved and perfected form.

The spinning machine, which has so highly encouraged one important branch of agriculture, and so greatly advanced the civilization and happiness of mankind, by clothing millions in comfort and decency, who would otherwise have remained in ragged, squalid degradation—the spinning machine of our day, all perfect as it is, would scarce be recognized as his own by the inventor, Arkwright, if it were not that the same principle—the idea of making many threads at once by machinery—is preserved.

Great, though not equally so, for the same time has not elapsed, has been the improvement in the steamboat. A hundred minds and a thousand hands have each contributed something to the simplification of its machinery and the extension of its powers. This is strikingly illustrated on the western waters, where the early boats of Fulton were nearly a month in making the trip from New Orleans to Louisville, which is now not unfrequently performed in less than a week. It is equally apparent in the increased speed of the boats upon the Hudson, as appears from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the steam-engine, laid a few days ago upon our tables.

It is probable, nay, certain, that ultimate excellence is not yet attained; and that the steamboats of the present time will bear the same relation to those of fifty years hence which the first boats of Fulton in 1807, or the original boat of Rumsey on the Potomac in 1786, bear to those of the present day. But this progressive improvement detracts nothing from the merits either of him who first drew the attention of mechanical men to the subject by actual and successful experiment, though he left it incomplete in consequence of premature death, nor of him who afterwards improved upon and brought it into general operation. They laid the foundation; they created the basis of all subsequent action. There is glory enough in so great an invention for both—for Rumsey, who originated the steamboat, and by actual trial proved its capability, and for Fulton, who subsequently carried out the grand design, and introduced it into common use.

They—I speak it not lightly or arrogantly, but from a deep conviction of its sober truth—deserve to be ranked among the highest benefactors of their species, higher, far, than nine tenths of the warriors and statesmen whose achievements blaze upon the page of history, and occupy so large a portion of the world's regard and admiration. To say nothing of other nations, their labors have contributed immeasurably to the advancement of all the great interests of their country; their labors have added hundreds of millions to its wealth. Sir, you have no arithmetic of powers vast enough by which to estimate the benefits of the steamboat in a pecuniary point of view alone. Their labors have rendered the whole Republic more prosperous in peace, more powerful and defensible in war. Their labors, too, have tended, in no small degree, to the preservation of human life. I am aware that the truth of this last assertion may not be universally admitted; but it will scarcely be questioned, at least by a western or southwestern man who recollects the old mode of conducting our commerce. Small as that commerce was before the introduction of the steamboat, it drew off a larger portion of population than is now necessary to transact it, although so immensely extended. Even then more died in the long and exposed and laborious voyages in keels and barges, or the exhausting return by land under a vertical sun, than now perish from steamboat explosions. But they dropped off one by one; they sank obscurely into the grave by the wayside, or, after reaching their homes, fell victims to disease incurred by a long sojourn and travel in southern climes. The consumption of life, though known to be great in the aggregate, happening so much in detail made no impression. But now every steamboat disaster creates a sensation, and is proclaimed in the universal press of the country. If the mighty commerce now in progress on the western waters had to be conducted in the old way, it would require the agency of so many individuals that it would not be long before the sides of the public roads, from New Orleans to the upper States; and the banks of that great river which pours into the Gulf the congregated waters of nearly half a continent, would be almost continued graveyards.

But to return from this digression, in which, as I promised brevity, I ought not to have indulged. After his experiment—successful experiment—upon the Potomac, in 1786, to which I have adverted, Rumsey, being under the strong conviction that skillful workmen and perfect machinery were alone wanting to the most complete success, and sensible that such could not then be procured in America, resolved to go to England. With slender means of his own, and aided—no, not aided—but mocked and deluded by some timid and unsteady patronage, he there resumed, with untiring energy, his great undertaking. He proceeded to procure patents from the British Government for steam navigation, and various inventions embracing improved steam-engines and boilers; those of Watt, and all preceding ones, being extremely inartificial and imperfect. These patents bear date in the beginning of 1788. Many of his inventions, in one modified form or another, are now in general use. As, for instance, the cylinder-boiler, so superior to the old tub or still-boilers, in the presentation of fire surface, and capacity for holding highly rarified steam, is described, both single and combined, in his specifications; and is identical in principle with the tub-boiler which he used in his Potomac experiment.

Difficulties and embarrassments of a pecuniary nature, and others such as invariably obstruct the progress of a new invention, attended him in England. He was often compelled to abandon, temporarily, his main object, and turn his attention to something else, in order to raise means to resume it. He undertook, with the same power, but by its more judicious application, to produce higher results in several water-works, in all which he succeeded, realizing thereby some reputation, and some funds to apply to his favorite project.

At another time, as mentioned by the committee in their report, in order to avoid a "London jail," and the delay, if not defeat, of all his high hopes, he was compelled to transfer, at what he considered a ruinous sacrifice, a large interest in his inventions—a contract which entangled and embarrassed him during the remainder of his short life. Still, however, he struggled on, undismayed; had constructed a boat of about one hundred tons burden, and pushed forward his machinery so near to the point of completion as to be able to indicate a day not very distant for a public exhibition, when his sudden death ensued from apoplexy, while discussing the principles of one of his inventions before a philosophical society of London. A very interesting account of the manner of his death is given in the letter of R. C. Wakefield, amongst the papers before the select committee. With his life, the whole project ceased; there was no one present to administer; there was no one interested in his undertaking possessed of skill and ability to carry it out. Most men looked upon it as wild and visionary. Few would have been willing to incur the ridicule of attempting to complete it. All that he left—his very boat and machinery—barely sufficed to satisfy anxious and greedy creditors.

With the sudden death of Fiesco, of Genoa, that most extraordinary revolution which, in a single night, with admirable ability, he had nearly effected, ceased, rolled back, became abortive. So did the sudden death of this humbler, but more useful man arrest all further prosecution, at the time, of the great object to which he had so intently devoted himself, and which, in some of the modes which he contemplated, he must, had time been allowed, have completed. He was not permitted to live to witness the realization of the high design which he had conceived, and the consummation of which he never doubted, to use his own bold language, "the navigation of our great rivers, the lakes, the gulf stream, the ocean itself, by the agency of steam."

Invention of Steamboats—Mr. Rumsey.

Mr. Speaker, it is evident, from the information before the committee who reported this resolution, that Rumsey, from the introductory letters which he carried, from the high order of mechanical genius which he displayed, and the daring and original project which he was attempting, attracted some attention in London, and secured to himself the acquaintance and friendship of many respectable men. It is fair to presume that other intelligent Americans, then resident in London, would have formed some acquaintance both with him and the novel design he was prosecuting. It is known that Fulton was for many years, during and after this period, living in Europe, and spending much of his time in London; and, in the absence of all other proof, it could scarcely be believed that he, with a talent for these things, with a mind directed to such objects, would have failed in becoming acquainted with, and interesting himself in the operations of, his countryman, who was occupying a position of painful prominence; so much so that, as he states in a letter to his brother, his project was the frequent subject of newspaper remark, and even of "play-house wit." But all doubt is removed by the letter of Rumsey to his friend, Mr. West, in America, in which he speaks of Fulton as if they were on terms of intimacy. Does not the conclusion almost irresistibly follow that, from this association with Rumsey, and acquaintance with his plans, Fulton was advanced in knowledge, was led to reflect, and ultimately to act on this subject? And, whether his application of steam-power was identical or dissimilar, original or derived, wholly new or modifications and improvements on some of Rumsey's plans, still it appears to me that it would be cruel injustice to the memory of this persevering, ardent, talented, but unfortunate man—unfortunate in being cut off in the prime of life, and in the midst of his career—to say that the world was under no obligation to him for an invention so incalculably, so supremely important.

If further evidence were wanting to prove that this acquaintance with Rumsey was not inoperative in turning Fulton's attention to the steamboat, it will be found in the fact that he was engaged in it in 1793, very shortly after the death of Rumsey. This is apparent from his correspondence with Lord Stanhope, who himself made some experiments in 1795. Fulton went to Europe for the purpose of introducing his torpedo for the explosion of ships; but, after the death of Rumsey, the steamboat seems to have engaged his chief attention until his final success in 1807. It is known, and so stated by his biographer, that, before his return to America, he was for many years actively employed in studying the subject, in constructing a variety of models, and making a series of experiments on a small scale. And when it is recollected that fifteen years thus elapsed before he obtained a motion much exceeding five miles an hour, it is matter of admiration that Rumsey, without any reflected lights, should, in the short period allowed him, have effected so much.

Mr. Speaker, I have understood—I know not with what truth, but I believe the fact is embodied in Colden's Life—that when Fulton made his first essay before the city of New York, a vast multitude assembled—most of them doubters, disbelievers, sneerers. After a few revolutions of the engine, some accident occurred from imperfect machinery, leading to a temporary suspension of the experiment. A sybilant voice arose from the crowd, "We said so. We knew it would not do." Scorn and derision were poured forth upon the man who, improving upon the labors of his predecessor, Rumsey, was doing more for the benefit of his species than has ever been effected by all the mighty armies and victorious chiefs,

"From Macedonia's madman to the Swede."

Now, suppose that Fulton, before remedying the defect, had suddenly died—in a land of strangers, too—leaving no one with legal authority to act for him; leaving no one interested in his design, of skill and talent to consummate it; poor, embarrassed, in debt; with executions levied on his very boat and engine, and merely suspended as a matter of special grace, until this trial should be made: suppose, from these or the like causes, the completion of the steamboat had been postponed for another twenty years; at the end of which time some other ingenious man who had witnessed Fulton's efforts, who was intimate with his plans, who had been deeply impressed by his powerful and lucid arguments, and warmed and excited to take an interest in the subject by his bold and sanguine spirit, had, after long private preparation, openly resumed the project; and, under more favorable auspices, from a more advanced state of the mechanic arts, or the benign influence of a more liberal patronage, had succeeded, triumphantly succeeded, in establishing the utility of the steamboat, either on some of Fulton's plans, or by modifications and improvements of his own: now, I ask the friends of Fulton whether, in this state of the case—and more especially if his had been the original effort—his memory should have gone down into oblivion unknown and unhonored by his country? As success alone, naked success, is the criterion by which the world forms its estimate of merit, I know this other individual would, generally, have monopolized the honor; but the inquiring, the reflecting, and the just, would not have passed unregarded the name of Fulton.

Mr. Speaker, I would not, if I could, take a single ray from the just fame of Fulton. It is admitted on all hands that he improved upon, and first broadly introduced the steamboat into general use; and for this alone he is entitled to the boundless and eternal gratitude of mankind. The world has been liberal in the conference of honor—something, too, his country has done for his descendants—something further this House proposed doing at the late session. To that measure, when it was first up—the only occasion when I was present—I gave my cordial assent; and I would have raised my voice in its favor, had I not been sensible that a cause sustained, as it was, by the fervid eloquence and powerful arguments of the gentlemen from South Carolina, Pennsylvania, New York, and Kentucky, [Messrs. LE GARE, BIDDLE, HOFFMAN, and CHAMBERS,] needed not my feeble advocacy. But in denying him originality, I do him no injustice. He never claimed it himself. His partial biographer cannot claim it for him. The very first act of the New York Legislature in his favor, in 1798, recognizes him not as the inventor, but the improver. All men who have looked into the subject know that it did not begin with him. Long before, the design had been conceived, to a good extent accomplished, its practicability proved, and was persisted in and prosecuted under the most favorable circumstances, with unwavering confidence and irrepressible resolution, until his dying hour, by James Rumsey; but for his acquaintance with whom, it is probable the powerful mind of Fulton would never have been brought to act upon the subject, and but for whom it is probable the world would yet have been without the benefits of the steamboat.

Mr. Speaker, there was but one individual who contested Rumsey's title to priority in the application of steam to navigation; and about his claims I wish to make a remark or two, in a spirit of candor and charity; for, as to the experiment ascribed to the Spaniard Garay, three hundred years ago, and mentioned by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DUNCAN,] at the last session, when I was not present, I can only say, that if any such ever was made, all knowledge of it had sunk into utter oblivion. Ages—centuries had rolled round, and the most profound silence and ignorance prevailed in regard to it. It was unknown to history—unknown to tradition—and could have had no influence whatever in bringing forward the steamboat in comparatively modern times. I acknowledge that this statement appears to me to be an entire fiction; that, if there be such a record, it was not based upon fact. It can scarcely be credited by any one who will look into the history of the origin, progress and improvement of the steam-engine, which, more than two hundred years afterwards, was used for scarcely any purpose except pumping water from mines, where but little machinery, and nothing but a simple rectilinear action, was required. If Garay was thus three centuries in advance of all the world, while his genius challenges our highest admiration, we are forced to acknowledge that he lived in vain; for, if the archives of the Spanish monarchy do present any basis for this statement, there it would have mouldered into dust, if the success of the steamboat in this new world had not given interest to everything connected with the subject, and caused the eye of some antiquarian to rest upon the passage, which would otherwise have been neglected as unintelligible or incredible.

I said, Mr. Speaker, there was but one person contested Rumsey's title to precedence. It is stated in the American Supplement to Rees's Encyclopedia, on the subject of steam, that Fitch made an experiment on the Delaware in 1783. If this were true, he preceded Rumsey; but I challenge the world to produce the testimony of a respectable witness, living or dead, to corroborate this statement. None such can be produced. The assertion is utterly erroneous; Fitch himself did not claim to have thought of steam navigation until 1785. In 1787 he built a boat and machinery on the Delaware, and made his first experiments in 1788. These facts are very clearly proven by various evidence before the committee. I will recapitulate but a part. The letter of General Washington to Governor Johnson, written in November, 1787, which I have before adverted to, says that Rumsey communicated to him his steamboat invention in November, 1784, and that some time afterwards Fitch called upon him, claiming for himself a similar invention, and requesting an introductory letter, "which he (Washington) declined giving, and went so far as to inform Mr. Fitch that, though he was not at liberty to disclose the principles of Mr. Rumsey's discovery, he could venture to assure him that he (Fitch) was not original, but that the idea had been communicated to him by Mr. Rumsey." Now, as Rumsey made no communication on the subject to Washington until November, 1784, it is probable that this interview on the part of Fitch did not take place until the year following; and, indeed, as I will hereafter show, not until the commencement of 1786; and, in either case, it was at a time when Rumsey was exerting every nerve in preparing for that experiment which he made on the Potomac in 1786, and which I have before mentioned. At all events, it was long after the private experiment which Rumsey made in 1784, in order to test some of the principles of his invention. If the statement in the Encyclopedia, that Fitch made experiments on the Delaware near Philadelphia, in 1783, were true, can it be believed that Washington, whose comprehensive vision took in everything likely to be of any use to his country, would, at so short a distance, have never heard of it? And if he had never heard of it, can it be credited that Fitch, whose originality was questioned and denied, would have failed in certifying him of it? And if Washington had either heard of it before, or been informed of it by Fitch at this meeting, could he, to whom Rumsey had made no disclosure on the subject until November, 1784, have said to Fitch, Sir, you are not original; Rumsey is before you? No; every one will see in that letter, not only a refutation of the statement in the Encyclopedia, but a refutation of Fitch's claim to precedence. On his own presentation of his case—on his own statements, declarations, and admissions, Washington refuses to give him a letter, and assures him that he has been anticipated by Rumsey.

There is also a letter from Washington to Rumsey, written in March, 1786, bearing upon this point. It will be seen in the twelfth volume of Sparke's Life. In this letter Washington urges Rumsey to bring forward his invention; warns him that his secret is leaking out, and that others will take advantage of it; and goes on to state that one individual had called on him, claiming for himself a plan of steam navigation, and requesting a letter of introduction, which he declined giving. Now, it can scarcely be doubted that the individual here alluded to was Fitch, and that his interview gave rise to this admonitory letter, and took place not long before its date.

The January number of the New York Review, just published, contains a well-written article on "steam navigation," and I regret that the writer was not in possession of all the facts touching its early history. It therein appears that Mr. Ogden, claiming certain rights as representative of Fitch, asserted them by petition before the Legislature of New York. Among other testimony before the committee raised on this petition, was that of General Bloomfield, fixing the period of Fitch's experiment to 1787 or 1788. On the authority of De Warville, the correspondent of Jefferson, and an eminent French writer of that period, I feel warranted in saying that it was the latter year.

In his work, published in 1789, which will be found in your library, he states that, being in Philadelphia in September, 1788, he attended by invitation, and witnessed Fitch's experiment. In a note, written in the February following, in London, he says:

"I have just become acquainted with Mr. Rumsey, of Virginia, a gentleman of great ingenuity, who proposes building a vessel in which, without sails, and by steam alone, he will cross the Atlantic in fifteen days."

This sublime conception, this bold undertaking of Rumsey, the accomplishment of which in the last year has created so vast a sensation, was not unknown to me and others of his family, but, without the high authority of De Warville, I would not have ventured to have named it. The English article in the Encyclopedia manifests much ignorance and carelessness in its preparation; as, for instance, without the shadow of truth or evidence, it ascribes to Mr. Symington the honor of introducing the steamboat into America, and at the same time states that Symington's first experiments were on the Forth and Clyde, in 1801. Lord Stanhope, Symington, the Abbe Arnel of France, Fulton, and others, seem to have been urged to reflection and action on this subject, in consequence of Rumsey's operations in London. The American supplemental article in the Encyclopedia is also, in many respects, unfair, disingenuous, and untrue. The compiler, who is the partial eulogist of Fulton, aware that he cannot ascribe to his favorite the glory of originality, endeavors to mystify and becloud, rather than to illustrate, the true history of the invention of the steamboat. He gives to Fitch, whose claims were untenable, precedence of Rumsey; and I think I have shown that he succeeded him although I have dwelt on but part of the evidence: that evidence, taken together, most clearly proves that Fitch was but a borrower. The compiler goes further, and, as if to do away with all claim which Rumsey, or even Fitch, might have upon the good opinion of their countrymen, says that the idea of steam navigation had been entertained at a still earlier period by Halls, of England, and that therefore he is better entitled to the honor of originality than Rumsey, although he admits that he made no attempt to reduce it to practice, and Rumsey, under the most adverse circumstances, actually succeeded in running a boat against the current of a river four or five miles an hour. The compiler further alleges that Rumsey, with unlimited patronage, and after full trial, abandoned the project as hopeless. Indisputable testimony shows that the assertion is as unfounded and false as it is illiberal and cruel. I judge that it is from this work that the Secretary of the Treasury deduces what he calls his "miscellaneous facts" in the report upon the steam-engine, laid upon our tables a few days ago. And from the misquotations of names and confusion of dates—caused, no doubt, by hasty reference—he has not improved the accuracy of the original article.

From the ignorance and carelessness, willful or otherwise, displayed in this treatise in the Encyclopedia, I have no confidence in the statement that Halls, of England, obtained a patent for steam navigation one hundred years ago. I am led to this conclusion by various reflections. The steam-engine at that early day, and, indeed, down to the time of Watt, in the latter part of the eighteenth century, was very inefficient, and very little used even for the simplest purposes. It is not stated, so far as my examination has gone, what agent Halls contemplated using, whether steam or animal power. And, further, Rumsey obtained a patent from the British Government for the same object (steam navigation) long afterwards, (in 1788,) which was then considered by all the intelligent and scientific men of London as new and original.

But even if the idea of steam navigation had been entertained in Europe at this anterior period, Rumsey was not the less original. There was no knowledge in America that such a design had ever been presented in Europe. Rumsey, imperfectly educated as he was, with a slight acquaintance with books, relying, as he did, on his own resources, on his own inventive genius, had never heard of it, and even if he had heard that such a suggestion had been made, it can operate nothing in diminution of his merit. I, sir, can declare that I have invented a plan for aerial navigation—that I have devised a machine by which I will soar aloft above the dull atmosphere encompassing the earth, where clouds and storms prevail, into the pure regions of ether, where, manufacturing an air suitable to the sustentation of life, I will traverse thousands of miles in an hour. But if I stop here—if I exhibit no plan—if I devise no machinery—if I in no way prove its feasibility—surely I am entitled to no credit for this suggestion of a wandering fancy, common, no doubt, to thousands. If you afterwards, whether you have heard my suggestion or not, devise a plan, construct machinery, and actually succeed in navigating the air, the honor of originality is exclusively your own. I cannot participate—it would be preposterous for me to arrogate any portion of the credit. If, from the infant state of the mechanic arts, or your poverty, or your early death, you left it incomplete, although you had done enough to prove its practicability, and to attract to it the attention of ingenious and scientific men, and another afterwards, improving upon your plan, brought it into successful and general operation, would it not be unfair that your claims, although you had found the diamond, although you had put the ball in motion, should be entirely superseded and disregarded? Should not the world, in the rendition of a just judgment, place you at least on terms of equality?

Mr. Speaker, I will not detain the House longer; I have already occupied too much time; I will only add that, while many of the representatives of James Rumsey are poor, very poor—for, in consequence of his early death, they never derived any benefits from the numerous inventions of their ancestor, except such as have been enjoyed by the whole country—there is yet one of them whose claims address themselves to the best sympathies of our nature. The one to whom I allude is the only son, the only living child, of James Rumsey. While his father was in England, devoting himself with fatal intensity to the completion of the steamboat, that son, by a malignant disease—scarlet fever—was, in early infancy, deprived of the faculties of speech and hearing. Talented, ingenious, ready, and dexterous at various mechanical employments, he is now earning a scanty subsistence by daily labor; but, with the improvidence common to persons in his condition, making no preparation for approaching old age. To the support and comfort of the evening of his life I have thought his country might contribute something, without violating any principle of wise policy.

Mr. Speaker, I have stood upon the bank of the beautiful river which washes the broad border of my own beloved State, and contemplated the majestic steam-palace in her proud career, exchanging with rapidity and cheapness the productions of different climes, conveying with comfort and expedition the traveling public, giving new life and energy to commerce, to agriculture, to national industry and enterprise: I say, Mr. Speaker, I have stood in musing mood upon the shore of the fair Ohio, and viewed the noble steamer moving victorious against wind and current,

"Walking the waters like a thing of life"—and then reflected that the only son of the man who first seriously attracted the attention of the skillful and ingenious to the subject; the only son of the man who first yoked the power of steam to the car of commerce; the only son of the man who first, by actual trial, proved its practicability; the only son of the man who, in his arduous struggles to perfect and present to the world the steamboat, expended his little fortune, banished himself from his home and his country, and in spite of all obstacles was pushing onwards to success, when arrested by sudden death—when I have reflected that the only son of this man was toiling for his daily bread, smitten by his God, and neglected by his country; when I have contemplated that and this spectacle, the steamboat and the unfortunate son of its inventor, feelings, emotions, reflections, have crowded upon me of a character which, as a patriot, a philanthropist, and a Christian, I acknowledge it was improper and sinful to entertain. To the support of that stricken one, I have thought his country, abounding in resources, with more hundreds of millions of public domain than she can squander in ages, might contribute something more substantial than a medal, without any extraordinary stretch of liberality. But it is not for me to solicit it, even for him. I shall be gratified, deeply gratified, if the Government of his country shall honor the memory of his father for all his sacrifices and all his services by the adoption of this resolution.

Mr. Speaker, I could have wished that the task which I have endeavored to discharge had been undertaken by another. But while I knew that on every subject of a political or party nature there would be, on this arena, a host of intellectual champions, armed cap-à-pie, panting for the conflict, and struggling for the floor, I apprehended that, in a cause of this kind, which is rather of private concernment, there would be but little interest felt, and but few, if any, prepared to couch a friendly or defensive lance. Hence, I have been constrained to trespass on the House.

Mr. Speaker, I have said that I had no pecuniary interest in this matter; yet, occupying the peculiar position which I do, if any vote should be taken, I will of course be excused from participating in it.

NOTE.—When Mr. Rumsey concluded, and without further debate, the resolution passed the House by a unanimous vote.

NATIONAL DEFENSE.

SPEECH OF HON. W. C. JOHNSON,
OF MARYLAND,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 2, 1839.

The bill entitled "A bill giving to the President of the United States additional powers for the defense of the United States, in certain cases, against invasion, and for other purposes," being under consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, offered the following amendment to the first section of the bill:

"And that the sum of — be, and the same is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be applied by the President of the United States for purchasing a suitable site, to consist of not less than fifty, nor more than one hundred, acres of land, for the purpose of erecting a national foundry, with suitable buildings and fixtures, for fabricating cannon for the use of the Army and Navy of the United States, and for employing suitable artisans, and for purchasing and procuring such materials as may be necessary to carry said foundry into efficient operation. That — amount of said sum be applied, under the direction of the Executive, for supplying ordnance for the immediate wants of the Government."

Mr. JOHNSON said that, before the chairman decided upon the division of the vote just taken on the amendment, he felt impelled, by a sense of justice to the subject-matter of the amendment, to claim the attention of the House for a few minutes.* At that late hour of the session he could not so far forget his respect to the feelings of the committee as to inflict a long set speech, nor would the state of his health allow him to de-

* Mr. JOHNSON had addressed the committee the evening before on the subject of the fortresses and state of defense. From the notes of the two speeches, as they were of a kindred character, they have been incorporated into one, as presenting a more unbroken connection of the subject.

tain the committee long. He knew full well that there was a strong feeling with several members of the committee against his amendment. He was well convinced that their objections were occasioned less from the intrinsic merits of the proposition than from the circumstances and time of its introduction. Some objected because a kindred proposition to the one immediately under consideration was reported in a specific bill, which he had often urged and as often failed to call the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to consider. Another portion of the committee thought that any amendment, however salutary in itself, would embarrass the progress of the bill now before the committee, as reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs. To remove these objections was the purpose of throwing himself upon the indulgence of the committee; and he knew no better way than to exhibit the true condition of the country in relation to its means of defense. This he had done in part a few evenings before, when he opposed the bill reported by the Committee on Military Affairs to erect new forts and fortifications. And he was impressed with the belief that the committee would be convinced, if they would patiently consider the true condition of the state of our ordnance, that his amendment was eminently essential to the very object which the Committee on Foreign Affairs had in view, if that object was to place the country in a state of defense from foreign aggression. The bill proposes to augment by twenty regiments the standing Army, and to authorize a loan of ten millions if the emergency should require that amount during the recess of Congress.

What was the condition, he would ask, of our forts, after passing an appropriation annually, for many years past, of from nine hundred thousand to one million dollars for their erection and repair? Was there one of the immense number constructed prepared for complete and efficient defense? Was there one that could resist for three hours a seventy-four ship-of-war? He said it with feelings of humiliation, that, after the immense millions lavished in building forts, there was not one in the whole nation that had a sufficient number of good cannon mounted to resist a sudden attack. This was greatly the fault of Congress. Members were content after voting away millions for building forts, which, under the present system, are but perishable monuments of extravagance and folly, and never deemed it worthy of further reflection to consider they were valuable or not, without cannon to protect them. And Congress has too long neglected the means of placing them in a state of protection. It was his unpleasant duty to expose the true condition of our means of defense.

In answer to a call made upon the ordnance department by the select committee on the subject of a national foundry, in 1835, of which he had the honor to be a member, the Colonel of Ordnance stated "that the number of guns required for the armament of the fortresses completed and in the progress of completion, of the caliber of twenty-four and thirty-two, was 6,632; and the number in possession of the Government, including the old patterns, which are of doubtful utility, 2,633; total number now required, 3,999.

Not one half of the 2,633 large guns on hand are fit for service. They have borne too much service, as it is well known that a cannon cannot be discharged but about one thousand times, with a full charge, without imminent peril, and most of that number are unfit for any use but to be cast into balls or valued only as old iron.

By a more recent report from the War Department, which had been printed, the condition of the defenses had been but little improved since 1835. He was astonished when he read it; and if it did not call the attention of Congress to the subject, his only hope was that it would awaken the attention of the nation. From this document he discovered that 1,178 large guns were now required for the new forts completed; 2,573 for forts under construction; 782 for forts rebuilding; 3,506 for works projected; 5,280 for protecting prominent points along the sea frontier.

By the report of the Colonel of Ordnance, which the select committee had instructed him (Mr. J.) to procure from the ordnance department, dated March 7, 1838, and which is appended to the report of the committee, but which he presumed but few members have had time to examine, it will be found that we have 935 cannons in forts; 1,219 in depot; 150 under contract; making an aggregate of 2,304, and showing that we now require for forts and the sea-board alone, 11,017 pieces of ordnance.

The Colonel of Ordnance informed the select committee, through the Secretary of War, in 1835, that—

"In relation to the competency of the foundries now employed to supply, on an emergency, all the cannon and shot necessary for the Navy, fortifications, and other defenses, it may be stated that, with their present means, four years would, at least, be required to cast the cannon, shot, and carriages necessary for the armament of the fortresses."

Then it would require four years under the present system, to fabricate ordnance for the present, instant wants of the fortresses alone; and for the Navy and field trains, we may safely say at least three years more might be added. Then, in seven years, with due exertions and zeal, we might expect to have accomplished what our exigencies at this moment require. The report of the Colonel of Ordnance of 7th March last, informs us that we have 447 twenty-four-pounders in forts, 339 in depot, 112 under contract; of thirty-two-pounders we have 458 in forts, and 760 in depot; and I would ask this committee how many forty-two-pounders do they suppose that we have? Will not all be astonished who have not turned their attention to the fact—for he was amazed when he read the report—to find that we have the beggarly, the miserable number of only 30 forty-two-pounders in our forts, 66 in depot, and 38 under contract.

We have, then, in reality, but ninety-six forty-two-pounders, and may, in progress of time, have one hundred and thirty-four, which would hardly average one for each fort in the United States, and would be hardly more than sufficient to protect one of our largest fortresses. From the fullest examination which he had been able to give the subject, he felt no hesitancy in saying that, for the purposes of the forts, the Navy, for field trains, and for the protection of prominent points and assailable positions along our coasts and inland frontier, we require not less than fifteen thousand pieces of ordnance and bomb-mortars of various sizes; and this number will not be considered extravagant, when we consider for a moment that our frontier border embraces an extent of twelve thousand miles, if the line is drawn with the indentations of the great and inland seas, and with the sinuosities of the border rivers. Can Congress forget that our northwestern frontier will be subject to the inroads of Indian depredations, in the event of a collision with England? And he had evidence, which he could rely upon, that the English Fur Company, either through policy of their own interest, or by the countenance of higher authority, have long adopted a policy of conciliating the various tribes that are crowded together by the too eager policy of our Government to extinguish land titles, and hover along the remote Northwest. He would not ask the Representatives and Delegates from that region whether that country was in a condition to repel a sudden invasion. The condition of the far Southwest was but little better. A few indifferent fortresses, with a scanty supply of ordnance, were all that the country could rely upon to keep in check thirty thousand warriors, pressed upon each other by the like policy of land speculators and the Government. He would ask gentlemen from the extreme South if there was a single fort on the Gulf of Mexico and its tributaries, on which float the rich staples of that prosperous country, that could resist the assault of a steam ship-of-war two hours? There is not one. Look along the entire Atlantic sea-board, and you will not find a fort or commercial city that could avert destruction from a fleet of half a dozen ships-of-the-line. With this melancholy, but too true, condition of our whole frontier border, Congress will vote millions for forts, but hesitate about establishing a national foundry for cannon. The condition of the Canada and New Brunswick frontier is but little better provided for defense. There is not the titling of ordnance along it which the exigencies require. And yet no less than three bills have been reported within the last few days, authorizing the Executive to build additional forts. He had opposed one the other night. He should oppose the whole of them, unless, at the same time, or in one of the bills, provision be made for placing those already built, as well as those proposed to be constructed, in a state of complete defense, by an abundant supply of ordnance.

Suppose the condition hurried upon us which some members seem so eagerly to invite—a speedy war with England. Its first fury will be at the extreme North. It will be with artillery. Will you dismantle all the forts to the south of its seat, in order to make that position formidable? Have we the control of the ocean, to defend all the assailable points along the Atlantic and the Gulf of Mexico, without relying on our land fortifications? War, you may be assured, sir, would not exist a month before it would wear a bloody spirit of ubiquity; and the swift engines of destruction would be felt most frequently where least suspected. He must look on with the cold indifference of oriental apathy at the amazing improvements going on in the world, which outstrip imagination and puzzle the judgment with astonishment, who has not marked the great revolution, which has been almost as quickly effected as conceived, in navigating the mighty oceans. He has been neglectful, he would with deference say, as a watchful representative of the nation, who has not noted the wonderful improvements made by the powerful nations of Europe in their engines and implements of war. Thrice remiss must he be who will not cheerfully place his own country in a position to meet invasions or repel outrages with a like, or, if possible, superior, means of preservation, or, if you please, destruction.

It was but a few weeks ago that we heard that a French fleet was towed into position by a steamship of war before the castle of San Juan de Uloa, and in two hours battered it into a heap of ruins. But a few days ago we were astonished to hear that one of those steam-vessels had penetrated our inland seas, and was in the port of Baltimore, to the equal surprise and admiration of the nation. If the Veloce had had on board her heavy ordnance and enormous bomb mortars, it would have been an easy task for her to have destroyed, singly and alone, every fort from the Atlantic to the monumental city. How many of those vast bomb mortars have we in our forts or in our Navy which throw a ball horizontally with the precision of a cannon; such as the French used in destroying the proud fortress at Vera Cruz; such as the English and Russians have in depot and in service? We have, I believe, four on the steamship Fulton, and we have a few thousand ten and twelve inch bomb-shells in forts and in depot. We have two, certainly not more than four, of those mortars which throw the hollow ball horizontally; and he (Mr. J.) had been informed, upon the highest authority, that the attempt to use them had, for want of skill, science, or practice, proved a failure. The matches in some experiments would not fuse; in other attempts they would explode as quickly as they left the cannon. As yet, they may be said to be worthless to the nation.

It is not that the Government shall monopolize the business of making cannon and all the material of war that he urged the erection of a national foundry; but that they should have at least an experimental foundry, with the capacity for enlargement in time of war, or upon any emergency, where they could not only make experiments in casting cannon, which is a most costly article of national want; for but where they could regulate the models, and try every means of combining metals, testing inventions and improvements, and improving, if possible, the present and future improvements, appertaining to engines for steamships of war.

Thousands of dollars have been spent by Government with private founders in order to have large brass cannon cast, and never has one been cast that would stand the test; nor was it until recently that those of a smaller size could be cast of a good quality. Mr. Ames, proprietor of a private foundry, has succeeded with the latter; and Mr. J. believed that the proprietor of the foundry near Boston has recently cast those of a small size that have stood the test required by Government.

Mr. N. P. Ames, the proprietor of a brass cannon foundry, and perhaps one of the most practical and scientific artisans in this or any other country, in a letter to a select committee, dated January 31, 1839, in answer to sundry questions, makes the following sensible answer:

WASHINGTON, January 31, 1839.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this date, in relation to a national foundry.

In answer to your first inquiry, "Would a national foundry be useful for the purposes of Government?" I would say that I believe one might be made so. I am sensible of the importance of experiments in establishing new patterns and testing different materials; and I think it would be well for Government to have the power to determine, definitely, what is best for the public service. A foundry would afford facilities for investigation that might prove valuable to the public interest.

In answer to the second inquiry, "Might not a foundry be established without detriment to private establishments?" I should think it would not necessarily be detrimental, but might be useful. There would undoubtedly be many experiments made at a national foundry that would not be proposed to private individuals, and beneficial results might arise, directly or indirectly, through such experiments. On the other hand, if a national foundry should be made so extensive as to reduce the business for private establishments to an amount that would not make it an object for enterprising individuals to engage in it, I think the public as well as private interests might be injured; for I believe the incentive for improvement in manufacturing operations is generally greater where private than where public interest only is engaged; and without the influence, directly or indirectly, of private establishments, improvements in public establishments would be likely to be limited.

It is, therefore, my opinion, that a national foundry should be established only on such grounds as would enable the public and private interests to subservise each other. The business of casting cannon might be taken entirely from individuals, as it depends only on Government for support. In this respect it differs materially from most other branches of business.

In answer to the last inquiry, "What region of country would be most eligible for a foundry?" I am not prepared for an opinion. Convenient water communication and water power would, in my view, be among the most important considerations in selecting a situation.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

N. P. AMES.

To the Hon. WILLIAM C. JOHNSON, Chairman of the Foundry Committee of the House of Representatives.

Such were the views which he (Mr. J.) had always entertained on this subject, that, so far from a national foundry injuring, it would really aid private interests, and would place the Government beyond the influence of combinations or impositions of any kind. What is there now to prevent a sagacious enemy employing a secret agent to purchase the private foundries, and then, in time of war, closing them upon the Government?

European Governments are more wise and sagacious in this respect. Every prominent Government of Europe has a national establishment for casting cannon.

The following statement was furnished the committee on that part of the President's message which related to the establishment of a national foundry for making cannon for the use of the Army and the Navy. It shows the mode used in Europe for supplying each nation with this indispensable means of national safety and protection:

United Service Journal, April, 1837.

CANNON FOUNDRIES.—The chief cannon foundry in Austria is in Vienna; that of Bavaria is at Augsburg, for the foundry at Munich is for casting statues and other works of the fine arts only; that of Wurtemberg is at Louisa, near Stuttgart; that of the Grand Duchy of Baden is at Carlsruhe; that for the Electorate of Hesse Cassel is at Cassel; Saxony has one, on a confined scale, at Dresden; for Prussia Saxony there is a foundry at Lauchamer, not far from Dresden; for Prussia there is one, though by no means of the most complete description, a second at Glatz, in Silesia, and a third at Sayn, about five miles from Coblenz, on the right bank of the Rhine; in the latter of which general as well as military castings are carried on. We are not aware that there is any foundry in the kingdom of Hanover, the cannon used being brought from England. The largest foundries in England are at Liverpool, in the vicinity of Birmingham, at Glammormoor and at Carron, in the north of Scotland. Russia possesses five, the largest of which is at St. Petersburg. There is one also at Moscow, and one at Casan. With regard to Portugal, its only foundry was at Lisbon; but that has been abandoned, and she imports all her cannon from England.

The only work of the kind in Spain is at Seville. There are two foundries in Italy—one at Turin and the other at Naples. Holland possesses a foundry at the Hague, conducted by Maritz, a Genevese, formerly a pupil of the Paris polytechnic school. The works at Liege, in Belgium, are, we believe, the only works where iron as well as brass cannon are cast. In France there are three foundries of brass cannon—at Douar, Toulouse, and Stratsburg; and two of iron cannon—at Ruel, near Angoulême, and at St. Gervais, in the south of the kingdom. In Denmark there is one foundry at Fredricswerk.—Notes by M. A. Jullien.

He would quote an extract from Commodore Patterson's letter to the Secretary of the Navy whilst commanding the Mediterranean squadron in 1834:

Extract of a letter from Commodore Daniel T. Patterson, whilst in command of the Mediterranean squadron, to the Secretary of the Navy, No. 101.

September, 16, 1834.

When at Cairo, I visited and closely examined the various establishments and institutions founded and supported by the Pacha. Within the walls of the citadel are a manufactory of small-arms, pistols, and sabers; a foundry for brass artillery, casting, turning, and boring, the two latter both effected at the same time and by the same power; contiguous to the boring room is the manufactory of field carriages and caissons, of which there were a number completed, with artillery and howitzers mounted ready for service, all of exceeding good and handsome workmanship.

I next visited a furnace and machinery for rolling sheet copper, and a manufactory of sheathing nails and spikes, conducted by an Englishman.

At Boulac, a suburb and the port of Cairo, is a new and extensive furnace and foundry for iron ordnance and every species of casting, very recently established, having three large iron hearths and a steam-engine; all the machinery English. Hereafter, all the ordnance for the forts and marine will be manufactured at Cairo, as have been the field artillery and small-arms for two years.

We are behind the age in improvements in machinery and implements of war and national protection. There is no establishment where Government can satisfactorily test the utility of modern improvements with complete and ready facility.

About two years ago Mr. Cochran, the inventor of the cylindrical small-arm and cannon, informed him (Mr. J.) that, failing to be patronized by this Government in the latter, he sought the countenance of the Grand Sultan, and by the aid of his Government he tested his invention in the presence of his highness in Constantinople. But a few days ago a citizen of this city was expressing to Mr. J. his mortification that he could not test an invention of his upon a cannon, which he had tried with great satisfaction upon small fire arms, to prevent the "escape of the power of powder from the touchhole." No individual has ordnance; they are serviceable alone as national property.

Can any mind of ready perception for a moment doubt that a mighty revolution has not only commenced, but has already been effected, in maritime warfare? Steam has not only been made auxiliary to wind and tide, but proudly to triumph over both, and to leave, struggling with the elements in its wake, the tardy canvas which has whitened the seas like things of air for a thousand years. The poet's highest imagination of other days has fallen short of modern genius, who never dreamt that steam would press the swift car more than fifty miles an hour, and that the propelling wind would be too feeble for the quick impulses of the present age, when he said sails would be used on land.

— "on the barren plains
Of Sericana, where Chinese drive
With sails and wind their cany wagons light."
[Paradise Lost.

The swift steamship, with its dreadful implements of destruction, will have the tendency, he could hope, as he believed, of lessening, from its very power of destruction, an appeal to arms by the civilized nations of the globe. Its sudden incursion on the defenseless city, the security of those on board, and the destruction of those assailed, will give but little glory to the successful, and no disgrace to the unsuspecting and surprised citizens of the consumed city.

The martial pomp of the tented field, the glittering livery and the waving plume, the very romance and poetry of chivalry will be destroyed; and the ambitious will, from these causes, cease to aspire for martial glory, because it will not be accorded by the slaughter of his fellow-beings. Skill and courage will give no advantage. And when war is robbed of those attributes, the warm enthusiast for distinction will seek it in other pursuits. He must seek it in acts and deeds of moral and intellectual improvement and superiority, in ameliorating the condition of mankind, rather than in the sanguinary profession of arms.

He, for one, believed in the improvable condition of the human race, and that much higher perfection is yet to be attained in civilizing, in moralizing, and refining the most improved nations of the world. The generous, the benevolent, and the philanthropic had still abundant and arduous labors to perform in that broad and endless field of improvement.

But, then, he maintained, this or any other nation, to preserve that peace so desired, must be ever ready to defend its rights and protect its interests and its honor. The best way to preserve peace in this age, and perhaps in ages to come, is to be formidably prepared for war. We must regard man as he is, and not as he may be, or as we could fondly hope that he should be.

He had digressed somewhat from the object and purpose of his remarks, and would now ask, what was our condition on the ocean? Many of our ships are unfit for sea; and after an expenditure of more than fifty million dollars, we have but few superior vessels-of-war. The South Sea exploring squadron was delayed under the pretext of lessening the number of vessels, when it was proposed to send but five. It at last, after two years' delay, sailed with six vessels, and will be inoffensive, in any emergency, under the Executive proclamation, for three years, even in the event of a war. The committee may recollect that a bill was hurried through this House last year to organize a coast squadron, for the protection of our merchant vessels, when a "dark, piratical looking vessel" was supposed to be hovering on our coast. That single "magic ship at sea" created more concern in Congress than the whole naval power of England has at the present time. But the Secretary of the Navy has informed us, at the opening of this session, that he has been unable to effect the intention of Congress, "owing to the want of proper vessels at the disposal of the Department. After supplying the necessities of foreign stations, the steamship Fulton is the only one now available for this service." Then the steamship Fulton is the only vessel now available to protect our merchantmen along a coast of some fifteen hundred miles in extent. We are far, very far, behind the age in steamships. We have one yes, one national steamship. Have England, France, and Russia, but one each? England has, he believed, about fifteen; France a like number, and Russia some eight or ten.*

An advantage in an eminent degree would result to the country from a national foundry in testing, by the fullest experiments the best metals and combinations of metals; so as to improve the tenacity of ordnance to resist heavy pressures, in order to prevent explosions and reduce as much as possible, to be safe, the weight of cannon for field trains and for the naval service. Most of the ordnance of the Government is totally unsafe for service, and nothing can create greater dismay in time of action than the explosion of a gun.

Taking this view of the importance of providing cannon of the best materials, Commodore Patterson, in giving his views at the request of National Defense—Mr. Johnson.

"Iron obtained from any one quality of ore rarely combines all the requisites for making the best and strongest ordnance; the practice has therefore been to mix iron from different ores in such proportions as have been ascertained by experience to produce the requisites necessary. An accurate knowledge of metals, with the qualities of different ores, will be attained with the actual cost of ordnance; and, being made under the superintendence of scientific officers, will inspire a general confidence in their safety and accuracy, dispelling apprehension from bursting, instances of which have occurred in our Navy, as on board the frigate President at the very commencement of the late war, when in pursuit of the English frigate Belvidere, by which Commodore Rodgers had his leg broken, and some of the crew were seriously injured. The immediate consequence of such an accident, in most cases, would be to create a general distrust in the crews as to the safety of the arm which they were to use, calculated to produce disastrous results in an action.

"Most, if not all, nations, having occasion for ordnance, possess national foundries directed by their own officers, to supply the Government with the best, and all it requires, made of the best materials of the most approved patterns, and corresponding dimensions, insuring an adequate supply for all purposes, which cannot, at all times be obtained from private establishments, and, possibly, when most urgently required by the Government, not to be had; causing a delay that might be attended with consequences injurious to the nation, as in the event of a sudden war with a powerful foe, (events which not unfrequently occur,) when only partially provided with ordnance."

Confidence, most generally, in all pursuits of life, is indispensable to success. It is always the most powerful adjunct. Distrust in the safety of ordnance half covers a soldier or a seaman. Even a knight, clad cap-a-pie in armor, would dread his adversary, unless he knew full well he grasped

"The trenchment blade, Toledo trusty."

The great deficiency in our supply of heavy ordnance proceeds from either want of skill in casting it, or from the limited means placed in the hands of the ordnance department. He was inclined to the belief that both reasons had influence; and perhaps another, the taste, or, if you please, the judgment of the ordnance department and the Board of Naval Commissioners. He would willingly vote an appropriation of $1,000,000, to be expended in procuring or making heavy ordnance. The reserved contingent fund, which is always left in the Treasury, of $2,000,000, could not be better applied than by being invested in ordnance, or at least one half of it. It would be as much funds reserved, in the eye of a political economist, if invested in cannon, as if it were to quietly remain in the Treasury in the form of bullion. And, by the investment, this great advantage would accrue to the nation; the cannon would be as little destructible in depot as the bullion in the Treasury; the former could be at once used upon a national emergency; the latter would at least most likely be used, but slowly, in procuring ordnance.

Those who will trace the history of Europe from the time of Edward III., who first used artillery, to the days of Frederick the Great, to Napoleon, and down to the last attack of the French upon Mexico, will find that, in almost every battle that has been fought, with equal numbers, superiority of ordnance decided the fate of success.

Bonaparte traced the entire failure of his African campaign to the circumstance of the capture of one of his ships by the British, on which was his heavy ordnance that he designed to destroy an important fortress with. As repeated and gallant as his assaults were, he found, to his dismay and confusion, that he had to encounter too fatally his own ordnance—repelling all his efforts.

The number of small arms now in our national depots is, by the tabular statement furnished the committee by the Colonel of Ordnance, on the 7th of March, 1838, 3,078 cavalry sabers, 3,971 artillery swords, 2,021 pistols, 1,645 carbines, 13,765 rifles, 572,005 muskets. Although better supplied with small-arms than with ordnance, he regretted to find that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means reported, in the annual Army appropriation bill, a diminution of $60,000 of the regular amount of appropriation to the two national armories, and $60,000 to private contractors.

He, (Mr. J.), with other members, made an ineffectual attempt to have the original appropriation reinstated in the bill. But economy was urged; and it is generally urged effectively when a latent national good may be pretermitted for some present tangible consideration. The cost of the muskets is about twelve dollars each.

Our population is now about double what it was at the commencement of the last war with England. We had, at the commencement of that war, 240,000 muskets in depot, and 60,000 were made and purchased during its continuance; and, at its termination, there were but 20,000 in the arsenals. Eight years were required to supply those which were lost and destroyed during the war. "Had the war continued another year," says the report of the ordnance department, "the deficiency of arms would have occasioned the most embarrassing consequences."

By a report made to Parliament in 1817, the number of small-arms furnished by Great Britain to the allies and the national troops, from 1803 to 1816, inclusive, was—

To the allies.....	2,143,643
To the regular troops.....	349,882
To the regular militia.....	59,405
To the local militia.....	151,969
To the volunteers.....	307,583
To the navy.....	215,233
Total.....	3,227,715
The number in depot in Great Britain in 1817 was.....	816,282
In the public service.....	900,974
Total.....	1,019,256

By the report of the Minister of War, it appears that the fire arms fabricated in the manufactories of the French Government, and made disposable for service from 1803 to 1814, were no less than 3,956,257.

The number in depot in France, in 1811, was 600,000, not including the immense number in service.

If it were necessary to illustrate the necessity of always having a superabundance of arms on hand, it might be stated that the English lost, at one blow, 60,000 muskets, which had been sent to Dantzic; and 100,000 more were lost in a single shipwreck.

At the close of the long war with France, when Bonaparte was dethroned and Louis reinstated, the emperors of Russia, of Austria, and other crowned heads, visited England. When they went to Woolwich, the Emperor of Austria was so astonished at the resources of that nation, and the immense supply of ordnance in depot, it is said, that he tested their reality with his cane, hardly believing it possible that they were real cannon, but that they were mock imitations, and designed for an artificial and ostentatious display of power.

He would say, before he concluded, that the entire officers of the Army and Navy, with hardly a single exception, thought that a national armory for making cannon was almost indispensable. Their statements in its favor filled nearly a hundred pages of the report, and those who used cannon were, or ought to be, good judges how they should be made. Their testimony at least had great weight with him. Unless you placed the forts in a state of protection, it were better that they had not been built. They could be easily taken by an enemy, and would then become their citadels for the easy annoyance of the nation. Indeed, he would say more. If the Government will not have them mounted with good ordnance, or adopt early means to place a sufficient supply of cannon in depot, which could be mounted at the first alarm of danger, national economy and the national interest would be promoted by their demolition. Nor could he ever vote for the erection of another, or for the repairs of those already built, until the Government adopted a policy of protection such as, or similar to, that which he had been feebly urging.

It was not because there were indications of collision with Great Britain that he urged the amendment. The present juncture of circumstances only enforced with increased weight the necessity of such a proposition as he had introduced. He thought it as essential in peace as on the approach of war; and nothing would be better calculated to avert a war than a formidable condition of our national defenses. So far from its being a belligerent measure, it was one of humanity; for it might be reduced to an aphorism, that the best way to avert national calamity was to prepare for war in time of peace.

He thought that there was much wisdom in the Irish maxim, that the best way to avoid danger was not to fear it. Certainly, to be well prepared to repel it.

Mr. J. said that he had not the burning impetuosity which some members had to plunge this nation into war at this time, as little prepared as it was for such a struggle. He would rather give the people the means of protection before much of its best blood should be shed. As one of the national legislative council, he would, through humanity, if not policy, rather economize human life than be oversaving of the public treasure. Expend the latter judiciously in time of peace, and you will by the very act effect the former.

No wise nation will hurry itself into war without some preparation. Rashness has less affinity to true courage than prudence. Rarely will national honor suffer by a firm and prudent remonstrance against national wrongs. Feelings which govern honorable men in their transactions of life are but aggregated in the sentiments of an upright, honest, and brave nation; and the former are but multiplied minatures of the latter. Generous dignity and cool firmness, whilst they grace a gentleman, make a nation invincible.

He had the moral, he believed, of one of Sir Walter Scott's allegories, in one of his fugitives, strongly impressed on his mind, though it was long since he had read it. Most of its coloring had faded from his memory. It describes a youth in all the glow and full pride of manhood, with bosom beating high for fame, emulous of renown, without a sense of fear. His genius specter led him to a sepulchral and gloomy cavern, where he beheld knights strayed on the earth and clad in armor. A dim light on the table gave a melancholy horror to the spectacle, and by it were laid a sword and trumpet. The specter-ghost, with measured emphasis, informed the intrepid youth that his fate or future destiny, to realize all his ardent aspirations or irretrievable ruin, depended upon his first choice in using one of the two instruments before him. The specter was then silent, and his eyes glared anxiously on the youth. The youth paused a moment in meditation as if his judgment was counseling his feelings; then firmly seized the trumpet, and placed it to his mouth. The cavern reverberated with the sound. A hundred knights, as if by magic, sprang on their feet with their drawn swords. And before he was hurled into destruction, the youth but heard the dreadful voice of the specter saying, "Woe and destruction to that foolish man who first blows the trumpet before he draws the sword." Whilst others are here blowing the trumpet, though not a specter, he (Mr. J.) was anxious to place in their hands the sword.

We have on our northern border more than twenty thousand soldiers in arms; and we should put our entire frontier in a state of defense. He had but slight apprehensions of a serious collision with England. It was the interest of both nations to preserve friendly relations. In our present condition, the sacrifice of men and money would be immense. With England, to the like considerations would be superadded the preservation of her four colonies. He believed that the question could be settled to the satisfaction and interest of both nations. His mind was free from every shadow and mist of doubt on the subject of right and title to the disputed territory; it is a part of Maine—an integral part of the whole country. There was a good deal of Hotspur impetuosity to the North, on both sides, and with all parties. He approved of the temper and tone of the Executive message; but was opposed to much of the discretionary power proposed to be given to the Executive in the bill under consideration. The Constitution gave the Executive already very great powers. He would not surrender to the discretion of any Executive, however prudent, virtually the power to make war. Congress alone should declare war. The Executive had now the power to repel invasions. He had the power to demand of England a final adjustment of this too long procrastinated question. The ultimatum of both Governments should be known; and for that purpose there was plenty of time before the meeting of the next Congress, unless the war speeches in Congress should stimulate the irritation on the border. He looked, he trusted, calmly on the subject, and believed he felt so; yet he felt a deep interest in the vexed controversy. He had heard much said about patriotism and courage from all sides of the House; nor would it be proper for him to inquire how much of it, on this floor, has often evaporated in words. He would let others form their estimate. He believed that the people of his State had a due proportion of both. He believed that they would prefer pursuing their quiet and honest industry to hammering their plowshares into swords; but, if war was inevitable; if it was forced upon them by the impetuosity of the people of Maine, the imprudence of the Executive, the injustice or injury of England, he believed he could safely say that, in the trying hour of danger, they would be where duty would call them; that, if a foreign foe invaded our territory, at the far North or the far South, then they would let that foe, of whatever nation they were, sorely feel

"The might that slumbers in a freeman's arm."

SMITHSONIAN BEQUEST.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE.

January 10, 1839.

Mr. ROBBINS submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed, consisting of five members of the Senate, jointly with such committee as may be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to consider the expediency of providing an institution of learning, to be established in the city of Washington, for the application of the legacy bequeathed by Mr. James Smithson, of London, to the United States, in trust for that purpose; also, to consider the expediency of a charter for such institution, together with the powers and privileges which in their opinion the said charter ought to confer; also, to consider the expediency of ways and means to be provided by Congress other than the said legacy, but in addition thereto, and in aid of said benevolent intention, and to report by bill or bills in the premises.

The resolution having been read,

Mr. ROBBINS said that, some days ago, he gave notice that he would take an opportunity to ask leave to introduce a joint resolution on the subject of the legacy bequeathed by Mr. Smithson, of London, to the United States in trust; and that he would take the same opportunity to submit to the Senate his views upon that subject. I rise now (said Mr. R.) to ask that leave, and to submit these views.

The motive to this noble legacy was, as the will expresses it, "the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men." Noble, indeed, it was, in every point of view; noble as coming from a stranger, with whom this country had no personal relations, speaking at once his high sense of our merit, while it proclaimed his own; noble in amount, and may be made effective to its beneficent purpose; but, above all, noble for its destination—"the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men;" leaving it to the wisdom of Congress to devise and provide the institution that should be most effective to this end. It ought to be an institution whose effects upon the country will make it a living monument to the honor of the illustrious donor in all time to come. Such an institution, I conceive, may be devised, of which, however, at present there is no model either in this country or in Europe; giving such a course of education and discipline as would give to the faculties of the human mind an improvement and power far beyond what they obtain by the ordinary systems of education; and far beyond what they afterwards attain in any of the professional pursuits.

Such an institution, as to its principle, suggested itself to the sagacious and far-seeing mind of Bacon, as one of the greatest importance. But while his other suggestions have been followed out with such wonderful success in extending the boundaries of physical science, this has been overlooked and neglected. One reason is, that the other suggestions were more elaborately explained by him; there, too, he not only pointed out the path, but he led the way in it himself. Besides, those other suggestions could be carried out by individual exertion and enterprise, independently of the existing establishments of learning; or they could be grafted on, and made a part of, those establishments. But this required an original plan of education, and a new foundation for its execution; where the young mind would be trained by a course of education and discipline that would unfold and perfect all his faculties; where genius would plume his young wings, and prepare himself to take the noblest flights. The idea, however, was not entirely original with Bacon; for it would be, in effect, but the revival of that system of education and discipline which produced such wonderful improvement and power of the human mind in Greece and Rome, and especially in Greece. Its effects here, I am persuaded, would be many and glorious. Of these I shall now indicate only one; but that one whose importance all must admit. In its progress, and ultimately, it would give to our country, I have no doubt, a national literature of a high and immortal character. However mortifying to our national pride it is to say it, it must be confessed that we have not a national literature of that character; nor is it possible we ever should have, as it appears to me, on our present systems of education. Not that our literature, such as it is, is inferior to that of other nations produced at the present day. No; mediocrity is the character of all literary works of the present day, go where you will. It is so in England, it is so in France, the two most literary nations of Europe. It is true, learned men and great scholars are everywhere to be found, indeed, they may be said to abound more than ever; the whole world, too, has become a reading world; the growth of the press is prodigious; but it is all ephemeral and evanescent—all destined to the grave of oblivion. Nor is it that our countrymen have not the gift of genius for literary works of that high and immortal character. Probably no people were ever blessed with it in a greater degree—of which everywhere we see the indications and the evidence; but what signifies genius for an art without discipline, without knowledge of its principles and skill in that art?

"Vis consilii expers, mole ruit sua;
Vim temperatam, dii quoque provebunt,
In majus."

Literature is now everywhere mediocre—because the arts of literature are nowhere cultivated; but everywhere neglected and apparently despised. I recollect to have seen in a late and leading periodical of Great Britain, an article in which the writer congratulates the age upon having thrown off the shackles of composition; and says, in a tone of triumph, that no one now thinks of writing like Junius, (as if it was an easy matter, but beneath him, to write like Junius,) except, he adds, some junior sophister in the country, corresponding with the editor of some village newspaper. The whole tribe of present writers seem, by their silence, to receive this description as eulogy—as a tribute of praise properly paid to their merit; while in truth it is the characteristic of a barbarous age, or of one declining to barbarism; it is the very description applied to mark the decline and last glimmering of letters in Greece and Rome.

The object of education is two-fold—knowledge and ability, both are important, but ability by far the most so. Knowledge is so far important as it is subsidiary to the acquiring of ability; and no further; except as a source of mental pleasure to the individual. It is ability that makes itself to be felt by society; it is ability that welds the scepter over the human heart and the human intellect. Now it is a great mistake to suppose that knowledge imparts ability of course. It does indeed impart ability of a certain kind; for by exercising the attention and the memory, it improves the capacity for acquiring; but the capacity to acquire is not ability to originate and produce. No; ability can only be given by the appropriate studies, accompanied with the appropriate exercises—directed by a certain rule, and conducted infallibly to a certain result.

In all the celebrated schools of Athens this was the plan of education; and there the ingenious youth, blessed with faculties of promise, never failed to attain the eminence aspired to, unless his perseverance failed. Hence the mighty effects of those schools; hence that immense tide of great men which they poured forth in all the departments of science and letters; and especially of letters; and hence, too, the astonishing perfection of their works. A celebrated writer, filled with astonishment at the splendor as well as the number of the works produced by the scholars of these schools, ascribes the event to the hand of a wonder-working Providence, interposed in honor of human nature, to show to what perfection the species might ascend. But there was nothing of miracle in it; the means were adequate to the end. It is no wonder at all that such schools gave to Athens her Thucydides in history, her Plato in ethics, her Sophocles to her drama, and her Demosthenes to her forum and her popular assemblies; and gave to her besides that host of rivals to these and almost their equals. It was the natural and necessary effect of such a system of education; and especially with a people who held, as the Athenians did, all other human considerations as cheap in comparison with the glory of letters and the arts.

It is true, this their high and brilliant career of literary glory was but of short duration; for soon as it had attained its meridian blaze, it was suddenly arrested; for the tyrant came and laid the proud freedom of Athens in the dust, and the Athenians were a people with whom the love of glory could not survive the loss of freedom. For freedom was the breast at which that love was fed; freedom was the element in which it lived and had its being; freedom gave to it the fields where its most splendid triumphs were achieved. The genius of Athens now drooped; fell from its lofty flights down to tame mediocrity—to ephemeral works born but to languish and to die; and so remained during the long rule of that ruthless despotism—the Macedonian; and until the Roman came to put it down, and to merge Greece in the Roman empire. Athens now was partially restored again to freedom. Her schools, which had been closed, or which had existed only in form, revived with something of their former effect. They again gave forth some works worthy of their former fame, though of less transcendent merit; and they now gave to Rome the Roman eloquence and literature.

*Græcia capta serum victorem cepit, et artes

and, if we are wise to profit by their example, may yet give to us an equal eloquence and literature.

I mention these things to show what encouragement we have to this enterprise—what well grounded hope of success. We have only to tread the path that led the Athenian to his glory, and open that path to the youth of our country. All the animating influences of freedom exist here in still greater force than they existed there; for, while it is not less absolute here, it is better regulated—better combined with order and security. Neither is the gift of genius wanting here; the gleams of this precious ore are seen to break out here and there all over the surface of our society; the animus acer et sublimis is daily displayed by our countrymen in all the forms of daring and enterprise; the eagle, their emblem, is not more daring in his flights. And if the love of fame, which was the ruling passion of the Greek, is not now so strong with us, it is because the want of the means, the want of plain and sure directions for its pursuits, begets a despair of its attainment. The Greek had these means, had these plain and sure directions; and it was the certainty of success, by perseverance and by their guide, that kindled and sustained his passion, and made it his ruling passion. This passion is now burning in the young bosoms of thousands of our youth; but it is, as I have said, vis consilii expers, and struggles in vain, because it struggles blindly for the fame it pants after. Let this Athenian mode of education be adopted in this instance; let it produce but a few examples of eminent success, (as I have no doubt it speedily would,) and thousands would rush to the path that had led to that success; and members now of this body are yet young enough to live to see a new era arising in our land—an other golden age of literature, no less splendid than any that had gone before it—not excepting even the Athenian.

I know it has been supposed that the Athenians had something peculiar in their genius, which gave to them their unparalleled success. But we have seen that when, with the loss of freedom, they lost their love of literary glory, they fell back to the ordinary level of mankind, and were not at all distinguished for literary merit from the mass of nations. So it was not nature, but the means adopted to assist and improve nature, that gave to them their preëminence; and their success was but in exact proportion to the perfection and use of those means.

I could wish, if all were agreed in it, that this institution should make one of a number of colleges to constitute a university to be established here, and to be endowed in a manner worthy of this great nation and their immense resources. This object, recommended by Washington in one of his early communications to Congress, has not, as it appears to me, received the attention it merits. For such an establishment, formed and conducted as it might be, would be attended with great and glorious results, to this country—not only by its direct operation in elevating the standard of education, but by forming a central point, a local head to all the learning of the country, such as the most learned nations of Europe have, and from which they derive the greatest advantages. But as opinions are divided upon this subject—not, I should hope, as to the great desirableness of such an establishment, but as to the constitutional competency of Congress to undertake it—I will not embarrass my present object by involving it with that subject. This, as an independent institution, may hereafter be made a part of such a university, should one be established; but it is now to be looked at only as an independent institution. Still I should hope that the liberality of Congress would so far concur with the generosity of this foreign benefactor as to give full effect to his beneficent purpose, and would not only give the grounds convenient for the accommodation and location of the buildings, but would also make an appropriation of money therefor sufficient to cover the cost of their erection; leaving the whole amount of the legacy as a fund the proceeds of which to be applied to the accumulation of books and apparatus, and to the support of the instruction and government of the institution; otherwise, the whole thing, I fear, will prove a failure by the expense of the outlays; at least when compared to the results which it might be made to produce; for though the salaries of instruction should not be over large, yet they should be so liberal as to command the services of the ablest instructors in every department embraced by the plan of education.

This is not the occasion for a detail in full of the plan of education which I should wish to see adopted; I will, however, beg leave to give its outline; premising that my object would be to give both learning and ability, but ability as the primary object. Ability, as I have stated, can only be given, as I am fully persuaded, by appropriate exercises directed by a certain rule; that is, by the principles of the art, whatever that art may be. So that exercises, exercises would be the Alpha and Omega of my system. The studies should be combined of science and literature, with its appropriate arts. As to science, they should be restricted to science properly so called—to pure original science—with some of the practical branches thereof not necessary now to be indicated, excluding professorial learning altogether. As to literature, the studies should be given to select models of a perfect literature, and to all those arts by which that perfect literature has been produced, and may be reproduced, accompanied by all those exercises regularly and ardently pursued, by which power and skill is given in those arts. The preliminary studies to qualify for admission should also be proscribed. I would have a model school for this preparation annexed to this institution and made a part of the establishment.

Such an institution, conducted by great masters, as I should hope the instructors to be, and without such indeed nothing great in education can be accomplished, whatever the system may be; but, conducted by great masters, would make the illustrious stranger, the founder of the institution, as I think, one of the greatest of benefactors to our country and to mankind, and to be worshipped almost, here at least, as the patron saint of education.

Mr. PRESTON. Unquestionably the subject to which my venerable friend, the honorable Senator from Rhode Island, has called the attention of the Senate, is one of great importance, demanding the grave consideration of Congress. The Smithsonian legacy has put the Government in possession of $500,000, which, by the acceptance of the trust, imposes upon us the duty of administering this fund in the most appropriate way, to accomplish the broad beneficence "of the diffusion of knowledge among men." As it is in the order of Providence that, as the mind is enlarged, our moral nature is also exalted, there can be no object more beneficent or dignified than that which the acceptance of this legacy presents to us. I earnestly hope that our efforts to discharge the trust assumed may be wisely directed and crowned with success. And surely, Mr. President, the establishment of the Smithsonian Institution could not commence under more favorable auspices than to have attracted the care of the honorable Senator, who in every way is so eminently qualified to take charge of whatever concerns the interests of learning or of charity. No one has more experienced in his own heart, or more exemplified in his own character, the benign influences of education, than the honorable gentleman; and no one, therefore, in this body, was so fit to have submitted the resolution before you, or to cast the foundations of an institution whose duration, we may hope, will bear a proportion to its enlarged objects. I am sure I but speak the sentiments of all the Senators, when I offer him my earnest thanks for the lead he takes in this matter. Nor can I forbear, also, Mr. President, to thank him for introducing, upon this most fit occasion those elegant and elevated topics which carry us for a moment into regions of calm and serene air, above the smoke and din of our accustomed and more strenuous efforts on this floor. It is pleasant to repose, though but for an instant, upon the green spot he has presented to us.

I rejoice, Mr. President, that it has so happened that this subject demands our attention at this session. After a long term of useful and honorable public service, my honorable friend is now about to terminate his coöperation with us on this floor. It is his last session. It is a fortunate, as it is a most just and fit termination of his official productions, that he at once finishes and perfects them by inscribing his name where it will be most appropriately placed—upon an institution for the promotion of knowledge. I hope, Mr. President, that we shall at once proceed to an earnest attention of this resolution, and to carry into effect the intentions of a testator, with a liberality controlled only by our constitutional restrictions.

The resolution was then agreed to.

SPEECH OF HON. F. W. PICKENS,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 1, 1839.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the bill reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom had been referred the President's message concerning the Northeastern Boundary Question—

Mr. PICKENS said it was with extreme reluctance he trespassed upon the attention of the committee; nothing but the great importance of the measure could induce him to do so at present. He had interrupted his colleague [Mr. LEGARE] as to the point of order, and had claimed the floor merely because of the circumstances under which he was placed with reference to the bill under consideration. It will be remembered that this morning, when the bill was first under discussion, his colleague [Mr. THOMPSON] had said he hoped that the bill would pass unanimously, without debate, as there could be no opposition to it. He (Mr. P.) then said that would not be the case, and he desired to inform the chairman [Mr. HOWARD] that, if he supposed so, he would be mistaken, for he (Mr. P.) intended to move to strike out the second section, and then gave notice of that, but, before proceeding, he gave way to hear the chairman first, in the development of the views of the committee. But, instead of this course, others had obtained the floor then, and brought on a wide range of discussion, and he had been prevented from explaining his points of objection to the bill. He desired to do so now.

But before discussing the bill, I desire (said Mr. P.) to notice the last observations of my colleague, [Mr. LEGARE.] He had said there was no danger of collision from the march of hostile troops at present, and had given in his experience of what he had witnessed in Europe, and said that he had often seen hostile armies moving and retiring over the same territory, and even coming into temporary conflict, and yet there was no war, and, in a few weeks, everything was again hushed into peace. This might be the case in regard to European armies, for they were made up of drilled and trained soldiers, under the strict orders of officers, who were again under the dictation of despotic cabinets. They could be marched up to the cannon's mouth, or marched off the field, because it might be the pleasure of a tyrant king, their master, so to will it. They were the mere machines in the hands of those who made war from ambition, and preserved peace from interest. Not so in our country. Let the President bring into action our forces, accustomed, as they were, even to licentious freedom, and we would find a very different state of things. Our armies would not be mercenary bands, but citizen-freemen, with but little discipline, and feeling a passionate enthusiasm for their country. When you once put a large force of that kind into action, and bring them near to their opponents, under their natural excitement, it would be as difficult to preserve peace as it would be to preserve from explosion the magazine into which ignited sparks were thrown.

The analogy drawn from other Governments does not hold good when applied to us. Peace may be preserved there, while the same causes would produce war here. There is always danger here in calling into existence military power, as is contemplated by the bill, unless we have already resolved on final action. In other Governments, everything is moved under the direction of despotic cabinets, with absolute power; the reverse is the case here.

I desire now to say a word in reference to what fell to-night from the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MENEFEE.] That gentleman had given us an enthusiastic disquisition on national honor and in which, if properly defined, I entirely agree. But if the gentleman meant that vague and undefinable national honor, drawn from the European code and practiced upon for the last three hundred years by European Governments, I raise my solemn protest against it. There whole nations had been drenched in blood upon a mere point of etiquette. Such doctrines might suit those countries whose people had been taught to humble themselves before the diadems of royalty, and to gaze in submission upon the stars and garters of nobility, but they were entirely unsuited to the people of a free Republic.

Sir, I contend that, in this country, with a Government limited and defined by the Constitution, we exercise nothing but trust powers for the benefit of the people, and we have no right to separate national honor from sound national interests.

Mr. MENEFEE asked if Mr. P. admitted that there was a difference between national honor and national interest?

Mr. PICKENS. No, sir, if properly understood and defined; but a general declamation upon abstract national honor, as drawn from the European code, was calculated to inflame our people, now already too excitable. I will not repeat Falstaff's soliloquy upon honor, but I will say that, although a duelist may demand satisfaction, at the risk of his life, because another may have too rudely brushed the skirt of his coat, yet, when the consequences of a man's action are not to be confined to himself, but drag with it the misery of millions, he has no right to stand upon a mere immaterial point of honor. What I mean to say is, that before a free people can be dragged into a war, it must be in defense of great national rights as well as national honor.

25TH CONG....3D SESS.

Maine Boundary Question—Mr. Pickens.

HO. OF REPS.

Before examining the second section of the bill, I desire to notice some of the observations which fell from the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BIDDLE.] In many of his remarks I entirely concur, but regret that he, as well as others, has thought proper on this occasion to call up topics not immediately connected with the subject. The discussion in which we are now involved will interest foreign Powers, and attention will be particularly drawn to it in England. As it is a contest between us and a foreign Power, I regret that it should have been thought necessary not only to go into the history of our faults upon this question, but also to censure our diplomatic controversies with other Powers. The gentleman [Mr. BIDDLE] has alluded to our blustering and talk exciting the ridicule of foreign Powers, and has even gone back to the last war with Great Britain, and said we had come out of it without gaining a single point, or at least having had all the points of controversy "adjourned over." I cannot see with what propriety these things are now brought up.

Mr. BIDDLE was understood to explain that he meant to illustrate the propriety of only taking such grounds at first as would be maintained and enforced if a conflict should occur.

Mr. PICKENS said he was willing to forget at present the past; or at least, when a critical controversy was pending between us and a foreign Power, he rather desired to cover over the faults of the country than to expose them to the gaze of the world. I have been taught from my mother's chamber, by examples drawn from Holy Writ, to dread Heaven's avenging curse pronounced upon that son who uncovered the nakedness of his parent. But I pass over these matters, and propose to examine the bill. The first section gives power to the President to call out the militia, the Army and the Navy, in certain contingencies that may happen. In the case of "actual invasion," he now has this power by the existing law. But a new contingency is now to be created, and that is, in case Great Britain should attempt to "enforce exclusive jurisdiction" over the disputed territory by "force of arms." This is a new and distinct power, as defined in this section, and makes a point in legislation.

The second section proposes "that in the event of actual invasion of the territory of the United States by any foreign Power, or of imminent danger of such invasion discovered in his [the President's] opinion to exist," then, and in that case, the President is clothed with power to enlist a regular army, with twenty new regiments, or nearly twenty thousand men. I contend that this is a dangerous power to be placed in the hands of any man. From what I know of the present President, I would as soon trust him with military power as any man I ever saw. He is cautious, and his nature is pacific. But it is a dangerous precedent to allow any Chief Magistrate to be the sole judge of the contingency and necessity for creating at one step a standing army of twenty thousand men. The Constitution has made Congress the judge of the necessity for war, and we have no right to delegate, directly or indirectly, any portion of that power. I have no idea of authorizing the President to take any step that may compel us hereafter to sanction that which will force us into a war. Let us declare war before we raise such an army. I have said that I do not fear to trust the present Executive with military power; but I am a sworn enemy of Executive discretion in any important matter that can be regulated by law. The precedent of to-day becomes the law of to-morrow. And we may have a prudent exercise of a dangerous power by a wise and virtuous President; but let things change—let us have some future hero, with his laurels green from the plains of some Talladega, Emucfau, or New Orleans—and then this very precedent which you now propose to establish will be quoted by him as containing the principle upon which he will ask to have discretionary power over a conditional army, which will be called upon to sustain him in waving his drawn sword triumphantly above the prostrate liberties of his country.

A standing army should never be created except by Congress, and we should be the sole judge of the time and manner of its creation. If there should be a necessity for it, there can be no difficulty. The country can be defended until Congress can be convened; and if there should be any such necessity for this army, Congress ought to be convened. Besides, suppose the President were to call for enlistments in the regular service now, what would be the result? You would get none but the very dregs from the alleys of your cities, forming a miserable band of the most inferior soldiers. In a well-fed country like this, you cannot get fit and proper recruits in the regular service until we shall have actually declared war, and thousands are thrown out of their ordinary employment for support. Then you can get a fine army of soldiers, and not until then. I would infinitely rather rely, in the first onset, for defense, upon the regular militia of the country or upon volunteers, than upon any suddenly raised enlistments. It is a mistake to suppose that, under the mere magic of the name of "regulars," they would have any advantage over militia or volunteers until they had seen service and felt that discipline which time alone can give.

Again, I think that this second section of the bill assumes somewhat a different position from that assumed by the President himself in his messages communicated to the House. I think these messages are pacific, and rather look to diplomatic arrangements to settle the controversy. The President's communications on the whole subject are executed with uncommon judgment and skill. They exhibit wisdom and prudence. Is it politic in us to do anything that may embarrass the position he has assumed? He looks, and I think wisely looks, to negotiation. The second section of the bill looks to me like clothing him with power to negotiate at the point of the sword. Could we bear this in a foreign Power towards us? It strikes me that its tendency may be rather to embarrass than to promote a peaceful arrangement.

I regret, exceedingly, that the Committee on Foreign Affairs should have thought it necessary to introduce certain portions of this bill, and I regret, exceedingly, that I cannot, in any event, support the second section, as it is entirely incompatible with my principles. Nothing can justify such a section, but imminent danger and extreme necessity. It is a great mistake to suppose that the Executive of this Confederacy is weak and powerless for the purposes of resistance and defense. In a just cause for national defense, where national rights as well as national honor are involved, there is not a stronger Executive in Christendom. Other countries rely for defense upon a drilled and standing army, whose profession is war, and who feed upon blood; but here, in a just and glorious cause, let the standard of the Republic be raised and we gather around it, not because an Executive orders us to do so, but because that devotion which springs from the hearts of freemen prompts us to come to the standard of our country. In a proper war the Executive will always find itself strong enough. In the first struggle we may suffer; but as to a permanent invasion or conquest, the thing is impossible. You may burn and devastate the land, but you can never conquer the country until you totally exterminate those who have been taught from their infancy to believe that no other institutions can preserve to them the inheritance of liberty. It is this universal feeling that makes your Executive sufficiently strong in all cases of just and necessary defense. It is according to the genius of our institutions that he should rely upon the citizen militia of the country in emergencies, for defense and support; and, as much as some Governments may ridicule them, I prefer that bulwark of national defense, as a general reliance, to any other that the wisdom of modern tacticians may create. They may be defeated, but they will rally again, and what is better, they are safe in times of peace.

That discretion which is to judge of the necessity of creating an addition to our present standing Army (which now amounts to twelve thousand) of twenty thousand, under an enlistment for five years, as contemplated in the second section of this bill, I desire should be left entirely to Congress, free from all embarrassment. The third section, which gives the President power over the equipment and arming of the Navy, and the fourth section, which creates the means, together with the first section, I consider strong enough, and as clothing him with all reasonable and necessary power. Strike out the second section, and I have no very serious objection to the bill; but then I consider it full strong. If any new aspect of great difficulty should arise with reference to Great Britain, let Congress be called together; and if we are to have war, let us choose our time to make it, and let us not be forced into it rashly and unprepared. But I cannot believe it possible for war to grow out of our present difficulty on this question. The good sense and interests of the two countries will not suffer it. As to the exclusive jurisdiction over the disputed territory set up by Great Britain, that arises from the construction she has always put upon her prior sovereignty. This claim rests upon the supposition that our independence and sovereignty commenced from the treaty of peace in 1783; and that, as she had exercised, prior to the Declaration of Independence or that treaty, sovereignty and jurisdiction over all the territory, then, subsequently to that period, she would continue to exercise jurisdiction upon all doubtful or disputed territory. Until the doubtful points are settled, she claims jurisdiction by reason of her prior sovereignty. This is the basis of her whole claim to exclusive jurisdiction; and yet this is all a mere fiction of law—the same as claiming a right from possession until a better title is proved. If such a position be sound, then, in a controversy between Great Britain and Russia in the Northwest, as to territory, the struggle would be to prove which was the oldest sovereign—Great Britain or Russia. The truth is, Great Britain treated with us in 1783 as an independent and equal sovereign; and amongst equals there can be, quoad hoc, no prior sovereign. The treaty makes the boundary, and is the law of location as to the line; and he who examines that, can have no hesitation as to the true line. Two rational minds cannot differ about it; yet Great Britain wishes particularly the northern portion of this disputed territory, as forming a military position to enable her to move troops across from New Brunswick to Canada; and, as she wants a military position, she makes a claim to territory; and I believe she was never known to yield such a claim. This is the whole amount of the controversy.

As to the declaration recently made in a letter of Sir John Harvey, that he was "acting under strict orders from his Government to exercise exclusive jurisdiction, and for that purpose he had the whole military force in the province at his command, and that his orders admitted of no discretion—that he was bound to execute them," I cannot believe but that he has misconceived his instructions.

I will now refer to only one circumstance, which is conclusive to my mind that he is mistaken. It will be recollected that the British Minister here (Mr. Fox) had but the other day signed a joint memorandum with Mr. Forsyth, recommending both Governor Fairfield and Sir John Harvey mutually to release prisoners taken on either side, and that both parties should "forbear to exercise exclusive jurisdiction" until the controversy is adjusted by the two Governments. Now, if the orders to Sir John Harvey from his Government were peremptory and admitted of no discretion, Mr. Fox must have been acquainted with them, and either Mr. Fox himself had discretion over the subject, or Sir John was mistaken in his construction; for how could the British Minister direct what he has in violation of orders from his Government? Either there is discretion or the British Governor has mistaken the construction of his orders, or Mr. Fox must be acting the diplomatic hypocrite in recommending what he has. I am induced to believe that Sir John Harvey must be mistaken or Mr. Fox would not have recommended what he has. I have no idea but that the whole matter can be amicably adjusted between the two countries without the slightest difficulty. But if the reverse should be the case, then we have other points of controversy of deep importance which we can bring into the account. I have alluded more fully, a few days since, in another debate, to the correspondence of Lord Palmerston with our Government, recently published, in which the British Government solemnly announce to us that they will not hereafter recognize any indemnity as due us from the destruction of our property in slaves, no matter under what circumstances they may fall under British dominion. This decision of that Government has been made in relation to three vessels driven by stress of weather on the Bahamas, bound from Alexandria to New Orleans with slaves belonging to our citizens. They make a distinction between the cases occurring previous to the British act of emancipation, passed for their West India islands, and those occurring since that act. They thus recognize indemnity as due in the one case, under the law of nations, and refuse in the other because, forsooth, their municipal regulation, as embodied in their act of emancipation, has upon that point abrogated the law of nations. Their own civil authorities upon the island, immediately after the vessel was driven in by the "act of God," seized upon the slaves, and forced them to accept their liberation, and refused possession to their owners; and yet the British Government solemnly refuse to us indemnity, and peremptorily announce to us that they will not hereafter recognize, under any circumstances, the right of property in persons. It is impossible to conceive of a more direct blow at our independence. It assumes the right in the British Government to declare to us in what our property shall not consist, and, by consequence, in what it shall consist. The whole correspondence shows the influence of O'Connell upon a weak cabinet. But I forbear to press this matter, and will only say, that rather than submit to this arrogant assumption of power by Great Britain, carried into full effect, I would prefer to see that noble country stretching itself from the Patapsco to the Sabine a howling wilderness, or wrapt in conflagration.

There are other points of controversy on our northwestern borders also, but it is, perhaps, no time to dwell on these things at present. I hope there is no danger of war. I believe everything will be amicably adjusted between us. The great capitalists of the two countries, our intimate commercial relations, and, above all, the good sense and good feeling that generally prevail on both sides, will preserve peace. But if I should be disappointed in this calculation, and the last sad appeal should be made, then, sir, let the "star spangled banner" be waved aloft, and the rally called, and, my life upon it, you will see the beacon fires of an indignant people kindled over a thousand hills, not only in the North, but in the South too; and the swords of a hundred thousand freemen will flash on high to avenge our wrongs and vindicate our rights.

Yes, sir, this is a question in which northern rights are peculiarly involved; and although we have been treated cruelly and unkindly by a portion of that section of the Union; although they have agitated a vital question, and made war upon our dearest rights and upon our domestic peace, yet I am willing, for the moment, to bury all that in oblivion, and to look alone to the rights and the honor of a common country. Our blood and treasure have been offered up before in a war waged peculiarly for northern rights, and we will be prepared again to do our duty, if needs be, without calculation as to cost.

In times that have recently passed, the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent, has been traduced and slandered by those who ought to have felt for us the common sympathy of brothers. There are those who have courted popularity by singling us out for denunciation, by way of illustrating their own peculiar patriotism. Yes, sir, South Carolina has been unkindly treated, but her star still twinkles above the horizon; her banner is in the breeze; and, thank God, there never has yet been a stain upon it; and now let the first tap of the war drum be heard on the remote confines of either extreme of this Union, and you will find her sons in the front ranks, with no other emotions beating in their hearts but for the glory and the triumph of a united and a common country.

PUBLIC LANDS.

SPEECH OF HON. J. ROBERTSON, OF VIRGINIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 7, 1839,

On the amendment proposed by him to the report of the Select Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Maryland, from the select committee to which the subject had been referred, having submitted the following report:

Resolved, That the committee report to the House, and ask leave to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject-matters referred to them, and that the journal of the committee be reported and published.

Resolved, further, That the committee deem it inexpedient to take further steps on the subject of the public lands this session.

Mr. ROBERTSON said that he had concurred with the committee in the resolution asking to be discharged. From the known diversity of opinion existing among its members, he was satisfied from the first that it would adopt no measure which could be proposed. No one, he imagined, was disappointed at the result of its labors. In doing nothing, it had performed its appointed work; it had fulfilled its destiny; and, for himself, he was grateful that it had done nothing worse.

But I did not concur, sir, (continued Mr. R.) in the resolution declaring it inexpedient to legislate upon the subject during the present session. I am not satisfied that this important question shall be thus put aside without one more effort, at least, to procure the action of the House upon it; and my purpose, in rising, was to move a recommitment to the same committee, or to the standing Committee on Public Lands, with instructions to report the joint resolution I now send to the Chair. I should prefer, however, sir, if in order, to offer the resolution as a substitute for those of the committee, so as to supersede the formality of a recommitment, and bring the question directly before the House.

The SPEAKER said it would be in order to move to strike out all after the word "resolved," and to insert the joint resolution proposed by the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. ROBERTSON accordingly moved to strike out, and insert the following joint resolution; which was read by the Clerk:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled, That, hereafter, the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause separate accounts to be kept of all moneys paid into the Treasury on account of sales of the public lands, to be disposed of in the manner herein provided, unless otherwise by law specially directed, viz: he shall, on the 1st day of July succeeding the next census, and thereafter semi-annually, on the 1st day of January and July in every year, divide all the said moneys then in the Treasury among the several States of the Union, in the ratio of their Federal numbers: Provided, nevertheless, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prohibit the appropriation of the proceeds of the public lands, or such portion thereof as may be requisite to meet the necessary expenditures of the Government for any year in which the receipts from customs and other sources of revenue shall be estimated to fall below — million dollars, and when it shall be deemed proper on that account to apply the said proceeds, by special appropriation, to supply the deficiency and meet those expenditures: Provided, also, That, in the event of a war between the United States and any foreign Power, the said semi-annual division shall cease, and be suspended during the continuance of such war: Provided, moreover, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to impair the right and obligation of Congress, whenever it shall satisfactorily appear that benefits from the use of the public lands, or the proceeds thereof, have been heretofore, or shall be hereafter, conferred on particular States, to extend as far as practicable in each and all the States, in their due and just proportions, who may require or be willing to accept them, similar benefits upon the same or equivalent terms.

Mr. DUNN moved to amend the amendment of Mr. ROBERTSON, by inserting before the first proviso—

First paying to the States in which such lands are situated twelve and a half per cent. of the proceeds of public lands sold within such States respectively.

Mr. ROBERTSON said: The object, sir, of the joint resolution I have ventured to present is to carry into effect the compacts between the original States of this Union, by distributing among all the States the future proceeds of the sales of the public domain in the proportions stipulated by these compacts. A proposition on its face so reasonable would seem to require no argument or persuasion to insure its adoption. But every similar one has been hitherto unsuccessful, and this, I am well assured, will be strenuously opposed. I avail myself, therefore, sir, of the opportunity now afforded me—the last, perhaps, I might ever enjoy—of addressing the House in its defense. I shall endeavor to maintain that the measure proposed is within the plain limits of our constitutional power; that the distribution it contemplates is not only intrinsically just, but is in conformity with compacts as solemn as any ever entered into among nations, and whose obligatory character is recognized by the Federal Constitution itself, and by Federal legislation both before and since that Constitution was adopted; that it has received the explicit sanction of a large majority of the States; and, indeed, directly or indirectly, of every State in the Union. In other words, sir, I hope to prove that the measure is both constitutional and expedient; or, in the language of the late Chief Magistrate, safe, just, and federal.

It is not my intention to enter into an examination of the original title to what is now called the public domain, because I desire, as far as practicable, to avoid irrelevant discussions. Whatever doubts or difficulties existed on this point during the revolutionary war or previous to it, they were closed and removed by the Articles of Confederation,* by the compacts of cession, and by the Constitution; and, if it were not so, the discussion would still be unprofitable, for no preference is asked for the old States, the original proprietors of the whole; and by whatever title this Government now holds, whether by cession, purchase, or conquest, none can deny their title to a just participation. I proceed at once, therefore, to the original compacts which lie at the foundation of the question. A brief reference to a single clause in one of them—the most important of them all, that of Virginia—will be sufficient for my present purpose. It is the often-quoted clause which, coming after the provisions setting apart inconsiderable portions of the vast territory surrendered, declares:

* That all the lands within the territory so ceded to the United States, and not reserved for, or appropriated to, any of the beforementioned purposes, or disposed of in the bounties to officers and soldiers of the American Army, shall be considered as a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become or shall become members of the Confederation, or Federal alliance of the said States, Virginia inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions of the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever.

I will not repeat the commentaries made on this clause in almost every discussion which has occurred on the subject of the public lands for ten years past. But I beg you, sir, for a moment, to call to mind the condition of our country when this solemn transfer of title was made and accepted. A Confederacy of States, each retaining absolute sovereignty, united by a league—as it was forcibly expressed, a rope of sand—no closer union at the time anticipated nor desired. The war of independence had but just terminated, leaving us involved in a heavy debt, and without available resources. Some of the States held or claimed an extent of territory stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Others, less fortunately circumstanced, regarded these extensive possessions as dangerous to their future peace; they urged that they had contributed their blood and treasure to acquire and defend them, and they insisted on a liberal surrender. The proposition was acceded to. New York led the way in 1781; Virginia followed, and, on the 1st of March, 1784, ceded the extensive region claimed by her northwest of the Ohio. In this session she stipulated that the territory should be laid out into States, to be admitted into the Union with the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence, as the other States; that certain portions of it should be reserved for specific purposes, and the residue (as declared in the clause just quoted) constitute a common fund for the use and benefit of all the States, in specified proportions. The payment of the public debt was not even mentioned in the compact as one of the objects to be provided for. Admitting, however, the payment of that debt to have been a substantial compliance with the provision requiring that the use and benefit of this common fund should be enjoyed by each State according to its proportion of the general charge and expenditure, still it cannot be contended that this was the only mode in which the States could receive their proportional shares. The debt was estimated at something more than forty million dollars; but, large as it was, it bore no comparison with the value of the hundreds of millions of acres ceded by Virginia alone. Supposing the payment of that debt contemplated, must not the question have naturally presented itself, what disposition should be made of the immense residue? and if so, what did the contracting parties intend should be its final destination?

Sir, the compact answers the question; it was to be a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the States as had become or should become members of the Confederation; in their separate, and not exclusively, at least, in their aggregate capacity. Had it been the design of the parties thus to confine it, they would have stopped after declaring it should be a common fund, or employed language to express the intention that it should be used solely for the general purposes of the Confederacy. So far from this, they adopt terms importing plainly a benefit in severalty, and prescribing the ratio in which each shall enjoy it—the ratio of contribution to the general charge and expenditure. They do not say that the funds shall be for the use of “the United States of America,” which was the style of the Confederacy, but for the use of such of the United States as were or might become members; they do not say it shall be applied to meet the general charge and expenditure, but that it shall be enjoyed by the members of the Confederacy according to their respective proportions of that charge and expenditure. The proceeds of the common fund might exceed or fall short of that expenditure. Exclusive of the public debt, our annual expenditure probably did not then exceed one or two hundred thousand dollars. Supposing the public debt and expenditures among the objects to which, by the express terms of the compact, this common fund might be applied—a construction, however, which, in regard to the last, neither the nature of our political association at the time, nor the language of the compact, justifies—would it not be unjust and absurd, after that debt had been discharged, and when those expenditures do not require it, to withhold it from the States for whose use and benefit it was conferred? Why provide for proportional enjoyment—specify the exact proportions in which each State should share the fund—if no distribution was contemplated, and that fund was designed exclusively as a joint fund for joint purposes? Why give a rule of apportionment, if that rule was never intended to be practically enforced?

But it has been said that the ratio of contribution existing at the time is the rule prescribed by the compact; and that having been since changed, that the rule itself is abrogated. Not so, sir. The terms do not confine the rule to the existing ratio of contribution, but make that ratio, whatever it may be at the time of distribution, the rule by which the proportions shall be measured. There is corroborating evidence in the history of the times to prove this to be the proper interpretation. In April, 1783, a committee of Congress suggested the propriety of altering the then existing rule of contribution, founded on a valuation of real estate, and substituting the ratio since incorporated into the Federal Constitution, for apportioning representation and direct taxes upon the basis of what are called Federal numbers. That committee, in recommending a supply of revenue, speaks of the proportion of each State as one to be fixed according to the rule “which is or may be” prescribed by the Articles of Confederation. Another committee, of which Mr. Madison was chairman, was then appointed to draw up an address to the States, among other things, recommending the proposed change. In October following, the act of the Virginia Assembly was passed, authorizing her Delegates in Congress to execute the deed of cession, and that deed was delivered and accepted, as I have stated, on the 1st of March, 1784. Now, it is not credible that Virginia was ignorant of the contemplated change, or meant that, if adopted, it should defeat her rights reserved by the deed. She knew that the ratio of contribution might be changed; but still the compact intended and provided that the use and benefit of the common fund should be enjoyed by the States in the same proportion in which they should contribute to the general burdens. This proportion, change as it may, must still give the rule. But grant that the new ratio did not become the rule, the only consequence would be, not that the rule is abrogated, but the old ratio of contribution would continue to be the rule of distribution.

But, sir, it is not merely the rule of apportionment which it is contended has been changed or abrogated. The monstrous doctrine is announced that the compacts themselves have no binding effect—that they have been annulled by the Federal Constitution; yes, sir, the very instrument designed to render them inviolable—and that they are incompatible with the sovereign rights of the new States. Sir, it was not to have been expected that the validity of these compacts would ever have been denied, whatever doubts might be suggested as to their construction. They have been recognized by repeated acts of Federal legislation, from the period of their date to the present time; they were indeed ratified and confirmed by the Constitution itself. In April, 1784, the month succeeding the cession from Virginia, an ordinance was passed by Congress for dividing the ceded territory into distinct States. This ordinance provided for the temporary and permanent government of those divisions, upon this express condition, among others—that they should in no case interfere with the primary disposal of the soil by the United States in Congress assembled; and that this and the other articles should stand as fundamental constitutions between the thirteen original States and each of the several States to be created. These provisions could have been made with no other view than to a fulfillment of the terms upon which cessions had been made.

But there is another and still more striking recognition of the compact made with Virginia. In 1786, the restriction imposed by that compact upon Congress in reference to the extent of the new States to be created in the ceded territory, being found inconvenient, Congress adopted a resolution recommending it to Virginia to revise and alter it in this respect; and in July following passed a new ordinance prescribing how the boundaries of the new States should be established “as soon as Virginia should alter her deed of cession.” In this ordinance a similar provision is made to prevent interference by the new States with the primary disposal of the soil. The Legislature of Virginia never made the change desired until the 30th December, 1788, after the Federal Constitution had been ratified by the requisite number of States. Here, then, is a plain recognition of the compact both before and after the adoption of the Federal Constitution.

Was it annulled by the Constitution? No, sir; far from it. It was ratified and reaffirmed by language too plain to be misconstrued. The first clause of the sixth article, penned at the very time when there was a pending application to Virginia to change the terms of her deed, reads as follows:

“All debts contracted and engagements entered into before the adoption of this Constitution shall be as valid against the United States under this Constitution as under the Confederation.”

I have already shown that the compact with Virginia was entered into prior to the adoption of the Constitution, and its validity unequivocally acknowledged by the old Confederation; and the effect of this clause consequently is the same as if that compact had been incorporated in the Constitution. Nor is this all. The fourth article enables this Government to fulfill its obligations by giving to Congress full power “to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting, the territory or other property of the United States;” and guards against the abuse of this power by declaring, in the same clause, that “nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice the claims of the United States or of any particular State.” That the Constitution was not construed by Virginia as affecting her claims, under her deed of cession, is manifest from the act which she subsequently passed to change that deed. It would have been idle to tender or accept this modification, confined as it was to one particular condition, had the whole compact been already abrogated. Had such been its intended operation, it can scarcely be believed that Virginia, dissatisfied as she was with many of its provisions, and who finally adopted it in convention by a majority of ten votes only, would ever have ratified it. But some of these compacts, imposing conditions almost precisely similar to those in the cession of Virginia, were entered into subsequent to the adoption of the Constitution. That instrument could not subsequently annul them, and this fact alone is conclusive to show that such was not understood to be its effect upon those previously made. This Government, sir, has never set up so monstrous a pretension. Its whole action proves the reverse. I might multiply instances, but it cannot be necessary. I will content myself with referring to the celebrated veto message of December, 1833. In that message the late Chief Magistrate, adopting the construction I have contended for, says:

“The cessions of Virginia, Georgia, and North Carolina, in express terms, and all the rest implicitly, not only provide specifically the proportion according to which each State shall profit by the proceeds of the land sales, but they proceed to declare that they shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever.”

And adds:

“This is the fundamental law of the land at this moment, growing out of compacts which are older than the Constitution, and formed the corner-stone on which the Union itself was erected.”

Sir, need I go further? The question seems indeed too plain for argument. The validity of these covenants, never controverted until recently, rests upon a foundation which cannot be shaken without subverting the Constitution itself, and denying all obligation in men to abide by their most solemn engagements.

I have said that the principle of distribution proposed in the joint resolution before you has been sanctioned by the States. I proceed to the proofs.

The General Assembly of Maryland, in 1821, had this subject under consideration. A committee was appointed by the Senate, whose deliberations resulted in a report and resolutions subsequently adopted by both branches. As they were the groundwork of the legislative action of other States, I request that they may be read.

The resolutions were read. The first and second are as follows:

“1. Resolved by the General Assembly of Maryland, That each of the United States has an equal right to participate in the benefit of the public lands, the common property of the Union.

“2. Resolved, That the States in whose favor Congress have not made appropriations of land for the purposes of education, are entitled to such appropriations as will correspond in a just proportion with those heretofore made in favor of other States.”

Mr. ROBERTSON. These resolutions, or others of similar import, were adopted in the same or the following year by New Hampshire, Rhode Island, New Jersey, Delaware, Pennsylvania, Vermont, Maine, and Kentucky.

Tennessee, though she denied that the benefits conferred upon her were as great as they had been represented, declared that “she was far from resisting claims set up by the old States to a participation in the public lands,” and concluded with a resolution leaving the matter “wholly to the wisdom and discretion of Congress.”

It has been supposed that New York dissented from these views. I do not so understand her. It is true that she did not concur with Maryland in disputing the justice or legality of the donations made to the new States, or claim on that account corresponding benefits. On the contrary, she asserted the right of Congress to make those donations. But she justified them, not only on the pretext that the new States had paid an equivalent, but upon the ground of such ample power over the public domain as would equally justify the disposition now proposed. The report contends that the public lands, if considered as held under the cessions, are held in full and absolute right, discharged from all conditions except those specific ones expressly reserved in the acts of cession; while, if held by original title, the fourth article of the Constitution empowers Congress to dispose of them, with no other limitation than such as may be imposed by the sense of public duty and the general welfare. Again:

"Like all other public property, these lands are indeed held as a trust for the common benefit of the States, or rather of the people of the United States; but of the mode of administering this common fund, and the objects to which it shall be applied, Congress alone is entitled to judge."

New York, therefore, so far from denying the power of Congress to distribute to all in just proportions, necessarily asserted it, in maintaining the still broader power to make any and every disposition not incompatible with the deeds of cession or the public welfare.

Connecticut, without impeaching the donations to the new States, argued in favor of an allotment to the old States, also for the purpose of education. Still more recently, as lately as May, 1838, her Legislature has distinctly asserted the principle of distribution, and requested her Representatives in Congress to use their best endeavors to have it practically adopted. I request the Clerk to read them for the information of the House.

The resolutions were read as follows:

Resolutions of Connecticut relating to the disposition of the public lands of the United States, at a General Assembly of the State of Connecticut, holden at New Haven, in said State, on the first Wednesday of May, A. D. 1838.

"Resolved by this Assembly, That the public lands belonging to the United States are the common property of all the States, and the proceeds of them should be appropriated to their use and benefit, and to no other purpose whatever, without the consent of the States respectively."

"Resolved, That this General Assembly do solemnly protest against a cession of any of the public lands to a State in which they may be situated, at a price less than that at which they are offered in market, and also against all pre-emption laws, and the grants made under the authority of such laws."

"Resolved by this Assembly, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to use their best endeavors to have the proceeds of the public lands divided among the States severally, as soon as it can with propriety be done."

"Resolved, That it is expedient that a portion of the public lands belonging to the United States should be appropriated to the support of education in the original thirteen States of the Union, and that the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State be requested to procure the adoption of such a measure."

"Resolved by this Assembly, That his Excellency the Governor be requested to forward a copy of these resolutions to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress, and also to each Executive of the several States, with a request that they may be laid before the Legislatures of their States respectively."

MR. ROBERTSON. These resolutions have been laid before the Legislature of Virginia. They are not, I think, on the Journals of either House of Congress.

MR. INGHAM said he believed they had never been transmitted by the Governor to the Representatives of the State.

MR. ROBERTSON. I could account for the omission, sir, in no other way. The gentlemen are welcome, however, to my copy, if they think proper to accept it. I trust they will spread it upon our Journal, and that I shall have their co-operation in endeavoring to carry into effect the wishes of their native State.

The principle of distribution has been asserted by Massachusetts, and her Representatives requested, in 1836, to carry it into practice, by supporting what is commonly called Clay's land bill.

The Senators and Representatives of Louisiana voted for the same bill, from which I infer it was acceptable to that State.

In February last, the Legislature of Ohio denounced the policy of abandoning the public lands to be sold piecemeal, and permitting the money to be used as common revenue, as treacherous and injurious to the States; and declared that, "after the payment of the public debt; the proceeds of the public lands belonged of right to the States," and that Congress was bound "to distribute the same, according to the deeds of cession."

Still more recently, North Carolina has sent us resolutions quite as strong as those of Maryland.

The attention of Virginia was called by the Governor to this interesting subject at the commencement of the present session of her Legislature. His message vindicates the right of the old States to a just participation in the common fund; and the House of Delegates, by a unanimous vote, has concurred in asserting it, and by a decided majority demanded a distribution. Their resolutions are now before the Senate. I know not how that branch of her Legislature may decide, nor will its decision, be it what it may, change the settled conviction of my mind that a vast majority of the people of Virginia will sustain the position taken by their Governor and their more immediate Representatives.

The resolutions were read by the Clerk, at the request of MR. ROBERTSON.

The resolutions on the subject of the public lands, as finally adopted by the House of Delegates.

"1. Resolved, That the public lands held by the United States belong in common to all the States, and that each and all are entitled to participate in the benefits derivable therefrom. [Passed unanimously.]

"2. Resolved, That it is amongst the solemn duties devolved upon the Congress of the United States 'faithfully and bona fide' to dispose of the public lands in such manner as will equally inure to the benefit of all the States who may now be, or shall hereafter become, members of this Confederacy; and that this General Assembly deprecates the adoption of all such measures by Congress as shall have a contrary tendency. [Passed unanimously.]

"3. Resolved, That, whilst this General Assembly views with becoming pride the rapid growth of the new States, and would do nothing to check their advance in wealth and power, it nevertheless cannot fail to perceive, in the bill for graduating the price of the public lands, and some of the other propositions now pending before Congress, the germ of measures calculated to unsettle the conditions on which the public lands were acquired by the United States, and greatly to impair the equality of benefits arising from the same, in which Virginia, in common with all the States, is justly entitled to participate. [Ayes 114, noes 13.]

"4. Resolved, That the lands which were ceded by the several States to the United States were ceded in trust, for the common benefit of all the States; and this General Assembly doth earnestly urge upon Congress the speedy adoption of some equitable plan for the distribution of the net proceeds of the sales thereof among the States. [Ayes 77, noes 49.]

"5. Resolved, That the lands acquired by the United States by purchase are held in trust, for the common benefit of all the States, and this General Assembly doth declare the opinion that the most just and equitable plan for disposing of the net proceeds of the sales thereof is by distributing the same in just proportions among all the States. [Ayes 76, noes 52.]

"6. Resolved, That the principles of justice and equality require that the Government of the United States should account with such of the States as have received no appropriation from the public lands, or of money arising from the sales thereof, in such manner as will place said States on an equal footing in this respect with the States that have received appropriations. [Ayes 12, noes 49.]

"7. Resolved, nevertheless, That, by the foregoing resolutions, urging the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, this General Assembly doth not mean, in any event, to infringe or disturb the act of Congress, passed the 2d of March, 1833, for the settlement of the tariff, commonly called the Compromise act; but, on the contrary, it hereby declares and resolves that the said compromise act should be held sacred and inviolate. [Ayes 83, noes 35.]

"8. Resolved, That the Governor of this Commonwealth transmit the foregoing report and resolutions to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State, with a request that the same be laid before the two Houses of Congress."

"9. Resolved, That the Governor be requested to communicate a copy of said preamble and resolutions to the Executive of each State in this Union, with a request to submit the same to their respective Legislatures."

The State of South Carolina, so far as I have been able to find, has expressed no opinion upon this subject. But the propositions lately presented by the Representatives from that State, and now supported by those from Arkansas, and which I shall have occasion to bring more particularly to the notice of the House, necessarily concede the power to distribute.

Thus, sir, I have enumerated nineteen States out of the twenty-six which have asserted or admitted the constitutional power of Congress to apportion the proceeds of the public lands among all the States.

In regard to Georgia, I entertain no more doubt of her wishes than I do of those of my own State, and very little more doubt of them than of my own existence.* Indeed, sir, the proposition offered at the last session by the gentleman from Georgia, [MR. HAYNES,] who now seems opposed to all manner of distribution, left me under the belief that he himself approved it, provided it was made among individuals, instead of States.

MR. HAYNES. Did I not remark to the gentleman from Virginia that I offered my resolution only as an alternative in case any distribution should prevail?

MR. ROBERTSON. The gentleman so stated to me a few days ago. I do not recollect that he ever said so during the last session. My impression is directly the reverse; and it was with unfeigned surprise that I heard the gentleman's proposition in committee, declaring it inexpedient, as I understood it, now or at any future time, to divide the lands, or their proceeds, either among States or individuals. Add Georgia, and you have twenty out of the twenty-six States, with a representation in the Senate of forty out of fifty-two, and in this House of two hundred and twenty-two out of two hundred and forty-two members!

Of the remaining six States—Alabama, Mississippi, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, and Michigan—three only, those I have last mentioned, having a representation in this House of six members only, and an equal number in the Senate, would probably have even a pecuniary interest in opposing a just division, or would seriously oppose it. And yet we hear it boastfully said that the new States will before long dictate their own terms, and write them on the face of the bill as the law of the land.

It has been intimated that New Hampshire and Ohio have changed their views and opinions. Sir, it does not follow, because New Hampshire has disapproved a division of the surplus revenue, that she opposes the distribution she formerly demanded of the proceeds of the public lands; nor that Ohio has given up the rights she so lately proclaimed it treachery to abandon, because she has changed her political complexion. I confess, sir, I am incredulous on this point. I must see some action of the Legislature or the people before I can believe it. If it be so, however, I should be reluctant to force this measure upon them, and will cheerfully vote for an amendment, if their Representatives will propose it, declaring that those States, or any others opposed to its constitutionality, shall not be compelled to participate. But the ground assumed for Ohio, it must be remarked, will, beyond dispute, give us the support of New York, Georgia, and Connecticut, whose political sentiments have also undergone a change, but in a different direction.

Supposing the six States I have mentioned, having together but twenty Representatives on this floor, to be all opposed to the principle of distribution, and adding to them all the States regarded as doubtful, there will still remain in its favor an overwhelming majority, having a representation four or five times greater, and a corresponding superiority of population.

I proceed to adduce other arguments, Mr. Speaker, in support of the proposed measure, drawn from the practical legislation of the country, and the opinions of men high in authority. The authority of great names will have more influence, I know, than any argument of mine. General Jackson, in 1829—

MR. PICKENS. Do you quote General Jackson as authority?

MR. ROBERTSON. Not for himself, sir, but for the party of which he was the leader.

MR. PICKENS. You do not call him the leader?

MR. ROBERTSON. I do, sir; the acknowledged, the undoubted leader; and among his followers were some as abject and servile as those of the eastern monarch, who were ready, when his Majesty said it was night at noonday, to look up to the sun, and swear they saw the moon and stars. In his first message to Congress, General Jackson, then fresh from the people, looking forward to a large surplus in the Treasury, and deprecating the injustice and discord which would probably ensue from using it for internal improvement, recommended an apportionment of such surplus "among the several States according to their ratio of representation." This apportionment he declared as, in his opinion, the most safe, just, and federal disposition which could be made of it; and this opinion he delib-

* Georgia never ceded her lands till 1802. Among other stipulations in her cession was one almost precisely similar to that quoted from the compact with Virginia; and another declaring that in a certain event the cession should be void, and the lands revert to Georgia.

25TH CONG....3D SESS.

Public Lands—Mr. Robertson.

Ho. OF REPS.

erately repeated after a twelvemonths' reflection. Well, sir, here was the assertion of the principle applicable to the whole surplus, from whatever source derived. If the proceeds of the public lands constituted a part, it was necessarily included, because the whole includes all its parts. If not, it would be difficult to show that though the general revenue might be divided, the proceeds of the public lands could not. The reverse of the proposition would come much nearer the truth. Who then denounced this monstrous heresy? Why did not the party who brought him into power abandon him for maintaining this unconstitutional doctrine? Sir, you scarcely heard a murmur of discontent.

In December, 1830, as I have said, the doctrine was deliberately repeated; and I cannot forbear to notice the fact, though perhaps not strictly relevant, that, in the month of — following, the House of Representatives of New York, tracking the steps of their leader, declared, without one dissenting voice, not only that a distribution of the entire surplus ought to be made annually, but pointed out the second section of the first article of the Constitution as that by which the respective proportions of the States should be regulated. But General Jackson changed his opinion; and, of course, it must be presumed all the party have done the same. If New York changed hers in this particular since 1831, I presume, looking to the recent election, she has again resumed her original ground. But I will return from this digression. After having twice asserted the principle of distribution as to all kinds of revenue, General Jackson suddenly shifted his ground, and found it altogether wrong to distribute even the proceeds of the public lands; and the next year put his royal veto—and no monarch ever exercised that high prerogative more royally—on a bill which had passed by a considerable majority, distributing the proceeds of the public lands; and then, sir, those who went before for distribution, out and out, discovered it to be unconstitutional, even as regards a fund over which they once contended Congress possessed absolute power.

But did not the late President and his party again, in substance, assert the principle of distribution in the bill of 1836, called the deposit bill? I know it will be said that bill did not distribute the funds among the States; that it was a mere loan, or rather a deposit. It was such in form, merely, not in substance, and so understood by all. There is no substantial difference between a loan without interest, never expected to be returned, and a gift. The attempt to get over the difficulty by christening it a loan or a deposit was a mere device, a contrivance to ease the consciences of the President and his party. Did a single individual ever believe that the States would be called upon to return a dollar of the amount?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes; I did.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Then, sir, the gentleman was more credulous than I had ever supposed him. He is one of a thousand. But I am told he speaks jestingly. Then, sir, he did not believe it. No one believed it. Suppose it had been in truth a loan, or a mere deposit, what more right had Congress to lend money to the States, or to deposit it with the States, than to distribute it among them? The Constitution no more authorizes the one than the other. Yet this was satisfactory to gentlemen who hold that we have no right to do indirectly what we cannot do directly. For myself, sir, I would have voted for the bill without this contrivance just as soon as with it, and upon this ground: that Congress has no right to raise money except for the purpose of meeting the necessary expenditures of the Government. If by design or mistake more is raised than is needed, there must of necessity exist a right to restore the excess. Suppose a tax, through mistake or intentionally, levied beyond our jurisdiction—in Texas, for instance, or Canada—or the estate of a citizen illegally confiscated, and the money brought into the Treasury: who can doubt the obligation to restore it to the lawful owner? Not under the power of appropriation. It was no appropriation, it was simply a restoration—a restoration of that which could not be lawfully appropriated, for the want of lawful objects of appropriation. Congress has no power to raise money for distribution; to raise it for any other purpose than to meet the just expenditures of the Government, would be as illegal as to raise it by confiscation. But it was there in the Treasury; and the proper and only means of avoiding an abuse of the power of appropriation was, to restore it to its lawful owners.

The whole Administration party, except some thirty odd, voted for this bill, and now they cannot overcome their constitutional scruples so far as to vote for distributing the proceeds of the public lands, though by a solemn compact recognized by the Constitution, that distribution is plainly authorized. They would no doubt do justice to the old States if they could without violating their consciences. But they are the friends of a strict construction—of State rights. Yes, sir; and among these State-rights politicians you will find the advocates of internal improvement, of a national bank, and a protecting tariff—the supporters of the proclamation and the force bill; those who justify the removal of the deposits, the protest, Treasury circular, and expunging resolution. Why, sir, cannot those who voted for the deposit bill of 1836 vote for the measure now upon your table? Call it, if you will, a loan, a deposit, instead of a distribution. But no, it was perfectly constitutional so to dispose of all public funds, except those which the States have a right, by compact, to enjoy in specified proportions. They could divide all, but not a part; they swallowed the camel, and now they strain at the gnat.

I propose, Mr. Speaker, to trace a little further the practical legislation of the country in regard to the public lands. Has not this Government ever since its original organization exercised the most unbounded power in disposing of them? Look at its munificent donations to the new States for schools and colleges, for roads and canals, for seats of government, and for other purposes. I pass by the question how far these donations were just or unjust, but refer to them solely to show the extent of power claimed by the Federal Government over the public domain. It has been said that a full equivalent was paid, and that these grants, indeed, were authorized by the terms of the old ordinance of July, 1787, declaring that schools and the means of education shall be forever encouraged. But would not this provision equally authorize grants to the old States for the same purposes? or, if limited to the States formed out of the ceded territory, upon what grounds are those maintained made to States not within those limits, to companies or to individuals? Tennessee has been favored with a large donation. Kentucky and Connecticut have each received a township. How can these States, then, deny to New York or Rhode Island or any other of the original States, a benefit similar to that which they have solicited and received for themselves? The propriety of distributing among the States the general revenues of the Federal Government may well be questioned? But the lands and their proceeds stand on very different footing. The revenues can only be expended upon objects specifically enumerated in the Constitution, or such as are incidentally necessary for effecting some constitutional power. Gentlemen may very justly contend for this principle; and if the public lands were, properly speaking, revenue, and there were no specific provisions by compact and by the Constitution itself applicable to their disposition, they would necessarily be subject to the same limitations which other revenues are. But here is the true source of the error in those who would apply these limitations to them. Land and revenue are not convertible terms. Revenue is defined to be income, rent, fruits; an assessment, an impost, a tax, a duty, a tribute, a contribution; these may be embraced under the term revenues. But no man ever terms his real estate revenue, though he should sell a part of it annually to minister to his wants or his extravagance. There may be revenue from taxes on men, or goods, or lands; but neither men, nor merchandise, nor lands are revenue. They are the subjects on which taxes are imposed, the sources whence revenue is derived, not the revenue itself. Land or merchandise is no more revenue than an oak is an acorn.

The Constitution itself may be considered as defining what constitutes the public revenues. It gives to Congress power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, and to borrow money. But a bill to dispose of the public lands is not a bill to do any one of these things, nor in any sense a revenue bill.* It is certainly true that the purchase money, when land is sold, may be used as revenue is used; but the land itself, unconverted, all must concede, is not revenue; and, considering it as held on a special trust, the proceeds, when converted, do but stand in the place of the land. If you may divide the land, so may you what is derived from its sale; and if such a division be authorized or required, the conversion of it for the purpose of defeating a division would be a manifest breach of trust. I hold it, therefore, perfectly clear, that the restrictions imposed by the Constitution, whatever they may be, on the expenditure of revenue, have no application to the disposition of the land or its price. This would be so on general principles. But when we look further—when we see the special provision made by the compacts for the disposition of this common fund, and the express authority conferred by separate clauses in the Constitution, ratifying those compacts and giving full power to perform them, no ground is left for reasonable doubt.

Having, Mr. Speaker, endeavored to vindicate the authority of Congress to make a distribution among the States as now proposed, and shown, I hope, satisfactorily, that the same principle has been sanctioned by a considerable majority, if not by all the States, and by the legislation of Congress down to the present day, I propose briefly to review some of the prominent plans which have been presented for the future disposition of the public domain.

I turn, in the first place, to the suggestion of the late Chief Magistrate, that the public lands should cease to be a source of revenue; and to the report of the Committee on the Public Lands of the last session, in which that suggestion has been adopted. As no action was had upon this report: it has very probably escaped the particular notice of the House. The committee pronounce it to be unjust and unconstitutional to raise revenue, or tax the people, in the purchase of the public lands, merely to raise a surplus revenue to be distributed among the several States.

Sir, I have already shown that neither land nor the price obtained for it can properly be termed revenue, nor in any sense regarded as a tax. It is no more a tax when the purchase is made from the Government than from individuals; no more a tax upon a purchaser in Indiana than upon one in Pennsylvania. It is a voluntary payment, for which the purchaser receives full value, and generally far more than the value of his money, better land being frequently sold in the new States for a dollar and a quarter than can be purchased in the old States for five or ten times that sum. By this confusion of terms, holding land as synonymous with revenue, and its price as a tax and a burden, the committee finds it to be very unconstitutional to distribute the proceeds; and, conforming to the recommendation of General Jackson, declares that "The period has fully arrived when the public lands should cease to be a subject of revenue to the Government, except for the payment of those general charges which grow out of the acquisition of the lands, their survey and sale."

Very oppressive and unconstitutional, sir, to tax the people by selling them good lands at half price, but perfectly just and constitutional to give away for nothing to one portion of the people the property belonging to all.

I leave this notable scheme of selling the public lands for costs and charges incurred in making good titles to those who will take them, and proceed to the resolutions offered by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. HARRISON.] These resolutions, sir, if I comprehend them, assert the monstrous doctrine that the public lands held by the United States under the deeds of cession are, in truth, the property of the States within which they lie. I desire that they may be read.

* The Constitution provides that "all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives." Was it ever thought the Senate could originate a bill to dispose of the public lands, to grant them away, or to graduate or reduce the price?

Resolutions offered by Mr. HARRISON, of Missouri, in the Select Committee on the Public Lands of the House of Representatives of the United States, January 16, 1839.

"Resolved, That the powers of the Federal Government result from the compact to which the States are parties, limited by the plain sense and intention of the instrument constituting that compact, and are no further valid than they are authorized by the grants enumerated in the compact.

"2. That State sovereignties are only diminished by powers specifically enumerated in this compact, or by such as are necessary to carry the specified powers into effect.

"3. That there being no terms or conditions mentioned in the Constitution by which new States, coming into the Confederacy, should be bound or restricted, each and every State, whether new or old, as a member of this Confederacy, has 'the same rights of freedom, sovereignty, and independence, in all respects whatever,' as another; and is as completely sovereign, to all intents and purposes, as it was, or would have been, had the Union never been formed, except only so far as it has given certain rights and powers to the General Government, enumerated in the Constitution, for specified purposes.

"4. That the right of exclusive jurisdiction to the utmost limits of State territory is an unqualified and undeniable attribute of sovereignty; and as, by the nature of the reserved rights, and the terms of the Constitution, no one State has a greater portion of reserved rights than another, so no other power whatever has any right to interfere, by legislative enactment or otherwise, with the property or rights of property which lie within the acknowledged limits of any of the States, since these are subjects of a local character, and appropriate only for local legislation.

"5. Resolved, therefore, As the States of this Confederacy, 'in all respects whatever, are equally free, sovereign, and independent,' no conditions being imposed or required by the Constitution upon those that might be admitted into the Union, that all restrictions and conditions upon the new States, on their admission, being opposed to the fundamental principles and analogies of the Government, and not sanctioned by the Constitution, are null and void; and that each new State, upon being admitted into the Union, being 'as free, sovereign, and independent as the other States, in all respects whatever,' was absolved, by the act of admission, from all terms, conditions, restrictions, and limitations whatever, whether under deeds of cession, ordinances, or compacts; and became, ipso facto, the absolute, unqualified, and uncontrollable sovereign of the soil lying within its respective limits and jurisdiction.

I do not intend, sir, critically to examine the premises which have led the gentleman to his most extraordinary conclusion. The conclusion itself is so monstrous that it is needless to attempt to detect the error of the reasoning. Some one has predicted that Virginia will die of an abstraction. I trust she will not die of this. I wish I could believe that it was a mere abstraction on which no practical measure was ever intended to be erected. Let us examine it.

The doctrine maintained is, that the compact entered into between the original States, and the condition imposed and accepted by the new States on their admission into the Union, were rendered null and void by the act of admission itself, and that they, the new States, then became ipso facto the uncontrollable sovereigns and owners of the soil.

Yes, sir, the new States, on their admission into the Union, were discharged from all obligation, legal or moral, to respect the title under which the public lands have been held since 1784. The compacts themselves are null and void, and consequently every sale or transfer made by the General Government is an act of usurpation! This is the naked, undisguised proposition. I believe I state it correctly. Extraordinary as it appears, it has perhaps been asserted before; but it is the first time, so far as I know, that an effort has been made to bring it forward in our great national council, in the face of the nation and of the world; and I sincerely hope the gentleman from Missouri may now succeed in obtaining a vote upon it.

It is true, that by the compacts under which the ceded territory was held, that territory was declared, after certain objects should be provided for, a common fund for all the States; that a solemn ordinance declares it as one of the fundamental constitutions between the original States and the new States subsequently to be formed in that territory, that these new States shall in no case interfere with the primary disposition of the soil by the United States in Congress assembled; that this condition is expressly imposed in every case by the very law under which these new States were authorized to form State Governments preparatory to their admission into the Union, and incorporated into the State constitutions themselves; that this perfect and uncontrollable power in Congress, at least so far as is consistent with the original compacts, has been asserted by all the constituted authorities of the Union, Federal and State, from the foundation of the Government to this hour. All this is nothing. These solemn stipulations are null and void; the Federal Government never owned a foot of land in any State after admitting it into the Union, and all its acts have been acts of usurpation! Let me ask the gentleman from Missouri to reflect on the consequences, moral and political, of this doctrine; to peruse again the celebrated veto message returning the land bill. Let him remark with what respect the old compacts are spoken of, and their binding obligation vindicated. I will do General Jackson the justice to say, that, however he may have urged upon Congress propositions inconsistent, in my opinion, with the stipulations of those compacts, he never, so far as I know, denied their obligatory force. He set up no claim for the United States on the ground of a right in them to the soil, but addressed himself to the policy and generosity of the Government. Sir, the gentleman from Missouri must view his doctrine in a light very different from that in which it strikes me. He believes, no doubt, in his own mind, that he can reconcile it to the principles of honor and integrity. If he should not be able to do this, in retracing the steps which have led him to adopt it, I trust he will renounce it.

The error, sir, which probably lies at the foundation of that doctrine is, the ideas he seems to entertain that ownership and jurisdiction are inseparable attributes of sovereignty. He assumes that the States have exclusive jurisdiction within their limits; and then infers exclusive and absolute ownership of the soil. The premises are erroneous, and, if true, the consequence would not follow. The States have not even exclusive jurisdiction. The General Government, on the contrary, has concurrent or even supreme jurisdiction to the extent of its constitutional powers; and it is still more grossly erroneous to claim the ownership, even if the jurisdiction was supreme. Our history affords numerous instances in which jurisdiction and ownership are separated. Indeed, they are rarely united. I will mention one or two familiar instances: In the cession of a part of this District by Virginia, the jurisdiction was conferred, but not the soil; and when the State of Pennsylvania contracted with the United States for the purchase of what was called the triangle, the jurisdiction was ceded at once, but the right of soil was retained for years. But suppose this doctrine true, and applicable to the public lands; say they belonged of right to the new States from the date of their creation; that the General Government, in undertaking to sell or dispose of them was an intruder, a usurper; what then? What becomes of all your titles to land in the new States derived since that period, as they have been, from this Government? All of them, sir, every one, null and void. The courts of justice must vacate every title which originated subsequent to the admission of the State into the Union. Nor is this the case in respect to private titles merely. Your school lands, seats of governments, salines, all, all are forfeited—founded in usurpation.

But, sir, we may be told they are held by a higher authority. The State, the sovereign of the soil, claims them ipso facto, by the act of admission: the very act by which it disclaimed all pretension of right to interfere with them. Well, suppose it so. Still all private titles are at an end, and the new proprietor, the State, has a right to partition out all the lands anew. Sir, this doctrine not only unsettles all private titles, it does more; it annuls the acts themselves admitting the new States into the Union. The security of the title of the United States was the fundamental condition of admittance, upon which alone the General Government could admit them; and if the condition be violated, the grant itself is annulled. Was there ever, sir, a doctrine more monstrous in its consequences? The Representative of a State on this floor invalidates the titles of his own fellow-citizens, and puts the State itself out of the Union! It is nullification indeed, far worse than that of the South. It is self-immolation. I cannot believe that the gentleman himself, on serious reflection, will maintain it.

For, sir, suppose it true, as a legal or constitutional doctrine; say that a State has the power to annul all its most solemn compacts: what then? It is the ultima ratio regum—the power; but not the right; the power to violate a promise! to commit a breach of plighted faith! If the day should ever come when any man shall invite the people of the West to exercise this power by a seizure of the common property of their brethren, an act more perfidious than that proposed by Themistocles to the Athenians, I trust some modern Aristides will be found to rebuke the meditated injustice, and teach them to spurn the council which would prompt them to consult their interests by an act which would tarnish their honor.

It has been said, Mr. Speaker, that we sold our patrimony for a mess of pottage—for less, sir; a spoonful from the dish. Esau received his stipulated price. We have never yet enjoyed ours. Our brother of Missouri insists that our brother of Ohio has had too large a share, and that his share must be made equal before we can be served, and follows up this by a broad denial of our right to any participation whatever. It is all—their rightful property. This pretension reminds me, sir, of the old fable of the beasts who went hunting. The young lion of the West seizes upon the game we have laid at his feet, and divides it into shares; one he claims by virtue of his royal prerogative, as sovereign of the soil; another on account of his superior skill and courage; he was the pioneer of the chase; a third he must have to answer the necessities of his den; and as to the last let them touch it who will!

But, sir, these pretensions can never prevail, nor be sanctioned by the western people themselves. Who, sir, are these western people? Goths and Vandals? Hordes of barbarian Tartars, who have made an irruption upon our territory, and are determined to hold it by force? No, sir; no! They are our brethren, descendants of the same common ancestry, bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh; many of them, indeed, citizens by birth of the old States. Among their representatives, I see around me in every direction native-born Virginians; men, sir, who would no more wrong us, I should fain hope, than, as they well know, we would wrong them, and in that confidence I extend to them the right hand of fellowship.

The next propositions to which I shall ask the attention of the House, are those of the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. YELL,] and of my friend from South Carolina who sits next me, [Mr. PICKENS.] They are substantially the same with that heretofore presented in the other House by a Senator from South Carolina. The Legislature of Arkansas, about a twelvemonth past, adopted a preamble and resolutions instructing their Senators and requesting their Representatives to give the bill of the Senator from South Carolina their cooperation and support; and the gentleman from Arkansas has adopted it with a few alterations. The scheme is to cede the public lands to the States in which they lie, those States paying to the United States one half of the gross proceeds of the sales. It is certainly less exceptionable and less unjust than that of the gentleman from Missouri, since it does not deny the title of the United States; and only asks a surrender of one half the gross proceeds of the common property, instead of the whole. I ascribe no unworthy or sinister motive to those who originated or support this measure. I can well believe, sir, that, like the proposition by the Senator from Kentucky, to give the new States twelve and a half per cent., this offer, though far more injurious to the South, may have had its source in a generous spirit of conciliation. I impeach no motives; I deal with measures, their effects and tendencies; but I regard it as strong evidence of the very favorable light in which it is viewed by the new States, that its only support, with the exception of South Carolina, comes from them. The Arkansas resolutions to which I have referred never having been received, as I understand, by their Representative, I request the Clerk to read the copy printed from that transmitted to the Virginia Legislature.

The resolutions were read.

Mr. ROBERTSON. The gentleman from

25TH CONG...3D SESS.

Public Lands—Mr. Robertson.

Ho. of Reps.

Arkansas, in compliance, I presume, with these resolutions, which requests him to give his hearty cooperation and support to the bill introduced by the Senator from South Carolina, proposed that bill, with slight modifications, in the select committee.

There are many and insuperable objections, in my opinion, to this scheme.

In the first place, it apparently throws the Indians out of the protection of the General Government. By the original bill the Indian title is to be extinguished at the expense of the State in which the land may lie. This provision is omitted in the bill proposed by the gentleman from Arkansas; yet all the public lands are ceded, and I presume the Indian lands among the rest. With whom are the Indians to treat? Is it meant to surrender this power to the States? Would they be disposed to assume so high and delicate a trust? Or are the treaties, as heretofore, to be made with the General Government? And if so, how will the States be required to abide by the bargain? and how is compliance to be enforced?

Again: all sales are to be conducted by agents appointed by the States, upon terms prescribed by the law. Here, sir, is a new and fruitful source of collision between the Federal and State Governments. In examining the accounts of their agents; settling with their collectors and treasurers, some of whom, like our own, may depart with the public money to distant lands to the other side of the water, controversies must be expected to arise. Sir, I am opposed to making new compacts touching the public domain. We can make none more solemn nor more just than those made by our fathers. I have no fear the new States will refuse to abide by them. But if they should, we can have no assurance that any instrument human ingenuity can devise would bind them.

But there is a still more decisive objection to this scheme, founded on its palpable injustice and inequality. It is incredible that even the new States themselves will ever consent to accept it, with the exception, perhaps, of Arkansas, Michigan, and Missouri. Remember, sir, that in Ohio and Indiana, the far greater part of the public domain has been sold, and the money paid into the Treasury. In Ohio there remain unsold about two million acres. Half the proceeds, in round numbers, may be estimated at $1,250,000, and this sum would be divided among probably a million and a quarter of inhabitants. Missouri, on the other hand, having upwards of thirty million acres, would receive sixteen or eighteen million dollars, for the use of some two or three hundred thousand inhabitants; and Arkansas and Michigan would share in somewhat similar proportions. But this is not all. After receiving each this enormous proportion of the common property, the balance, instead of being divided among the other citizens of the Union, twelve or fifteen millions in number, is to go into the Treasury as a common fund, in which those States are again to participate. And this because, as it is said, the principle of distribution is unconstitutional! Sir, the scheme upon its face asserts the principle of distribution, not, indeed, of a fair, equitable, and general distribution, but of an unequal, partial, and unjust one. Still it is a distribution. How is it that the Constitution authorizes distribution of half the public lands, or half the amount of sales among seven States, and prohibits a distribution of the other half among the remaining nineteen? admits the States created by it to a division of a common fund, and excludes the Old Thirteen who framed it from any participation in what was wholly their own? But again, sir; this scheme proposes to cede to Tennessee three million acres of land, or more, belonging to the United States. What reason is there that a ratable proportion may not be allotted to New York and Pennsylvania, and every other State in the Union? It would seem that every disposition of the public land is constitutional provided it be confined to one or a few of the States, but unconstitutional if it renders equal justice to all. These constitutional doctrines, sir, are beyond my comprehension.

I cannot pass without notice the project submitted some days past by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING.] It comes from one who knows, not more perhaps than any gentleman in this House, but as much as any man in this country, of the extent and situation of our public domain. His scheme proposes that the lands themselves be divided in severalty among the States in equalized proportions, the division commencing with the portion to which the title is complete, and to be repeated, from time to time, until the whole shall be partitioned. Let us try, sir, how this will answer. There are, at this time, some two hundred and thirty million acres ready to be divided, giving, on an average, eight or nine million to each State—varying in their relative proportions, according to the quality of the land and the population of the State, from half a million perhaps to fifteen or twenty million acres. Congress is to pass an organic law defining the rights and powers over lands assigned to one State within the limits of another. Can this project, sir, ever be carried into effect without extreme inconvenience, or the danger of serious collisions among the States, and between the States and this Government? Colony upon colony—wheels within wheels.

But suppose the partition made—the regulations prescribed: possibly, for a time at least, some of the States having these distant and dispersed possessions might perhaps be able to maintain them. New York and Pennsylvania might, in case of difficulty, keep theirs in Michigan or Arkansas, if that should be their location. But, sir, what would be the condition of New Jersey, or Rhode Island, or Delaware, in case their portion should be assigned in one of the larger States of the West or South, and a controversy should arise between them? Rhode Island, I suppose, would fit out an armament, and make a descent upon New Orleans, to punish Louisiana for encroaching on her possessions. It would be quite amusing, sir, to see my respected friend from Delaware, at the head of a detachment of Delaware militia, marching against Governor Casey, to punish some aggression by the people of Illinois, or to dislodge a band of ten or twenty thousand squatters. How would South Carolina or Georgia, at the extreme South, maintain her settlements in Iowa or Wisconsin, and from thence—for the magnificent views of the gentleman from Massachusetts extend as far—all along to the borders of the Oregon? Sir, I can conceive no means of preserving her title but by dispatching orders, through means of the newly-invented magnetic telegraph, directing aid to be sent from colony to colony, stretching, as they may, from the Ohio to the South Sea.

Mr. CUSHING. The gentleman endeavors to meet my proposition by ridicule.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Not so, sir; ridicule, it is said, is the test of truth. I admit it is not always so; but the objections I have pressed I regard as solid and substantial objections. They are such as carry conviction to my mind, and to that, I believe, of every gentleman who considers them, that the scheme of the gentleman from Massachusetts will be every way inconvenient, if not impracticable. Sir, among the inducements held out to the old States to cede their distant possessions, not the least cogent was the difficulty of retaining and managing them; and now, with all the disadvantages arising from the surrender for so long a period, with a denial of our title now before us, these lands are again to be restored in fragments, scattered over the western country, and the colonial system of the States reestablished.

Some what of a kindred character to this scheme of partition is the one offered by the gentleman from Georgia, at the last session, to which I have before alluded. They both propose a division of the lands; but the gentleman from Georgia would divide them among the individual citizens, instead of the States. Sir, the gentleman says he proposed this only as an alternative, in case a distribution should be determined on, but that he was opposed to distribution in every form. I drew a different conclusion from the resolution itself. It does not suggest such a division as a proper subject for inquiry, but instructs the committee to report a bill to carry it into effect. It left no choice between that and any other mode. Suppose the committee appointed: the gentleman, of course, would have been the chairman, and would have expected a committee concurring in his plan. What would have been done? A bill must have been reported in conformity with instructions. Would he not have voted for his own measure, or would he and the committee have opposed it in the House as unconstitutional? I can understand that an amendment may be offered to a bill in itself unconstitutional, the mover voting finally against the whole bill; but I cannot comprehend how any gentleman can offer a distinct and original proposition in the shape of a bill, to be voted for as an alternative, or in any other way, when he regards the measure itself as unconstitutional.

Mr. HAYNES. I ask the gentleman if he would not accept my proposition if he could not get his own?

Mr. ROBERTSON. If I could get nothing better, I would, bad as it is. I prefer the distribution among the States, because I think it would be equally just, and less inconvenient. I do not regard his scheme as unconstitutional; for, although the compact declares that the benefits shall inure to the States, yet, substantially, you give it to the States in giving it to their citizens. But I prefer the mode as it is prescribed by the compact, as every way more proper, and less inconvenient.

If the States, sir, would find insuperable difficulties in holding and managing their distant and numerous possessions, under the scheme of the gentleman from Massachusetts, how much more impossible would it not be for individuals to get the benefit of theirs? Let us look forward beyond the present generation. Some fifty or a hundred years hence, a descendant of the gentleman from Georgia determines to look after his western lands, being the quota of his great ancestor, situated between the Mississippi and the Oregon. Will he go by land or water? No matter, sir; he weathers Cape Horn or passes the defiles of the Rocky mountains in safety; he is fortunate enough to find his land, as described in his title-papers. It is in the possession of a preëmptioner! one claiming under the British or Russian Government or the Baffin's Bay Company. The regular affidavit-man of the district swears that he well remembers when the settler cleared the land by cutting down four saplings, with which he made an inclosure, and then planted one grain of corn and two black-eyed peas. We will suppose, under the preëmption law, that is proof sufficient. What would the claimant do? Why, sir, be well pleased, no doubt, to take what the Committee on Public Lands offer to the old States, the costs and charges incurred, and to return from whence he came.

I have gone through, Mr. Speaker, with the review I have thought it proper to make of some of the most prominent plans now before the country for disposing of the public domain. I wish the people to know what they are. I have spoken of them freely and frankly, as I am willing all may speak of mine. I have pointed out the objections which prove them, in my opinion, impracticable or unjust, and have shaped my own proposition with a view to avoid, as far as practicable, those objections.

So far, Mr. Speaker, I have endeavored, and I trust not unsuccessfully, to prove that the principle of distribution my resolution proposes, is authorized by the original compacts, and sanctioned by the Constitution; that it has been demanded by a majority of the States; directly or indirectly conceded by all, and denied by none. I beg leave now, sir, to state the nature of the proposition a little more particularly, and the reasons which lead me to hope it may be adopted. It assumes the general principle of distribution asserted in the land bill of 1832, from which, however, it differs in some essential particulars.

Before noticing these, let us stop for a moment and inquire what would have been the effect of the passage of that bill? Upwards of fifty-seven million dollars, sir, would have been distributed among the States, of which my State would have received nearly four and a half millions, and the other States in proportion. It is true, that to get rid of the accumulated surplus, arising in a great measure from the sales of land, we were compelled afterwards, in 1836, to pass what was called the deposit bill, under which the States received less than one half that amount. What became of the residue, the $30,000,000? Wasted in extravagant expenditures; in jobs to Executive supporters; percolated by absconding collectors; scattered along the highway, on the Cumberland road; sunk in the swamps of Florida; in harbors, rivers, and creeks; or covered beneath the ruins of useless and dilapidated works falling to pieces before they were finished. But, sir, I return from this digression.

I mentioned that in some particulars the joint resolution on your table differed from the distribution bill of 1832. The twelve and a half per cent. allowed by that bill to the new States is omitted. I regret, sir, that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DUNN] offered an amendment to insert that provision. It was made originally, as I have always supposed, to compensate the new States for the loss they would otherwise sustain in dividing according to the preceding census, in consequence of the great relative increase of their population since that census was taken. But the resolution before you does not propose any distribution until after the next census. It gives to the new States, therefore, the benefit of their increased population; they get the full measure of their rights, and there is no ground for allowing them an additional sum by way of a gratuity. But if the gentleman should persist in this unjust amendment, it is demonstrable that his own State, should it prevail, will lose greatly more than she can gain. The allowance must, of course, be made to all the new States as well as to Indiana—that is, indeed, the provision of the amendment—and to the States hereafter to be admitted, as well as those already in the Union. The unsold lands in Indiana are stated to be five million one hundred and twenty thousand two hundred and seventy-two acres. The whole of the unsold lands of the Union are variously estimated from five hundred millions to seven hundred and fifty millions or more. Supposing the quantity to be six hundred millions, and rating it at one dollar per acre, the twelve and a half per cent. of Indiana on her unsold lands would be between six and seven hundred thousand dollars; while her proportion, say one twenty-fifth part, or four per cent. of the one eighth, or twelve and a half per cent. surrendered to the other States, would be about three millions. The amendment would be still more injurious to Ohio, because the quantity of unsold land within her limits is not half so great, being two million one hundred and ten thousand four hundred and five acres only, while her population would entitle her to a much larger share in the amount surrendered. She would receive between two and three hundred thousand dollars, and give up about five millions. These States, therefore, would unquestionably consult their own interests in abandoning the proposed amendment, or they will well deserve the loss they will inevitably sustain in their attempt to secure an unjust advantage.

Not only, sir, is the proposed scheme more favorable to those States without the amendment than with it, but it is every way more favorable than that proposed by the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. YELL,] or even that of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. HARRISON,] because their proportions, say four or five per cent. on the value of the six or seven hundred million acres belonging to the Union, must exceed one half or even the whole of the value of the public lands lying within their respective limits. The gentleman from Indiana himself, [Mr. DUNN,] in an able report presented by him to the Indiana Legislature, some six or seven years ago, has demonstrated that his State would be the loser by accepting the cession of all the unsold lands within her limits in preference to the distribution proposed by Mr. CLAY's land bill; and it is equally certain that the proposition to distribute is more unfavorable to her with the amendment giving the twelve and a half per cent. than without it. Indeed, sir, it is even questionable whether Missouri, Arkansas, and Michigan may not ultimately derive more benefit from an equal participation than from the unjust schemes now urged by their Representatives, could they succeed in carrying them. But they cannot succeed. The new States themselves will never unite in them. Ohio will never consent to receive of a common fund two or three hundred thousand dollars, while Indiana, with a third of her population, receives double the amount, and Missouri, Michigan, and Arkansas, with a still smaller number, receive each the enormous amount of four millions.* Still less will she ever agree to the proposition which would give to these States one half or the whole of the lands within their limits, nearly thirty million acres on an average in each, while two million or one half of that quantity is to be assigned to her, possessing, as she does, a population exceeding that of them all put together. Least of all, Mr. Speaker, is it to be expected that the old States will ever submit to schemes which deprive them of all participation, or of a just participation, in the common property. I beg leave, sir, to read a few passages from the report of the gentleman from Indiana I have just alluded to. [Mr. R. read extracts from the report.] Not only does the gentleman expose the injustice and inequality of the scheme of a total surrender, in its bearing upon the new as well as the old States, but he pays a just tribute to the generous policy pursued by this Government in reference to the public lands, and frankly acknowledges that he could scarcely think of anything which could induce him, were he a citizen of an old State, to give up the advantages which the distribution of these common funds would afford for education and improvement.

The joint resolution differs in another very material respect from the distribution bill of 1832. That bill required the division of the proceeds of sales without regard to the state of our finances. The resolution, on the contrary, if adopted, will not draw any money from the Treasury wanted to meet the necessary expenditures of the Government. It may be asked at what amount shall those expenditures be estimated? The resolution proposes to fix some limit to that amount, and leaves it to the wisdom of Congress to say what the limit shall be. For myself, I will go as low as $13,000,000, that being about the highest amount expended during the administration of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] who was so severely rebuked for his extravagance by the party in power, who now expend between thirty and forty; or I will be content to limit the sum to $20,000,000, which, perhaps, this reforming Administration may make suffice. Unless the customs and other revenues equal that sum, let the proceeds of the lands be applied to meet the deficiency. It may be said there will then be nothing to distribute. Sir, our importations are constantly increasing; and notwithstanding the compromise act, our revenue will most probably not fall below $20,000,000. But say that it will; then no injury will result from the resolution, since it leaves the proceeds of the lands in that case applicable to the wants of the Government.

There is no provision made in the joint resolution for the future reduction or graduation of the price of the public lands. If my own judgment did not disapprove these measures, the known opinions of my constituents would be considered by me as an instruction to oppose them. What good reason can be assigned for reducing the price of the Government lands? Will not the lands in the hands of private proprietors, with the privilege of taking choice out of upwards of eighty million acres now open to entry at $1 25, furnish at a low price all that can for many years be required for cultivation? There is enough, were not another acre of public land thrown into market, to subsist six times our present population. Eighty millions and upwards have been sold in the new States and Territories, and the quantity in the other States must be largely upwards of two hundred millions; while France has in all about one hundred and twenty-eight millions, and Great Britain eighty-seven millions only.

The pretext is to benefit the poor. You are to benefit the poor by giving them, at reduced price, what are called the refuse lands. Sir, I verily believe you could not do a poor man a greater injury than to give him, for nothing, a tract of poor land, and compel him to keep it. If he has money to purchase refuse lands at fifty, or even twenty-five cents, he would act more wisely to lay it out in land of better quality, though he should obtain but a half or a third of the quantity. But it is a mere pretext. There is no man so poor in this country, if he be able and willing to work, but can procure more land than he can cultivate. Any man who can buy a turkey or a bottle of brandy may purchase an acre of good land. An industrious mechanic, a day laborer, in sixty or ninety days, may purchase enough to subsist a numerous family. Yes, sir; the loafer who throws himself nightly upon the marble steps or stony pavements of the great metropolis of New York may lie down, if he will, beneath the shady elms of Missouri, or the orange groves of Florida, and rise in the morning lord of the manor. Nay, more: if the new bill which I have seen upon our tables for the military occupation of Florida should go into operation, ten thousand men may each take his three hundred and twenty acres as a free gift, and be furnished at the public expense with a year's support, medicines when sick, and an army to defend him! We are to make them a present of three million two hundred thousand acres of the public land, and pay them—computing each ration at twenty cents, to say nothing of the expense of troops and medicines—$720,000 to take it.

Sir, these schemes of reduction are not intended to benefit the poor. The true object is to enable the rich proprietor to add to his possessions by taking up the contiguous lands at a price far below their value; or to benefit the speculator into whose hands the tracts taken up under such a law would probably soon fall. The man who cannot acquire and hold land now, would not hold it if given to him for nothing; especially if the land to be given be as worthless as it is represented.

It is not the true policy of the Government, Mr. Speaker, to invite more labor or capital to agriculture. There is already, perhaps, too great a portion of both withdrawn from the mechanic arts. It is not the policy of any of the States further to reduce the price of the public lands. The inevitable effect will be to disperse the population, already too much scattered, to break up the older settlements, and to diminish the value of the land of every land-holder in the Union. These effects have been adverted to, sir, by the gentleman from Indiana, in his report. He assents to the propriety of giving up the refuse lands to settlers, but decidedly objects to a general reduction of the price to cost, as proposed by the late President. He says:

"It is believed that no system founded on such a principle can be carried into practice without entire ruin to the present holders of land in the new States."

Mark you, sir, even "in the new States;" the gentleman takes no notice of the old ones, whose interests are still more deeply affected. It is even thought ungenerous and envious on our part to complain of what, when brought home to themselves, our brethren of the West can feel full as sensibly as others. He adds:

"To throw open to entry the unsold lands in the West to actual settlers at cost, the immediate consequence will be a reduction in the value of the landed estate of the country to an incalculable degree. The old counties will be immediately depopulated by the people pressing on to the interior, each endeavoring to locate himself before his neighbor. That portion of the community engaged in the mechanic arts would quit their usual pursuits, to the great detriment of the country."

Such, sir, are the views of the candid and intelligent gentleman—himself a western man—of the policy of reducing still lower the price of the public lands.

It would be of no advantage, sir, even to the individuals proposed to be benefited. A day-laborer or a mechanic can make more profit by continuing his usual occupation, than by clearing and cultivating lands. If the policy could be confined to a single State—to Indiana or Alabama, for instance—it might, perhaps, be found beneficial to that State; because, in that case, its population would not be withdrawn. But suppose it adopted as a general measure; suppose

25TH CONG....3D SESS.

Public Lands—Mr. Robertson.

HO. OF REPS.

you surrender the lands of Iowa, Wisconsin, and Florida at reduced prices, or on the terms proposed by the Florida military occupation bill: the population of Alabama and the new States of the South would, in that case, flow into Florida, and that of Indiana and the western States into Wisconsin and Iowa.

There is no foundation, sir, for complaint in reference to the price of the public lands. When gentlemen talk of the great merits and sufferings of the hardy pioneers of the West, they should not forget those of the early settler of the old States, from the landing of Sir Walter Raleigh to that of the Pilgrims. They should remember that, while for a moderate sum they purchase fertile lands in the new States and Territories, the citizens of other sections of the Union pay more than double for lands of vastly inferior quality; and that while the means of constructing roads and canals and erecting schools and colleges have been supplied to them out of the common funds, the old States, with few exceptions, have been wholly denied similar benefits. Yet gentlemen, with these facts before their eyes, talk of oppression—oppression in taxing them by the sale of land at a price confessedly below its real worth. Let us for a moment, sir, test the justice of the charge by referring to their own example. In some cases, I am informed, those States have obtained from the Government leave to dispose of the school lands originally granted to the townships. Well, sir, what has been the result? Indiana has sold hers, I am told, on an average, for four or five dollars per acre; Ohio for probably as much or more; and Michigan has put up hers on the express condition that not an acre should be sold below eight! These school lands, it will be recollected, consist of the sixteenth section in each township, and must therefore be of an average value, as certainly as if drawn by lot. Sir, I see no impropriety in this; they act wisely and justly to augment their resources by getting the value of their property. But I use it to repel the charge of injustice and oppression, made by the new States against this Government, by showing that their own citizens experience greater oppression from them than from us.

I have thought it unnecessary, Mr. Speaker, to make any discrimination between the lands ceded by the States and those purchased from France or Spain, or from the Indians. I believe—the whole country believes—there is no substantial distinction. It cannot be that we have one law for Louisiana and Missouri, and another for Alabama and Ohio. I will not stop at this time to examine the constitutional question. The constitutionality of these purchases has been well defended under the war power conferred by the Constitution, as well as that to regulate commerce; and it must be acknowledged that, with the command of the mouth of the Mississippi, not only might our commerce be seriously annoyed, but our interior country constantly exposed to attack. Be this as it may, the purchase was made, the territory has been formed into States, and those States admitted into the Union; so incorporated into our system that we could not separate them, if we would, without impairing its healthful action; indeed, without vital injury. What, then, shall be done with the fertile regions thus acquired? In the statements furnished by the Government, the amount paid has been treated as a charge upon the funds arising from the sales of the ceded lands. Upon every principle of reason and equity; then, these acquisitions stand in the place of the funds employed in the purchase. By the Constitution, moreover, full power is given to dispose of all public lands, without reference to the mode in which they may be acquired. If it be said they stand, in any respect, on a different footing from the ceded lands, then how comes it that donations have been made to Louisiana and Missouri for education and internal improvement, which can only be justified by resorting to the original compacts of cession and ordinances under them, applicable only to the ceded lands, or those which may stand in their place? But suppose there is, in truth, a substantial difference: still we have the lands; we cannot abandon them; and have no more right to surrender them to one portion of the people than to another. There is no rule that can be adopted more constitutional or more just than to distribute them. I would consider them, sir, as a great surplus fund, to be distributed among its common owners, as was the great surplus of money, a few years past, in the Treasury. You need not call it, sir, distribution; call it, if you will, a loan, or a deposit, or a lease for nine hundred and ninety-nine years, renewable forever. The name will be no objection, provided the property be fairly divided among its rightful owners.

Mr. Speaker, I have submitted the proposition before you in a spirit of concession. If any have a right to complain, it is the old States. The distribution proposed is wholly prospective. It does not look back to what is past, or demand for the old States, previous to a general distribution, such appropriations as will correspond in a just proportion with those heretofore made in favor of other States. This claim was not only asserted by Maryland and other States, as far back as 1821, but has been repewed in the resolutions recently adopted by the House of Delegates of Virginia. That there are just grounds for the claim, I cannot doubt; but there are strong considerations which lead me to believe that the old States themselves, actuated by the same spirit which has ever induced them to pursue towards the new States a generous policy, will yield it, provided just principles shall hereafter be pursued in the administration of the common funds. I will state the reasons which should influence them, as I think, to adopt such a policy. The ordinance of 1787 declares that schools and the means of education shall be forever encouraged. It is certainly true that many and large donations have been made for very different purposes; but, as to them, the States obtaining them claim to have paid an equivalent. This ordinance and these donations were made in part, or acquiesced in by the representatives of the old States. If an account were to be taken, it would be difficult, if not impossible, to fix a standard by which the value of the consideration could be estimated, or the just proportions of other States ascertained. And more than all, sir, the claim itself, if successfully asserted under such circumstances, would generate an unfriendly feeling, for which the entire domain of the Union, spacious as it is, would poorly compensate. I offer these, sir, as my own individual opinions. As members of this House, we have no power to say to the States they shall not enjoy the full measure of their rights in the public domain. It is a sacred trust we cannot violate. As representatives of the States, we were sent here to defend, not to abandon, their rights and interests. To guard, these, sir, the proviso has been annexed, which leaves the question how far those rights and interests shall be waived or insisted on with the States, who alone are competent to decide it.

I had intended, Mr. Speaker, to notice the amendment contemplated by the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. YELL,] but have already trespassed much longer upon the patience of the House than I had intended. I am not certain, indeed, that I comprehend it, and will therefore make but a single remark. It calls apparently for an account of all benefits derived by the old States from the public lands since the origin of the Government. Well, sir, let this account be taken, and then let all the expenditures of the Government during the same period be also ascertained; those of the old revolutionary war, of the late war, civil and military expenses of every kind, appropriations for purchasing Louisiana and Florida, extinguishing Indian titles, and carrying on Indian wars. Present both sides of the account, and I labor under a great mistake if the balance found against the gentleman's own State will not constitute a mortgage ample enough to eat up every foot of land within its limits.

The old States can fear no just settlement. They ask nothing more than their due. None can impute to them a grasping disposition. If any should, let them be sure there is in themselves no taint of cupidity. Let them set an example of noble disinterestedness, and offer better terms to us than we offer to them. Let them present any plan more reasonable, more just, and for one I will give it my hearty support. If not, then, in an equal spirit of candor, let them take ours. I trust, sir, it will be adopted.

It is simple in itself; it may be described in two words: divide fairly—divide fairly the common property.

It changes no system.

By avoiding new compacts, it avoids controversies with the States.

It draws no money from the Treasury necessary to meet the just expenditures of the Government, and consequently obviates all pretext for an increased tariff; while, by distributing the excess, it prevents wasteful appropriations to a partial system of internal improvement.

It is in fulfillment of our solemn covenants, conformable to our fundamental law, and rests on the eternal foundations of justice.

I address myself to the representatives of the old States. Is it not our right? If so, why shall we surrender it? I warn them their constituents will expect them to answer the question. The people are in action, and rely upon it, sir, they are in earnest. Hear the language just addressed to us by the State of New Jersey:

"Issuing from the toils and sufferings of our revolutionary struggle, exhausted in everything but patriotism and honor, she has been left to provide her own common school fund, to build and endow her own academies and colleges, and to construct her own railroads and canals, by such ways and means as she could devise. She has looked to the public lands, in part acquired by her valor or purchased with her treasure, as a source from which she might hereafter expect aid in educating her sons, in developing her natural resources, in facilitating the intercourse of her citizens, and in accomplishing other similar purposes which constitute the true glory and wealth of a State. But an attempt, it would seem, is to be made to strip her, in piecemeal or in mass, of this property, to which she is entitled by every principle of law and justice. It may be that it will succeed; but it shall not be with her consent, nor without her remonstrance."

Sir, this is strong language; and it is to be regretted there should ever be occasion to use it. Is it not an interest of transcendent importance to secure to the present and future generations the benefits to which they are entitled; benefits which they may receive not only without doing wrong to any, but by conferring benefits on those from whom, in turn, they derive them? For the fertile lands they transfer will repay tenfold their cost. Why, then, should this incalculable treasure be thrown away? surrendered piecemeal or in mass? But, immense as are the consequences in a pecuniary view, infinitely more important are they in a moral and in a political aspect. As you shall settle this question, you may perpetuate harmony or generate lasting dissensions among us.

But now is not the time. Postpone—postpone. For nearly twenty years have your constituents been knocking at your door. How much longer will their servants—no, sir, their masters—in this Hall deny them admittance? Amid the thousand frivolous questions which occupy months of our time, can we not devote one week to a subject beyond comparison the most important which could attract our notice? Can we not spare four days? In that time the old convention of my State, computing from the day it was reported, adopted the Constitution which radically changed the form of our Government, and which remained unaltered for upwards of fifty years. Yet gentlemen—from the old States, too—when they know it is in their power, if they will, to adopt this measure to-morrow, cannot spare the time to do justice to their constituents, and secure incalculable blessings to future generations.

I appeal to the Representatives of the new States themselves. Have not your brethren been just? have they not been generous to you? and will you not be just to them? Let us, on all sides, sir, come together as brethren of one family, disdaining to seek unjust advantages in sharing the common patrimony. It is a sense of mutual benefit; more than all, of reciprocal justice; which, as with hooks of steel, draws State to State, man to man, heart to heart. That—that alone—will keep bright and strong the chain of our Union; bind us more closely together than parchment bonds, or penal statutes, or armed mercenaries. Let us now, sir, and at all times, meet in that fraternal spirit which actuated our fathers, and our friendship will be as deep as the fathomless oceans which wash our shores, and durable as the everlasting hills which overlook our boundless domain.

Maine Boundary Question—Mr. Williams.

SENATE.

MAINE BOUNDARY QUESTION.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE,

FRIDAY, March 1, 1839.

The Senate having taken up the resolutions reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, on the subject of the difficulties between Maine and New Brunswick—

Mr. BUCHANAN said the subject had been so much discussed that he would now offer no further explanation of the resolutions, though he would be happy to reply to any questions which might be proposed.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Maine, remarked that he felt a delicacy in saying anything in opposition to resolutions reported by the able and distinguished Committee on Foreign Relations, and he could hardly expect to succeed in obtaining any modification of them, however much he might wish it; but the subject was all important to his State, and he would not refrain from expressing his views frankly, and then would acquiesce in whatever decision the Senate might make.

The first three resolutions are intended to justify Maine and her course in the late movements in the disputed territory, and to declare "that the Senate will cordially coöperate with and sustain the President in defending the rights of the country, should her Britannic Majesty's Government persist in carrying its avowed determination into execution, and attempt, by military force, to assume exclusive jurisdiction over the disputed territory." This was all very well; but he regretted that the first resolution, instead of saying "that the Senate can discover no trace, throughout the long correspondence which has been submitted to them between the Governments of Great Britain and the United States, of any understanding, express or implied, much less of any explicit agreement, such as is now alleged, that the territory in dispute between them on the northeastern boundary of the latter shall be placed and remain under the exclusive jurisdiction of her Britannic Majesty's Government until the settlement of the question," did not contain a simple, positive, and direct denial of any such agreement or understanding as was alleged and claimed by her Britannic Majesty's Minister and the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, in their late communications. He could not think, while her Majesty's representatives undertook to assert and repeat that such an understanding and agreement had been made with us, that we should content ourselves by saying that we cannot discover any trace of either throughout the correspondence between the two Governments. If such understanding or agreement ever existed or was made, we were parties to it, and must know the fact; if it never was made, then say so, and not put it on the ground that we cannot discover it in the correspondence. If we refer to the correspondence to prove that no such agreement or understanding was ever made, we may expect that her Majesty's Government will do the same, and insist that the agreement and understanding are proved by that correspondence.

We have already seen what Great Britain can do by diplomacy. Her whole claim to the disputed territory has no foundation but what grows out of diplomacy and diplomatic correspondence; and, with the skill and adroitness of her diplomatic agents, she will make out of the correspondence a better pretense to exclusive jurisdiction than she can to the territory in dispute; and he would be most reluctant to open a new question with her Majesty's Government, to be determined by the multifarious correspondence between the two Governments. If a man were to say to you, Mr. President, that he had a certain understanding or agreement with you, which you felt confident was not so, would you say to him that you could not discover any trace of it in your communications with him? Or, being conscious that you had not made any such agreement, would you not say so in direct terms, and thus put an end to the question? Mr. Fox and Sir John Harvey say that, by the agreement and understanding between the parties, Great Britain was to have exclusive jurisdiction of the disputed territory until the question of boundary shall be settled. The President and Mr. Forsyth say it was not so. Let us say the same, and nothing more, and thus make an end of this part of the case.

But it appeared to Mr. W. that it was unnecessary, impolitic, and still more objectionable, that we should undertake to declare what was or is the precise understanding or argument between the parties; and yet the first resolution asserts "that there was and is a clear subsisting understanding between the parties, under which they have both acted, that until this question shall be finally determined, each of them shall refrain from the exercise of jurisdiction over any portion of the disputed territory, except such parts of it as may have been in the actual possession of the one or the other party;" without intending to deny that since 1825, there have been, from time to time, understandings between the parties in reference to abstaining from certain acts complained of as offensive to the one or the other of them, and to the kind of possession and jurisdiction which either party might enjoy, or that the resolution describes those understandings, as a whole, with tolerable correctness, as we understand them; yet can it be safe or prudent for us to affirm that there was and is a clear subsisting understanding, and undertake to define precisely what it is? The committee believe it was and is as stated in the resolution. The British Minister and the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick affirm that it secures to her Majesty exclusive jurisdiction of the whole disputed territory, until the boundary question is settled. Why, then, undertake to say what that understanding is? Our construction of the correspondence settles nothing; and the British construction of it will not settle it. We are opening a door to interminable negotiation to settle what never will be settled in that way. Any man who has looked, or will look carefully, into the voluminous correspondence between the two Governments since 1825, will be convinced that it is no easy task to determine what has been or is the understanding of the parties upon the subject of possession and jurisdiction of the disputed territory, pending the negotiation as to the boundary.

Mr. W. referred to and read many extracts from the correspondence between the Governments consequent upon complaints, by the one against the other, of certain acts within the disputed territory supposed to be inconsistent with the rights and understandings of the respective parties; and contended that, while we had insisted upon our construction of them, Great Britain had maintained a different construction, and we had repeatedly protested against her unjust pretensions. What was and is the understanding between the parties, is not, then, so clear as the committee have supposed, and there is no necessity for us to embarrass ourselves by affirming, in these resolutions, what that understanding was or is. Besides, whatever that understanding may have been in reference to some parts of the disputed territory, it should not be applied to the Aroostook country, the seat of present difficulties. That country has been in possession and under the jurisdiction of Massachusetts and Maine more than thirty years. Soon after the source of the St. Croix was agreed upon and fixed, under the treaty of 1794, two ranges of townships west of the line running due north from the monument were surveyed by Massachusetts, and the township including the Aroostook river, near its mouth, was granted, in 1817, and other lands near it were granted soon after. These lands have been and are now held under those grants. After Maine was separated from Massachusetts, other lands in that region were surveyed into townships, and divided between the two States. Until very recently, Great Britain did not claim any jurisdiction over that portion of the disputed territory, unless it be inferred from her keeping a warden, as he is called, of the disputed territory. Within a few years past, Maine has expended large sums of money in opening and in making roads into the Aroostook country; has surveyed her lands there into lots for settlement and cultivation; already there are some good farms there, and great numbers of settlers are preparing to take lots and reside upon them. The land is of excellent quality, and now that it can be reached over good roads, it will be rapidly settled and cultivated. Is it to be expected that Maine is forever to be restrained from occupying and settling this valuable portion of her territory? For such reasons; Mr. W. felt it to be his duty to ask, and to urge, the modification of the first resolution, so that it should contain a simple and direct denial of any understanding or agreement for the exclusive jurisdiction, by her Majesty's Government, of the disputed territory, until the question of boundary be settled, as lately claimed by Mr. Fox and Sir John Harvey, and nothing more.

To the fourth resolution Mr. W. had other objections, and he earnestly hoped that it would be stricken out. It was wholly unnecessary and uncalled for. In the contingency mentioned, Maine would voluntarily pursue the course of forbearance indicated by that resolution; she could have no interest or inducement to act otherwise. Then why threaten or admonish her "that, should she refuse to do so, and determine to settle the controversy for herself, by force, &c., in such an event there would be no obligation imposed on this Government to sustain her by military aid?" Has Maine done anything to require or deserve this admonition from the Senate? Your resolutions sustain and justify her in all that she has thus far done. Then why not trust her for the future? Why suspect her in advance? If you would have Maine continue to assert and defend her rights as becomes a sovereign State, and as a member of the Confederacy disposed to maintain the peace of the nation, then rely upon her honor and upon her sense of duty to the Union, and not volunteer a threat or gratuitous admonition. It will be time enough to give this advice, and to declare the obligations of this Government, when Maine, by any act of her's, shall deserve it. Until then, she should be treated as an equal among equals, and possessing the rights and duties of a sovereign State. Leave Maine to her own responsibility, and she will take pride in acting firmly and prudently. Tell her in advance what this resolution proposes to say to her, and she may question the justice and correctness of the principles asserted, and hesitate to do upon compulsion what she would readily do upon her own responsibility. Whatever may have been the intention of the committee in reporting this resolution, it can hardly be doubted that Maine will regard it as derogatory to her as one of the free States of this Union, and it will be most unfortunate if it shall be adopted. Mr. W. therefore moved that the fourth resolution be stricken out.

Mr. BUCHANAN replied, that never had resolutions been drawn up with more care than these by any committee, and he did not expect that they would meet with any opposition. Much that was contained in the resolutions was a correct summary of the views of the President. The committee had examined the correspondence on this subject since 1832, at the time when the Senate disaffirmed the award of the King of the Netherlands, and in that correspondence they found an agreement in express terms, which had been in force since 1835, and which was the same as that embodied in these resolutions, "that, until this question shall be finally determined, each of the two parties shall refrain from the exercise of jurisdiction over any portion of the disputed territory, except such parts of it as may have been in the actual possession of the one or the other party." During the pendency of the new negotiation it became indispensable to enter into some arrangement on this subject, and Mr. Livingston proposed that this should be the understanding between the two parties. The Government of England concurred in this proposition, not hastily, for it was not answered till April, 1833, when the British Minister agreed to the terms of the proposition. Mr. B. read from the correspondence, showing that the agreement was such as he had stated. Here, he said, was a distinct proposition, accompanied with its distinct acceptance; and if it were necessary, and the time permitted, it could be shown, that from that time to this, the two Governments had adhered to this understanding.

Mr. B. said he would endeavor, in a few remarks, which he would pledge himself to confine within the limits of five or ten minutes, to show more fully what these resolutions were. The first resolution, in the strongest terms that could be used, denied the assertion made by Mr. Fox and Sir John Harvey, of the right of the British Government to exclusive jurisdiction over the disputed territory by an agreement, either express or implied, and set up and demonstrated a clear understanding between the two countries which was wholly inconsistent with the existence of any such agreement, and entirely in conflict with any such exclusive jurisdiction.

The second resolution justified the conduct of Maine through this whole affair, maintaining that she ought to drive out trespassers on the disputed territory, and that it was not reasonable cause of offense to the British authorities.

The third resolution went as far as possible, consistently with what was due to the British Government, in asserting the rights of Maine to the disputed territory; because it asserted that, if New Brunswick or Great Britain should persist in maintaining exclusive jurisdiction by force of arms, in that case the exigency under the Constitution and laws would have arisen, in which it would be the duty of the President to call out the whole force of the country to protect the property in the disputed territory.

And what was the fourth resolution? Was it not apparent, even from what the Senator from Maine had said, that this resolution was necessary? Mr. B. would not now enter at all into an examination of the conduct of Maine. But she was a brave and gallant State, and her feelings of hostility were greatly excited. Was there not, therefore, danger that, with ten thousand men at her command, she would rush into a conflict with the New Brunswick or British authorities. The fourth resolution, therefore, could do no less than declare that, if Sir John Harvey should first withdraw his forces, then, in the opinion of the United States Government, Maine ought to follow such an example of forbearance, and that, if she did not, then this Government would be under no obligation, after having done everything it could for Maine, to afford her any protection under such circumstances, nor ought she to expect it. The fourth resolution simply defines our own position, and says that the Constitution and laws impose on us no such obligation as to protect Maine while pursuing a course contrary to the advice of this Government. If we adopt only the first three resolutions, they will be all on one side, and will lead Great Britain to believe that we are ready for war at once.

And what is the argument of the Senator from Maine? Sir, I was at a loss to conceive what motive a Senator from Maine could have in attempting to disprove this settled agreement. And what reason does he assign for even a wish that it might not exist? He says the negotiation may still be pending for years, and Maine does not want this understanding to be interposed between her and the possession of her territory.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not say we did not desire this understanding to exist. I only stated an objection to it, as here stated. The resolution affirms the agreement to be so and so, when perhaps it is still to be a subject of negotiation whether it is so or not, for the British Government is but too ready to hang negotiation on any practicable point that may possibly turn in their favor.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Sir, did not the Senator from Maine and others represent it as a great hardship that, under this agreement, they could not enter into the disputed territory and settle it? And if they should do so, the peace of the country would be endangered, and this understanding is the only barrier in the way of Maine to prevent her from taking possession of the disputed territory. Sir, are we prepared for such a course which must inevitably and at once bring us into open collision with the British Government? For myself, I am prepared for that event if it must come, but I would pursue the course of honor and of right to the end of the controversy, and then, if hostilities must come, we may be a united people, and enter into them with energy and success. I presume the Senate are unanimously of the opinion that if Great Britain persists in asserting her claim to exclusive jurisdiction over the territory, war is inevitable. And yet this is objected to by the Senator from Maine, because it contains an affirmation of the right of Maine.

And why does he object to this? Because we have made this affirmation a year before, is there, can there be any objection that we should again affirm it? And yet on this ground the Senator objects.

In regard to the claim to exclusive jurisdiction on the part of Great Britain, the Senator attempts to prove that there is no understanding on this subject, and for that purpose he goes back to the original correspondence, and presents from that a claim set up by Great Britain, which was derogatory to our rights and degrading to the nation. And what was that claim? That we were to hold the United States—their soil, their independence, their existence—not in virtue of our own good swords, not in virtue of our independence, declared and achieved by our moral, intellectual, and physical energies, but as a base concession from England; and, therefore, as it did not appear that England has conceded to us the possession and jurisdiction of the disputed territory, it was consequently not ours. And how did the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] meet that degrading and insulting claim at the time? He met it with the highest honor and with irresistible triumph. And now the Senator goes back to that degrading claim, and follows up the train of events to 1832, when he ought to have begun precisely where he left off. And why? Because the state of things was entirely changed in 1832, when the award of the King of the Netherlands was rejected by the United States Senate, at the instance of Maine, and Mr. Livingston then proposed the present understanding, and made it as manifest as language could make it. And what is it? That, while the negotiation is pending, each of the two parties should confine itself to rights already possessed, and to this Sir Charles Vaughan, in the most formal manner, gave his assent; and it is the only possible principle on which the peace of the two countries can be maintained, because there is no hope of settling the controversy if either party has a right to rush on the disputed territory, and assert its possession and jurisdiction without any prescribed limits. Sometimes this agreement has been attempted to be violated; but in every instance, as I hope they will also in this, the British authorities have desisted from carrying out such violations.

[Mr. B. here read from the President's message an account of various cases in which England had refrained, when opposed, from extending her rights and jurisdiction in the disputed territory.]

Sir, I hope this settlement will come soon. I do not say we should wait forever; and if England persists in her claim to exclusive jurisdiction over the disputed territory, all America will be united, and she will be successfully resisted. But if, on the other hand, this unfounded claim should be withdrawn on the part of England, and Maine herself should persist in the same violation of this agreement from which England forbears, there may be war, doubtless, but the country will be divided. Sir, if there must be war, let it be a national war, and let it be on the side of right at every step, so that there can be no question about it. And however I have been continually the advocate of Maine, and never more than at this moment, yet I am unwilling that any of the individual States should compel us in our course, and force us to go to war. Sir, I believe I have redeemed my pledge, and in a manner which I hope will be satisfactory to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, said he wished to say a few words in addition to what had been urged by the Senator from Pennsylvania, but rather for the purpose of assuming the proper responsibility which belonged to him as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations than with a design to enforce the views of that Senator.

Mr. President, (said Mr. C.) as far as the President seeks to preserve the peace of the country, as long as he can do so consistently with the honor and interest of the country, I will support him all I can; and these resolutions are now brought forward for the preservation of the peace of the country. The most important of them are the two last, of which the third declares that if the British authorities persist in asserting their claim to exclusive jurisdiction, it will be the duty of the United States then to recognize this state of things as an invasion of the territory of the United States, which demands, if necessary, the entire force of the United States to repel it, and after that to afford protection to the territory in question. The Secretary of State and the British Minister have concurred in the terms of an agreement; and if Sir John Harvey does not pursue the course indicated by that instrument, but persists in his avowed determination, and goes on to maintain exclusive jurisdiction over the disputed territory, the consequence will be war, and then I shall be prepared to go with the Executive, and wage that war with the whole power of the United States.

The last resolution (the fourth) looks to the contingency in which the country may be precipitated into a war by the State of Maine, and it therefore declares that, if the British Government should desist from asserting a right to exclusive jurisdiction over this territory, and should withdraw their forces, and if then Maine will not do so on her part, but makes war for herself in the maintenance of her right, in such case that resolution declares, what it is impossible for any citizen to deny, that the United States is not bound to follow Maine into that war which she wages not only without the concurrence, but against the most earnest interdiction of the Government of the United States. The resolution does not declare that even then, in no possible contingency, will the United States not come to her relief, but simply that the United States will not stand bound to give such relief, and that, if there is war, it must be by the common consent and the common Government of the United States.

Sir, I presume this fourth resolution involves a proposition from which it is impossible for any Senator to dissent. This is a Government of twenty-six States, while Maine is but one of them. Of all the powers of the highest nature and character which come within the scope of human authority, that of war is the highest which can be exercised by the sovereignty of any country; and, as it respects Maine, no one can contend that the power of war does not reside exclusively in this Government. After looking on all the papers that have been placed before us on this subject, it is my opinion that Maine is so enraged, and justly so, at the conduct of a bordering province, that she may precipitate us into a war, which can only be prevented by that forbearance on the part of Maine which is recommended in this resolution, in which will be uttered the decision of the Government at Washington in a tone with which there is no doubt that the President will concur. I therefore give my entire concurrence in the views of the committee, expressed in the fourth resolution, that if Maine, on her own responsibility, from her own resources, and contrary to the entreaties of this Government, plunges into a war, we are not then bound to follow her, and to repair to her relief with the military power of this Government. But I hope she will forbear from coming into any actual hostilities against a province thus at peace with the United States.

Sir, I desire no other war than what we have already seen. Still I know enough of the resources of the country, and of its valor in a war with any Power, that if we have a just cause so that the approbation of Heaven may fall on my countrymen, I fear not the results. But when we have a war, I want to see that it is the result of dire necessity, and to see a prevailing conviction in the country that negotiation could not prevent it, and that it is a war not of Maine acting for the Confederacy, but of the twenty-six States united in its prosecution with their utmost vigor, and then we shall gather fresh laurels and gain additional renown for the country. I know that Maine complains of the tardiness of the negotiation, and there is cause for it; but it is not right that she should take the reins into her own hands, but she should act moderately, and in danger and difficulty it is her duty to operate with the Government here. I think there has been neglect in regard to this subject, and I remarked, on a former occasion, that when the disturbances in Canada arose it was a time to press this matter, but I knew of no attempt to press it during that time. It is now upwards of a year since the commencement of those difficulties, and it is the greater part of a year since Congress unanimously decided that we have a right to the disputed territory. And yet, as far as we have any information before us, the Executive Government seems to have been sleeping, instead of availing itself of the difficulties in the British provinces; and, worse than that, instead of our profiting by the Canada disturbances, or availing ourselves of any advantages from them whatever, the whole profit of them has been derived from Great Britain. And how is it that Great Britain has taken advantage of the insurrection in Canada? She has taken the opportunity to throw into her provinces a force of from fifteen to thirty thousand men; and under what pretext? That they were to suppress insurrection. But if there had been peace there, and the United States had seen regiment after regiment and corps after corps thus thrown into the provinces, would we not have increased our military means? But Great Britain, thus increasing her forces under cover of silencing Canada, is now ready for war, and may at once, with advantage, enter into hostilities with us, while our Government, instead of pressing the negotiation, has been asleep, and there has been no increase of the means on our part to meet the increased dangers of war. Therefore I say, that while, from these events, we have failed to derive any profit, which should have been wholly our own, Great Britain has been benefited to a great extent, while she has just so far placed us at a disadvantage; and while I say this, I repeat that it is no matter whether the negotiation was tardy or speedy in its consummation, Maine has no right, in consequence of such tardiness, to assume the functions of a common authority, and to plunge the country into a war. We are not represented by Maine nor by Governor Fairfield, and I do not choose that Maine should take on herself the responsibilities of entering into a war with a foreign Power, not only without the consent of the common Government, but without that of any of our citizens except those of Maine.

Mr. President, my voice is for peace, as long as it can be maintained consistently with the honor and interest of the country. But the negotiation has been unreasonably long, and I hope the two parties, aroused by recent occurrences, will see the necessity of terminating it as soon as practicable. It would be a sorry spectacle to see two kindred nations rushing into a state of war, without its duration being foreseen, for the sake of five or six millions of waste land, the whole of which would not be worth the expense of such a war for two or three months. Yet I must say that, holding the opinion that Great Britain has not the shadow of a claim to this territory, and that the clear right of Maine has been already too long withheld from her, if we now forbear sufficiently, and if at the termination of the negotiation we have no resource left but the final resort of nations, I repeat we shall be furnished with the contingency of a just war, which will be felt to be so by the people of the United States, and will be approved by Heaven; and in such a war I do not fear but that our country will come out of it gloriously and triumphantly, as it always has done in its contests with that Power.

Mr. NORVELL said that he would suggest to his honorable friend from Maine [Mr. WILLIAMS] the expediency of modifying his motion to strike out the whole of the fourth resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, and of limiting himself to a proposition to strike out the second clause of that resolution. The first branch of the resolution expressed the opinion of the Senate, that "should the British authorities refrain from attempting the military occupation of the territory in dispute, and from enforcing their claim to exclusive jurisdiction over it by arms, that then the State of Maine ought, on her part, to pursue a course of similar forbearance." The forbearance here suggested to Maine amounted simply to this: that she ought not, pending the negotiation, to attempt the military occupation of the territory in dispute, should not claim the exercise of an exclusive jurisdiction over it by arms, if the British authorities desisted from any such occupation and claim. So far, he thought, the Senate might be justified in going upon this subject. But they ought not to go further. They ought not to declare that should the State of Maine refuse to forbear, as recommended, "and determine to settle the controversy for herself by force, the adjustment of which is intrusted by the Constitution to the Federal Government, in such an event there will be no obligation imposed on this Government to sustain her by military aid." When this body were called upon to make this declaration, they were invoked to violate the Constitution of the United States, to fly directly in its face, and to absolve themselves from the solemn duty of discharging one of their highest obligations to the several States of this Union. The fourth section of the fourth article of the Federal Constitution provides that "the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and protect each of them from invasion."

It was manifest from this provision that the Federal Government could not, under any circumstances, withhold its military aid from any State of the Union to repel foreign invasion. No matter what might induce that invasion; no matter whether the act of Maine may have provoked it or not; let the invasion come, and this Government would have no alternative; it must yield its military aid promptly and effectually to that State; it must march up to the rescue. He would never consent to threaten a sovereign State of this Union, as the latter clause of the resolution did, to withhold our aid from her in the event that any action on her part should cause her invasion from abroad. We could not stand coldly by, and see Maine crushed by a powerful European kingdom, who was seeking to extend her dominions on this continent, as well as in every other quarter of the globe. The constitutional injunction is unqualified. The State of Maine certainly owed it to the General Government that the question of peace or war should be left to its decision. Nor did she appear to have entertained any design of waging war without our previous sanction. It was not necessary to menace her, in anticipation, with our displeasure. It was not necessary to tell her that, if she did not pursue a course exactly such as we might dictate, we should not be bound to render her effective military assistance against a foreign invader. She deserved no such rebuke, no such threat, at our hands. She had endured the divided possession of one third of her territory till endurance had ceased to be a virtue. For his part, he was tired of resolving; he desired to see no other resolutions adopted; the emergency demanded stronger measures than paper resolves. He was willing to let the resolutions of the Committee on Foreign Relations pass, modified as he had suggested to his friend from Maine, if they were followed up, as he trusted they would be, by an act of Congress giving authority to the Executive to raise forces, and to effect a loan, for the vindication of the rights of Maine and the honor of the nation.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, said: It is not indispensable for us to say what we will do in such and such contingencies; it is enough for us to determine what we will do at present; and I therefore ask a division of the question on the fourth resolution, so that we may first decide on the first branch, which is the expression of a mere opinion that Maine ought to forbear; and then on the second, which I think disrespectful to Maine; and I would not appear as attempting to intimidate her with a threat of withdrawing the aid of the Government in any event.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I have said all I intended to say on this subject, and I leave it entirely with the Senate; stating this, however, that I believe the last clause of the fourth resolution is more important than all the rest. It is no threat, but simply a statement that we will not be under obligation to bring the United States forces to the aid of Maine, if she goes out of the pale of the Constitution by occupying the disputed territory with a military force; and if the last resolution is stricken out, I do not think the resolutions ought to pass.

Mr. WILLIAMS now moved to strike out the last clause of the fourth resolution, denying the obligation of the United States to support Maine in case of her not withdrawing if New Brunswick should withdraw.

Mr. CALHOUN said it was a subject of very great regret that there was any difficulty in regard to these resolutions. The opinion of the Senate on this subject ought to be unanimous. He had examined the resolutions with care; they were evidently drawn up so as to operate most effectually, and, in his opinion, the part proposed to be stricken out constituted much of the essence of the resolutions.

We here propose (said Mr. C.) that, if the British authorities do not attempt to assert their claim to exclusive jurisdiction, then Maine is to retire; and I ask, in that case, ought not Maine to retire? According to her own declaration, she did not undertake to hold military possession of the territory, but simply to drive off intruders, and when that is done, can she in good faith remain? And I next ask, can it be derogatory to Maine for us to say that if Great Britain will refrain from asserting exclusive jurisdiction, we also will do so? Sir, we are on the edge of a precipice. Although the right of Maine is clear to us and certain, yet it is a matter in dispute between the parties. We, on our part, can trust Maine; but Great Britain ought to have the assurance that Maine will withdraw if Britain will forbear. And we ought to be unanimous in measures in regard to this subject. I think the country owe this very able committee their thanks for these resolutions.

Mr. ALLEN said: This is a subject which involves the relations between this and a foreign country; and yet we are speaking of one of the States of this Union, which is but a part of the whole, as being in contest with Great Britain. Sir, on such a subject I know of no such power as the State of Maine, and I will not admit, for a moment, that one of the States can, by any possibility, commit an act which will throw it on the mercy of an armed world. This Government was formed chiefly in relation to the external part of the world, and in war I will know nothing about the several States, and nothing but the entire Republic. You make an assumption here that if Maine does so and so, you will turn her out. Sir, I will not admit the assumption that Maine can do an act that will take her out of the protection of this Government. Right or wrong, I am for the country, and the whole country; and I am, therefore, in favor of striking out the last clause of this resolution.

Mr. BUCHANAN said: I repeat that I consider the last part of the fourth resolution as the most important part of the whole matter; and, lest this terrible anathema against a positive recommendation of the President may occasion some more response, I will read an extract from his message, which declares:

"These are still my views on the subject; and, until this step shall have been taken, I cannot think it proper to invoke the attention of Congress to other than amicable means for the settlement of the controversy, or to cause the military power of the Federal Government to be brought in aid of the State of Maine in any attempt to effect that object by a resort to force."

Sir, the resolution is not so strong as this. It does not negative our going to the aid of Maine, if she does not comply with the terms of the resolution, but merely asserts that we are, in that case, not under obligation to aid her, and that is the whole of it.

Mr. NILES spoke in favor of the resolution, and of the part proposed to be stricken out, urging that Maine was now acting under a false impression in regard to the views of the General Government, and it was therefore their duty to undeceive her.

The Senator from Kentucky (said Mr. N.) has represented this as a controversy about a few million acres of wild land. It is not a question of millions, but of the rights and honor of the country. Britain has refused all negotiation on the treaty of 1783; and is not that a virtual denial of our rights? Sir, I would carry our forbearance no further, but assert our right at once. I would authorize the Executive to say that our forbearance is exhausted, and that further delay neither consists with the peace nor the honor of this country.

Mr. SOUTHARD, having read the fourth resolution, said he was opposed to striking out any part of it. I think it necessary (he said) to the former part of the resolutions. And it is but a declaration of their results as to the matter of our duty. I speak not of feeling, but of constitutional right and duty; and, on that ground, this clause is right, and should not be stricken out.

Maine Boundary Question—Mr. Davis.

Again: I would not strike it out because, on the point of a conflict, it takes the true and just ground on which this great nation ought to stand in view of the country in all our conflicts with other Powers. We ought to be ready at any moment to declare the great principles on which we act, not only in relation to ourselves, but to all mankind; and we ought to take the ground assumed by this resolution, because it rests on the Constitution of the country, and on a great principle of common justice, since it may save us from difficulties which may hereafter arise in regard to the States of this Union.

The Constitution, in regard to the defense of this country, has been referred to, and I feel the obligation imposed on us by the Constitution. But if that were white paper, patriotism alone would call me to the defense of the United States, when assailed by a common enemy. But I think Senators have mistaken both the Constitution and this resolution. The resolution does not say we will not protect Maine when invaded. No, sir; and no one could have the heart to say that he would, in such a case, hesitate a single moment in yielding the last drop of his blood. But it says that when a foreign army is withdrawn, if Maine will not also consent to withdraw, she is not to look to us to protect her then in her improper course. And this is done on great principles of justice.

Is the peace of this country to be put into the hands of an individual State of this Union? Are the States all to be bound by the decisions of one on the question of peace or war? No, sir; that question is a common question for the Union itself; and I am not willing that it should be decided by any one or two or ten of the States of this Union. I then regard that resolution as true in respect to the Constitution of the country, and it is demanded in justice to the world that we should proclaim it.

What is now our position in regard to all the world of nations? We are twenty-six United States; and is it not due to the world to proclaim that no one of them shall bring us into a war, and that the whole will not yield to any low and precipitate impulse of a part? I believe the declaration would be received in Europe as a declaration of common sense and common justice, that the whole people must decide on questions of such importance to us and to other Powers, and they would have confidence in the proceedings of this Government, which they cannot have without such assurance. But let them understand, on the contrary, that of the twenty-six States, any one can determine what are their rights, and that there cannot be then an appeal to the judgment of the whole Union, and where then would be their confidence in us? Let them but understand that we follow the lead, in these high matters, of a small portion of the United States, and all confidence in this Government by foreign Powers will be at once withdrawn, and the Government of Europe will feel that there is no safety in holding any intercourse with us. We ought, therefore, to declare that no separate portion of the United States shall be permitted to interfere and control our relations with foreign Governments, but that it shall be done by all the people of all the United States.

But it is said this resolution looks like a threat to the State of Maine. No, sir; we are not in the habit of threatening the members of the Confederacy, and we have no inducement to hold out to the feeblest a threat that if she will not do as we choose we will punish her. But we have a right to do this—and I hope we shall do it, not only in regard to the feeblest, but the strongest—that is, to declare to them that we are to judge when we are to be brought into a war with a foreign Government, and we will not let you decide that question for us. I believe Maine is right, and her adversary wrong, and nothing has surprised me more than a doubt of the right of Maine on the treaty of 1783. If geography is right, if the mathematics is right, then is Maine right in this controversy with a foreign Government; and if the Executive is as decided with Great Britain as Congress is unanimous on this subject, that Government has too much of a sense of justice much longer to refuse to yield. I say this, that Maine may understand that while my views are such as I have expressed, I have not a doubt of her right to this territory. And if, in the further results of this matter, the rights of Maine shall still be denied by Great Britain, I have nothing further to offer, except my aid in the conflict, and of that Maine shall have all. But I would not enter into a foreign war without the exercise of our own judgment.

This high moral position I desire this Government to assume, that we may do justice to Great Britain. But let not Maine, if New Brunswick withdraws her force, still persist in retaining her force in the disputed territory; and that is all the resolution asserts, that if Great Britain withdraw, Maine is to withdraw; and further, that it is to be by the common consent of the whole people of this nation whenever we enter into a war. And I will say, as was once said of Great Britain, let this country be but true to herself, and let the four corners of the earth come, and she will foil them. Sir, this is no insult to Maine. The passions and prejudices of Maine have been aroused by the delays of Government; but all this is to be forgotten, and we are now to act simply on what is before us.

Mr. BENTON was opposed to this fourth resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations. He looked upon it as involving both an unconstitutionality and an impossibility. The Union was a unit—a single body—and no part of it could be struck without every part feeling the blow. The General Government was created for the common defense, and was charged with the whole business of our foreign relations. It is for the General Government to settle all questions with foreign nations, and it is to this Government that foreign nations must look for the settlement of all questions. They cannot deal with a single State, neither amicably by negotiation, nor hostilely by arms. If Maine does wrong to Great Britain, the application for redress must be to this Government. If it be wrong, and this Government does not redress it, it assumes it. It makes the aggression of Maine its own aggression. This is our Constitution; this is a principal, and this the main object of the Union. We have formed a Union for the common defense; and the States have submitted to that Union the decision of all questions which the State or their citizens can have with foreign Powers. The Congress is the council of the Union; it is bound to take cognizance of the wrongs of every part of the Union, and to decide upon every question. If a State is in the wrong with respect to a foreign Power, it must desist; if in the right, it must be sustained. It cannot be abandoned to a contest with that foreign Power. We cannot stand by and see that Power chastise it! The Constitution forbids this.

It requires the whole Union to give aid and succor to each State. While in the Union it must be defended; while in the Union its resources are in the hands of the Federal Government; and neutrality, or non-interference, is an impossible state for this Government. Impossible under the Constitution; impossible in point of fact. Impossible in point of fact; for the revenues of the State are in our hands, her forts and magazines are in our hands, her sinews of war are in our hands; and before we can be neutral we must restore her resources, we must give up her custom-houses, forts, magazines, and her share of the fleet. To retain these in our hands, while she combats naked and empty-handed with a foreign Power, will not be neutrality and non-interference, but will be aid and interference on the opposite side: it will be aiding the foreign Power by disabling the State! The whole thing is impossible—as impossible as it would be unconstitutional; and the contingent inaction of this Government in the case supposed in the resolution is clearly and manifestly an error, which cannot stand the test of the Constitution or of events. The Senate should reject the resolution. It may lead to erroneous and unfortunate conclusions abroad, and will not be sanctioned at home. It may induce the British Government to suppose that a state of things may arise in which they may have to deal with Maine alone, and to induce them to act upon that supposition. Fatal to the peace of the two countries would be that supposition and that action! Right or wrong, Maine cannot be struck by the British! If she is struck, every State in the Union is struck! Every one will feel the blow, and every one will come to her aid. The far West and the extreme South will feel the blow, and will join in repelling or avenging it. This would be the inevitable result. Let the resolution, then, be rejected. Let the Federal Government take charge of the controversy, and proceed to settle it with Great Britain. Let this Government do its part, as the supreme head of the Confederacy, and hold itself ready to act its part in any consequences that may ensue.

Mr. DAVIS said: After reading this resolution, I find myself disappointed; and I am not well reconciled to some other parts of the resolutions. I am reluctant to raise objections against them, because I know they were drawn up with the best of motives.

I do not doubt that we are to regard that agreement which has been so much spoken of; but I will say this: that that agreement was made for a temporary purpose, and only to endure while negotiations were pending. I suppose it did exist by a proposition made on the one side, and by an accession to that proposition on the other side. I had occasion to remark the other day, and the documents will show, that Great Britain declared the negotiation at an end, in which our Secretary of State concurred. And was not this bargain then at an end? What is the subject of the protocol, (memorandum?) It is, that Great Britain alleges a new agreement that we deny; and we therefore propose now to enter into a new agreement. And what good will it do to renew what was given up by the Executive? I can foresee no good from it, and there may be evil.

But this resolution is yet more important, and involves a principle of higher consideration. I do not view it as others, in the nature of a threat; but I view it as involving a constitutional power and duty of this Government, and as declaring to Maine and the world that this Government has the right, in certain contingencies, to withhold its protection from Maine. Let us look at it in that important aspect: and now what is our constitutional duty? I will read from the Constitution, in the tenth section:

"No State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any duty of tonnage, keep troops or ships of war in time of peace, enter into any agreement or compact with another State or with a foreign Power, or engage in war, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent danger as will not admit of delay."

And now let us look at section four of the fourth article:

"The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and, on application of the Legislature, or of the Executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence."

Against invasion and domestic violence! Let us suppose a case, for example, that the people of Canada come across the river at Detroit for the purpose of invading Michigan, is there any doubt of the authority of Michigan to repel them? Is it not within the terms of the Constitution itself? Nothing is plainer than that the State has this power, and it would be its duty to exercise it, even if it were not in the Constitution. And if all this is so, it is plain that it is the duty of this Government not only to defend its own rights, but to sustain the jurisdiction of Michigan as a member of the Confederacy.

And now let us look at Maine. The Senators from Pennsylvania, Missouri, and Kentucky, declare that there is not a shadow of doubt as to the right of Maine to this territory; that the line marked out by the treaty is so clear and evident, that there cannot be a doubt on the subject in the mind of any reasonable man. And have we not the authority of this body by a unanimous decision that such is the fact? Whose, then, is this territory? It is part and parcel of the State of Maine by the opinion of everybody. And what right, then, has Great Britain to touch it? Is it not, in fact and in truth, an invasion of the State of Maine? And are you prepared, if Maine insist on what the Constitution imposes on you as a duty and an obligation—are you prepared to say to Maine, your territory is not invaded? And when she denies it, will you still question whether she is invaded? Sir, is not your answer already and unambiguously made, that this territory is absolutely a part of Maine? Then, the only fact which you can question is, whether it is invaded, and, if it is, then the obligation on you arises there to repel that invader. Admit all this to be true, and how, then, will you come to the conclusion arrived at in this resolution? How can you say to Maine, forbear; and, if you will not forbear, the United States will withhold their power from protecting you? Are you at liberty to say so, have you the right to do so, and can you do it without violating an obligation expressly imposed upon you by this important instrument? You have no right, and you cannot do it. The advice is salutary enough till it reaches that point; but, when you go beyond that, as you would do by this resolution, you violate your duty here, and, therefore, you have no right to pass such a resolution as that.

Mr. PRESTON said: I am against striking out this clause, and I have risen to say a few words to that effect, though, if my views were such as those of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. ALLEN,] I could not oppose striking it out. He insists that Maine can do no action that necessarily involve us in war. I believe that Maine can do an act in which we are not bound to protect her. If, for instance, Maine should invade New Brunswick, defeat Sir John Harvey, capture her men, and hold them there, does any man suppose that we must then go to war, because of Maine violating the Constitution, which forbids this course of conduct? The Constitution expressly denies this power to the States, and if a State causes war, I ask whether that act is making war for us?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly not, if she herself makes the invasion.

Mr. PRESTON. She cannot make war for us in any way. She cannot do it. She may repel invasion, and in some respects this is a war; but it is caused by invasion; and in such a case a State may not only repel it, but may call on this Government to repel it; and all this may be done without a declaration of war. But the Senator from Massachusetts, abandoning this general ground, that it is impossible for a State to do anything which must necessarily produce a war, comes to a case such as is not before us. The resolution supposes no invasion to be made. His Detroit case, therefore, is not a parallel at all. The case of the resolutions is that there is to be no invasion; they suppose, on the contrary, that New Brunswick is to forbear; and then the naked case is this, that if there is no invasion, and Maine, notwithstanding, chooses war, shall we sustain her?

But, says the Senator, avoiding the difficulty, and with another fundamental mistake, shall not Maine enter into the possession of her undisputed territory, which the Senate accords to her by a unanimous decision? Sir, the whole of this is a fallacy. It is not her undisputed territory; on the contrary, I, with the resolutions, and with all, have declared that it is disputed. It is her rightful territory; but is that right undisputed? Is it not, on the contrary, the foundation of the whole of these proceedings that her right to this country is disputed? Great Britain claims it as fully and as boldly as Maine. But will you, by your example, put them in the position to maintain that they, being sure as we are, have a right to go there and maintain by force their possession? We have decided the right; but, pending the action on the mutual question, neither we nor the other party have the right to take possession of the territory. Maine has not the right to take it. It is a question in our foreign relations, one that is disputed, and the settlement of it rests with this Government.

And where is the line that divides us! Here, says the British negotiator, and there, says the American negotiator. And to what are we to appeal? There is but one resource of two—war or negotiation; and the proposition of the Senator amounts to this: that Maine is to say whether it shall be by war or negotiation. She would rush at once into war, and thus destroy all chance of a negotiation. But will any one say that she has the right? Will the South venture on a question of this kind? A portion of her property has been seized by the British, which they have taken under a presumed power in our general relations. Would it be admitted that North Carolina might land a force on the Island of Bermuda, and seize these slaves, or that she might make a declaration of war for this purpose. As far as the military occupation of this territory is concerned, Maine has no more right to it than she has to sack Frederickton. I do not say that it is not necessary for this Government to get it for her; but as long as it is in abeyance, Maine has no more right to take possession of it than she has to take possession of Frederickton.

And now, how does this matter stand in regard to this territory? The right, we know, is in Maine, and we are in the process of establishing her title; but before we accomplish that, Maine changes the position of the question, and takes from us a prerogative which belongs to us. By a unanimous vote of this body, we declare that the line is beyond that territory. It is there; and if every inch of it is to be drawn in blood, it shall be there. But by whose power is this to be effected? By our own, into whose hands these high powers are committed. It is not by the blood of Maine that this is to be decided, but by my blood and money, and by the blood and money of the whole country, and we are to decide on the time and the manner. But what mockery would all this be if Maine could drag us into a war; and with what spirit should we go to war, if we were, or could be dragged into it? We have seen a fire along the whole northern frontier. Suppose the case was there, could Vermont draw us into a war when the whole country is against it? And Maine has no more right to march into the disputed territory than the Governor of Vermont has to march his troops into Canada. This resolution seems right, under every aspect of the case. Maine is bound to forego her proceedings, and to surrender her discretion to the discretion of the General Government. Let her, then, forbear a little longer. I concede that, if for a series of years we should disregard her rights, then she would have the right to take the matter into her own hands, and be sovereign and independent by her own vigor. But this is an extreme case. I am anxious to take the case as it is now expressly made, and that is this: there is a dispute about this territory, and into that territory no foreigner can put his foot, and by this Government and by no State power can a different state of things exist. By the supposition of a case, Great Britain is to withdraw; and she having thus performed her part, the question arises whether Maine may set aside her part of the agreement.

Sir, I would be as reluctant as any one throughout the State of Maine to accede to this resolution if I believed it infringed any one of her just rights, or impaired her sovereignty. I would rather go to war than infringe the Constitution. But I do not believe that it does so. I may be asked why I am in favor of this resolution. It is because the war spirit is up. Britain has treated us badly, extremely so, and consequently the war spirit is abroad. Maine is greatly excited; and is it better to leave this matter to her, who has received the outrage, than to us who are cooler, and to whom the prerogative of judging in this case belongs? Shall she draw us on, or shall we restrain her?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Maine, said: I was a little surprised at the remarks of the Senator from South Carolina, in the early part of his speech, knowing, as I did, the views of that gentleman in regard to State rights and State sovereignty, and I am glad to perceive that before he closed he was induced to say that when a State has suffered for a long series of years the suppression of her rights, it is her right and duty to interpose in her own behalf, and be sovereign by her own energies. And now what is the case before us? This territory, he admits, or rather declares, is a part of the State of Maine, and her right of possession is held in suspense. But if this and a foreign Government have a right to take one third of the State of Maine, and say the title to it is in suspense, and to say to Maine she has no right to exercise jurisdiction over what is acknowledged by us to be absolutely her own, why have they not the right to take the whole State, and put Maine in abeyance as to her own identity? And if Britain and the United States should take a fancy to say the Penobscot is the boundary, are the rights of Maine over all that territory suspended on that account? Sir, I trust not.

And what is the actual case now under consideration? The territory of right belongs to Maine, and an agreement is made that she shall not extend her jurisdiction over it, and then Maine is treated as if she had violated that agreement. But what are these resolutions? Do they not say that in all her acts, thus far, she has not violated the spirit of any agreement? Why, then, is the conduct of Maine arraigned, as if she would now revenge her own wrongs? Thus far Maine has acted within the spirit of that agreement; and why, then, not leave her to determine and to do her own duty? Why go on and say, on a supposition, on a mere presumption, that if she act otherwise than you prescribe, you will not then be under obligation to protect her? We say that Maine has done, thus far, well; and why not stop there, and leave her to her own honor and discretion? Sir, I hope this clause will be stricken out.

Mr. WALKER said: I cannot bring my mind to favor the adoption of the entire resolutions. I am not for war unless it is demanded by the honor of the country. I have no objection to the first part of this resolution, but to the last part I see constitutional objections which cannot be answered, and I should feel obliged to the Committee on Foreign Relations if they could answer them.

The remarkable case in which a State can call on this Government for protection is when she is invaded, and it is the duty of this Government, by the Constitution, to protect a State under all circumstances against invasion. And is this Government to determine when a State shall enter into possession of what we have declared to be a portion of the territory? We have unanimously decided that the soil is hers. Whose is the sovereignty then over this territory? I say it is that of Maine. And is it not right that this State sovereignty should be exercised? Has Maine not the right to the possession of this territory? Or has this Government the right to prescribe the time and circumstances under which a State shall exercise the right of sovereignty over the whole of her territory? This is not the question whether a State has a right to decide what is her territory. But when the General Government has decided that it is her territory, has that General Government the right to say that she has not the right to exercise jurisdiction over that territory?

Sir, what is the case? Maine is actually invaded, and shall we not repel that invasion? It is said this territory is disputed; but by whom? By a foreign Power. And what is the result of the argument of the Senator from South Carolina when carried out? It is, that although our territory is invaded, we are not bound to repel that invasion if a foreign Power deny our right to the territory. Sir, if that is so, you never can repel invasion, for the invaders will ever deny your right. The territory is invaded, and we are told that we are not to perform our constitutional duty because a foreign Power disputes our jurisdiction.

Maine, if she choose, may abandon the territory. But has this Government a right, under the Constitution, to demand that a sovereign State shall give up the actual possession of any portion of her territory? We have no such right, and these resolutions cannot alter the Constitution. Then suppose that Maine has taken actual possession of this territory, and refuses to abandon that possession, and then suppose that Great Britain marches her troops within the limits of Maine, and makes war upon the State: then what do we declare if we adopt this resolution? We should have proclaimed to Great Britain and the world that this Government is under no obligation to defend Maine in the possession of this territory. The resolutions mean this or nothing; and now I ask, if Maine should refuse to abandon this territory, and Great Britain should invade it, and proceed to slaughter our people, are we, in that case, under no obligation to defend and protect them?

Mr. BROWN said, with all the reverence which he had on all occasions felt and cherished for the rights of the States, he could not assent to the doctrines which had been avowed by the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. WALKER.] He could not sanction the doctrine that the State of Maine had a right to take possession, by military force, of the territory now in dispute, and which she claims as being within her proper boundaries. Where the limits of a State have been ascertained and acknowledged, the principle asserted was, beyond all doubt, correct; but when they were in dispute, the case was materially different. A State could not settle controversies of any kind with a foreign Government, as it was competent alone for the General Government to exercise that authority, to which the treaty-making power belonged, under the Constitution. The power of settling controversies of that kind had been most wisely confided exclusively to the General Government. If it were left to each State whose territory borders on that belonging to foreign countries, and who might happen to have disputed boundaries, to withdraw from the General Government the power of settling them by treaty, and of taking the controversy into their own hands, a single member of the Confederacy would have the power of involving the other States in war at its pleasure. He therefore considered the doctrine contended for, utterly incompatible with the authority of the General Government to which the power of making war and peace alone belongs, under the Constitution.

Mr. B. said he should vote for the adoption of the resolutions reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, because he believed they took the true view, not only as to the rights of the respective parties to the controversy, but as to the duties which it was incumbent on each to perform. Some honorable Senators had viewed them as not sufficiently strong in sustaining the rights of the State of Maine; but he took a very different view of them. The third resolution declares it the duty of the President, if the British Government shall attempt, by military force, to exercise exclusive jurisdiction over the territory in dispute, to resist it by the whole military force of the United States, and pledges the coöperation of the Senate in sustaining him to that end. As a correlative duty, the fourth resolution declares that, in the event the British Government shall refrain from attempting a military occupation, the State of Maine should, in the opinion of the Senate, pursue a similar course of forbearance; but should she refuse to do so, and determine to settle the controversy for herself, by force, that there will be no obligation imposed on the United States to sustain her by military aid.

Mr. B. was opposed to striking out the latter part of the last resolution, as had been proposed. The State of Maine certainly had no right, during the pendency of the controversy between the Government of the United States and Great Britain, to occupy the territory in dispute by a military force, except for the single purpose of repelling invasion. If she pursued a contrary course, and should choose to undertake the settlement of the controversy herself, the Government of the United States would be absolved from any obligation to sustain her in it. To strike out that part of the resolution might create the inference that she had the right to occupy the territory by a military force, a right the exercise of which would inevitably lead to war. With the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. ALLEN,] he shared fully in the wish to see the rights of the State of Maine defended, and to the utmost protected; but he could not agree with him in the sentiment which he had just uttered—that he was with her, "right or wrong." The maxim which the Senator had repeated was uttered by a gallant officer in the late war, and is the sentiment of lofty patriotism. In a state of war it never can be misapplied. When the country is once involved in war, no true patriot will refuse to aid her, "right or wrong;" but it would be a great misapplication of the principle in a state of peace to make the same declaration. He had the utmost confidence in the patriotism of the State of Maine, and did not believe that she would act rashly in the present controversy; but if she should determine to occupy the territory in dispute between her and Great Britain by military force, and decide to settle the controversy for herself, he should not be ready to justify her, "right or wrong." The maxim that "he who has his quarrel just is doubly armed" is not more truly applicable to individuals than to nations. Let us, in the progress of this controversy, be sure that every step we take in it is sanctioned by prudence and justice; and if an appeal to arms becomes unavoidable, then we shall be strengthened in the conflict not only by a consciousness of the justice of our cause, but by the approbation of the nations of the civilized world.

Mr. B. said that he would not refrain from noticing an observation of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON,] before he had concluded what he had to say on this subject. That Senator deprecates the prevalence, at this time, of what he calls a war spirit in our country. He saw nothing to regret in this, if it be so. If it be meant by this that the nation had shown a just sensibility to the national honor, he rejoiced at it. The high spirit which the arrogant pretensions of Great Britain had called forth from one part of the country to the other, and the readiness of every portion of the Union to share with Maine in the controversy, was the exhibition of a noble moral spectacle, of which he was proud. Its tendency was to create a true American and national feeling, and to diminish the force of those various British influences on our country, which he regarded as by far more formidable and dangerous to our republican form of Government than all others combined. He saw nothing in it to regret, but everything to honor and applaud.

Mr. B. would vote for the whole of the resolutions, not because he would surrender the right of Maine or the dignity of the United States, but because they would best attain the great end in view, which was a just and honorable termination of the negotiation.

Mr. RIVES said: It seems to me that the resolutions would be certainly incomplete if we strike out either the whole or part of the fourth resolution. The Senator from Maine has viewed this subject under a misconception of the true character of the controversy. He asks, why say anything to Maine; why not leave her to her own honor and discretion? Sir, I hold that, while almost the whole of these resolutions are taken up in asserting the rights of Maine, we may be allowed to intimate to her what we consider to be her duty in relation to those rights. Of the first three resolutions asserting the rights of Maine, the first denies the right of Britain to exclusive jurisdiction over this territory. The second declares that Maine is authorized to expel trespassers on this territory. The third declares that, if Great Britain persist in asserting her claim of exclusive jurisdiction by a military occupation of the territory, in that case the United States are bound to sustain Maine, and it will be considered as an invasion, demanding of this Government to call out the military force of the whole country to repel it.

When we have done all this in the assertion of the rights of Maine, shall we be silent in closing, with respect to what we consider her duty in relation to withdrawing her military force? Call it civil posse, or what you please, shall we not say that, if Great Britain refrain from the forcible assertion of exclusive jurisdiction, we must insist upon it as a case of duty in Maine to manifest like forbearance, and that, if she will not do so, there is no obligation resting on the United States to sustain her by military aid? All the arguments which have been brought to bear against the resolution are founded on misconceptions of its character. Gentlemen put it on the ground of invasion. But the resolution, on the contrary, supposes that Britain will withdraw, and, in that case, if Maine refuse to withdraw also, this Government is not bound to sustain her by military aid. The power of peace and war is lodged in the hands of the National Government, and it is not the right of a State to make war in spite of the nation. Maine has applied to the Government for defense, and ought to expect the Government to prescribe in what manner and under what circumstances that defense will be afforded.

No one is more ready than I to declare the rights of Maine to this territory, and I am ready to give my utmost support in the maintenance of those rights. But this question is to be decided by Congress, the great arbiter in such cases; and it is not for Maine herself to decide it. And it appears to me, that if we strike out the latter part of this resolution, we shall seem to acquiesce in the assumption that Maine is to decide this question for the United States.

Sir, Maine, or her Representatives here, has mistaken her remedy. It is yet a matter of negotiation; and let all be brought to bear that can be made to bear on the British Government to induce her to hasten the negotiation and bring it to some issue; and, when that is brought to an end without success, I, for one, shall be ready for a formal declaration of war, for the purpose of sustaining our rights. And let gentlemen bring forward a proposition declaring that this negotiation demands earnest and pressing efforts to bring it to a close, or let it be a proposition for a special mission for that purpose. Its long pendency is a stain on the character of the country; but, till it is terminated, I am against the action of one of the States to precipitate us into a war with a foreign Power. We have done everything to stimulate the Executive to hasten this negotiation. I have not learned what has been done in consequence of the resolutions of Congress at the last session; and I should be glad to know why this matter was not pressed while Canada was in a state of insurrection. I do not know what has been done; but if the Senator from Maine will bring forward a proposition to stimulate the Executive, it shall have my support, or for a special mission to Great Britain, using all the means to bring the controversy to a definitive conclusion; or let it be employed to submit to her a proposition for another arbitration; and if Great Britain will not consent, then, on that supposition, let the Senator bring forward and lay a resolution on the table that the Government of the United States, and not Maine, shall occupy the territory by force.

Mr. WEBSTER said: Concurring, Mr. President, in the general spirit of these resolutions, I should be glad if there could be some modifications made in the latter branch of the fourth and last, so as to insure for it my own approbation, and I should hope the unanimous approbation of the Senate. I cannot vote for it as it now stands. I must say that, in my opinion, there are well-founded objections against it. I concur with the Senator from Missouri in thinking that its sentiment is not constitutional.

Let us see, sir, how this fourth resolution stands. Its words are:

Resolved, That should the British authorities refrain from attempting a military occupation of the territory in dispute, and from enforcing their claim to exclusive jurisdiction over it by arms, then, in the opinion of the Senate, the State of Maine ought, on her part, to pursue a course of similar forbearance. And should she refuse to do so, and determine to settle the controversy for herself by force, the adjustment of which is intrusted under the Constitution to the Federal Government, in such an event there will be no obligation imposed on that Government to sustain her by military aid.

To the latter part of this resolution I entirely object. It is not fragrant of the true spirit of the Constitution of the United States. It seems to imply that, in certain contingencies, we shall leave the State of Maine to carry on alone the war against England. It says that, if she shall not act as we recommend, but shall make use of her own force, we will not aid her. But will that fulfill our whole constitutional duty? Gentlemen say that they will not suffer all the rest of the States to be dragged into a war by Maine. Very well; but, then, neither must Maine herself be allowed to go to war, unless for reasons which shall induce this Government to go to war also. We need not reenact the Constitution; we need not declare that no State can make war with a foreign nation. Hostilities commenced by a State are not lawful war. If a State declare war, it is still no lawful war, and it is, unquestionably, our duty to repress all such hostilities, until this Government is at war itself. It is wholly inadmissible to suppose any case whatever, however contingent or however extreme, in which we may be quiet here, without dereliction of our duty, while one of the States is in arms against a foreign nation. No supposable or imaginable case would allow such a state of things. Yet this seems to be implied in the last branch of this resolution. Hostilities, carried on by State authority, are no more lawful than irregular invasions by multitudes of private and unauthorized individuals. Unquestionably, the duty of this Government is to prevent all such occurrences.

Maine Boundary Question—Mr. Calhoun.

We, therefore, must set out, in the consideration of such subjects, with the conviction of this truth, that no State has a right to make war for itself any more than it has to make war for the whole country; or, as has been expressed, to drag the other States into it.

These resolutions were, of course, drawn up hastily, as time has been short.

Mr. BUCHANAN. They were not drawn up in two days.

Mr. WEBSTER. I meant a compliment to the committee; but if gentlemen reject it, I will take it back. [Laughter.] There may be a state of things by which Maine may be involved in hostilities; and shall we then keep hands off? Shall we neither repress those hostilities, nor make the war our own, but leave her to fight out her own quarrel, in her own way? Sir, what American statesman can maintain such doctrines? This cannot be. We must prevent the war, or carry it on ourselves. And we cannot constitutionally declare by a resolution that we will or will not give her the military aid of this Government. For what is implied in that? That she may go on, and make a little war of her own, in which we may or may not take part, as we shall be advised. This, I repeat, is the constitutional doctrine, fairly to be inferred from this latter branch of the resolution; and I again say that it is a doctrine which I, for one, repudiate altogether. Maine is not our ally; she is a part of ourselves. In whatever relates to our foreign relations, she has no capacity for separate action, and can neither make war nor make peace for herself. If she is invaded, she may repel that invasion, and it will be our duty to hasten to her aid with all our power. If she be not invaded, the power and the duty of vindicating her rights against foreign nations devolve on this Government; and she herself, in the mean time, is to keep the peace.

But I have another objection to this resolution. It seems to carry an imputation against Maine. It implies that there is reason to fear that she may violate her constitutional duty. Now I am not disposed thus to censure her in advance. I will impute to her no such purpose. Where is there any evidence that she "determines to settle the controversy for herself by force," or that she is likely to come to any such determination? Thus far she has made no such attempt. Why, then, should we rebuke her beforehand? Why suppose a case, and that a very improbable one, for no purpose but that of saying that, should it happen, we will reject her, and cast her off? This reproach in advance is unnecessary and unjust.

Why is it not enough to say, sir, that we will support the peace of the United States, that we will protect the interests of all the members of the Union, and vindicate their rights to the soil; that when there shall be a necessity for war, it shall be declared and waged by the whole power of this Government; but that, while there is peace, it shall be maintained by this Government? Sir, I repeat again, that there can be no possible state of things in which this resolution would be constitutional and just. If there is an invasion of Maine, she may repel it, and we must support her; and if Maine invade her peaceable neighbors with hostile forces, it is our duty to be there and prevent such invasion.

Sir, I concur cordially in the peaceful spirit of these resolutions; I would not hold out encouragement to acts which might implicate the peace of the country. But the case made in this fourth resolution is not actual; it is all supposititious. Maine has, as yet, done nothing which ought to be regarded as hostile. Why, then, shall we presume that she will not still do her duty? Is it not a matter of proper respect to the State to take it for granted that, without an admonition or a rebuke from us, she will confine herself to those defensive measures which everybody knows she may rightfully exercise? She has manifested no disposition to maintain exclusive jurisdiction by military occupation; yet that is just the predicament in which this resolution supposes she may hereafter place herself. But why get up a supposed case, in order to chide her, and to threaten her with being left to her fate? I should be glad, Mr. President, to be able to vote for all the resolutions; but I cannot vote for the last, unless this latter clause be stricken out.

Mr. BUCHANAN said: Since these resolutions have been met with extraordinary objections, I will make a few observations further. This body is truly the conservative body of the country; and we are not to be deterred, through fear of giving offense, from marching forward in the course of our duty.

It appears to me that some of the arguments of Senators must of necessity involve the country in war; not a war of the whole country, but a war brought on we know not how nor why. What is the position of the Senator from Mississippi and of the two Senators from Massachusetts? It is, that this is the territory of Maine, and therefore we are to go to war forthwith. They support Maine in the occupation of this territory, and let that proposition be adopted here, and the negotiation is ended, and then war is the immediate and inevitable result.

But has the negotiation ended? I admit there has been long delay. But has not the British Minister told us that he expects a speedy settlement of the main question? But if the negotiation has ended, every Senator knows that war is the immediate result. Senators are wrong on this subject. This disputed territory has never been in the possession of Maine. She never held it. This has been a vexed question ever since the treaty of 1783; and since the rejection of the award of the King of Holland, it has, on our part, been under the control of the treaty-making power of this Government, and Maine has not the right to the exclusive possession of the territory any more than England. It is withdrawn from the jurisdiction of both severally, and is under the joint jurisdiction of this Government and England, for the purpose of settling the controversy. But if this is the territory of Maine, and we are at once to maintain for her its possession, then the negotiation is ended, and we are already in a state of war. Maine has expelled trespassers, and she did right to that extent. But Senators now say the negotiation is ended, that the disputed territory belongs to Maine, and that we are bound by the Constitution to call forth the militia in defense of this territory. Sir, the President, in all this affair, has acted with caution and firmness. He sees the approaching storm. In Maine all parties are excited to the highest pitch, and, if we go there, they are rising by hundreds and by thousands.

It is alleged that a force of four or five thousand men, under the command of Sir John Harvey, is concentrating at the mouth of the Aroostook, and that he has given notice to the land agent of Maine that, unless his men should disperse, he would drive them away; and the hardy freemen of that State are rallying to the rescue. All this the President looks at boldly and calmly, with a fixed determination to support Maine against such an unjust attack; but, having been placed in a position of exalted eminence by the people of the whole country, where duty requires him to stand above the excited feelings so natural to the single State directly interested in the contest, and to view the question in its bearings upon the whole Union, he says that, if Sir John Harvey should withdraw his forces, he will not, in that event, feel himself bound to send the forces of the United States to the support of Maine, should she determine to settle the controversy for herself by arms.

This territory has never been considered for a moment, from 1783 till now, as a part of Maine; and when we pledge ourselves to stand by Maine to the death, is it unkind or unconstitutional for us to adopt the last clause of the fourth resolution? The Senate in that do not say that, even if Maine should do wrong, a contingency might arise in which we would not rush to her rescue. We could not say that, although it would have been constitutional to do so; but we want to tell Maine that we are not under a constitutional obligation to aid her if she take possession of the disputed territory by her own force. And we do not require of her even a simultaneous withdrawal; but the British are to withdraw first; and we say, if they do that, as I hope they will, then we are under no constitutional obligation to sustain Maine in the possession of the territory, if she choose to attempt it by force.

Sir, much as I deprecate war, yet I more dread dishonor; and if Sir John Harvey persist in carrying his threat into execution, the Senate pledge themselves to war. And if we strike out the fourth resolution, and send the other three to Maine, with the speeches of the two Senators from Massachusetts and the Senator from Mississippi, we shall be at war before a fortnight. And if we say to Maine, with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. ALLEN,] we will support you, right or wrong, sir, we shall then be governed by her impulses, we shall be led astray by the enthusiasm of Maine. For her I am prepared to go to war. But I wish to do it under such conditions that there can be no dispute about the justice of our cause. And I am not willing to conclude this proceeding without expressing to Maine our decision that the question is exclusively with us, and not with her. As it regards mere modifications of the resolutions, I am in favor of them as far as they can aid in effecting unanimity. But as far as the principle is concerned—that the question is ours—that I cannot abandon; and on that I had trusted and confidently hoped that we should have unanimity in the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS said: I will add but a word of explanation. The ground taken by the Senator from Pennsylvania represents me as saying the negotiation is at an end. Now, all I desire is, that the Senate may know how and why I said it. I said it had been at an end, and it was so declared, both by this and the British Government; but I did not say that it could not be renewed. I said also, that Great Britain had departed from the original understanding, (of not extending jurisdiction,) because she considered it as no longer binding; and, taking still higher ground, she claimed for herself the sole occupancy of the disputed territory. And this claim has just been asserted, not only by the British Minister here, but by New Brunswick; and by the protocol is now proposed a new arrangement. That is the view which I took of the subject, and the connection in which I mentioned it, not because this arrangement was gone beyond all hope, but that it might be renewed.

As it regards the Constitution, the difference between the Senator and myself is this: he does not at all controvert the position which I assumed, that if a State is invaded, it is then both the right of a State to repel it, and the duty of this Government to aid in repelling it. Nothing can be clearer than this. It is plain common sense. But the difference between us is, that he says Maine is not invaded, but I say it is, and that is the whole difference between us. And if he thinks that I would justify Maine in going out of the territory to court a controversy, he is under a mistake. I spoke of her right to repel invasion. And now, how am I answered? Does any gentleman say that this is not the territory of Maine? No, sir, not one. But the Senator from Pennsylvania avoids this by saying Maine never had possession of it. But is it so? He says that the possession of it has not been held since 1783. But how does this agree with the facts? Massachusetts surveyed the territory, laid out towns upon it, and disposed of portions of it thirty years ago, as far back as 1806, exercising jurisdiction, as a part of the United States, over all the wild territory. And now can you say, after such acts as these, that there is and has been no jurisdiction and no possession? Such are the facts, and such is the way in which the subject presents itself here.

Mr. CALHOUN. I will recall the attention of the Senate to the present state of the facts, which I regard as most important of all at this time. It is a fact that Maine has now possession of the disputed territory; that is, a part. It is another fact, the Governor of New Brunswick threatens to remove the Maine forces by the British forces. And now the great object is to relieve the country from present difficulty. And where is the difficulty? New Brunswick feels herself under orders to expel the forces of Maine out of the territory. Maine has gone there merely to drive out trespassers, but she cannot retire under this menace. This is the naked state of the facts, and, unless something is done, New Brunswick will execute her threats. And what is to be done? This resolution is one expedient, and it goes on the ground that if New Brunswick will abstain, Maine is to retire. This will save the honor of both sides. And what is proposed on the other side? To insist that Maine has now a right to the possession: gentlemen who take that ground intend war, and it will come. And what is another view of the subject taken by one of the Senators from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER?] It is, that Maine is not to be known in this affair any more than a county; and it intimates that this county cannot be at the same time in the opposite relations of war and peace, (with the principal and subordinates of another power,) and that we have a right to go and drive off the Maine forces without consulting Maine at all.

I know that all this arises from the Senator's peculiar views, or from his political system. But we differ on these points. And although this is the boundary of the United States, and is so of Maine, the views of the Senator on these points must be abhorrent to every man who does not agree with him in his peculiar sentiments.

Sir, we must meet this point of honor, (between Maine and New Brunswick,) and the committee have done well to say that New Brunswick is to withdraw, and then Maine is to withdraw. That is the best proposition.

Mr. YOUNG now moved to strike out the last clause of the fourth resolution, and insert:

And leave the ultimate adjustment of her grievances to the Government of the United States, to which it rightfully and constitutionally belongs.

Mr. CALHOUN. This is judiciously worded; but it will not reach the point. We ask New Brunswick to abstain from her avowed determination; and if she does this, Maine ought to withdraw. I prefer, therefore, the original clause as it came from the committee; it is to the point; and when I heard the substitute for it, I was still more decidedly in its favor; for, if that does not mean the same thing, it means nothing at all. And we had better not disguise our meaning on the point at issue, it is a point of honor; for Maine is threatened, and New Brunswick has given the threat; so that neither can retire unless we interpose. We therefore come forward, and, after due deliberation, we adopt the views of the Executive in this matter. Sir, in this question is peace or war. There is no safety but in adopting the views of the committee in conjunction with the opinions of the Executive.

Mr. WEBSTER. It is easy, sir, to say that any question involves peace or war; and I do not know how far any subject may be circumscribed and narrowed, if it respect our foreign relations, and yet not incur the charge of involving, by possibility, peace or war. But I cannot think that on the question of this amendment to this fourth resolution, hangs the great issue of peace or war. The gentleman calls on me for a substitute. I think the resolutions sufficiently expressive without the last clause of the fourth. But, if anything is needed in place of that clause, I think that the clause proposed by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. Young] is vastly preferable to the original clause, and that it may obtain the general approbation, and perhaps the unanimous vote of the Senate.

And what is the difference? Sir, it is quite apparent. The resolution now says that if the British authorities shall withdraw their troops, and Maine shall not withdraw hers, but undertake to settle the controversy herself, then this Government will not be under obligation to sustain her by military force. But the clause proposed by the member from Illinois leaves out all this, and asserts the duty and the power of this Government over the whole subject. The amendment of the member from Illinois proposes to add to the first branch of the resolution these words: "Leaving to the Government of the United States, to which it properly belongs, the redress of her grievances." And, I ask, which reads most like the Constitution of the United States?

The Senator from South Carolina seems to think that this is an infringement of I know not what right of a State, and a measure growing out of my own peculiar and singular views. Does he mean that a State has a right to make war? Or, if it should, does he deny our power and our duty to prevent it?

Mr. CALHOUN. There are two ways of preventing it. One is to invite Maine to retire; the other is to drive her off, which we might do if she is to be regarded only as a county. But, as Maine is a State, we have not that right, although we may apply to her the moral force of this Government.

Mr. WEBSTER. A moral force is not political power. We are clothed with political power, which it is our duty to exercise on all proper occasions, as well to preserve the peace of the country as to maintain its rights. But I have not said that Maine was no more than a county. All I said was, that we could have no war by States any more than by counties or by multitudes of armed persons, acting without any authority at all.

Mr. CALHOUN. Certainly not.

Mr. WEBSTER. Then it is our business to prevent it. If there be hostilities not carried on by the authority of this Government, they are to be suppressed. I did not say that we were to drive Maine out of the Union; but the reverse. I said that we must prevent war, unless authorized by this Government, by such means as the case should call for, when it should happen; and that if we cannot prevent such war, then we cannot execute the Constitution. It is our duty—the duty of this Government, and of nobody else—to say when there shall be war, and when there shall be peace. And, in the next place, what I have objected to in the resolution is the penalty which is there hypothetically threatened against Maine; a threat for which I see no cause and no reason.

Mr. CALHOUN. I did not suppose that the question of war or peace was involved in the words of the resolution, but in the principle on which it is based. The resolution is better than the amendment, because it bears more directly on the point of honor at issue, and on which turns the difficulty. And what I mean to assert is, that the military occupation by Maine of that territory is absolutely inconsistent with peace.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is Maine to withdraw her force under existing circumstances?

Mr. CALHOUN. Certainly not. Maine has a right to retain her military force while she remains under a threat.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What I wish to say is, that the military force of Maine is now under a threat, and whenever that threat shall be withdrawn, Maine can have no inducement to retain her military force in the territory; and it was, therefore, that I argued that it was best to leave Maine, on this point, to her own discretion.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky. These resolutions were not hastily drawn up by the committee, but after a full examination and consideration of the subject; and I must say that, after all that has been said, I still adhere to them as they are. I believe that peace depends on our firmness here at Washington, and directed to Maine. Gentlemen have argued as if there was an actual invasion; but if it is so, let them come out boldly and propose a declaration of war. Sir, there is no invasion; at least none such as the Constitution contemplates in the way of hostility to this Government. When the Constitution speaks of invasion, and of the right of a State to call on this Government for its repulsion, the Constitution means that an uncontroverted, settled territory is invaded: but is that now the case? The Senator from Massachusetts says that this is the acknowledged territory of Maine: but acknowledged by whom? It is by one of the parties. And now let us suppose that Great Britain is equally unanimous as to her right to the territory as we are to ours: might not Britain then say that Maine's going into the Aroostook country was an invasion, and that it imposed on the British Government the duty of repelling it? There are two parties in this controversy, and the other party may be under a conviction that the territory is hers, as clear as our own. It is in dispute; and, till that is settled, what has taken place cannot be an invasion which this Government is bound to repel.

But we are asked, can a State make war? Yes she can, in fact; and I wish she may not be at war at this moment. Can we deny the fact that ten thousand militia, with arms in their hands, and sent by Maine upon Frederickton, would be war upon New Brunswick? Who can deny it? It is not a constitutional, legitimate war; but it is war ipso facto, and it is against that that I wish the Legislature and the country to guard. And what is the fact? Great Britain has not invaded this territory; but Maine has invaded it, with all the circumstance and pomp of war, really for a civil purpose; but to the British it may have appeared different, and as a military occupation. She has gone there with one hundred and fifty chosen men, under a sheriff, and with a six-pounder. Afterwards, Sir John Harvey warns them to break up and retire; but the Governor of Maine says "no," and the Legislature make a unanimous call for ten thousand men, who are now assembling in sight almost of the British force at the mouth of the Aroostook. And do we now resort to logic, and think it an impossibility that a State can make war? It is contrary to fact.

And what is presented in the resolutions? The second declares that, if the British shall, with a military force, enter the country with a view to its occupation and exclusive jurisdiction, then we will consider it as an invasion. But no such entry has been made. It has been threatened, but not made. And further, we say, if the British forbear, then Maine also is to forbear; and then we say, if she will not forbear, (and who will say that she ought not?) Maine may continue her military occupation of the territory. And who will say that she is not bound to retire? And if she is bound to do so, are we not manfully to tell her, not that we will not come to her succor, but simply forewarn her that if she refuse to withdraw, then this Government is not bound by the Constitution to aid and succor her? And is not this fair and candid? If gentlemen look at this exasperated state of feeling, can they doubt the danger of war? And whenever we are in war, I am the last man to have peace on any other ground than that of the honor and interest of the country. But it is proposed here simply to say to Maine that she ought to prepare to leave it to this Government to adjust and arrange this matter with a foreign Government; and in her present infuriated state is it not necessary that you should say to her, if you refuse our counsels, and rush headlong into war, you must take the consequences, and we are acquitted of all obligation to follow you?

Sir, I trust the amendment will not be adopted, either to strike out any part of this resolution, or to insert the clause proposed. I saw from the first, that if the Executive and Legislature would now take a bold, manly course, they might avert war. I had great uncertainty in regard to the Executive; but, as far as I know, he has acted with a sincere purpose to preserve the peace of the country, and in this I desire that all may unite.

Mr. ALLEN said: Four years ago, the President recommended what were esteemed hard and harsh measures against a foreign Power, and all who looked at the strength of that Power said, if you pass those resolutions you will have war. But we passed those resolutions notwithstanding all that, and those who were most disposed to avoid them, nevertheless, when the vote was taken, voted for them, and the vote was unanimous, two gentlemen who were against them at night voting on the other side the next morning. And what was the consequence? We refused to pocket the insult, and France paid the money.

At the last session, the Senate, by a unanimous vote, determined that the right to this territory was in Maine. Great Britain has now eighteen thousand regulars and twenty-five thousand Canadians drilled for the field; and when this is done, we are dared with a threat. But is there anything about the question of title to the disputed territory? No, sir; Great Britain has refused to negotiate on that subject. And what do we now hear? When she has prepared her cannon, you hear her for the first time then claim exclusive jurisdiction over the territory; and gentlemen now rise here and say this is a subordinate and unimportant question. Sir, it is now the only question. She has asserted that claim with a threat of force. That is the condition of the question. Sir John Harvey would not say that he would withdraw the trespassers. They were British subjects, and the object was to maintain jurisdiction by personal possession. And the avails of the proceeding are to be put to the disputed territory fund! Britain intends that British subjects shall hold personal possession of that territory, and she therefore backs the intruders with the whole force of the empire to maintain her possession.

The vote was now taken on the question of striking out the last clause of the fourth resolution; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 18, nays 26.

Mr. WEBSTER. I move now, sir, to strike out the last clause of this fourth resolution, and insert the words proposed by the member from Illinois.

Mr. NORVELL suggested that these words might be amended by saying "the vindication of her rights," instead of "the redress of her grievances," so as to read, "and leave the ultimate vindication of her rights to the Government of the United States, to which it rightfully and constitutionally belongs."

Mr. WEBSTER said he liked this change of words, and adopted it with pleasure; and asked to have the whole resolution then read, in order to see how it would stand if thus amended.

The Secretary having read the resolution as proposed by Mr. WEBSTER to be amended,

Mr. WEBSTER said: There, sir, I can understand that; it savors of the true doctrine, correctly describes the duties of Maine and our own duties. It has the spirit of the Constitution in it, and I trust the Senate will adopt it as it stands.

Mr. BUCHANAN said this modification would change entirely the import of the substitute proposed by Mr. Young.

Mr. WEBSTER thought otherwise.

Mr. LINN. I can vote for this; but if blood has been shed, however we may vote, the very instant that blood is drawn by command of British authority, at that instant we shall be in a state of war; and I would say, paralyzed by the tongue that would say nay, and the arm that would not give its aid to Maine. It is a thing, of course, to make patriotic speeches; but any one who knows me will say that I will come up to what I say I will do, and I would go further if I could. And I say again that, whatever we vote now, the very instant that blood is drawn by British authority, that very instant my voice shall be for war.

Sir, I look back on the whole scene of haughtiness and pride which has been enacted upon us by that Government, and the impression from it in no way disposes me to pacific measures towards that Government; and whenever there is a doubt whether we ought to have war or not, whenever such a doubt shall arise, that decides me for war. I look back at the insults and injuries which we have received from that Power, and which neither I nor the country have forgotten, and which, though I am forgiving, I cannot forget; and in the event of a collision, however light, you will find me voting for the extreme measures. Ay, sir, and I look forward, too, at the prospect of our being sold to Great Britain through the medium of her stocks. I am looking for the time when we shall see troops of British noblemen on this side of the Atlantic; and already in this country is there a passion, a love growing up for the point and titles of aristocracy. I believe, therefore, it is a matter of policy to place an insurmountable barrier between the two countries, at least for ten years to come.

The question was now put on Mr. WEBSTER's motion to strike out and insert as above, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 24, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Clay of Alabama, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Foster, Hubbard, Knight, Lyon, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Walker, Webster, White, Williams of Maine, Williams of Mississippi, and Young—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Fulton, King, Linn, Merriek, Morris, Montton, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Sawyer, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, and Wright—21.

The first three resolutions of the Committee on Foreign Relations on this subject were taken together; and agreed to—yeas 44, nays 1, (Mr. RUGGLES.)

The fourth resolution, modified as above, was unanimously agreed to.

Mr. RUGGLES offered as a fifth resolution a declaration that the great and unaccountable procrastination in settling this question was a cause of much regret, and that this Government owed it to the United States and to Maine to require its immediate adjustment.

On the call of Mr. NILES, the resolutions of Congress at the last session on this subject were read, and appeared so strong and decisive (calling for an immediate adjustment of the question) that Mr. DAVIS withdrew his proposition, as not likely to give any additional force to the injunction.

In a report of the proceedings in the Senate on the Maine boundary question, published in the Daily Globe of the 9th instant, the remarks of Mr. BUCHANAN, with several others, were copied from the Intelligencer. The following note to the editors of that paper, making some corrections, escaped us at the time:

TO THE EDITORS.

LANCASTER, March 22, 1839.

GENTLEMEN: There is one error in the sketch of the debate in the Senate on the night of the 1st instant, on the subject of the Maine controversy, which appeared in the tri-weekly Intelligencer of Tuesday last, of sufficient importance to justify correction from me. I am made to say, in the fourth column of the fourth page, when speaking of the proceedings on our northeastern frontier, that "all this the President looks at boldly and manfully, on an exalted eminence, above the feelings of the country." &c. &c. Now, I certainly never used, nor could have used, such an absurd expression. The nearest mode of correction is to state the substance of what I did say, which is as follows:

[The paragraph, as corrected, is given in the foregoing debate.]

I might make some other corrections, such as that I did not say that the boundary question "had been a vexed question ever since the treaty of 1783," and that "this territory had never been considered for a moment, from 1783 till now, as a part of Maine;" having endeavored to prove, and I think successfully, in a report to the Senate on a former occasion, that it did not even begin to be a question at all, until the conferences which preceded the treaty of Ghent; but I forbear to trouble you further.

I make these corrections in no spirit of complaint against the reporter; on the contrary, considering the lateness of the hour and the length of the debate, his sketch is more accurate than could have been reasonably expected.

Yours, very respectfully,

JAMES BUCHANAN.

STATE OF THE FINANCES.

SPEECH OF HON. G. N. BRIGGS, OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 2 and 9, 1839.

The House having under consideration the motion to recommit the report of the Committee of Ways and Means on the state of the Finances—

Mr. BRIGGS said he should not have at this time risen, but for some remarks which had fallen from the honorable gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RHETT] to day, as well as from another gentleman from South Carolina yesterday, [Mr. PICKENS,] which were, indeed, but a continuation of observations of the same kind from the same quarter. The gentleman [Mr. RHETT] had harped upon the tariff and compromise bill, and had declared, with much solemnity, that he should not violate it. Why, who talked, or who had talked of violating it? Who asked for any revision of the tariff? Why were these gentlemen so continually harping on that string? Was that portion of the Union so deeply interested in violating the compromise? He had supposed it was the people of a different portion of the country that had the deepest interest in such a measure; yet they asked for no such thing. The gentleman spoke of the great reluctance with which he should violate the compromise, yet he threw out remarks which very plainly showed that he would be very glad if it were violated. The gentleman had said there were two ways in which this might be done: the one was by direct legislation increasing the rate of duties; the other, by such extravagant expenditure as would create a public debt.

The first of the two gentlemen from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS] had commenced his speech by warmly complimenting the frank and open course of the gentleman from Pennsylvania over the way [Mr. BIDDLE.] He had expressed the liveliest satisfaction at it; had considered the question as one of vital importance, and had called on the country to witness that gentleman's course in regard to it. Any one just entering the House would suppose that some great and leading measure had been moved by one of the parties here; but what did the mighty affair turn out to be? Why, sir, the Committee of Ways and Means had made a report on the finances, and, finding they had fallen into an error of fact, the chairman made a motion to correct that error. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, supposing he had detected other errors, moved to recommit the report, that they might correct any errors it contained! Yet the gentleman declared, in his own emphatic manner, that here was an issue of the most intense interest, and he called upon the party with whom he has recently united himself, to rally, and to vote against this terrible motion to recommit. It had often been said that new converts were usually the most zealous of their sect; and this might possibly account for the burning zeal of the gentleman from South Carolina in forming this new issue, to which he attached such vast importance. It was certainly most singular! Was here any great principle to contend about? Mr. B. could perceive none. But the issue was, at all events, to be made. The gentleman looked beyond the question before the House, and insisted that the true question now was, whether the existing extravagance was to continue, or a wholesome reform was to take its place. The gentleman placed his hopes of reform upon his new friends. But, had he forgotten that the same party on whom he now relied had voted enormous sums for purposes from which it was now proposed to withhold even the ordinary appropriations? Had they not called on the Departments from day to day to see whether they could not conveniently spend a few thousands more on this object, and a few thousands more on that? Had they not, in some cases, made double appropriations? Had the gentleman forgotten the determined resistance they had made to the distribution of the surplus revenue? and, when all the Departments were absolutely gorged until they were in danger of bursting from plethora, had they not held on to the money to the very last, with the grasp of a dying miser? The gentleman ought not to pass over these things. He gave notice to the country, and repeated the oft-repeated note of alarm, and warned the House and the nation that if it should be attempted to reinforce a protecting tariff, the attempt would surely result in the dissolution of the Union. What occasion was there for all this? Why should the gentleman, on this occasion, repeat that note of terror and alarm, and in an octave higher than at former rehearsals? Nobody proposed to disturb the compromise here, although elsewhere such a thing had been suggested; but by none of the party with whom Mr. B. was in the habit of acting; by none of those who were most interested that such measure should succeed.

Mr. B. said he had been particularly impressed by the remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina, when protesting against a revision of the tariff as unconstitutional. And he had been led to contrast the views now expressed by that gentleman with those avowed and maintained by other leading gentlemen from his own State at another time. The gentleman's colleague, [Mr. RHETT,] who had last addressed the House, had made the extraordinary assertion that the first law avowedly passed with a view to protection, had been enacted in 1820, and that the system had not been consummated till 1824. The remark was surprising. In 1816 Mr. B. found on record a speech delivered by a very distinguished gentleman from the State of South Carolina, an authority to which the gentleman in particular would not object, he meant John C. Calhoun, which was perfectly clear and decided in maintaining the propriety of enacting duties expressly with a view to protection. That gentleman had then been a member of this House, and had delivered a most lucid and convincing speech in favor of duties for protection and of internal improvement by the General Government, and had maintained that both measures were calculated to bind the Union together in the strongest bonds. Nay, so far did he go as to advocate a principle now denounced as odious and abominable—the expediency of the minimum: it was contended for both by John C. Calhoun and William Lowndes, both of them the bold and fearless advocates of a protective tariff. Had there ever been a single President of the United States, from the days of Washington to this hour, who had not declared in favor of the principles of protection? Never one. There was no exception, from President Washington to President Jackson. In one of General Jackson's State papers there was to be found a most explicit and labored defense of a protecting tariff. And further: the man who, above all others, had ever been the idol of the South Carolina party—he meant Mr. Jefferson—had used language the strongest of all in favor of the protective policy. That statesman spoke not merely of duties for protection, but duties of protection. In 1816, when the State of South Carolina had been the warm advocate of a protective tariff, and the State of Massachusetts had been opposed to it—it was in that year that Mr. Jefferson, in his famous letter to Benjamin Austin, of Boston, advocated a protective tariff, and said that the opposition to it came from "the Federal aristocrats of the East." Then it was that Mr. Jefferson had maintained that the manufacturer ought to be placed by the side of the merchant and the farmer, and had predicted that the country never would flourish and develop all its energies till that was done. Gentlemen were mistaken if they thought to make the people believe that the tariff was an odious northern measure. Not only the tariff, but internal improvements, now so totally denounced, were of southern origin.

Mr. RHETT here interposed. He was perfectly aware of all that. But the gentleman might save himself the trouble of referring to what gentlemen from South Carolina had said on those subjects. Mr. R. did not care one farthing what they had said, or whether they had advocated a tariff or no. He had his own opinions, and these he should continue to hold and to avow, though Mr. Jefferson, and Mr. Lowndes, and Mr. Calhoun, and all the South Carolina delegation, ay, and Andrew Jackson to boot, had held opinions diametrically opposite.

[At this point of the debate the morning hour expired, and the subject lay over till the next day.]

TUESDAY, February 9, 1839.

The same subject being under consideration—

Mr. BRIGGS said that at the moment when the hour had expired the other morning, he had been interrupted in his remarks by the gentleman from South Carolina. I was proceeding to show in answer to certain statements which had been made here by the two gentlemen from South Carolina, that this principle of the tariff was not, as had been represented in that quarter, a thing of northern origin. I mentioned several distinguished gentlemen from the South whose opinions in favor of a protective tariff and of internal improvements were on record. The gentleman who interrupted me said that he cared not for those opinions—that he disregarded them entirely, and he seemed to treat with lofty scorn the opinions of such men as William Lowndes, John C. Calhoun, Robert Y. Hayne, Thomas Jefferson, ay, sir, and even Andrew Jackson. This may be all so. The gentleman may hold these opinions in light estimation, but that does not alter the fact. The opinions of the distinguished statesmen to whom I have alluded are upon record, and the gentleman cannot nullify or expunge them. They are written down by the pen of history, and whatever may be the course of things hereafter, there they will stand. The gentleman intimated that it was improper to refer to such opinions in this way. They were referred to by him in no spirit of disrespect to the gentleman who entertained such opinions, for he respected them all, although probably some of them might have changed their views. But when gentlemen coming from the same quarter of the Union and the same State rise and avow opinions directly opposite, and charge upon the members from other sections of the Union the introduction and support of a system which they say operates unjustly, which is a system of oppression and fraud, is it inappropriate for the latter to allude to the opinions coming from the same section of the country as those who prefer such charges? Suppose they are right. Should it not rather lead to forbearance in their minds towards us, that the system originated with them and not with us?

But, sir, the allusion to these opinions is correct and proper in another point of view. The gentleman from South Carolina who last spoke declared, with all apparent seriousness, and with his usual ardor, that the principle of a protective tariff was never recognized until the year 1820, when it was applied to the article of iron. Now, was it not proper for me to show that this great principle had been discussed at an earlier period? I allude to these opinions not only as regarded the subject of the tariff, but also that of internal improvement. And in addition to the names I have mentioned, I give the name of another distinguished gentleman from South Carolina who advocated internal improvements, and who advocated, amongst others, that which has been denounced as being the worst of all of them—the Cumberland road bill. I allude to George McDuffie, who, with all the powers of his great mind, advocated appropriations for that work and others. This very Cumberland road originated with the administration of Mr. Jefferson, and received the sanction of his signature.

I will now advert briefly to extracts from messages of the several Presidents of the United States, beginning with the message of George Washington, in the year 1796. He says:

"Congress have repeatedly, and not without success, directed their attention to the encouragement of domestic manufactures. The object is of too great consequence not to insure a continuance of their efforts in every way which shall appear eligible."

This is the opinion expressed by that great man so far back as the year 1796; and yet the gentleman from South Carolina tells us that the principle of protection was not recognized until the year 1820.

Well, sir, what further? In the year 1806, at a time when there was a large amount of money flowing into the Treasury, Mr. Jefferson, speaking of the manner in which the surplus should be disposed of, asks:

"Shall we suppress the impost, and give that advantage to foreign over domestic manufactures?"

Again: in the year 1808, Mr. Jefferson holds the following language, and I call the particular attention of my southern friends to this extract:

"The situation into which we have been forced has impelled us to apply a portion of our industry and capital to internal manufactures and improvements. The extent of this conviction is daily increasing, and little doubt remains that the establishments formed and forming will, under the auspices of cheaper materials and subsistence, the freedom of labor from taxation with us, and of protecting duties and prohibitions, become permanent."

And yet the gentleman from South Carolina had learned from the history of this protective principle that it never was recognized by this Government until the year 1820, when it was applied to iron.

President Madison, in the year 1809, says:

"It will be worthy of their just and provident care to make such further alterations in the laws as will more especially foster and protect the several branches of manufactures which have been recently instituted or extended by the laudable exertions of our citizens."

Thus it appears that this system now denounced in the broadest terms by the two gentlemen from South Carolina—and I notice this merely by way of defense—this very principle, I say, has been recognized from the establishment of the Constitution of the United States; has been recommended, and from time to time pressed on the consideration of Congress, by the distinguished citizens of the South who have presided over the destinies of this country. This, in connection with the fact stated the other day by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BRIDLE,] that the preamble of the second act passed under the Constitution declares it to be necessary for the support of Government, and for the encouragement and protection of manufactures, that duties be laid, shows most clearly what have been the opinions of statesmen from the southern portion of this Confederacy. Yet gentlemen rise up on this floor, again and again, and denounce the system as having originated with one section of the Union, and founded in oppression and fraud.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS] talked about an effort to burn this principle of protection into the Constitution. To burn it into the Constitution! No, sir; it is more deeply fixed in that instrument. It was ingrafted by men who framed that Constitution, and they give their opinions in the preamble of the act to which I have alluded.

But, sir, the matter does not rest here. So far back as the year 1808, it was a favorite and popular topic in the South; in the Old Dominion it was so. You will find that the subject of protection to manufactures was a popular subject at Fourth of July celebrations and at other public meetings in the State of Virginia.

Amongst other things of a very patriotic nature, we find the following extract from an address issued at Richmond, Virginia, in 1808, and signed by William H. Cabell, W. Wirt, William Fouché, sr., Peyton Randolph, and Thomas Ritchie:

"Perhaps it is no wild supposition to conceive that even if the present attacks upon our trade should blow over, Congress may adopt the policy of encouraging our manufactures by rather higher duties on imported articles of Europe. To keep ourselves from being altogether dependent on Europe for our clothing, Congress may adopt this course if they should discover from experience of the intermediate time, that we have really the inclination and the spirit to clothe ourselves."

Thus, (Mr. B. continued,) in the year 1808 was the sentiment promulgated to the people of Virginia, by a committee of citizens formed to take into consideration this identical subject, and, amongst the number was the venerable editor of the Richmond Enquirer, who now, I believe, is not so much devoted to the American system. But I will not trespass further in allusion to this part of the subject. I said before that my remarks on this point were not made with a view to reargue the question of tariff.

Mr. DROMGOOLE here rose and explained that the opinions which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BRIGGS] had indicated, were not the opinions of the people of Virginia.

Mr. BRIGGS. I have not stated this to be the opinion of Virginia at this day. I have spoken of past times—of that period when gentlemen coming from the same section of country as those now most opposed to the protective system, were in favor of it; of those days to which they allude as being the golden days of this Republic; of those days when pure American principles prevailed through the land; of those days when Jefferson and his copatriots guided the destinies of the Republic; and I allude to those times and to those men to show that the great principles of protection and internal improvement were the great republican principles of that day. Sir, they are so now; and however it may suit political or party purposes to raise a cry against them, they will continue to be so whilst the pillars of the Constitution shall stand firm on their deep foundations.

But, sir, connected with this outcry is the kindred charge of extravagance of appropriations. And the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS] rallies his new friends, and bids them come to the rescue to save the Government from the consequences of these extravagant expenditures. And he has been so magnanimous as to refer to appropriations for past years, as having been made in total disregard of the interests of the Confederacy. Now, that there have been extravagant appropriations, which ought to be corrected, I am not about to deny. But I have one remark to make. If such extravagant appropriations have been made, they are not to be traced exclusively to one party or the other. They cannot, with justice, be thrown by the Executive on Congress; neither can the majority or minority of Congress, with propriety, be made exclusively responsible for them. It is said, in one quarter, that the recommendations of the Executive have been disregarded, and that Congress has gone beyond those recommendations, and appropriated millions more than had been asked for. Some days since, sir, we passed appropriation bills to the amount of some two or three millions. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, on being inquired of, says that five or six hundred thousand dollars of that amount have been appropriated which were not embraced in the estimates, but which were called for at subsequent periods by official communications.

25TH CONG...3D SESS.

It has been charged that the extravagance of appropriations is to be traced to the Opposition in Congress. This is a singular contradiction: The Opposition, for twelve years, have been in a minority in this House, and yet to them is attributed the charge of extravagance and waste. As a member of the Opposition, I have voted liberally for objects of appropriation, when I believed them to be just and proper, and I still intend to do so. But when gentlemen charge this responsibility upon the Opposition, I say it is absurd in the extreme. The Administration have the power, whilst in a majority here, to prevent any and every appropriation; and they must not hope thus to escape from a just responsibility. I have not had time to look closely into these matters, but I have before me a few cases to which I will call your attention.

The matter of the $3,000,000 appropriation will be in the recollection of every member of this House; all who were here at that time; and also of the people of the country. It will be recollected that, at the close of the session, four years ago, upon the last night, there was an amendment appended to the fortification bill, appropriating the large sum of $3,000,000, to be placed in the hands of the Executive, for the defense of the United States. That appropriation was opposed, with few exceptions, by all the Opposition members, and it was supported by the members of the majority. It passed this House, but was defeated in another branch of Congress. I allude to it now, to show that the Opposition, at all events, was not chargeable with extravagance in that instance, where the appropriation was made, as many believed, in direct violation of the Constitution, and where it was proposed that a large sum of money, appropriated without specification, should be placed in the hands of the Executive, and yielded up to him for such disposition as he might think proper.

Again: Two years ago an amendment was reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to one of the appropriation bills, appropriating $400,000 to launch and equip the ship Pennsylvania. It was the session with which terminated the administration of General Jackson; and some of his friends seemed to think it was necessary to wind up the term of his official service, that this great vessel—this leviathan of the Navy—should lave her huge sides in the waters of the Atlantic; they urged that she ought to be sent abroad over the world, and exhibited to the nations of Europe, as an emblem of the power and might of the people of this Union. The bill came into the House; the yeas and nays were taken on the amendment upon concurring with the Committee of the Whole in this enormous appropriation. There were one hundred and twenty-five votes against the appropriation, and out of that number sixty-seven were Opposition votes; and of the number of votes on the other side, a very few were those of Opposition members. The appropriation was defeated by the joint votes of the members of the two parties; but the Opposition votes outnumbered those of the other side. Afterwards it came up in the shape of an amendment from the Senate, though reduced to the sum of $100,000; and I believe it will be found that a larger proportion of the friends of the Administration voted in favor of it, than of the Opposition. In my opinion, the whole appropriation was extravagant and unnecessary. The public service did not require it to be done.

There is another fact. At the next succeeding session of Congress, when the Treasury of the country was overflowing with millions, when the ingenuity of certain gentlemen of Congress was put to the test to use the money by any means short of having it thrown back again to the people from whom it came, appropriations for fortifications were made to an amount double that which was called for. In addition to this, a bill was reported at another end of the Capitol for an entire new system of fortifications, the whole cost of which could not have been less than one hundred million dollars; and that bill, too, came from a quarter where there was a constant boast of economy. It met with no favor from the Opposition members of this House; and the journals of that day will show that appropriations for roads, rivers, and harbors, were liberally voted for by members of both parties. At that time, gentlemen could see a propriety in such appropriations; but a change has suddenly come over them. These fortifications, which were then so necessary; and when, although on the eve of a war, as we supposed, we were told we scarcely had a gun mounted in any fort, and the necessity was urged upon us not only of completing the old fortifications, but of beginning new ones—these appropriations are now to be suddenly abandoned. How is this? The appropriations for fortifications, I understand, are to be suspended this year in anticipation that a new mode of harbor and coast defense is to be adopted. Whether the House will be of that opinion or not remains yet to be seen. This new economy in appropriations is to be applied to your numerous harbors and extended coasts. The lights of the ocean, which guide the sea-tossed mariner to a place of safety, are to be extinguished; and he is to be given over to the darkness of midnight and the fury of the storm. The mouths of your rivers are to be left obstructed; the harbors upon your lakes are to be abandoned; and the multitudes that ride upon those rough and tempestuous inland seas are to be given up to the mercy of the elements. Thousands of lives and untold millions of property on your great rivers are to be exposed to snags and sawyers. All, all, are suddenly to be abandoned. Let me tell gentlemen that, whatever temporary object they may hope to gain by this course, they may rely upon it that the people will look into these matters. They are matters which deeply concern them. They require the reasonable and necessary appropriations for these great and important objects, and they will have them.

Sir, I have already stated that what I have said in regard to these questions of tariff and internal improvements has been said defensively. Gentlemen so often rise on this floor, (especially those honorable gentlemen from South Carolina who have spoken,) and reiterate charges of injustice, and oppression, and fraud, in connection with the tariff, that justice has seemed to me to demand that those charges should be repelled. I do not admit the position which gentlemen here seem to take for granted, that this system is oppressive and unjust. I deny it; and I will not fear, on a proper occasion, to maintain and prove the position that the South has never paid anything under this system beyond the just portion which fell to her in contributing to the expenses of the Government. I hold this to be capable of the clearest demonstration.

But, sir, although we at the North are so deeply interested in the preservation of this system, we do not come here with any view to reiterate this question of the tariff; and I do not know why gentlemen who profess to regard the principles of the compromise bill as sacred (although neither I, nor any Representative from the State which I in part represent, voted for it) whilst we are silent and make no move, should scarcely ever speak without allusion to that agitating topic. The gentleman the other day manifested what seemed to be a morbid sensibility that it might be agitated. Though he would not on any account do it himself, yet he thought it manifest how easy it would be to do so.

Sir, we do not propose to agitate this matter before the exigency comes that shall render it necessary to do so. When that exigency shall come, I do not suffer myself to doubt that this House will enter upon that great subject with the calmness, candor, and wisdom which become those who are intrusted with the interests of a great people. I deprecate entering upon it in advance. I think that we should in every way endeavor to calm the rising tempest, to cultivate a kind and brotherly feeling, a friendly and generous intercourse; so that, when the great occasion shall arise for the discussion of questions so exciting in their nature, we may enter upon it with the calmness which becomes the importance of the subject, and the character of those who are to decide upon it. The manufacturers of this country (I speak of that portion of country which I represent) desire, of all things, stability and certainty; moderate protection, with certainty in the laws, would be preferable to higher duties, with perpetual fluctuation and change. They desire to see the time come when they can lay in a stock of cotton and wool, with the certainty that the existing laws will not be changed before the raw material can be wrought into fabric for the market. They ask from you nothing unreasonable—they want nothing that is unjust. But they do say that the institutions in which they have invested such vast amounts of capital, which have been invited into existence and reared up under the protecting auspices of this Government, should still be protected; and they say that it would be suicidal in the extreme for you to raise your hand against them. They do not look to such an event—they do not expect it. A just Government can do no such thing, a wise and paternal one will not do it.

EXPULSION OF MR. DUNCAN.

SPEECH OF HON. HIRAM GRAY,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 21, 1839,

On the resolution of Mr. PRENTISS to expel Mr. DUNCAN from his seat.

Mr. GRAY said he did not rise for the purpose of debating, but for the purpose of ending the debate, which he believed was uselessly consuming the time of the House. The resolution under consideration involves three questions. One is whether the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SOUTHGATE] have misrepresented the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DUNCAN.]

Mr. STANLY. There is no such question.

Mr. GRAY. I think otherwise. The next question is, whether the gentleman from Ohio, if he has not been misrepresented, is justifiable, and if not justifiable, the third question would be, what ought to be done in the premises? And when these questions are disposed of, another arises; and that is, whether the House has the constitutional power to deal with a member for what he may say through the columns of the press in relation to another member; and if all these questions be so determined as to present a case clear of constitutional difficulties, then it will be claimed that before the House can proceed to try this recent insult against its dignity and character, it must proceed to the trial of an older case, entitled by every consideration to be first considered. I allude to a case that occurred at the last session, and not yet disposed of.

Mr. WISE said that if the gentleman would not move the previous question, he intended to raise the question whether he had been reported here as guilty of murder, for having borne a challenge out of doors. The House was about to take, not retributive justice, but preventive justice. If Mr. W. was bound by the law, he would submit to the law; but he said to this House, either protect me, or restore to me the arms of the cavalier, and I will protect myself. He was ready to go to the penitentiary, if the House choose to send him there.

Mr. GRAY. I am not disposed to withhold or extend to the gentleman the arms of the cavalier; whether he has them or not is quite unimportant. I was saying, sir, if the present case be urged, there is an older and more important one that should be first considered; one in which the life of a member has been sacrificed; and believing, as I do, that the short time remaining of the session is insufficient to consider either, for the purpose of disposing of the whole matter, I move that the resolution be laid on the table; and upon that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken and lost; there being—yeas 83, nays 91.

Mr. GRAY said the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. PRENTISS] had seen fit to allude to him as the defender of the gentleman from Ohio,

25TH CONG....3D SESS.

Wisconsin Contested Election—Mr. Cushing.

Ho. OF REPS.

[Mr. DUNCAN,] and has said that he had not read and hence had misapprehended his resolution. As a test whether he or the gentleman from Mississippi had misapprehended the resolution, he submitted to him whether, if a committee be raised, the gentleman from Ohio would not have the right, in justification of his publication, to establish, by any competent testimony, that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SOUTHCARE] had spoken, as published, of him what was not true? and if he should succeed in the proof, could any man, or this House, ever gain say the right of the gentleman from Ohio to publish to the world that they had misrepresented him? Certainly it would not be pretended that because they were members of this House they could speak and publish as having spoken upon this floor, in all cases, with impunity; and that the dignity of this House, so much talked and so little cared about, would protect its members from exposure for misrepresenting any one, a fellow-member or a stranger. I do not pretend to say who is the aggressor in this instance; that is not now a question under consideration. I now ask the gentleman from Mississippi whether I have misunderstood his resolution, and submit whether he has not himself misunderstood it? He surely has, if he has entertained the idea that under it the gentleman from Ohio would not have the right to justify his publication by proving its truth.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. PRENTISS] entirely misunderstood me if he supposed I was defending the gentleman from Ohio. I have not attempted it, and shall not. It would place me in the attitude of defending certain gentlemen of the Opposition, which I have not the capacity or disposition to do. Much concern is all at once felt for the honor and dignity of this House by a party, members of which have done more to impair the honor, dignity, and character of this House, and the nation, than any publication sent into it from out of doors.

Gentlemen in favor of this resolution seem to suppose that members of this House have the right to say of others what they please, provided it be said upon the floor, in debate; and that the humble right to reply, through the columns of the public journals, is a contempt, unless it be in courteous language, however uncourteous the attack to which the reply is made. Gentlemen here, in many instances, (in my judgment very improperly,) speak of persons out of the House in language as offensive as that used by the gentleman from Ohio.

The President of the United States, elected by a large majority of the suffrages of the American people, has been, within a few days, charged, upon this floor, charged with living in luxury and idleness in the White House, and basely pandering to the corrupt views of a few that desire equally to divide the private property of the people, without regard to those by whose honest industry it was earned. A baser libel has not been uttered on this floor, or elsewhere, or a greater indignity offered to the judgment of the people. No man, whose opinions or actions are the subject of consideration on this floor, is spared from the most odious epithets that can be formed from the English language. No virtue on his part shields him from attack, and perfect innocence scarcely extenuates. The right thus to speak is accorded to all, each placing himself for trial at the bar of public opinion for what he says of persons out of the House—for his abuse of the constitutional freedom in debate.

But the dignity of this House is otherwise injured and its character impaired. Its power has been set at defiance. During the present Congress the presiding officer of the House, while presiding over the deliberations of this body, has been called the supple tool of the "occupant of the White House" for corrupt and dishonest purposes. The gentlemen now zealous to maintain the dignity and character of this House did not then feel so shocked as to offer a resolution to reprimand or expel. A member of this House has refused to vote, and openly defied the power of the House to compel him to vote. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. PRENTISS] nor his friends were not then so tenacious of their dignity and the dignity and character of the House; but when any one, not of their party, upon his own responsibility, and out of the House, publishes even a member of their party, the dignity and character of the House and the dignity and character of the nation are at once assailed in the person of a partisan friend. Publications of this kind are not new; similar ones were made some years since by Cage and Plummer, of Mississippi, one a member and the other not a member of this House; by Jarvis and Smith, of Maine; and more recently by two members of this House. Each of these publications were as severe as the present one, and no gentleman felt himself called upon to draw the attention of the House to the subject. I do not wish to be understood as defending these publications any further than is necessary to rescue the character of the person attacked from the effect of misrepresentation. I repudiate, as much as any one, the use of the language adopted by the gentleman from Ohio. The words "liar and scoundrel" are dignified too much when elevated to a use upon this floor, or applied by one member to another. Sir, if the precepts of the school in which I was educated should be adopted here, instead of the "code of honor," the words liar and scoundrel would never be used. When I am satisfied that a man is a liar and a scoundrel, I am at the same time satisfied of another thing; and that is, that he is not worthy of the notice of a gentleman. To call him so, neither degrades him nor elevates a gentleman; but it degrades a gentleman and elevates him; it brings them in contact with each other, which can never be done without imparting each to the other a little of the influence of their respective characters. I was not educated to respect this code of honor, that avoids discretion, and does injustice to our better feelings; that violates the laws of the land and the mandates of God. I am frank to say that I think discretion the better part of valor; and if all here would thus think and thus act, we would hear less empty vaunting, less of boasted chivalry and of the arms of the cavalier, that creates disgust in one portion of the Union, and is of doubtful credit in another.

Who resort to the language we have heard here, but gentlemen who acknowledge "the code of honor" as binding upon their conduct? Not an instance can be cited during the present session of exceptional language but by gentlemen who acknowledge the supremacy of the "code of honor," and who borrow occasionally from the vocabulary of the blackguard's language, to express their hatred of their adversary, and sufficiently strong and abusive to throw off upon their opponent the responsibility of making the call. I have said that I do not defend the language of the gentleman from Ohio; if, however, he has been wantonly misrepresented, he has the right to say so, and publish it as extensively as he pleases. The choice of language is a matter of taste, in relation to which the power of the House cannot be interposed. Surely the House would not exercise its authority in a mere matter of rhetoric, a choice between words, and compel the adoption of the one or the other; that is a mere matter of taste, in relation to which every one is left free to judge, and choose for himself. Public opinion must and will correct these evils. If a sentence be ungrammatical, the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. KENNEDY,] highly qualified, and always ready, will "do it into English." It is not from publications made out of the House, and sent into it, that its dignity and character is to be lost or impaired; but it is from remarks made here, and published to the world, that this body loses its dignity and its character. Sir, to this and the other branch of Congress, the State Legislatures look for example, and what is the example set them? It is to insult the dignity of their body, by insulting their Presiding Officer—the man they have themselves elected to preside over them, and refuse to vote, and set the power of the House at defiance. These, sir, are some of the numerous scenes that have transpired here, which I trust will only be remembered to be disapproved of. When I was last up, I moved to lay the resolution on the table, for want of time to discuss it. The gentleman from Mississippi thought it singular I should make such a motion; whether he thought my motives pure or not, I appeal to the country if I was not right.

Mr. PRENTISS disclaimed the slightest intention to impugn the motives of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GRAY said he did not intend to be understood as saying that the gentleman had impugned his motives; and I now, with great confidence that I am right, appeal to the House, and to the recollection of the oldest members in it, to bear me out in the assertion that no question of privilege was ever tried and disposed of in eight days, which is all that remains of the session. We have much important business on hand that must be passed over for want of time to do it. Should this matter be considered of sufficient importance to ride over the pressing business of the country, I again say, and I say it in no offensive sense to any one, that there is a question of privilege of a more serious character, which has precedence in point of time and importance; it is among the unfinished business of last session; it is a case viewed differently in different parts of the Union; it is one in which many conscientiously feel a deep interest. I speak of it in the language of my constituents and in the language of the law. And, sir, I ask gentlemen, who seem to be horror-stricken at this publication, before they give it precedence over the all-important business of the country, and the still higher question of privilege pending at the last session, to compare the two, if they can magnify the present case into a comparison; and a moment's reflection will show that if this was wrong, that was foul; if this is an insult, that was murder.

WISCONSIN CONTESTED ELECTION.

REMARKS OF HON. C. CUSHING,
OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 3, 1839,

On the Wisconsin contested election.

Mr. CUSHING said that his opinion of the present case was founded on the facts proved or admitted on all hands, and on the provisions of law contained in the statute-book. So far as he knew anything of the question, it was, indeed, a pure question of law upon the facts reported to the House. These were the true elements out of which a right judgment is to be formed as to the competing claims of the two gentlemen who respectively claim the seat. In briefly expressing his views on the subject, he should begin by collating the material facts in what he conceived to be the natural and proper course, and then apply to them the pertinent provisions and principles of law.

Mr. Doty comes here and presents the following certificate:

TERRITORY OF WISCONSIN, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.

To all to whom these presents shall come greeting:

This is to certify that, at an election held in the Territory of Wisconsin on the 10th day of September last, in conformity with the act of Congress establishing the territorial government, and the laws of the said Territory, James Duane Doty received the highest number of votes for the office of Delegate to Congress of the United States, and is therefore declared to be duly elected.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand, and caused the great seal of the Territory to be affixed. Done at Mineral Point this 27th day of October, in the year of our Lord 1838.

HENRY DODGE.

This certificate, it is admitted, is a true one; that is, at an election held in Wisconsin in September last, in conformity with the act of Congress establishing the territorial government and the laws of said Territory, Mr. Doty was chosen to be its Delegate in Congress. Was he elected for one year or for two years? Does his term of service apply to the present (the Twenty-Fifth) Congress, or to the next? That is the first question for the House to decide; for, as Mr. Doty claims a seat in the present Congress, he must make good that claim, and this upon the strength of his own title, not upon the defects, real or supposed, in the title of Mr. Jones.

Mr. C. said the first thing to be remarked on the face of the certificate was its absolute silence in regard to the tenure of the office, and the period of its beginning or close. It does not set forth that Mr. Doty is elected a Delegate for the term of two years from the date of the certificate, in conformity with the provisions of the act of 1819, for the Territory of Michigan.

Nor was any legal inference deducible from the fact of its being dated in October. He (Mr. C.) held a certificate of his own election to Congress dated in November last. But that certificate gave him no claim to a seat in the present Congress. In Massachusetts (as it ought to be in all the States, and was in many of them) elections for Congress were held in anticipation of the period when, by the practical construction of the Constitution, each Congress had its legal commencement, namely, the 4th of March of each alternate year. It was neither strange nor irregular to hold the election for a second period of service during the currency of the first period. On the contrary, it was the most regular course, because thus only could there be a complete Congress ready to come into existence on the expiration of an existing Congress. To be sure, in his certificate the term of service was defined. But suppose it had not been: would that vary the case? Not at all. If the tenure of service were not expressed, the law of the land would come in to supply it, just as precisely and certainly as if the law had been recited in the certificate; and so it must be in the case of Mr. Doty.

But the Committee on Elections say that, according to common construction in all such cases, where an obligation is imposed, or a duty to be performed, and no time fixed for discharging the obligation or performing the duty, it is to be done forthwith. Mr. C. said he could not agree that such was the "common construction." In some cases the obligation or duty attaches forthwith; in others, after a reasonable time; in others, on demand or notice; and, as the only universal rule, the obligation or duty is to be discharged or performed at such time as the law of the land applicable to the subject-matter prescribes and defines; so that nothing is concluded by the date of Mr. Doty's election, or of his certificate. We are to look to the law of the land—that is, the Constitution or acts of Congress—to ascertain the tenure of office of a Delegate from Wisconsin.

In fact, if the certificate had been express, it could only have referred to and recognized the law of the land as defining the tenure of office. The Governor could not, by his certificate, create a new tenure of office different than that prescribed by statute. Thus, in his own certificate before cited, the tenure was "for the term by the Constitution of the said United States expressed, commencing," &c. The same general principle must control and construe Mr. Doty's certificate.

Nor do the other parts of the certificate contradict; but, on the other hand, they sustain and confirm this construction. The election was held, says the certificate, in conformity with the act of Congress establishing the Territory and the laws of said Territory. It could not lawfully be held otherwise. These words seem to relate only to the mode of election; but if they extended further, and affected in any way the tenure and term of service, they would not vary the conclusion. For the inquiry in either alternative would be the same. What say the laws of the Territory? Above all, what says the organic act of Congress establishing the territorial government?

This act passed April 20, 1836, to take effect the 4th of July following, provides:

"Sec. 14. That a Delegate to the House of Representatives of the United States, to serve for the term of two years, may be elected by the voters qualified to elect members of the Legislative Assembly, who shall be entitled to the same rights and privileges as have been granted to the Delegates of the several Territories of the United States to the said House of Representatives; the first election shall be held at such time and place, or places, and be conducted in the same manner as the Governor shall appoint and direct; the person having the greatest number of votes shall be declared by the Governor to be duly elected, and a certificate thereof shall be given to the person so elected."

This act is explicit in providing that the Delegate shall be elected "to serve for the term of two years;" but it does not in so many words fix the termini of the period of service. And if the act contained nothing else on the subject, and there were no other law expressly applicable to the case, the presumption would certainly be in favor of making the term conformable to that of members of the House of Representatives chosen by the States under the Constitution. Mr. C. did not mean to be understood as affirming that the provisions of the Constitution in regard to members of the House were of necessity applicable to Delegates from Territories. He was aware that Delegates had been treated as creatures of law rather than of the Constitution; and Congress had in the case of Michigan, and in some older cases, given its sanction to the idea that Delegates from the Territories might be chosen for a term differing from the constitutional term of Representatives from the States. But such a difference constituted an anomaly. It was also an inconvenient anomaly; because the effect of it would be, if the Delegate held a seat for two years, partly in one Congress and partly in another, he must be twice qualified, and twice subject to have his seat contested in successive Houses. And the anomaly would be the greater and the more inconvenient, if, as in the case of Michigan, the term of service not only covered fractions of two successive Congresses, but was subject to a shifting and arbitrary commencement, depending on the date of the certificate. The presumption of law, therefore, if there were nothing in the act of 1836, or in any other act, to control the presumption, or define the case specifically, would be in favor of the general principle of a term of service for the Delegate from Wisconsin corresponding to the constitutional periods of Congress.

But though the act of 1836 contains nothing to control this general presumption, yet it does contain a provision which supports that presumption. The Committee on Elections err in saying that the act of 1836 "is perfect in itself, and would seem to be independent of all other acts." It expressly refers us to some other acts or act on this very point. It declares that the Delegate from Wisconsin "shall be entitled to the same rights and privileges as have been granted to the Delegates of the several Territories," &c. It establishes a rule to measure his "rights and privileges, and refers us for this rule to some provisions of law governing "the several Territories" in this matter.

Is there any such provision for "the several Territories?" There is. It is not the statute of February 16, 1819, referring to the date of the certificate as the beginning of the service; for that is a particular statute for Michigan alone. It is the act of March 3, 1817, which provides that "In every Territory of the United States in which a temporary government has been or shall hereafter be established, and which, by virtue of the ordinance of Congress of 13th July, 1787, or of any subsequent act of Congress, passed or to be passed, now hath, or hereafter shall have, the right to send a Delegate to Congress, such Delegate shall be elected every second year for the same term of two years for which members of the House of Representatives of the United States are elected."

This is the act, and the only act, which, so far as regards the term of service, defines the rights and privileges of the Delegates of the several Territories of the United States. It was enacted for the very purpose of doing away the inconvenient anomaly of a term of service for Delegates different from that of Representatives. It is not repealed by the act of April, 1836, establishing the territorial government of Wisconsin. It is not repealed expressly; that is plain enough; for the latter act omits to define the period of service expressly, and, above all, omits to reenact the peculiar provision of the Michigan act of 1819. Nor is it repealed by implication; for the two acts of 1817 and 1836 are compatible in terms. They are consistent in meaning. Placed side by side they constitute a complete and coherent whole. The act of 1836 does not cover the whole subject, but leaves us to go elsewhere to discover the termini of the term of service it contemplates; it expressly refers us to some general law on the subject; and that general law, as to this point, is the act of 1817, which thus comes in to continue the act of 1836, and to construe Mr. Doty's certificate, and to make his term of service begin on the 4th of March next, and be coextensive with the Twenty-Sixth Congress.

Mr. C. said he did not see how it was possible, in the face of the several statutes he had collated, to escape this conclusion; nor could the committee have escaped it if it had not mixed up the case of Mr. Doty with that of Mr. Jones, and undertaken to measure the term of service of Mr. Doty, not by the plain law of the case applied to his certificate, but by some irregularities, real or supposed, in the preceding tenure of Mr. Jones. Mr. C. contended that the two cases were, in point of fact, absolutely distinct. Whatever might be the facts in the case of Mr. Jones, that of Mr. Doty must stand upon its own facts. Those facts are, that at an election in Wisconsin, duly held in September, he received the highest number of votes for the office of Delegate to Congress, and that he holds the Governor's certificate to this effect. And those facts are to be governed by the letter of statute, not by what Mr. Jones may have done in the Twenty-Fourth Congress. Mr. Jones did not and could not make or alter the law. Nor do the peculiar and anomalous facts appertaining to the admission of Michigan vary the law applicable to the case of Mr. Doty. Suppose a gentleman to come here from Massachusetts, and show that, in November last, he was elected to succeed him (Mr. C.) in the next Congress; that would not give him the place in this Congress. No, though he should proceed further, and show that he (Mr. C.) was now sitting here by mistake, or by open usurpation of right. The applicant must prevail on the legal import of his own election and his own certificate; yet, as the irregularities in the action of Mr. Jones, or of the House, in the incidents of the Twenty-Fourth Congress, had become involved with the present subject in the report of the Committee of Elections, and in the minds of honorable members, so as to confuse and obscure the whole case, Mr. C. would cursorily state his view of the claims of Mr. Jones.

Mr. Jones received two years ago the following certificate:

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
WISCONSIN TERRITORY, November 1, 1836.

I, Henry Dodge, Governor of the Territory of Wisconsin, do hereby certify that, in conformity with the organic law of Congress, passed April 20, 1836, and agreeably to the fourteenth section of said act of Congress, I have caused elections to be held in the several counties in this Territory for a Delegate to the Congress of the United States, to serve for the term of two years; and I hereby declare and make known that George W. Jones, Esq., has been duly elected a Delegate to the Congress of the United States, agreeable to the provisions of said organic law.

Given under my hand and seal, this 1st day of November, anno Domini 1836.

H. DODGE.

Mr. C. thought all the principles of law applicable to the certificate of Mr. Doty apply to this. It differs in words, but not in legal import. Or if there be any difference in the legal import, it is more in favor of the doctrine deduced from Mr. Doty's, that the term of service is intended to be coincident with that of Representatives from the States. It expressly cites the act of April, 1836, as governing both the election and the period of service. By the election of 1836, and the certificate issued thereon, Mr. Jones became a Delegate in the Twenty-Fifth Congress, and for the two years of that Congress and no other, beginning on the 4th of March, 1837, and terminating on the 3d of March, 1839; in the same way that, by the election of 1838, Mr. Doty became a Delegate in the Twenty-Sixth Congress, beginning on the 4th of March, 1839, and continuing for two years from that time. The two certificates are perfectly consistent, and have both of them a clear and certain construction when collated with the acts of 1836 and 1817, and they thus free the two cases of Mr. Jones and Mr. Doty from all collision or contrariety.

Mr. C. said he should not enter into any discussion of the peculiarities in the position of Mr. Jones in the Twenty-Fourth Congress, any further than to suggest why those facts could not control the present case. There was much room for debate concerning them, but they might all be admitted without shaking the principles he had laid down as the basis of his own conclusions. Thus, it is assumed that if Mr. Jones be held entitled to his seat here the present session, the effect will be to give him a service of three years. Not so. If his certificate in 1836 did not, by legal construction, take effect until the 4th of March, 1837, then the two years have not yet expired; and the error lies in assuming that he sat in the second session of the Twenty-Fourth Congress under that certificate. Suppose he sat here wrongfully that session: how could such a fact vary the legal construction of the present

25TH CONG....3D SESS.

Indian Affairs—Mr. Everett.

HO. OF REPS.

certificate? Suppose that he or the House, in fact, thought at the time that he was then sitting under the present certificate: how could that misconception, of himself or of any other man, affect the legal force and import of the act of 1817 applied to the act of 1836? Who ever imagined before that the mere mistake of an individual or of individuals repealed an act of Congress? In point of fact, Mr. Jones came to the Twenty-Fourth Congress, a Delegate from Michigan. He sat in the first session of that Congress as such without dispute, because, though a part of the previous Territory of Michigan assumed to be a State, and the credentials of Mr. Crary, as its Representative elect, were communicated to the House on the 16th of December, 1835; yet the State was not recognized as such by act of Congress until the 26th of January, 1837, nor was Mr. Crary sworn in until that time; and that part of Michigan now constituting Wisconsin still remained unquestionably a Territory long after the domestic organization of the State of Michigan. Nay, the political community which, in anticipation of the action of Congress, organized itself as a State, differed materially from that which was actually admitted into the Union as such. Accordingly, on the 7th of December, 1835, as appears by the Journal, Mr. Jones appeared and took his place as the Delegate from Michigan. He was chosen, and held a certificate for two years. When did that certificate expire? Whether it was cut short by the organization of the Territory of Wisconsin, in July, 1836, or whether (which seems the truer construction) it did not cease to have effect until the admission of Michigan as a State, in January, 1837—in either case, Mr. C. thought it left the organization of Wisconsin to stand upon its own merits, giving to the Delegate of that Territory a tenure of service corresponding in period and in duration with that of Representatives from the States.

INDIAN AFFAIRS.

SPEECH OF HON. H. EVERETT, OF VERMONT,IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
January 24, 1839.

The House having resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of referring the several subjects contained in the President's message, and having under consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That so much of said message as relates to Indian affairs, except what concerns the defense of the frontiers against Indian hostilities, and the protection of the Indians against the intrusions of the citizens of the United States, be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs,

Mr. EVERETT requested that the part of the message relating to Indian affairs might be read. Mr. E., interrupting the reading, said he presumed it would be sufficient to refer to the passages on which he intended to comment.

"The occasion is, therefore, deemed a proper one to place this policy in such a point of view as will exonerate the Government of the United States from the undeserved reproach which has been cast upon it through several successive Administrations. That a mixed occupation of the same territory, by the white and red man, is incompatible with the safety or happiness of either, is a position in respect to which there has long since ceased to be room for a difference of opinion. Reason and experience have alike demonstrated its impracticability. The bitter fruits of every attempt heretofore to overcome the barriers interposed by nature have only been destruction, both physical and moral, to the Indian; dangerous conflicts of authority between the Federal and State governments; and detrimental to the individual prosperity of the citizen, as well as to the general improvement of the country. The remedial policy, the principles of which were settled more than thirty years ago, under the administration of Mr. Jefferson, consists in an extinction, for a fair consideration, of the title to all the lands still occupied by the Indians within the States and Territories of the United States; their removal to a country west of the Mississippi, much more extensive, and better adapted to their condition, than that on which they then resided, the guarantee to them, by the United States, of their exclusive possession of that country forever, exempt from all intrusions by white men, with ample provisions for their security against external violence and internal dissensions; and the extension to them of suitable facilities for their advancement in civilization. This has not been the policy of particular Administrations only, but of each in succession, since the first attempt to carry it out under that of Mr. Monroe. All have labored for its accomplishment, only with different degrees of success. The manner of its execution has, it is true, from time to time, given rise to conflicts of opinion and unjust imputations; but, in respect to the wisdom and necessity of the policy itself, there has not, from the beginning, existed a doubt in the mind of any calm, judicious, disinterested friend of the Indian race, accustomed to reflection and enlightened by experience."

"Occupying the double character of contractor on its own account, and guardian for the parties contracted with, it was hardly to be expected that the dealings of the Federal Government with the Indian tribes would escape misrepresentation. That there occurred in the early settlement of this country, as in all others where the civilized race has succeeded to the possessions of the savage, instances of oppression and fraud on the part of the former, there is too much reason to believe. No such offenses can, however, be justly charged upon this Government since it became free to pursue its own course. Its dealings with the Indian tribes have been just and friendly throughout."

"The United States have fulfilled in good faith all their treaty stipulations with the Indian tribes, and have, in every other instance, insisted upon a like performance of their obligations."

It will be seen, from these extracts, that the message was intended as a general defense of the conduct of the past and present Administration ("since it became free to pursue its own course") in regard to the Indians, against what the President is pleased to call "undeserved reproaches," "unjust imputations," "misrepresentation." And it affirms of this Government: "Its dealings with the Indian tribes have been just and friendly throughout," and that "the United States have fulfilled in good faith all their treaty stipulations with the Indian tribes."

Having in times past animadverted on the course pursued by the two Administrations towards the southern Indians, I cannot but take to myself a full share of the censure implied by the message; and I feel called on to examine on whom censure ought to rest. I will state distinctly some of the leading charges which have been made, and the grounds on which they rest; and will submit to the judgment of the people of this nation whether the charges contain aught of "undeserved reproach," of "unjust imputation," or of "misrepresentation."

I will first correct an historical error. The President attributes to Mr. Jefferson's administration the establishment of the remedial policy of Indian removals. I have found no document or fact in our history that gives countenance to it. And I will be obliged to any gentleman present to name one.

Mr. HAYNES referred to the Cherokee treaty of 1817.

Mr. EVERETT. That was after Mr. Jefferson's reign.

Mr. HAYNES. But it refers to facts during his time.

Mr. EVERETT. And what is the reference? It is to a fact the very reverse of the policy of Indian removal, as understood by Mr. Monroe, its real author. The fact referred to is this: In 1808, a portion of the Cherokees applied to Mr. Jefferson for permission to remove to the West; not for the purpose of being there civilized, but "to continue the hunter state." This, and this alone, was the policy proposed during the administration of Mr. Jefferson—to remove such and such only as desired "to continue the hunter life." On this subject I will make a reference to the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs in 1834, made under the supervision of one well acquainted with the history of our Indian relations. I allude to the present Executive of Georgia:

"Whatever difference of opinion may heretofore have existed, the policy of the Government in regard to the future condition of these tribes of Indians, may now be regarded as definitively settled. To induce them to remove west of the Mississippi, to a territory set apart and dedicated to their use and government forever; to secure to them there a final home; to elevate their intellectual, moral, and civil condition; and to fit them for the enjoyment of the blessings of a free government, is that policy." &c.

"The project for removing the eastern Indians west of the Mississippi may be referred for its origin to a proposition of a part of the Cherokee tribe, in 1808, 'to remove across the Mississippi river on some vacant lands of the United States,' and there 'to continue the hunter life,' in consequence of which, in 1817, they exchanged their lands east for lands west of that river."

"The Choctaw treaty of 1823, made 'to promote the civilization of the east Choctaw Indians, by the establishment of schools among them, and to perpetuate them as a nation, by exchanging for a small part of their land a country beyond the Mississippi river, where all who live by hunting, and will not work, may be collected together.' Neither a tract of land west of the river for that purpose. Neither of theseessions looked to the civilization of the Indians west of the Mississippi; and it is worthy of remark that this emigration, for the purpose of continuing the hunter life, has, contrary to all thought or expectation, laid the foundation for Indian civilization; those who were thus sent off having far outstripped those they left behind in the arts of civilization and in the comforts of life."

"In 1825 the plan for the removal and civilization of the Indian tribes was officially pressed on the attention of Congress by the President's (Mr. Monroe's) message, and the report of the Secretary of War (Mr. Calhoun) of that year. The plan then proposed was 'to acquire a sufficient tract of country west of the State of Missouri and Territory of Arkansas, in order to establish permanent settlements in that quarter of the tribes which were proposed to be removed; to give them the strongest and most solemn assurances that the country given them should be theirs as a permanent home for themselves and their posterity, without being disturbed by the encroachments of our citizens; 'to add to such assurances a system by which the Government, without destroying their independence, would gradually unite the several tribes under a simple, but enlightened system of government and laws.'"

So much for the historical error; nor would it have deserved so much notice, were it not the fashion to draw on Mr. Jefferson for authority, when facts were not at command.

I now return to the charges and to the defense. Against the policy of Indian removals, as understood by Mr. Monroe, or as defined by the committee, no reproaches were ever made. I, certainly, have made none, neither against the policy, nor against any Administration for supporting it. It was one of the objects of the report to carry it into execution. That policy was to induce the Indians to remove, not to force them. And this constitutes the difference of the policy before 1829 and since—"since it (the Government) became free to pursue its own course." The "reproaches," the "imputations," have been made against this change of the policy, or, if you please, in the language of the message, to "the manner of its execution."

I proceed to the specification of the charges brought against the last and the present Administrations. I shall submit to the committee, and to the nation, whether its dealings have been just? Whether it has fulfilled all treaty stipulations with the Indian tribes—with the southern tribes?

I begin with the Seminoles. The charge is, that the Executive, in 1835, commenced war against the Seminoles, to enforce the execution of a treaty not legally or morally obligatory upon them; and, for that purpose, the war, thus unjustly commenced, is continued to this time.

In 1836 I attempted an examination of this subject in detail. At this time I shall content myself with giving a brief of one of the objections then taken, and to which the late special message of the President (document 93) has given additional force.

By the treaty concluded with the Seminoles—concluded on the 9th May, 1832, and ratified 12th April, 1834—they agreed to emigrate to the country west of the Mississippi, heretofore ceded to the Creek nation, on certain conditions; one of which was that the Creeks should assent to reunite with the Seminoles as one people, and that they should be "received as a constituent part of the Creek nation, and be readmitted to all the privileges as a member of the same." The terms of this condition have reference to former relations between the Seminoles and Creeks. The Seminoles were formerly a distinct band, having a separate location; and, as such, were a constituent part—a member of the Creek nation—or (as expressed in article four) of the "Creek confederation." They seceded from the Creek nation, and by the treaty of Camp Moultrie of 1823, were recognized as an independent tribe. The object and purpose of the condition was obviously to restore the ancient relations between the Seminoles and Creeks. This, however, required the assent of the Creek nation, as well of the part that had not emigrated, as of the part that had emigrated. The whole Creek nation numbered over twenty-five thousand—less than twenty-five hundred had emigrated. On the 14th February, 1833, it was attempted to fulfill the condition in the sense I have given it. A treaty was then made with the emigrant Creeks, by which they agreed that "the Seminoles will hereafter be considered as a constituent part of the said (Creek) nation, but are to be located on some part of the Creek country by themselves; which location will be selected for them by the commissioners" signing the treaty; and a location was immediately selected between the forks of the Canadian river. This arrangement was made at Fort Gibson, and appears to have been satisfactory to the Seminole and emigrant Creek delegates then present, and only wanted the assent of the eastern Creeks to have rendered it a perfect fulfillment of the condition. But to them it was not communicated, nor was their assent asked. They, however, "discovered" the arrangement, and refused to sanction it. They sent word to the Seminole bands "that while they were willing to receive them within their limits as a portion of the nation, they would not suffer them to enjoy any separate allotment of their soil." And, sir, this fact came to the knowledge of the Executive before the ratification of the Seminole treaty. It came to the knowledge of General Eaton while negotiating with the Indians at Washington in the winter of 1834. And yet, notwithstanding this, the Executive procured the treaty to be ratified in the April following. The Seminoles refused to execute the treaty, on the express ground that the condition had not been fulfilled; that no separate location had been provided for them. I have the authority of General Eaton for saying that this "was the essential cause of their reluctance to go off." This, his opinion, he communicated to the Executive as early as March, 1835. This, sir, is the treaty that we have been endeavoring for the last three years to execute by the Seminole war.

The importance of the fulfillment of the condition to the Seminoles and to ourselves is illustrated by the late special message of the President, (Doc. No. 93.) From this it appears that the fortune of war has placed in our hands two thousand Seminoles, whom we have transported over the Mississippi. The Eastern Creeks have also been removed to the lands assigned them, and have taken possession of the lands allotted to the Seminoles; and they now say, as they said in 1833, "that they will not suffer the Seminoles to enjoy any separate allotment of their soil." And the Seminoles now, as in 1832, refuse to amalgamate with the Creeks. These two thousand Seminoles are now encamped in the Cherokee country, near Fort Gibson, where they must remain until a new location is provided for them. And now, at this late day, the President asks Congress for the authority to provide them a location elsewhere than that in the Creek country. How unfortunate that this had not been provided for before the ratification of the treaty—before the commencement of the Seminole war!

The charge, then, is, that the Executive, knowing that the condition of the treaty had not been fulfilled—knowing that nine tenths of the Creeks had objected to allowing a separate location to the Seminoles, and that they had given the Seminoles notice of the fact—yet, knowing all this, it proceeded to have the treaty ratified; and afterwards, knowing that this objection continued to be the essential reason why the Seminoles would not remove, it proceeded to compel them to remove by force. I lay out of the question a pretended subsequent agreement of a few of the chiefs, as having been the result of an equally unjustifiable force.

This, sir, is one of the specifications; and I ask, was this "dealing justly and friendly throughout?"

Another: In the course of the Seminole war, a number of the Seminoles came in under the protection of a flag, and under express assurance of its protection. That flag was violated; they were made prisoners—detained and transported beyond the Mississippi. Was this dealing just? On a former occasion, I stated that I thought the House would be satisfied with the course then (as was intimated to me) pursuing by the Secretary of War. I now state that I have no reason to be satisfied. I know not what was done. But no public notice has since been taken of the transaction—no public censure—no atonement to the Seminoles, or to ourselves. And what was the consequence? Even Indians will not in future respect your flag. You can hold no communication with the enemy. And you continue the war. And what do you propose? How is the war to be conducted or ended? Is it seriously intended, as has been proposed, to settle your lands in Florida by tenants, by Knight service? And are these feudal knights to be your defense against the Seminoles? Or, perhaps, as is suggested by a friend near me, are they to defend your army against the Indians? This knight service, too, is to be the defense along the whole line of your western frontier. But, sir, perhaps I am trenching on the powers of the Committee on Military Affairs, to which I believe one of the resolutions commits this subject. I will, however, take leave to suggest a more simple and certain mode of terminating the Seminole war. It is this: as your flag may not be respected, dismiss one of the Seminole prisoners, with a message that, if the Seminoles will not cross a certain designated line, you will not. Both sides are equally tired of the war; and that line, I have no doubt, would be respected. On these terms you could have had a peace a year ago.

I pass from the Seminoles to the Creeks; and I make this charge, that the Executive removed the Creeks by a military force, in violation of an existing treaty.

By the treaty of 24th March, 1832, certain reservations were made to the Creeks, who, at the end of five years, were entitled to patents in fee, if they chose to remain; and in the meantime, the United States agreed to remove all intruders. The twelfth article is in these words:

"ART. XII. The United States are desirous that the Creeks should remove to the country west of the Mississippi, &c.: Provided, however, That this article shall not be construed so as to compel any Creek Indian to emigrate, but they shall be free to go or stay, as they please."

The obligation to remove intruders was not regarded. The whites intruded upon them; and, by fraud, by persecution, by forgery, and by force, evicted many of the Creeks from their lands. This produced resistance on the part of a few, and this was magnified into a general hostility of the Creek nation. The Executive, instead of removing the intruders, removed twenty-two thousand Creeks by a military force. Their removal was attended with unparalleled suffering; resulting, as I am informed, in the death of six thousand within the first year. Such was the fate of the Creeks, such the dealings which are pronounced just and friendly throughout.

I pass to the Cherokees; and is it true that you have fulfilled your treaty stipulations with them? Permit me to say that this is the first time that I ever heard it asserted or pretended. It never has been contended on this floor that we had fulfilled them. I now refer to the treaty of Holston; and from that time to 1838 to the treaty of New Echota. I will refer you to the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs of 1830, and the debates of that session. In neither was it contended or pretended that we had fulfilled the stipulation with the Cherokees contained in the seventh article of the treaty of Holston:

"ART. VII. The United States solemnly guaranty to the Cherokee nation all their lands not hereby ceded."

The fact was notorious, conceded, that we had not fulfilled this stipulation. Instead of being denied, our neglect was attempted to be excused on the ground that we had not the power, consistently with the rights of the States. I do not enter upon the question of the validity of the excuse: it was debated at the last session: my present concern is with the allegation in the message, that the United States have, in good faith, fulfilled all its treaty stipulations with the Indian tribes, and with admitted facts as to the treaty of Holston.

The next charge has relation to the treaty of New Echota. It is, that this treaty was with less than one hundred adult Cherokees, against the known will of the great body of the nation, not one in forty assenting to it. At the last session this treaty was fully debated. I took part in the debate; and shall not now enter upon the details. I take the leading fact, the uncontroverted and incontrovertible fact, that this treaty was concluded with less than one hundred Cherokees acting for themselves alone; and I place it in opposition to the declaration in the message that "no instance of oppression and fraud" "can justly be charged upon this Government, since it became free to pursue its own course." And that "its dealings with the Indians have been just and friendly throughout."

I add one more charge to the list: it is, that the treaty was a fraud upon the Senate as well as on the Cherokees. The specification is, that in the month of November, 1835, secret instructions were given to conclude a treaty with a minority of the nation, which were not communicated to the Senate when the treaty was before it for ratification.

The instructions communicated were those of the 2d April, which required the assent of a majority of the nation; they were communicated as the instructions under which the treaty was made; the direct evidence of the fact that secret instructions were given which eventuated in the treaty, came out long after its ratification, and by one of those chances that happen in the oblique transactions of men. Strong presumptions arose from the letter of the Commissioner of the 30th of October, taken in connection with the then existing state of things; but we are indebted to a collateral circumstance for the disclosure of the fact that the secret instructions were given. It was this: the Auditor disallowed the charges for the special messenger who was sent for and returned with the instructions; to obtain the allowances, the Commissioner disclosed the fact to the acting Secretary of War, on which the account was allowed and paid. What sort of dealing is this?

Such are some of the charges which have been heretofore made against the Government "since it became free to pursue its own course." The proofs are in the records of its Departments.

I have a word to say of the execution of the treaty. The time allowed the Cherokees for removal expired on the 23d May, 1838. In consequence of an order previously issued, a military force of seven thousand men was then in the Cherokee country, for the purpose of removing the Cherokees. As the crisis approached, the Administration became alarmed at the probable consequences of a forcible removal of the Cherokee nation. I am willing to believe that a sentiment of humanity mingled with the alarm. On the 22d of May the President submitted to Congress a recommendation for a further appropriation for the benefit of the Cherokees, and for the allowance to them of the further time of two years for the completion of their emigration. (Doc. 376.) To prevent all mistake on this subject, I refer to the letter of the Secretary to the Cherokee delegation, of the 18th of May, communicated in this document:

"As it has been before observed, the Government of the United States could not agree to this article [viz: 'Such removal to be commenced at the earliest period, and to be fully completed within two years from this date'] without the consent of the States whose rights are involved, and whose interests may be affected by this stipulation. But the Executive pledges itself to use its best efforts to induce them to abstain from pressing their claims in a manner that would produce loss or inconvenience to the Cherokee people, and would be inconsistent with their being removed with every reasonable comfort. From the well-known humanity and generous character of the States of Georgia, Tennessee, and Alabama, there can be no doubt of their granting every indulgence which the interests of humanity require; and if two years are necessary for the comfortable removal of the nation, the undersigned will venture to assure the delegation that their request will be granted."

In my opinion, the Executive had the right to grant it without consulting any of the States. I pass that. My object is to show that the Executive submitted the proposition for the extension of time to Congress, with an undertaking on his part that it should be fulfilled. And how was it defeated? The proposition was immediately communicated to the Executive of Georgia, with corresponding instructions to General Scott. A correspondence ensued between the Executive of Georgia and the Secretary of War, (Doc. No. 421,) by which it would seem "that his Excellency must have misapprehended the true meaning and intent of the Government." General Scott had, on the 24th, commenced the work of arresting the Cherokees in view of their removal, and he was instructed "to continue the prosecution of the measures he had adopted to remove the Indians." A bill passed making a further appropriation for the Cherokees; General Scott continued the capture of the Cherokees, and all the grace they obtained was a respite till October, then to be removed under the conduct of their chiefs. This, I admit, was a great favor; yet, with all the care and prudence with which they have been removed, the consequences have been most fatal. The confinement of large numbers together, the change of diet, the agitation and fatigues of removal, have resulted in the loss of about three thousand. Much of this would have been prevented had the proposed delay of two years been allowed. That it was not allowed is to be attributed to the injudicious, and, if I may say so, the obstinate course of the Executive of Georgia, and to the want of firmness of our own. I have spoken of the consequences of that hasty removal, not of any intention to produce them.

It was not my intention when I came here, to have said one word on subjects that are past. The southern Indians have been removed—they are gone. I was disposed to let all past controversies rest. But, sir, I could not in silence submit to the sweeping denunciation of the message that all the charges heretofore brought against the Executive, on the subject of our Indian relations, were "undeserved reproaches," "unjust imputations," or "misrepresentations;" nor that history should falsify facts, however much to our credit, that, for the last ten years, all our dealings with the Indians have been just, or that we have fulfilled all our treaty stipulations with the Indian tribes; and I have to say that, so often as such denunciations and assertions shall be repeated, as often will the charges be restated.

EXECUTIVE POWER.

SPEECH OF HON. WILLIAM SLADE,

OF VERMONT,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 22, 1839.

An amendment to the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1839, being under consideration in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. SLADE said that it had not been his intention to trouble the House, during the present session, with any remarks on the great questions which divide the leading parties in the country. It was always with extreme reluctance that he addressed the House; and he felt his ordinary embarrassment much increased by a consideration of the extent and fullness of the discussions which these questions had recently undergone here and elsewhere. He had not the vanity to suppose that he could adduce any new facts, or urge any new arguments; yet he deemed the present a crisis when it is incumbent on every man to do his duty and his whole duty; and when it becomes no man to stand still until he can "do some great thing," before he attempts anything; but to do, according to his ability, whatever his hands find to do with all his might. In the fearful struggle going on between Executive power and constitutional freedom, every man should feel that he has a deep stake, and that the efforts of the feeblest and the humblest may not be unavailing to turn the scale and secure a victory. If I can influence but a single mind; if I can rouse but a single freeman, and give to his efforts a right direction, I shall be amply rewarded.

But, sir, I have other motives for addressing this committee. It has been my lot to stand on this floor as an opponent of slavery, and to be identified with those who are sometimes reproached as being men of "one idea;" in the contemplation of which they are so engrossed as to overlook all other public interests. I am willing to bear the reproach of being opposed to slavery, here and everywhere. I am not ashamed to own that, on this subject, I think much and feel deeply. But, sir, so far from forgetting other interests, in my desire for the emancipation of the enslaved, the contemplation of the great principles of justice which lie at the foundation of that cause does but inspire me with a firmer purpose to maintain another cause with which those principles are deeply identified.

I am opposed to slavery of every kind; to slavery of mind and slavery of body; to the slavery whose silken cords are artfully coiled around the spirits of freemen, as well as to the harsh and cruel bondage which forces the sweat and toil of him who moves at the bidding of a taskmaster. Sir, I cannot stand still and see corruption stalking through this land, and crushing everything beneath its tread, without standing up and opposing my feeble strength to its progress. No man can estimate the consequences of failure in the present effort to arrest it. The crisis is one of momentous and fearful interest. The triumph of corruption now may be its enduring triumph; a triumph which may reach, in its consequences, far beyond the time when African slavery shall have been exterminated—as I pray Heaven it may soon be—from this and every other land. That slavery I abhor and detest, and shall do what I rightfully can to root it out from the world; but I also detest and abhor the slavery in which the policy of this Administration has long sought to bind the freemen of this country; and I intend to do what I can to take away the power of the oppressor, so that the oppressed may go free. In both cases I am for emancipation without delay. In one, I do not expect to see it accomplished immediately; in the other, I hope to see it effected on the 4th of March, 1841. Neither of these causes do I intend to forget in my zeal for the other. The sword of justice is two-edged; and both the "curse of slavery" and the "corruptions of Van Burenism" may be made to feel its power.

THE PEOPLE TIRED OF DISCUSSION.

I have, Mr. Chairman, listened to the recent debate in this committee with some attention, and have heard some things which sounded to me very strangely. On entering this Hall two days ago, I found a gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Howard] replying to the arguments which had been urged against this Administration, and professing to defend it on its arraignment for corruption and abuse of power. And what did I hear from him? Why, sir, instead of a serious defense, there met my ear a most mournful complaint of waste of time in this discussion! Instead of an argument, we were gravely and reprovingly told that "the people were dissatisfied with us as a debating society." Yes, sir, standing in the high position of chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs—a position from which he might well be supposed to speak the sentiments of the Administration—the gentleman deems it sufficient to meet the indignant remonstrances of the people, through their Representatives, against the newly-developed results of Executive favoritism and corruption, by telling us that we are a mere debating society, with whose harangues our constituents are wearied! We are actually gowned by the gentleman and sent back to college, and held up as a class of sophomores, exercising our wits and sharpening our faculties by intellectual conflict. This is deemed by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs as a sufficient answer to the arguments of opposition on this floor, and a fitting defense of the Administration against the heavy artillery drawn up to batter down its fortifications and level the walls of its last citadel.

The people dissatisfied with us as a debating society! Sir, so far from this being true, the people are looking from every quarter with the most intense anxiety to our deliberations, and to the investigations we have instituted into the abuses of Executive power. Many a man among the honest, unsophisticated yeomanry of the country, who has long held on to the Administration, under the hope of reform, which was artfully held out at the beginning of its deceptive career, is beginning to open his eyes upon the alarming results of pledges broken and power abused. "Give us light," is the cry that comes up to us from every quarter of the Union. "Send us speeches and reports of committees. We want to see the results of the promised 'reform,' and possess the means of judging of the conduct of those who have ruled over us for the last ten years." Such is the language addressed to me by many of my constituents; and it is, I have no doubt, addressed to almost every member on this floor who is known to be unpledged to sustain, right or wrong, the men in power. And, sir, these inquiries have not been prompted by any artificial excitement, got up to subserve the purposes of party; but they have been forced from the people by the practical results of the Executive policy—results which no arts could conceal—results which have been the legitimate fruit of seed long since sown, and which would produce its kind. The Administration have sown the wind and are now reaping the whirlwind.

Mr. Chairman, I commend the prudence of the gentleman from Maryland. He has made the best defense of the Administration that could be made. We are "a debating society!" and the people are sick of it! This is his answer to the murmurs of the people, and the arguments of the people's representatives. This is the language which is used to Congress and the country when, after a maladministration of ten years, which has brought us to the foot of Executive power, there is a roused and struggling effort to shake off the incubus, restore the Constitution to its just balance, Congress to its rights, and the people to their full and free breathing.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman mistakes the feelings of himself and his political associates here for the feelings of the people, when he supposes they are tired of discussion. Sir, the people want discussion. They pray for light. They say, debate—debate fully and thoroughly. We will pay the expense. Go on. Probe matters to the bottom. Don't spare for their crying. We begin to find out that the boasting reformers have deceived and misled us, and we want to see further into the mystery of their political iniquity. Open the doors wide, if you can get the keys; and if you cannot, keep thundering at them till we can come to your aid with a reinforcement.

Tired of discussion! Well may this Administration be tired of it. It is a battering-ram that is shaking the walls of their castle, and threatening to bury them in its ruins. Light and truth! What horror takes hold of the abusers of power, when these stern and vigorous assailants look them full in the face—when quickened memory brings up with fearful celerity, and presents in dread array, their political transgressions, and "conscience, which makes cowards of us all," performs his office. Well may they cry out in the subdued agony of detected guilt, we are tired of discussion. But, sir, the people are not tired of it. They are aroused, and discussion will go on. If we hold our peace, they will not be silent. If we refuse to come to the rescue, then shall enlargement and deliverance arise from some other quarter. "Truth is mighty, and will prevail."

But suffer me, Mr. Chairman, to look a little more narrowly into the reasons why the friends of the Administration are tired of discussion. It is ten years since the present dynasty came into power. Those who are now so impatient of discussion have good memories. They have not forgotten with what professions they forced their way to the chief control. The means employed by them to supplant the preceding Administration have become matter of history. The pledges made to a deceived people are on record; and the gross and shameless violations of them now stare their authors full in the face. And, sir, it shall not be my fault if they are not made to look upon them until their eyeballs shall be seared with the sight.

THREAT TO PUT DOWN THE "PURE ADMINISTRATION."

I well remember the history of the canvass which elevated General Jackson to the Presidency. I saw then, as clearly as I see now, and detested then, as strongly as I detest now, the means by which that elevation was effected. And I now say, without the fear of contradiction, that a grosser system of deception was never practiced upon any people than that by which the purest Administration the country ever had was supplanted, and the most corrupt put in its place. Who, Mr. Chairman, can fail to remember the declaration of a leading partisan of General Jackson, now the second officer in the Government, made at the outset of Mr. Adams's administration, that "it should be put down, though pure as the angels at the right hand of the throne of God?" And how was a pure Administration to be put down? The ingenuity of disappointed ambition was ready with an answer, raise the cry of "bargain and corruption," because a man who voted in the House of Representatives for the elected President has been selected as one of his confidential advisers. Let "bargain and corruption" be stereotyped, and placed at the head of every Opposition newspaper for four years. It was done! The columns of the United States Telegraph, and of all the affiliated journals of the

"put down" party, now bare on their face evidence how faithfully this purpose was executed; while the sentiments of the whole country, from north to south, and from east to west, attest, with overwhelming unanimity, the utter falsehood of the charge. But it had its day, and wrought its intended effect.

PRETENDED ABUSE OF PATRONAGE BY MR. ADAMS.

Next came the charge of a prostitution of Executive patronage and abuse of Executive power. It is now a matter of amazement that there should have been found wickedness brazen enough to make the charge, and credulity weak enough to be duped by it. Yet such was the fact. Mr. Adams made two removals from office during his entire administration, neither of which was for a political cause, and yet the land was literally filled with clamor about the danger of an abuse of Executive power. That clamor was commenced in 1826, in the report of a committee of the Senate on the subject of Executive patronage, at the head of which was Thomas H. Benton, and among whose members were Martin Van Buren and Richard M. Johnson. That report dwelt with much apparent alarm on "the degree and amount of patronage now [then] exercised by the President," and came to "the conclusion that the same may, and ought to be diminished by law." For the professed purpose of effecting that diminution, the committee reported six bills, one of which, it is worthy of special remark, provided:

"That in all nominations made by the President to the Senate, to fill vacancies occasioned by the exercise of the President's power to remove from office, the fact of the removal shall be stated to the Senate at the time the nomination is made, with a statement of the reasons for which such officer may have been removed."

I wish, Mr. Chairman, that I had time to go fully into the report of that committee. But I must forbear. It labored to magnify the amount of patronage then exercised by the President; declared that "the power of patronage, unless checked by the vigorous interposition of Congress, must go on increasing, until Federal influence in many parts of this Confederation will predominate in elections as completely as British influence predominates in the elections of Scotland and Ireland in rotten-borough towns;" urged the necessity of "laboring to multiply the guards, and to strengthen the barriers against the possible abuse of power;" and spoke of the disposition manifested "in all ages to flock to the standard of power whosoever and by whomsoever raised." It also embodied a glowing and truly prophetic description of the effect of the exercise of Executive power, which I shall have occasion more particularly to notice hereafter.

It is useful to look back on this report from the point where we now stand. There was thrown around it an air of sincerity and regard for the public good which rendered it very imposing, and seemed to claim for its authors the merit of no common patriotism and discernment. But, sir, we can now see it in its true light. It was hypocritical cant, used to effect the purposes of unworthy ambition. Sound doctrines it indeed contained; but their promulgation was made under circumstances and in a manner clearly showing that it was intended not to lay a foundation for carrying them out in practice, but to give countenance to the false clamor against the then Administration. Nothing had occurred to justify alarm. No arbitrary removals from office had been made, suggesting the necessity of imposing on the President the duty of giving reasons for removals, or furnishing an occasion for the sudden and high-wrought solicitude manifested for the exemption of the country from the dangerous charm of Executive influence. But, sir, the conspirators understood it; and now we understand it, and the whole country understands it. The connection which that report—profusely scattered through the country—was made to have with the misrepresentations which were to be put down, and which did put down, a pure Administration, and the subsequent perpetration, by its authors and their political friends, as soon as they came into power, of all the abuses they pretended to deprecate, reveal to the broad light of day the great purpose of the report. That purpose was the acquisition of power. It was effected; and effected only to enable those who accomplished it to fulfill their own worst predictions of the abuse of power.

I have said, Mr. Chairman, that none now dare to charge Mr. Adams with an abuse of Executive power. I recall the assertion, and admit that there is one exception. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Howard] has said in this debate that "General Jackson found the instrument [Executive patronage] bright from recent use, in the magazine stormed and taken on his coming into power." By this he intended to say that Executive patronage had been used by the preceding Administration for party purposes; and that its notorious use for such purposes by General Jackson and his successor has been but a following out of the policy of the Administration that preceded him. Now, sir, I demand the proof of the gentleman's assertion. I deny that there is a shadow of foundation for it. Sir, I am amazed at the temerity which can now make such an assertion. Who, I ask, did Mr. Adams remove from office for opinion's sake? Not one; no, sir, not one. On the contrary, have not the advocates of the "spoils" system long maintained that his neglect to use his official power to put down his enemies and put up his friends very much contributed to his defeat? Where is the active supporter of General Jackson and Mr. Van Buren, who has not attempted to defend their use of Executive power for party purposes, by referring to what has been denominated the fatal neglect of Mr. Adams to adopt that policy? And yet the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations rises here and gravely tells us that the use of Executive power for party purposes was an instrument that General Jackson "found bright from recent use" in the captured magazine of his vanquished enemy! Mr. Chairman, I must cease to be astonished at anything, and give it up that "all is fair in politics," when such assertions can be made in the face of the country by Representatives of the people on this floor. But while this assertion proves that "all is fair in politics," it proves another thing. It shows that gentlemen of the Administration feel pressed with the argument against the prostitution of Executive patronage, and see the necessity of meeting it by an excuse, at least, if they cannot find a justification. The notorious groundlessness of the excuse now offered leaves those who urge it in a position of no enviable weakness before the country. If they are content to remain in that position, I am willing to leave them there, "alone in their glory."

But I will proceed to consider, as among the means used to "put down" the "pure Administration," some of the pretensions set up and urged in favor of the candidate for the succession, and which professed to shadow forth the grand reform to be given the country under his Administration.

A LIBERAL ADMINISTRATION PROMISED.

And first, General Jackson was to be a great pacificator! Party spirit was to expire under his administration; or, at least, it was to be divested of all its asperity. Men were to be selected for office without regard to party, and solely on the ground of high personal qualifications and eminent fitness for official station. There was a large class of minds on which such assurances were fitted to operate, and on which they did operate with much effect. General Jackson's letter to Mr. Monroe, in 1816, was published, in which the most earnest advice was given touching the formation of his Cabinet and the principles which should govern him in his selections for office. I cannot resist the impulse to read a paragraph from that letter, to remind this committee and the country of the professions which were pressed into the service of the conspirators against the pure Administration which they were pledged to "put down."

"Pardon me, my dear sir, [said General Jackson,] for the following remarks concerning the next presidential term. They are made with the sincerity and freedom of a friend. I cannot doubt they will be received with feelings similar to those which have impelled me to make them. Everything depends on the selection of your ministry. In every selection party and party feelings should be avoided. Now is the time to exterminate that monster called party spirit. By selecting characters most conspicuous for their probity, virtue, capacity, and firmness, without any regard to party, you will go far to, if not entirely, eradicate those feelings which on former occasions threw so many obstacles in the way of Government; and perhaps have the pleasure and honor of uniting a people heretofore politically divided. The Chief Magistrate of a great and powerful nation should never indulge in party feelings. His conduct should be liberal and disinterested, always bearing in mind that he acts for the whole, and not a part of the community. By this course you will exalt the national character, and acquire for yourself a name as imperishable as monumental marble. Consult no party in your choice. Pursue the dictates of that unerring judgment which has so long and so often benefited our country, and rendered conspicuous its rulers. These are the sentiments of a friend. They are the feelings, if I know my own heart, of an undissembled patriot.

"Accept assurances of my sincere friendship, and believe me to be, respectfully, your obedient servant."

"ANDREW JACKSON."

And now, Mr. Chairman, mark how full were General Jackson's expressions of a disregard of "party and party feelings." How deep and strong his abhorrence of "the monster called party spirit." How earnestly were "probity, virtue, capacity, and firmness" commended. How fitting was it then in the eyes of General Jackson, that the Chief Magistrate of a great and powerful nation should never indulge in party feelings." How important, then, that "his conduct should be liberal and disinterested, bearing in mind that he acts for the whole and not a part of the community!" Sir, I do not doubt the sincerity of this advice. General Jackson felt as that he wrote. He had not then become corrupted by ambition. He had not come in contact with the men who, afterwards, sought to use him in accomplishing their purpose of "putting down" all "pure" administration. He was General Andrew Jackson, fresh from the conflicts and toils and victories of war, and unpracticed in the arts of political chicanery. But what was sincerity in him, then, became the rankest hypocrisy in those who used it ten years afterwards. He deprecated, truly, the prevalence of a proscribing, exterminating party spirit. They sought to use him to accomplish its worst purposes. He saw and felt the value of "probity, virtue, and capacity" in public station. They saw and felt the value of his recommendation of these qualities in aiding them to crush a pure, virtuous, and capable Administration. He saw that Mr. Monroe might acquire for himself an imperishable name by following his noble advice. They saw, with the keen sight of political gamblers, that they might acquire power by skillfully using that advice; and that, having acquired, they might improve it for purposes of the foulest ambition.

But, sir, I will do them the justice to say that I do not believe they then contemplated the full extent to which the power they were grasping would be carried under the new Administration. It seems impossible they should have even dreamed that General Jackson, the author of the noble sentiments I have quoted, could ever be brought to enact, in his own administration, an utter falsification of every profession they contained—a falsification so complete that there should not be, as, in truth, there is not, found a single one of his friends whose face does not crimson with blushes at an exhibition of the contrast. But the fitting instrument for effecting that purpose had not then taken the stage as a chief actor. The time had not come for him to spread his toils and spring the snare. But it at length came. General Jackson was elected. His Cabinet was formed. The work was commenced! Mr. Chairman, you know its history. The country knows it. The arts by which an ambitious aspirant for the highest honors gained the confidence of the old chief, and the unscrupulousness with which that confidence was abused, are familiar to all. General Jackson yielded to the subtle influence; and without seeming to have been at all aware that he had ever discoursed of probity, virtue, and capacity as qualifications for office; without seeming to recollect that he had ever denounced party spirit as a monster, and recommended liberality and disinterestedness as indispensable for the Chief Magistrate of a great nation, he became suddenly and strangely metamorphosed into the mere President of a party—exalting party devotion above the qualifications he had so strongly commended, and converting the whole power of his high office to the illiberal and interested purpose of serving party friends and accomplishing the designs of party ambition. The history of inconsistency, from the beginning of time to this hour, cannot, I fearlessly assert, furnish a parallel.

Executive Power—Mr. Stide.

Hb. OF REFS.

GENERAL JACKSON WAS TO SERVE BUT ONE TERM.

But this is not all: there were other pledges. You remember, Mr. Chairman, how strenuously it was maintained during the administration of Mr. Adams, that a President should not be a candidate for a second election. It became a favorite doctrine of the Opposition. It was just then discovered that executive power might be used by a President to secure his own continuance in office. The danger of this was portrayed in strong colors; and General Jackson was the man in whose person a reform was to be commenced, if the people would honor him with their confidence. The suggestion took. Thousands believed, and voted for the man who would retire at the end of four years! He was elected; and so strong did he himself seem to be impressed with the danger of giving a President a second election, that he actually recommended, in three successive messages to Congress, an amendment to the Constitution, rendering the President ineligible for a second term; and yet, when the four years drew near a close, and the people looked to see him preparing to retire, behold, they found him preparing to extend his iron reign through another four years! The humbug had served its intended purpose. It had aided in putting down a pure Administration, and now it must be exploded to sustain the power of a corrupt one.

MEMBERS OF CONGRESS WERE NOT TO BE APPOINTED TO OFFICE.

I come now to another pledge made antecedent to the election which "put down" the "pure" Administration. It was among the earliest and loudest of the complaints against Mr. Adams that he had appointed Mr. Clay, a member of Congress, to the office of Secretary of State. You remember, Mr. Chairman, the stereotyped charge: "a bargain and corruption," as connected with that selection, the sweeping effect of which, in the hands of its inventors, was as signal as the conviction of its utter groundlessness is now universal. It was used not only to bring odium on the Administration for an act already done, but to fill the country with apprehensions of future danger from the practice of appointing members of Congress to office. The conspirators suddenly became great sticklers for the purity of the representative bodies, and eagle-eyed to see the danger to that purity from the practice in question. Upon the people everywhere was urged the great and indispensable importance of a reform, which should exclude the members of those bodies from Executive appointments, and General Jackson was held up as the man who would effectually work out that reform, and secure Congress from the corruption of Executive influence.

I said that General Jackson was held up as the champion of this promised reform. Sir, there was more than this. He held himself up in that character at the very outset of the canvass which resulted in his election. He was nominated by the Legislature of Tennessee in October following Mr. Adams's inauguration; and, on that occasion, in the presence of both Houses of the Legislature, who gave him a grand reception for that purpose, handed in his resignation of the seat he then held in the Senate of the United States. That resignation I hold in my hand, and beg leave to read a portion of it. The General was not content with merely resigning into their hands the trust he had received from them, nor, indeed, with an addition of reasons for it. There were purposes connected with that occasion which such a paper could not accomplish. He had just been nominated for the Presidency, and it fell in with the plans of the conspirators against the "pure" Administration, that he should seize that occasion to give countenance to the charge against it of corruption, and set forth, in due form, the danger to the independence and purity of Congress from the appointment of its members to Executive offices. This purpose he accomplished by embodying in his resignation a dissertation on the subject, which I will now read.

Having descanted on the importance of the amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by the Legislature of Tennessee, whereby the election of President should be made directly by the people, without the intervention of electors, he proceeded to say:

"With a view to sustain more effectually, in practice, the axiom which divides the three great classes of power into independent constitutional checks, I would propose a provision rendering any member of Congress ineligible to office under the General Government during the term for which he was elected, and for twenty years thereafter, except in cases of judicial office." * * * "The effect of such a constitutional provision is obvious. By it, Congress, in a considerable degree, would be free from that connection with the executive department which at present gives strong ground of apprehension and jealousy on the part of the people. Members, instead of being liable to be withdrawn from legislating on the great interests of the nation, through prospects of Executive patronage, would be more liberally confided in by their constituents; while their vigilance would be less interrupted by party feelings and party excitements. Calculations from intrigue or management would fail, nor would their deliberations or investigations of subjects consume so much time. The morals of the country would be improved; and virtue, uniting with the labors of the representatives, and with the official ministers of the law, would tend to perpetuate the honor and glory of the Government."

"But if this change in the Constitution should not be obtained, and important appointments continue to devolve on the Representatives in Congress, it requires no depth of thought to be convinced that corruption will become the order of the day, and that, under the garb of conscientious sacrifices to establish precedents for the public good, evils of serious importance to the freedom and prosperity of the Republic may arise. It is through this channel that the people may expect to be attacked in their constitutional sovereignty, and where tyranny may well be apprehended to spring up in some favorable emergency. Against such inroads every guard ought to be interposed; and none better occurs than that of closing the suspected avenue with some necessary constitutional restriction. We know human nature to be prone to evil: we are early taught to pray that we may not be led into temptation; and hence the opinion that, by constitutional provision, all avenues to temptation on the part of our political servants should be closed."

"My name having been before the nation for the office of Chief Magistrate during the time I served as your Senator, placed me in a situation truly delicate; but, delicate as it was, my friends do not, and my enemies cannot, charge me with descending from the independent ground then occupied, with degrading the trust reposed in me, by intruding for the presidential chair. As, by a resolution of your body, you have thought proper again to present my name to the American people, I must entreat to be excused from any further service in the Senate; and to suggest, in conclusion, that it is due to myself to practice upon the maxims recommended to others; and hence I feel constrained to retire from a situation where temptations may exist and suspicious arise of the exercise of an influence tending to my own aggrandizement."

"Accept, &c., ANDREW JACKSON."

It needs, Mr. Chairman, but a slight acquaintance with the history of the presidential canvass from 1825 to 1829 to see the drift and bearing of this extraordinary resignation. Mr. Clay had been, by the appointment of the President, transferred from the House of Representatives to the Department of State; and thereupon the clamor of corruption had been raised, and a conspiracy formed to "put down" the Administration. At this crisis General Jackson was brought out, and presented to the country as the man who was to put an end to the appointment of members of Congress to office, and dry up this source of corruption. Under his administration, legislative purity was to be maintained; Congress was to be "free from that connection with the executive department which" then gave "strong ground of apprehension and jealousy;" legislative independence was to be strictly guarded; "calculations from intrigue and management" were to "fail;" the "morals of the country" were to be "improved," and "the honor and glory of the Government perpetuated!" But this was not all. If the interference of Executive influence with legislative independence was suffered to "continue," by the appointment of members of Congress to office, it was the General's most solemn opinion that "corruption" would "become the order of the day;" that "the people would be attacked in their constitutional sovereignty;" and that "tyranny" would "spring up in some favorable emergency!" Human nature was then, in his opinion, very "prone to evil;" and the propriety of the prayer, "lead us not into temptation," was presented to his mind in a very impressive light! His situation was "truly delicate!" He could not descend from his "independent ground by intriguing for the presidential chair!" and felt "constrained to retire from a situation" (the Senate of the United States) where he might be tempted to act with a view to his "own aggrandizement!" What modesty and delicacy! What purity and patriotism! Who could refuse to vote for the man who put forth such sentiments, and gave to his countrymen such pledges?

Mr. Chairman, it is no idle reminiscence that calls up these pledges. They throw a flood of light upon the administration of the present dynasty, and set it forth in bold and emblazoned relief before the country. If they had been faithfully fulfilled, what praise would not have been bestowed upon the purity, patriotism and consistency of their author! But, sir, they have not been fulfilled. Every one of them has been violated—openly violated. Instead of striving to maintain the legislative purity, this dynasty has, from the moment of its accession to power, sought to assail and corrupt it. Instead of laboring to sustain the independent, constitutional checks, they have been trifled with and trampled on. Instead of avoiding a connection between the Executive and Congress, which it was pretended gave such strong ground of apprehension and jealousy, that connection, in the most odious forms of Executive interference and influence, has been carefully cherished and maintained. Instead of legislative independence, there has been legislative subservience. "Calculations from intrigue and management," instead of being "defeated," have been relied on; and corruption has, indeed, "become the order of the day."

Does anybody deny this? Who is he? Can he be an Administration man? Surely not, sir, surely not; for will he not admit, can he refuse to admit, that all this must necessarily be connected with the practice of appointing members of Congress to office? Did not General Jackson say that it would? and will his friends make him a false prophet? Will they now contend, when the appointment of members of Congress to office has been very greatly increased by himself and his favorite successor, that the consequences that he predicted from the practice, as it existed before such increase, will not follow? If the appointment of members of Congress at the rate of five in an administration of four years (for that was all that Mr. Adams appointed) was to make corruption the order of the day, and produce all the evils predicted, what amount of corruption, and what multiplication of evils, must not have resulted from the appointment of twenty members of Congress during the first four years of General Jackson's administration? And how fearfully must the corruption have been augmented and the evils multiplied by the subsequent addition of more than twenty appointments of like character! What a "sum" is here for political arithmetic! What results would stare gentlemen in the face, if they would apply the simple rule of three to this case!

But startling as would be these results, they would not exceed the reality, as evinced by everything we see around us. Sir, we are overwhelmed with the evidence of corruption, intrigue, management, and legislative subservience which has been gathering strength ever since the day that General Jackson came into power, and "put down" the "pure" Administration. What observer of the "signs of the times" has not seen it? Sir, not a single Congress has been elected since that time whose members have not been brought within the charm of Executive influence, by a liberal distribution among them of the loaves and fishes of office—a distribution at the average rate of the appointment of about ten members of each Congress! And, what is worthy of special notice, there have been several cases of members of Congress, who having failed of a reelection by the people, in consequence of their unscrupulous devotion to the Executive, were subsequently rewarded for that devotion by appointments at his hands. It would be worth a little inquiry to ascertain the amount which has been paid as salaries, outfits, &c., under such appointments, since this dynasty came into power. But I have not found time to make the full examination which I intend to make hereafter. It was stated by a gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. Allan,] in a speech on this floor, in March, 1836, that the amount at that time exceeded five hundred and thirty thousand dollars. It will be no exaggeration to estimate that it has swollen to more than seven hundred thousand dollars. Seven hundred thousand dollars of the people's money thus used by an Administration that came into power as the boasted enemy of corruption, and the watchful guardian of congressional purity and independence!

But, sir, the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. BYNUM,] while he does not and cannot undertake to defend the Administration from the charge of an improper exertion of influence, by appointments of members of Congress to office, seems quite anxious to vindicate it from the charge of inconsistency; and, for this purpose, has read to us that portion of General Jackson's annual message of December, 1829, in which he recommended an amendment of the Constitution which should exclude members of Congress from all appointments "in the gift of the President in whose election they may have been officially concerned." Treating this as the profession, he asks, where is the inconsistency of the practice, since no member of Congress has been appointed to office who has been "officially concerned" in the election either of General Jackson or Mr. Van Buren?

Mr. Chairman, it is not the message of 1829 which we make the test of inconsistency in this matter; it is General Jackson's address to the Legislature of Tennessee, in 1825, when he was just starting in the race for the Presidency. In that address he said that he "would impose a provision rendering any member of Congress ineligible to office." In the message of 1829 he took care to limit the exclusion to such members only as "may have been officially concerned in the election of the President" who should propose to appoint them. So far, then, from the message of 1829 being the standard by which General Jackson's consistency is to be tested, that very message is proof of his inconsistency. Sir, the message was itself an artful abandonment of the profession of 1825, and was intended to prepare the way for the practical abandonment of it which followed. The profession of 1825 had answered its purpose; and, like all other professions, was now to be cast off and thrown to the winds. Power had been obtained by it, and now power was to be retained by its abandonment.

What a "change had come o'er the spirit of" General Jackson's "dream" in four short years! How marvelously the dangers of 1825 had vanished in 1829! How suddenly were the bars thrown down, and the President permitted to range through the Halls of Congress, (obstructed only by a contingency of rare occurrence,) with his hands full of bribes to tempt the people's representatives. Not a suspicion was breathed that members of Congress would be "liable to be withdrawn from legislating on the interests of the nation, through Executive patronage," or that "their vigilance would be interrupted by party feelings and party excitements," or that there was any danger to be apprehended from "intrigue and management." Not an aspiration was raised for the preservation of "the morals of the country," or an apprehension felt that "corruption would become the order of the day," or that "the people would be attacked in their constitutional sovereignty." "Human nature" was miraculously cured of its propensity to evil; and it had come to be seriously doubted whether it was at all necessary that members of Congress should pray that they might "not be led into temptation!" Such was the change of four years. Such the difference between candidate Jackson in 1825 and President Jackson in 1829!

PLEDGE OF RETRENCHMENT AND ECONOMY.

I close, Mr. Chairman, my allusion to the professions and promises which preceded the election of General Jackson, b. adverting to those of retrenchment and economy.

At no period, since the foundation of this Government, has there been a more reasonable and just regard to economy in the public expenditures than during the administration of John Quincy Adams. No considerable increase was made during that period either in the number or the salaries of the public officers; and the aggregate of public expenditures remained almost precisely the same at the close as it was at the commencement of that Administration. There was, it is true, a disposition to favor expenditures for works of internal improvement; but these, so far from furnishing a ground for the charge of extravagance, were but the using of the people's money to increase their facilities of intercourse, give an enhanced value to the productions of their industry, and bind the country more strongly together in the bonds of fraternal union. The charge of extravagance, however, was not fastened on expenditures for internal improvement. The conspirators against that Administration well knew that it must not be assailed on that ground; that that battery must be masked, as was that against the tariff, by the declaration of General Jackson in favor of a "judicious" tariff, until they could get possession of the Government, and be able to strengthen themselves for an attack on both those interests. If they had then openly assailed internal improvements and the tariff, they would now be able to say that there are two points in which their practice has corresponded with their professions! But they chose to make their attack on other points; the last of which, and its corresponding pledge of reform, I come now, for a few moments, to consider.

The foundation for the charge of extravagance against the administration of Mr. Adams was laid in efforts to create impressions against him personally. He was represented as haughty and aristocratic. Having spent a large portion of his life at foreign courts, it was represented that he had thereby contracted such habits of extravagance, and had become so corrupted in his principles, as to render him unfit to be President of a plain, republican people. And then the presidential mansion was represented to have been fitted up by him in a style of almost oriental splendor. To give an air of reality to this, the "East Room Letter" was written, and published in the Richmond Enquirer, and other papers, in which the writer (a Senator of the United States, one of the conspirators, writing anonymously) declared that, on visiting the President's mansion, he had found the East Room so gorgeously furnished that it could hardly be looked into without dazzling the eyes of the beholder, when he knew that there was not ten dollars' worth of furniture in the entire room! All these insinuations of personal extravagance originated with men who knew then, as all the world knows now, that the object of their slander was one of the plainest and most economical, unostentatious Chief Magistrates the country ever had.

And then, too, he was the son of his father! His blood was tainted with the sin of Federalism; and though he really possessed more genuine republicanism than the whole combined host of his calumniators, he was held up to the country as a high-toned aristocrat, without a single feeling in common with the mass of his countrymen.

It was by these and kindred means that the public mind had been prepared for the grand charge of extravagance, and the splendid professions of economy and retrenchment which closed the political campaign of 1825-29, and consummated the purpose of putting down the "pure" Administration.

I regret, Mr. Chairman, that I have not time to give a full history of the means employed to spread through the country the false clamor of extravagance, and the equally false as well as hypocritical professions of retrenchment and reform. But I must be brief, and shall confine myself to a single range of inquiry.

You remember, sir, the labors of the celebrated "retrenchment committee," appointed by the House of Representatives in the winter of 1828. Their report was made in May of that year, just in time to operate on the presidential election in November following; and was circulated through the country in unsparing profusion, and with a promptness and zeal worthy of an honest cause. The committee professed to have discovered great abuses in a useless multiplication of executive officers, especially in the Departments of State, Treasury, War, Navy, and Post Office, in this city; and declared their conviction that "by a judicious system of reform, at least one third of the number of clerks in those Departments might be reduced with safety to the public interest," independently of a considerable additional reduction which might be effected by the enforcement among them of a due degree of industry. "We believe (said the committee) that there are, in fact, a corps of invalid pensioners attached to some of these offices; and just in proportion to their increasing disability to discharge their duties, is there an increased necessity for the appointment of new clerks." The committee said, however, that they could not propose "any specific reduction of the number of clerks," inasmuch as "without the cordial aid of the Executive, no effective scheme of retrenchment could be instituted." Nothing but the Executive stood in the way of a reform which should dispense at once with more than a third of the clerks, and make the remainder industrious and faithful! Nothing, of course, but a change of administration was necessary to consummate the reform!

The next session of Congress found the reformers at their posts. Retrenchment was still the watchword. General Jackson had been elected, and the "cordial aid" of the Executive was, of course, secured. In this state of things, the following resolution was offered by the author of the retrenchment report, and adopted:

"Resolved, That this House has a right to expect that the Executive will submit to Congress, at its next session, a comprehensive scheme of retrenchment, which shall extend to the lopping off of all useless offices, and the securing a more effective accountability in those which are retained."

Such, Mr. Chairman, had been the pretended discoveries of extravagance, and such was the note of preparation for "an effective and comprehensive scheme of retrenchment," when this Administration came into power.

And now, sir, let me ask—what has been done to redeem the pledges thus made? What expenditure has been diminished? What offices have been "lopped off?" Where is the promised "comprehensive scheme of retrenchment?" Has there been retrenchment to the amount of a single dollar in one of the Executive Departments? Mr. Chairman, I ask these questions in sober earnest. I ask them in the name of a deceived and abused people—a people who brought this Administration into power to get rid of offices they supposed to be useless, and cut off expenditures they believed to be extravagant.

I know, indeed, that, to make a show of attempting reform, the President in his first message, invited the attention of Congress to the subject, "to ascertain what offices can be dispensed with, and what expenses retrenched." That part of the message was referred to a committee of this House; and the committee called on the heads of all executive departments for information to what extent reductions might be made in their several Departments. And what replies do you think were given? Why, sir, from every one of them there came back the response that no reduction of officers could be made, while most of them actually asked for an increase! Yes, sir, an increase! The "reformers" had promised retrenchment if they could get possession of the executive offices, and have the "cordial aid" of the President. Well, they were gratified. They got a President of their choice. They took possession of the executive offices. And, sir, the President himself—if we can believe the declaration of the United States Telegraph, at that time his official organ—gave his "cordial" and efficient aid by actually visiting the public offices to see that everything was in order, and that every man did his duty! And yet his own Secretaries, thus acting under his own immediate inspection, told Congress that they wanted more officers!

Thus exploded the bubble of retrenchment; and, from that time to the present, the great effort has been to multiply offices as rapidly as possible, to enable the Administration to provide for the swarms of hungry, famished expectants who had for years been cursing extravagance, lauding economy, and praying for reform. Yes, sir, if you will take the trouble to examine the Blue Book you will find that, in every department, there has been a great increase in the number and the amount of compensation of the executive officers; while the aggregate amount of the expenditures of the Government has swollen from less than thirteen millions to nearly forty!

It is said, indeed, that there have been extraordinary demands on the Treasury within the last few years—such as those arising from the Florida war, an increase of pensions, &c. Now, sir, without dwelling on the wasteful extravagance of expenditure in the Florida war, or the injustice on our part in which it originated, and deducting from the aggregate of expenditures all chargeable to that cause, as well as to every other of an extraordinary nature, there will yet remain an increase of several millions which the apologists of the Administration wholly fail to account for, consistently with their vaunted professions of retrenchment and economy.

Sir, there has not been the slightest effort to retrench or economize. No one, indeed, has even attempted, under all the goadings of the Opposition, to exhibit any evidence of retrenchment. All that we have witnessed have been awkward attempts to apologize for the vast increase of expenditure. One of these apologies has been that the natural increase in the business of the Government has called for an increased number of officers. Now, sir, if I had time I would go through the various Departments, and show you that the increase of officers in most, if not all of them, bears a very great disproportion to any reasonably assumed natural increase of their business. I must content myself, however, with referring to one department—that of the customs—as an example. I have before me a statement from the Secretary of the Treasury, communicated in answer to a call of the Senate at the last session of Congress, exhibiting the total annual expense of collecting the revenue for twenty years, commencing with 1818, and ending with 1837. It is as follows, omitting the fractions of dollars:

1820.....	777,764	1830.....	1,006,059
1821.....	700,598	1831.....	1,155,971
1822.....	723,964	1832.....	1,287,553
1823.....	745,989	1833.....	1,402,118
1824.....	758,350	1834.....	1,358,951
1825.....	864,085	1835.....	1,320,533
1826.....	855,162	1836.....	1,414,528
1827.....	851,521	1837.....	1,497,275

Now, sir, mark the rapid increase of these expenditures from the time the "pure" Administration was put down, in 1828—an increase of more than six hundred thousand dollars in eight years; being at the average rate of more than seventy-five thousand dollars a year. What does this mean? Was there a corresponding increase in the business of the custom-house department? Nobody can pretend it. On the contrary, all know that the revenue has, for the last few years, been diminishing. Mark, too, the striking contrast between this increase of expense and that of the preceding ten years. That increase, you will observe, was, in the whole, but $120,000, being an average annual increase of less than one sixteenth the annual increase under the retrenching Administration!

But there is another view of this subject. What has become of the "one third" of the officers which the "reformers" told us, before they came into power, were "useless," and might be "lopped off?" Did they tell us the truth? If they did, then that one third retained was clearly enough, and more than enough, to do any additional business which could have subsequently fallen upon the Executive Departments. The very large addition, then, to the number of officers since 1828, forms a body of "useless officers" which ought to be "lopped off" without delay. Out of their own mouths shall the "reformers" be judged. The people will hold them to a real bona fide retrenchment. This was the promise—a promise, indeed, which they never intended to perform; but which they must perform, or stand self-convicted either of falsely accusing the Administration they put down, or of practicing the very extravagance they so loudly condemned.

But, sir, the "reformers" were not only pledged to retrenchment, and the "lopping off of all useless officers;" but their "comprehensive scheme" extended to "the securing of a more effective accountability." Yes, sir, "a more effective accountability!" Bear that in mind, Mr. Chairman, when you think of the glorious results of the "reform" in the "effective accountability" which has suffered a balance of $1,250,000 to accumulate and run away in the hands of a single sub-treasurer in the city of New York! Just about as much effectiveness in it as there was truth in the charge of extravagance, and sincerity in the pledges of reform.

Let me call your attention, sir, to one other point in the famous retrenchment report. The committee professed great alarm at the amount of "the Executive patronage of the press." Estimating that there were about one hundred printers employed in publishing the laws and Government advertisements, and doing job-work, they say:

"When your committee look at this amount of patronage, placed, without control or responsibility, in the hands of the Executive, or those of subordinate chiefs of his Departments; and when they reflect on the moral mechanism upon which this patronage acts, with a power that seems irresistible, they would deem their duty very inadequately discharged if they did not propose some remedy for abuses already existing, and essentially liable to be augmented."

"The danger which assails the freedom of the press, through the insinuation of this species of influence, is far more serious than any star-chamber code of pains and penalties. This pecuniary censorship of the press must end in its utter prostitution to an indiscriminate support of the acts of Government, however injurious to the rights and interests of the people."

To curtail this dangerous patronage, the committee proposed that the control of the printing of the annual volume of the laws should be taken from the Secretary of State and given to the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives; that the Secretary of State should be compelled to select the paper published by the printer of the laws of each State to publish the laws of the United States; that the papers published by the printers of both Houses of Congress should be selected to publish the laws and Government advertisements in the District of Columbia; and that the job printing, binding, and stationery, for each Department, should be done and furnished under contracts made by the lowest bidders, on advertised proposals.

And now, Mr. Chairman, what account must I give of these promised reforms? Can I tell you that they were executed after the reforming Administration came into power? No, sir. Was no proposition made in Congress to that effect by the reformers? None. Did not General Jackson press the matter in his messages to Congress? Not at all? Sir, not a word was heard from him or his friends on that subject after he came into power. The visions of danger which stood before the terrified eyes of the retrenchment committee in 1828, had passed away "as a dream when one awaketh."

But it may be asked if no legislation was proposed as a "remedy for abuses" in the "Executive patronage of the press," did not the Executive himself very cautiously avoid such an exercise of that patronage as would "insinuate an influence" that should interfere with "the freedom of the press," and "prostitute it to an indiscriminate support of the acts of the Government?" Did he not, for example, direct the Secretary of State to divide the patronage of publishing the laws fairly among the papers of the different parties, having respect to location, circulation, and moral and literary character? Did he not say, however I may be disposed to "reward friends and punish enemies," I will never consent to extend that principle to the press, whose entire and perfect freedom from Executive influence is indispensable to its fidelity as a sentinel on the watch-tower of freedom.

Mr. Chairman, the President neither said nor did any such things as these questions suggest. No, sir; the very reverse of it was then, and has ever since been, the settled policy of the Administration. In carrying out this policy, the press has been approached with the same influence that has been brought to bear upon the host of applicants for office. Executive subserviency has been made the test. Support the Administration, or you shall not publish the laws of Congress, or the advertisements of the Departments, or do any work for the Government. There was not an Opposition press in the employ of the Government at the time this Administration came into power, that has been able to retain its employment without changing its political character; and there is not a single press now enjoying the Executive patronage, that can become truly independent but at the hazard of an instantaneous and entire withdrawal of that patronage. Nor is this all. A great number, probably not far from one hundred, editors or printers of newspapers, have been appointed to lucrative offices. Many of them have received the office of postmaster, which has given to their establishments very peculiar advantages. Many presses, it is well known, have been kept from sinking by the mere aid thus received through Executive patronage.

Thus, sir, have the sound doctrines of the retrenchment report been disregarded. It aided to put patronage and power into hands that have since torn and scattered it to the winds. The patronage of the press, as well as every other branch of Executive patronage, instead of being regarded as a delicate public trust, to be used with a high sense of the danger of its perversion, has been treated as private property, vested in the President and his political heirs, to be used as an instrument of augmenting Executive influence, and perpetuating usurped Executive power.

PLEDGES OF GENERAL JACKSON'S INAUGURAL.

I have now, Mr. Chairman, done with the false clamor and the deceptive professions and pledges which preceded the election of General Jackson, in 1828. On the 4th of March, 1829, he took the chair of State. Sir, I shall never forget that day. It was not, however, its parade and pomp and pageantry that left the deep impression. The shouts of the immense multitude who gathered to witness the inauguration of the great "Reformer," soon died upon my ear. The mortification of seeing a "pure" Administration "put down," and its unscrupulous assailants elevated to power, I soon ceased to feel. But there were some things that I could not, and never can, forget, because they formed the soul of that ceremony, and sustained a deep and enduring relation to the subsequent administration of the Government. It was between the center pillars of the eastern portico of this Capitol, that I saw the President stand up, and, in the presence of assembled thousands, utter, as a part of his inaugural address, what I will now read:

"The recent demonstration of public sentiment inscribed on the list of Executive duties, in characters too legible to be overlooked, the task of reform, which will require, particularly, the correction of those abuses that have brought the patronage of the Federal Government into conflict with the freedom of elections, and the counteraction of those causes which have disturbed the rightful course of appointment, and have placed, or continued, power in unfaithful or incompetent hands. In the performance of a task thus generally delineated, I shall endeavor to select men whose diligence and talents will insure, in their respective stations, able and faithful cooperation; depending for the advancement of the public service more on the integrity and zeal of the public officers than on their numbers. A diffidence, perhaps to just, in my own qualifications, will teach me to look with reverence to the examples of public virtue left by my illustrious predecessors, and with veneration to the lights that flow from the mind that founded and the mind that reformed our system. The same diffidence induces me to hope for instruction and aid from the coordinate branches of the Government."

Mr. Chairman, do not suspect me of misreading this inaugural. I know that it sounds strangely now. Then it was the admiration of thousands. Nothing was so true, or sound, or patriotic. What we now know to have been false in assertion, was then taken by the multitude as absolute verity; and what experience has since shown to have been hollow profession and hypocritical cant, was then regarded as evidence of an honest intention to reform abuses, and give the country a pure administration. Who does not now feel amazed when he looks back and sees General Jackson thus standing up and pouring forth, in the presence of the nation, this double-distilled essence of the four years' slander of his pure and upright predecessor? Who does not now see there was not a semblance of truth in the assertion that that predecessor had "brought the patronage of the Government into conflict with the freedom of elections?" Who now believes that there was the slightest intention to perform what was promised in that inaugural? Who, indeed, regards it as anything else than one of those splendid humbugs which have been made to dance in succession for the last ten years before the eyes of the American people?

Sir, everybody knows that all its professions and promises have been wholly disregarded; that they were disregarded, in fact, immediately after they were made. Do you not, sir, remember how flagrantly the President, within two weeks after the inaugural was pronounced, set at naught the "instruction and aid" which he professed to "hope for from the coordinate branches of the Government," by dismissing the Senate from their special session, with a message informing them that he had no more business to lay before them, and then immediately proceeding to remove collectors, comptrollers, auditors, marshals, district attorneys, land registers and receivers, and ministers in foreign countries, and supplying their places by his own appointment, with "the advice and consent" of nobody but his unscrupulous and irresponsible partisan advisers? Do you not remember that among these examples of "reform," was the removal of the collector of the port of New York, for no cause but that of political non-conformity, and the appointment in his place of Samuel Swartwout, who has recently run away with $1,250,000 of the people's money? Do you not remember how the work of "reform" was carried on during the whole of the recess between the dismissal of the Senate in March, 1829, and its reassembling in December following? and with what unsparring severity it has been carried on from that time to this? And is there a man who hears me who will assert that it has not been carried on from first to last, with the most unscrupulous devotion to mere party interests? Is there one who does not know that thousands of removals and thousands of appointments have been made for the very purpose professedly deprecated in the inaugural—that of "bringing the patronage of the Government into conflict with the freedom of elections?" Has not the promise to make "diligence, talents, integrity, and zeal," the test of qualification for office, been flagrantly violated? Have any qualifications been able to stand the competition of partisan "diligence," partisan "talents," and partisan "zeal?"

It has, however, been said, and recently said on this floor by a member from Ohio, [Mr. Duncan,] that there are a great many Whigs left in office; and he has undertaken to prove it, by professing to give the number of Whigs and Administration men now in office in the various departments in this city. Sir, I do not deny that there are Whigs left in office here. I know some of them; and I know them to be among the most capable and efficient officers of the Government. But, sir, I know, too, the reason why they have escaped the besom of the "reform." They would probably, all have been removed when it swept through the public offices here in 1829-30, but for a conviction that the public business could not be carried on without them. The names of many, and, I believe, of most of them, were on what was called the "black list"—a list of candidates for proscription, made out under the direction of the celebrated "Central Committee"—and it was well understood that General Jackson was urged to remove them, and that it would have been done but for the remonstrances of some of the heads of the Departments, who, driven by necessity to appreciate the value of old and experienced clerks, insisted that the public business must suffer unless the work of "reform" was arrested. The project of a full and entire sweep was thereupon abandoned. It is thus that these Whigs have been spared. Necessity, not liberality, has debated it.

But, sir, there was the less inducement to fill every office here with a devoted partisan, because the clerks in this city are in a condition to exert very little political influence, and can mingle in no elections affecting the general politics of the country. It is not so, however, elsewhere; and hence we find a general sweep of collectors, surveyors of ports, naval officers, all the subordinate officers of the customs, marshals, district attorneys, land registers and receivers, and postmasters. Wherever political influence has been wanted, there has the Administration been ready to cut down political opponents; and supply their places with the men who had done the most party service, and who would pay the most money, ride the greatest number of miles, and proclaim with the loudest voice the purity and consistency and preëminent democracy of the reforming Administration! There is not a State, nor a congressional district, nor a county in this whole Union where evidence of the truth of this assertion may not be found. Everywhere has the patronage of the Executive been "brought into conflict with the freedom of election." Indeed, it has been the grand engine by which this dynasty has sought to sustain and perpetuate its power.

And what an inconceivable amount of power may be wielded by a single hand; when that hand holds the millions of patronage at the Executive disposal, and is guided by a will unregulated and uncontrolled by any principle save that of self and party aggrandizement. Establish the principle that every office in the gift of the Executive is held for disposal to the highest bidder—to the man who can pay the most in partisan services—and there is carried, with electric rapidity, throughout the land, an influence which pollutes and corrupts everything that it reaches. The standard of political morality becomes lowered; and every man who has a single aspiration for office is at once tempted to inquire, what will promote my interest? rather than, what is right in principle, and best for the interest of the country?

FULFILLMENT OF PROPHECY.

And, Mr. Chairman, no men in this nation have ever better understood the weakness of human nature in this respect, and the power which patronage can exert upon it, than those who have administered the Government for the last ten years. Sir, it is remarkable that the present President and Vice President of the United States, and the "expunging" Senator from Missouri [Mr. Benton] were leading members of the Senate committee on executive patronage in 1826, whose report—to which I have before adverted—drawn up by Mr. Benton, contains a most glowing description of the danger of an abuse of that patronage. Suffer me to read a paragraph from that report:

"The King of England (say the committee) is the 'fountain of honor'; the President of the United States is the source of patronage. He presides over the entire system of Federal appointments, jobs, and contracts. He has power over the support of the individuals who administer the system. He makes and unmakes them. He chooses from the circle of his friends and supporters, and may dismiss them, and upon all the principles of human action, will dismiss them, as often as they disappoint his expectations. His spirit will animate their actions in all the elections to State and Federal offices. There may be exceptions; but the truth of a general rule is proved by the exception. The intended check and control of the Senate, without new constitutional and statutory provisions, will cease to operate. Patronage will penetrate this body, subdue its capacity of resistance, chain it to the ear of power, and enable the President to rule as easily, and much more securely, with than without the nominal check of the Senate." "We must look forward to the time when the nomination of the President can carry any man through the Senate, and his recommendation can carry any measure through the two Houses of Congress; when the principle of public action will be open and avowed—the President wants my vote, and I want his patronage; I will vote as he wishes, and he will give me the office I wish for. What will this be but the government of one man? and what is the government of one man but a monarchy?"

Who, Mr. Chairman, will deny that Martin Van Buren, Richard M. Johnson, and Thomas H. Benton, were prophets in 1826? Sir, could prophecy itself have described more accurately than they did the effects of the abuse of Executive patronage which we have all witnessed during the last ten years? Here, in this single paragraph, is a complete epitome of the workings of Executive influence in its varied action on the host of executive officers, on both branches of Congress, and on the State Legislatures, during that period. What was prophecy in 1826 has become history in 1839.

I would that I had time to trace that history in its full details. I would present to you evidence of the extended and diversified workings of perverted and prostituted patronage, which should exhibit it as almost possessing the attribute of omnipresence to the furthest limits of this Union. Sir, there is not a department of the Executive Government which it has not penetrated, through its remotest and minutest ramifications. There is not a State government which it has not reached and influenced. There is not a single Whig member in Congress, and has not been for the last eight years, who has not, in obtaining his seat, been obliged to contend with this influence, exerted either through subservient office-holders, or a pensioned press. And, sir, while it has thus acted on elections to both branches of Congress, seeking thereby to secure a subservient Senate and House of Representatives, it has actually entered these Halls with its party espionage and its party-drill. Not a question of great public interest has been decided here in which its power has not been felt. Not a member of "the party" has ever given signs of a determination to throw off the yoke, and stand up in the conscious dignity of legislative independence, who has not been made to feel the terrors of its retributions. Not a Congress has existed for the last ten years which has not witnessed the bestowment of rewards on some of its members for distinguished subserviency to the Executive; and upon not a few of them, after they have been "elected to stay at home," on account of such subserviency.

Mr. Chairman, no description of the workings of this subtle influence has ever come up to the full reality. Notwithstanding all that has been said on the subject, the half has not been told. Indeed, sir, how could it be? Consider for a moment the extent of the means which the vast patronage of the Executive enables him to employ to this end; and then remember that you have a Chief Magistrate with a mind so constituted by nature, and so trained by political education, that the idea of power to remove, or power to appoint, never enter his mind without an instant suggestion of the inquiry—how may this power be used so as to advance my interests and build up my party? Sir, you might as well expect that the Ethiopian would change his skin, or the leopard his spots, as that he who has long been accustomed to do this evil should learn to do well.

I have spoken of the means of accomplishing party purposes by the Executive. And have you ever thought, Mr. Chairman, of the prodigious efficacy, which unity of purpose gives to Executive power? Here are no permanently divided councils. Friends may advise, but a single will finally controls the whole. The President puts his hand to the crank of the mighty machine, and every wheel moves, so perfect is the mechanism, to the furthest extremities of the Union. Go, sir, into a cotton factory, and see its vast and complicated movements. Story rising on story is filled with machinery, all instinct with life, and moving in obedience to a single impulse, far removed from your observation, but nevertheless felt in its steady, effective power, from the basement to the attic story. This, sir, is but a miniature model of the mighty Executive machine which is moved by a single master spirit in this city. Is an increased political effort needed, for example, in Maine or Louisiana? Behold! a score of men are seen riding through the State, stirring up the faithful, and rallying them to an approaching political conflict. And what moves them? The fear of losing office, or the hope of obtaining it. See that political leader moving about among the subordinates of the custom-house in that city, and demanding of them a tax on their incomes, to support the expenses of an election! What gives him power to enforce his collections? Has he a legal process? No, sir. But there is a process by which he reaches the pockets of the taxed, and draws from them the "needful." Sir, it is not a legal, but a political process. They understand it. Their offices are their bread, and they do not choose to go hungry. That is the secret.

CUSTOM-HOUSE OFFICERS TAXED BY "THE PARTY."

[Since this speech was delivered, the report of "the investigating committee" has been made; by which it appears, from the examination of witnesses belonging to the custom-house department at New York, that the officers of that department have been regularly assessed, from one to six per cent. on their salaries, for political purposes, and have been called on by collectors for the amount. "It was assessed (says one of the witnesses) by the general committee of the Tammany Hall party. If the individual did not pay the amount he was taxed with, the collector would remark: you will be reported to the general committee; and everybody understood that proscription would follow. The collector of the general committee has an alphabetical book, which contains the names of persons taxed, and the amount each individual is required to pay."

Here we have a glimpse of the secret movements of the machinery by which Executive patronage is "brought into conflict with the freedom of elections." There are more than four hundred officers of various grades connected with the custom-house in the city of New York; and here is an exhibition of the influence which moves them in a solid phalanx at the elections, and draws from the avails of their offices the means of aiding to secure party triumphs! A Tammany Hall committee gives them to understand that "proscription" will follow a refusal to pay the tax it imposes on them for political purposes! What would Martin Van Buren, Richard M. Johnson, and Thomas H. Benton (the prominent members of the committee on Executive patronage, in 1826, to whose report I have referred) have said, if the custom-house department at New York had then been under such an influence as is here disclosed? What horror would have seized them on making the discovery! The bare contemplation of the possible effect of the power of the President over the officers then connected with that custom-house was made the occasion of sounding an alarm by the committee. Hear them: After stating that the number then amounted to one hundred and seventy-four, and their compensation to $119,620, [the present number is over four hundred, and the amount of their compensation more than four hundred thousand dollars,] the committee said:

Executive Power—Mr. Stide.

"A formidable list, indeed, formidable in numbers, and still more so from the vast amount of money in their hands. The action of such a body of men, supporting them to be animated by one spirit, [what was then supposition is now reality!] must be tremendous in an election; and that they will be so animated is a proposition too plain to need demonstration. [Who so capable of giving fulfillment to their predictions as the prophets themselves!] Power over a man's support has always been held and admitted to be power over his will. The President has power over the support of all these officers, and they again have power over debtor merchants to the amount of $10,000,000 per annum, and over the daily support of an immense number of individuals, professional, mechanical, and day laboring, to whom they can and will extend or deny a valuable private as well as public patronage, according to the part they shall act in State as well as Federal elections."

What the committee thus spoke of as possible and probable in 1826, has become sober reality in 1839; while there is added (what did not then enter the conceptions of the prophets) Tammany Hall taxation for political purposes, enforced by the threat of official proscription! Such are some of the fruits of the corrupt principle which the reforming dynasty have adopted in the bestowment of Executive patronage, and to which they have sought, and are still seeking, to give the force of a settled, permanent rule of Executive action.]

MANUFACTURE OF PUBLIC SENTIMENT.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is another branch of this machinery which is not less perfectly organized, and not less completely within the control of the central power. I mean the affiliated party press of the country. Is it determined by the President, with the advice of the select political cabal, that any new party movement shall be made? A messenger is dispatched; the editor of the Globe appears; (though he is understood to be generally present as one of the advisers!) instructions are given, and the Globe moves. Straightway there is a corresponding and simultaneous movement in the party press in Vermont, in Pennsylvania, in Georgia, and in the far West. Public sentiment is manufactured, as the cotton is taken from the bale, in the lower story, and comes out a perfect web in the upper. Every editor and every executive officer knows his place; knows what is expected of him, and knows he shall be "shot for desertion." No military government was ever more absolute; no machinery was ever moved with a precision more perfect.

Wonder is often expressed that, with the most powerful means, so far as there is power in truth, (alas! it is too often powerless,) the Opposition are able to make so little impression, and are so often defeated when victory seems certain. Here, sir, is the secret. The President and his men understand it; and, while the Whigs talk of principle, they laugh at its inefficacy when brought into conflict with their party machinery. Mr. Chairman, how many illustrations of this might be drawn from the history of our political conflicts during the last ten years. Suffer me to refer you to one of them.

EXECUTIVE INFLUENCE AND THE EXPUNGING RESOLUTION.

You remember, sir, the celebrated case of the deposits. The President "took the responsibility," and the public Treasury moved at his bidding. The Senate, alarmed at the high-handed usurpation of power, determined to rebuke it, and passed a resolution of censure. The President sent them a protest, in which he asserted principles and set up claims to power which made him little to an absolute monarch.

But he was not content with a protest. He could not rest on the sober, deliberate judgment of his countrymen. He must have present satisfaction! The Senate had offended him, and they must be humbled, and the record of the obnoxious resolution expunged. But how should it be done? How should such a result be accomplished? Sir, the means were not wanting. Party organization supplied them. Instructions from State Legislatures could accomplish the end, and party machinery was adequate to their production. The President willed it; and the result showed that his will, by a mysterious process, became the law of legislative action in numerous States of the Union.

For three years was this process going on. From year to year the expunging resolution struggled in the Senate, under the overwhelming arguments which were urged against it. On one occasion (March, 1835) the expunging words were stricken from the resolution by a vote of 39 to 7; upon which Mr. WEBSTER, in addressing the Senate, said:

"The attempt to induce the Senate to expunge its Journal has failed—signally and effectually failed. The record remains—neither blurred, blotted, nor disgraced."

Would to Heaven, sir, that it had thus still remained. The attempt to blot and disgrace it failed, signally indeed, but not finally. Executive influence was too strong for the most unanswerable constitutional arguments. The State Legislatures were surrounded and pressed with it. Many resisted, but many yielded; and Senators who, in 1835, had voted to strike from the expunging resolution its material words, and render it a nullity, were, two years afterwards, induced to yield to the President's wishes, and vote to expunge a record which the Constitution had commanded them to "keep." Sir, I was in the Senate Chamber when the final vote on that resolution was passed. I heard the responses to the call of the yeas and nays, and saw the result of the three years' Executive war upon the independence of that body. It was a disgraceful and humiliating spectacle, and seemed almost to impress upon the very image of the Father of his Country, as it looked down from the canvas, an expression of mingled sorrow, amazement, and indignation. There stood the Senator who, "solitary and alone," had, three years before, "set that ball in motion," swelling in triumph at the successful result of Executive influence and party machinery; and there sat the subdued and the humbled, who had been made, through that influence, the unwilling instruments of accomplishing the designs of "the great expunger!"

The vote had passed; the resolution was adopted. It was a moment of thrilling interest. The Secretary brought into the Senate the doomed record, and there executed the sentence by which it was "blurred, blotted, and disgraced."

Mr. Chairman, what a redemption from the disgrace of that scene might, at that moment, have been achieved! It was in the power of a single man. And why did he not seize upon it? Why did he not rally the energies of a soul indignant at the high-handed outrage which was about to be committed, and nobly and sternly refuse to become the instrument of its perpetration? Why did not the Secretary stand up, in the midst of the scene, and say to the President of that body, "Sir, I cannot, I must not, do this deed. My hand can never hold the pen that blurs and blots the record I have sworn to 'keep.' Take from me my office; consign me to beggary if you will; but do not require me to disregard my official oath, and violate the Constitution of my country. My duty has been to this moment, and shall continue to be, faithfully performed; but, come what will, that deed I cannot, I must not, I will not do!"

What a sublime example of self-sacrificing devotion to principle would have been thus exhibited! Sir, I would rather, so far as personal gratification is concerned, have occupied the position of that officer at that moment, than to be President of the United States to the end of my life. There would have been more true glory in such a refusal than in a hundred military victories; and the laurels which would have adorned his brow would have remained fresh when the name of one connected with that transaction shall have been consigned to execration and infamy.

But, Mr. Chairman, there was one redeeming act connected with that scene. It was the act of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, who rose, as the final vote upon the resolution was about to be taken, and in the name of himself and his colleague, read to the Senate their solemn protest against it. Sir, it was a noble sight!—the Senator standing up, with his erect form and manly bearing, and declaring to the Senate and the world, in the calm dignity of conscious uprightness and truth, the great principles of the Constitution, which forbid the deed that was about to be committed.

But, sir, the exposition of constitutional principles was not the only feature of the protest which gave it interest. It declared, with a becoming plainness and directness, the true origin of the influence which was then about to carry the expunging resolution. It says:

"We have seen with deep regret and sincere pain the Legislatures of respectable States instructing the Senators of those States to vote for and support this violation of the Journal of the Senate; and this pain is infinitely increased by our full belief and entire conviction that most, if not all these proceedings of States had their origin in promptings from Washington; that they have been urgently requested and insisted on, as being necessary to the accomplishment of the intended purpose; and that it is nothing else but the influence and power of the executive branch of this Government which has brought the Legislatures of so many of the free States of this Union to quit the sphere of their ordinary duties for the purpose of cooperating to accomplish a measure, in our judgment, so unconstitutional, so derogatory to the character of the Senate, and marked with so broad an impression of COMPLIANCE WITH POWER. But this resolution is to pass. We expect it. That cause which has been powerful enough to influence so many STATE LEGISLATURES, will show itself powerful enough, especially with such aids, to secure the passage of the resolution here."

Thus, sir, did the Senator from Massachusetts, at a moment of intense interest, and under circumstances of peculiar responsibility, stand up, in the face of the Senate and the world, and solemnly declare his "full belief and entire conviction" that it was the influence and power of the executive branch of this Government which had brought the Legislatures of so many of the States to quit the sphere of their ordinary duties to aid in carrying into effect the will of the President in the measure then about to be consummated.

And what reply was made to this charge? Was it answered? Was there any attempt to answer it? No, sir. Every expunging Senator cowered under its withering rebuke. All felt its justice, for its truth had been written on almost every page of our preceding three years' political history. The "promptings" had been visible to every intelligent observer. None could deny their reality—none did deny it—none dared deny it.

Thus, Mr. Chairman, have I glanced at the four years' warfare upon the "pure" Administration—at the pretended apprehensions, by the "put-down" conspirators, of danger from the abuse of Executive patronage—their extreme solicitude lest the purity of Congress should be assailed by the appointment of its members to office—their fears that corruption would become the order of the day—their alarm at the pretended discovery of extravagance—their grand preparations for retrenchment, as soon as they could have the cooperation of the Executive, and the pledges of the President that he would respect "diligence, talents, and integrity," in his appointments—see that power should not be placed in "unfaithful or incompetent hands," and take care that his patronage should not be abused to party purposes.

I have also reminded the committee of the violations of all these pledges by the men to whose hands a credulous people had been induced to confide the administration of their Government. And, sir, it is amazing to contemplate the extent and the openness of these violations. One could hardly believe his senses when he beholds them, especially when he looks at the bold and daring disregard of pledges in the prostitution of the whole patronage of the Executive to the purpose of enlarging his power, and bringing even Congress itself, in both its branches, to bow to the supremacy of his will.

PRETENSIONS TO DEMOCRACY.

But, Mr. Chairman, these violations of pledges are scarcely less wonderful than are the expedients which have been employed to keep up the delusion and retain the confidence of an abused and betrayed people. I cannot explore this field; but I must advert, in passing, to one of the most prominent of these expedients: it is the high-sounding and extravagant profession of a regard for Democracy. Nothing can exceed it; and nothing has ever equaled it but the professions of the "put down" party from 1823 to 1829.

Democracy! Yes, sir; notwithstanding the complete organization of an Executive corps throughout the country, moved by a common impulse from the Executive head; regarding his will as their law; striving, in the strength of a single master principle, to perpetuate his power, and elevate it above every other in the Government, and acting with an unceasing reference to interests distinct from, and adverse to, the interests of the people; notwithstanding all this, have we heard from the authors and finisiers of this system of Executive corruption and tyranny the loud and incessant cry of "Democracy! Democracy! Democracy!" Nothing can exceed the love professed for the dear people, and the regard pretended for their rights. Sir, the men who knew how to deceive the people to gain their confidence, know how to flatter them for the purpose of retaining it. They can "stoop to conquer." They know that, though the people cannot be corrupted, they may be deceived; and that approaches to absolute power may be successfully veiled by professions of regard for popular rights. They have not consulted the history of usurpation in vain. They know how insidiously power has encroached on right, in every country where liberty has found a grave or ambition a throne.

It is as wonderful as it is painful to observe the progress which has been made within the last ten years in the career of popular deception. General Jackson, at his inauguration, professed to "look with veneration to the lights that flowed from the mind that reformed our system." Jefferson was the reformer whom he thus professed to venerate, and to whose light the leaders of the party still profess to look for guidance. But, sir, they have left Mr. Jefferson, and the principles of his reform, at a rightless distance behind them. He was a Republican, and an enemy of accumulated, overgrown Executive power. He respected the equal rights of the people, and labored to secure and perpetuate them. But there were conservative principles in his Administration, which we shall in vain look for in this. "Republicanism" was then the word; a republicanism regulated and controlled by constitutions—a republicanism jealous of power—a republicanism whose essential element was a fair and free representation of the people uncontrolled by Executive influence. The madness of that sort of "Democracy" which breaks open flour stores—threatens to raze bank edifices to their foundations; and enters halls of legislation with an armed force, to assert constitutional rights was then unknown. Mobs had not then become a part of the Government of the country, and Lynch law had not a name!

But behold the change! Now, republicanism is an obsolete word, for whose meaning we must consult the dictionary; while Democracy is the first word that is learned after the alphabet is mastered. Every man who obtains an election through the power of Executive influence will you hear boasting that he has been elevated through the power of "the Democracy;" just as though "the Democracy" means something besides the people, and the whole people. Nothing can exceed the impudence of the systematic attempt to make that portion of the people of the United States who constitute "the party," and who are subjected to the mysterious action of Executive influence, the Democracy, and the exclusive Democracy; while that portion of the same people who are struggling to break the charm of that influence, resist the encroachments of power, and maintain popular rights upon a broad, liberal, and constitutional basis, are treated as though they formed no part of the people, and are called by every name that has ever been associated with odium and reproach in our political history.

To blind the people to the falsity and absurdity of these pretensions to exclusive Democracy, and veil the deceptions practiced on them, the managers, with the art of the juggler, who, by sleight of hand, diverts attention from the true point of observation, take care to direct the attention of the people to other objects with which they are more familiar, and which are capable of being brought to bear more directly on their feelings and interests. While Executive power seems a great way off, and Executive influence, though advancing with a sure and steady step, is of a nature not to be immediately felt in its bearing on private interests, there is a class of objects near home which the managers know how to present so as to engross the popular attention. Thus, the rich are made an object of jealousy to the poor. The laborer is excited against the capitalist—the indolent and improvident against the industrious and frugal—the ignorant against the learned and intelligent—and even the vicious and abandoned against the virtuous and the upright. Associated wealth, no matter how widely it may embrace men of small means, or how greatly it may stimulate and reward industry, is declared to be monopolizing and dangerous. Banks, however prudently and safely managed, are denounced as the money-making machines of the wealthy, designed only to make the rich richer and the poor poorer. Facitious distinctions are created. Jealousies are excited. An imaginary aristocracy is raised up in the midst of every community; and nothing can be heard but the war-cry—down with monopolies, and down with the aristocracy.

PRESIDENT THE CHAMPION OF DEMOCRACY.

And now comes the grand movement! It is to put the President at the head of "the Democracy," and make him its great champion and leader in the war. And behold! forth from hundreds of well trained presses, and thousands of well disciplined partisan leaders in every quarter of the country, there go high sounding praises of the suprememinent Democracy of the President! He is the Democratic President, and has been elected by the Democracy. There is, moreover, claimed for him the representative character. Under the Administration that preceded the advent of the great "reformer," the Chief Magistrate was simply the President of the United States—the constitutional Executive. The representative character was understood to belong eminently to this body, drawn as it is from the midst of the people; elected by them for short periods; invested with the power of impeaching the President, and all other officers, in their name, and directly and exclusively responsible to them for the exercise of that and every other power. But, to carry out the scheme of deception and usurpation, it became important to claim a new and unheard-of relation between the President and the people. General Jackson, therefore, set up the pretension of being "the direct representative of the American people." Such was the claim of his memorable protest sent to the Senate in 1834—a claim intended to lay the foundation of a practical exemption from all other responsibility save a responsibility directly, without the intervention of either impeachment or investigation by Congress, to a public opinion which might be created by Executive influence through subservient subordinates and a subservient press. To give a party cast to this claim, it has, at length, assumed a new form; and the President is now presented to us (see Democratic Review for September, 1838) as "the national representative of the American Democracy." "The representative of the Democracy! Democracy personified! A living, moving, thinking, speaking representative of pure, simple, unadulterated, uncompounded Democracy!"

Such is the claim. The President is not slow in performing his part. He talks Democracy. He writes Democracy. He looks Democracy. And it is the Democracy! To monopolies he is very hostile. Against banks he utters anathemas. "Associated wealth" (see his last annual message) he cannot endure. The aristocracy are intolerable. In short, to every thing that is opposed to Democracy, and especially to "the Democracy," he is most especially, and very exceedingly opposed!

The President is thus installed as the high priest of Democracy; and it would be about as safe for a Roman Catholic to question the authority of the Pope, as for one of "the party" to question the Democracy of the President. So complete is the delusion, that when the Whigs attempt to rouse the people to a sense of the danger of the President's overgrown influence, through the abuse of Executive patronage, "the Democracy" are made to believe that that influence is exercised for their special benefit, because it is all necessary to enable the President, who is their representative, to fight their battles, and put down the aristocracy!

The danger of Executive influence and power (the greatest of all dangers in our system of government) is thus veiled from the eyes of thousands. They see the President only as a mighty champion of "the Democracy," leading on its hosts to glorious victory; while every man who will not sustain him in the holy war is held up as an aristocrat and a Federalist, with "blue lights" burning all over and around him.

Thus, sir, are the people taught to look, not to their Representatives, as the guardians of their rights, and the exponents of their will, but to the President, (strange absurdity!) to the President—armed as he is with power, through hundreds of subservient presses, and thousands of equally official dependants, to execute the purposes of his single will, and accomplish the ends of an ambition which such power continually tempts to encroachment and corruption.

Thus it is that this new-fangled system rears up a colossal structure of Executive power on the broad basis of a deceived and misled Democracy. Like the Pyramids of Egypt, whose towering height and mighty massiveness gives insignificance to every object around them, so is the President, under this mis-called Democratic system, made to tower above and overshadow every other object within the political horizon. And, sir, just in proportion as the mighty structure is spread out, and carried up, is the cry of "Democracy" increased. There is not a man who shoulders a stone or carries a hod of mortar to aid in rearing the towering mass who will not tell you that he is building up the Democracy; and no man must dare appropriate to himself the name of Democrat who will not literally strip himself to the work.

It is by such means, Mr. Chairman, that this "reforming" dynasty has been laboring, for ten years, to hoodwink the people, and make them submit to be mounted and spurred, and jaded by the "Democratic" Jehus who have driven with reckless daring over the prostrate Constitution and laws of the country. And, sir, it is amazing to contemplate the success which has attended these efforts at deception; to see the height to which the presidential office has towered; to mark the movements of its influence and power—now standing erect, in grim and surly majesty, and "taking the responsibility," and now winding its sinuous and silent way, and distilling its slow but venomous poison through every department of the Government, and every portion of the country.

A DAY OF RECKONING HAS COME.

But, sir, a day of reckoning has at length come. Results are beginning to be wrought out. The people begin to see that all is not right. They begin to learn that "diligence, talents, and integrity" have not been made the passports to office; that the great principle which has governed in Executive appointments has elevated a race of mercenary, desperate politicians, and has put into the hands of the Linns, the Boyds, the Spencers, the Prices, and the Swartwouts, the money of the people, to be lost in speculation, squandered in extravagance, or used to aid Executive power in its treacherous "conflict with the freedom of elections." Sir, they are beginning to lay down their axes, their hoes, and their hammers, and, standing up and looking you in the face in the sternness and amazement of disappointed confidence, they thunder in your ears the appalling demand—GIVE AN ACCOUNT OF THEY STEWARDSHIP! Here, say they, are your pledges of retrenchment and reform; your professions of horror at the danger of an abuse of Executive power; your boasted regard for the freedom and purity of elections; your promises to give us upright and faithful officers; and your expressed fears that, if you were not placed in power, corruption would become the order of the day. And now here is the fulfillment of your pledges and promises in the ten years' administration which you have inflicted on the country. We call on you, as our servants, to tell us why the evils you predicted have not been averted, and the good you promised has not been done; why for bread you have given us a stone, and for fish a serpent; and why, when we looked that the vineyard should bring forth grapes, it has brought forth wild grapes.

Executive Power—Mr. Slade.

Ho. of Reps.

THE PRESIDENTIAL QUESTION IN CONGRESS.

And now, sir, what is your reply to the demands of a betrayed and abused people, urged, and ably urged, as they have been, by the people's Representatives on this floor? How do you meet the facts and arguments which are pressed upon you? Sir, you do it by endeavoring to stifle investigation; by deprecating discussion; by holding us up, as the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs has done, as a debating club; and, in short, by every conceivable device which can tend to divert the public mind from the great questions we are struggling to bring out in their true magnitude and importance before the country.

It was in the spirit of this system of evasion that a gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BYNUM] yesterday told us that these lengthened discussions would not be tolerated by the people; that these attacks on the Administration were intended to act on the next presidential election; and that it was "not our business to make Presidents," but to attend to our appropriate legislative duties. "It is a dangerous practice," said the gentleman, "for us to be employed in making Presidents."

The gentleman from North Carolina seems very much alive to the danger of our being engaged in making a President. But where have slept his apprehensions for the last ten years, while the President has been making members of Congress; while he has been reaching out the long arms of Executive influence, north, south, east, and west, and bringing into these legislative Halls men who would act in obedience to his will? And where were his fears when General Jackson made his successor? Did he discover any "danger" in that operation? No, sir, none. But now, when we seek to unmake him whom General Jackson made, the case is amazingly altered! It is a "dangerous practice."

Mr. Chairman, I deplore, as much as any one, the necessity which impels to discussions and investigations here, looking to a presidential election. But how are they to be avoided? Are we to sit still and see the Executive bestriding the country with his colossal power, and not warn it of the danger? Is corruption to go unrebuked? Are the grossest abuses to pass uninvestigated? Is this body the grand constitutional inquest of the nation, invested with the power even of impeaching the President, (notwithstanding his claims to the representative character,) and are we to be told that discussion shall cease, investigation be suppressed, and the Executive held to no responsibility to the people, through their Representatives, because it is not their business to make Presidents? The abusers of power may thus talk; they do not want motives for it; but the people hold a very different language.

Sir, I am aware that the presidential question has come to engross a large share of the attention of Congress, and that discussions bearing on it interfere, often very injuriously, with the ordinary business of legislation. Once it was otherwise; but in a fatal moment it was determined to "put down" a "pure" Administration. The combination was formed, the forces marshaled, and these halls were made the chosen theater for the onset. Day after day and month after month were they made to resound with the most groundless clamor and the most bitter invective against the Administration which it had been declared, in advance, should be prostrated. It was then that the presidential whirlpool was set in motion, which has become a rapid, raging maelstrom, drawing and engulfing everything within its vortex.

And, sir, how can it now be otherwise, when the Administration, brought into power by means of the professions and pledges I have described, has disappointed a confiding people; when the President has "rushed madly" from his constitutional sphere, placed himself at the head of a party, used his patronage to build it up, and sought to make all the State governments and all the branches of this Government revolve around him as the great center of the whole? Sir, it is the abuse of power that has kept this maelstrom in motion. Let the Executive restore the balance of the Constitution which he has disturbed; let him go back to the constitutional sphere in which the predecessors of General Jackson were content to move; let him cease to pervert his patronage to selfish and party purposes; let him become the HIGH-MINDED, LIBERAL, DISINTERESTED, CONSTITUTIONAL CHIEF MAGISTRATE OF THE NATION, and the maelstrom will cease to move, and this Hall will be restored to what it was before the conspiracy was formed to put down the pure Administration.

But, sir, until this is done, investigation and discussion must and will go on here. If we will not investigate and discuss, the people will send those here who will. The great centralizing, all-engulfing power of the Executive must and will be resisted. It will be in vain to attempt to arrest this effort by telling us that it is not our business to make Presidents. Sir, we know our appropriate business. Long enough have we seen Executive influence moving around and through these Halls, and long enough have we legislated under its control. It is our first and most solemn duty to endeavor to repel it; to restore the independence of these legislative bodies; to drive the Goths and Vandals from this Capitol. We have nothing to do with making this or that man President; but we have something to do with Executive corruption and usurpation, (both of which have much to do with us,) something to do with that Executive influence which has disturbed the constitutional balance of this Government—which has made its way to the ballot-boxes, elected a President, brought into these Halls members of its own creation, and assailed the independence of these bodies by Executive bribes on the one hand, and Executive denunciation on the other; that influence, in part, so prophetically described in the report of the committee of the Senate on Executive patronage, in 1826, (made by Martin Van Buren, Richard M. Johnson, Thomas H. Benton, and others, to swell the false clamor against the "pure" Administration,) in which it was said:

"The power of patronage, UNLESS CHECKED BY THE VIGOROUS INTERPOSITION OF CONGRESS, must go on increasing." * * * "PATRONAGE WILL PENETRATE THIS BODY, SUBDUCE ITS CAPACITY OF RESISTANCE, CHAIN IT TO THE CAR OF POWER, and enable the President to rule as easily, and much more securely, with than without the nominal check of the Senate."

Sir, if it is not our appropriate business to discuss and investigate when this prediction is literally fulfilled before our eyes, then we may as well determine, at once, to submit! and when we have submitted, we shall have no more to do but to dissolve these bodies, and leave the Executive to govern the country without the forms of the Constitution.

SHALL POLITICAL TREACHERY BE REWARDED?

Having, Mr. Chairman, dwelt at some length upon the connection between the maladministration of those in power and their professions and pledges, I anticipate the inquiries—why talk so much of professions? Why dwell so long on pledges? If the Administration is bad, show it; but the measures of a bad Administration will be made no worse by proving that the men in power have made hypocritical professions, or that they have violated their pledges.

Sir, there are two questions before the country for decision, namely: Shall a corrupt and pernicious system of policy be perpetuated? and shall hypocrisy and treachery be rewarded with a triumph? It need hardly be said, sir, that the proof of the corrupt character of the policy, drawn from a consideration of its nature and tendency, finds "confirmation strong" in the professions and promises of its authors. They are judged out of their own mouths. They pronounced in advance their own condemnation, and furnished the arguments to sustain it.

But, sir, there is something in the treachery of a deliberate violation of pledges solemnly made to obtain power, which is deserving of distinct and deep consideration. While the pledges were made upon an assumption of abuses which were known not to exist, their violation has been the result of deep, settled, systematic purpose. The Administration have sinned with their eyes open—in the very face of their own professions and pledges. They have been constantly reminded of their inconsistency. They have had spread out before them General Jackson's letter to President Monroe in 1816; his address to the Tennessee Legislature in 1825; the report of the Senate committee on Executive patronage in 1826; the retrenchment report of 1828; and the inaugural address of 1829. But it has all been to no purpose, but to show the world with what perfect coolness and deliberation professions may be falsified, pledges violated, and power abused.

And now, sir, do you not perceive, in this view of the subject, a distinct and very strong reason for deprecating the triumph of those in power? Did you ever see an individual who had risen by a successful course of chicanery, to wealth and importance, triumphing in a purchased respectability, and reveling in the enjoyment of ill-gotten gain? and did you not mark the pernicious moral influence of his success—especially upon the young men of the community? Can any influence be more dangerous in private life than such examples of successful villany? And shall such examples teach us nothing? Can we fail to perceive their application? Can we shut our eyes to the moral influence which must follow a triumphant consummation of the system of political chicanery which I have described? Can we measure the height and depth, and length and breadth of its bearings on the broad and boundless future in our country's history? If, sir, the political charlatanism of this Administration is to meet with no rebuke from the people, but is to be sanctioned and rewarded by them, then, indeed, shall corruption become "the order of the day," and its current acquire a strength which it will be very difficult, if not impossible, successfully to resist.

NATURE AND TENDENCY OF THE "SPOILS" PRINCIPLE.

Sir, it is my deliberate conviction that we have arrived at a point whence, if a successful stand is not made against this current, it will become resistless and overwhelming. I do not think that we are, any of us, sufficiently awake to the existing reality on this subject. I do not believe that we are fully aware of the progress which corruption has made under the administration of the present dynasty. We have not sufficiently reflected on the nature and tendency of the principle which enters into the entire policy of the Administration touching the bestowment of Executive patronage. We have not considered how strongly it appeals to the selfish and sordid passions of our nature; nor how systematically and perseveringly the means have been sought and found of giving it effect. We have not been aware how rapidly its insidious influence is debasing the moral feelings of our countrymen, and lowering the standard of political morality. Why, sir, what an instantaneous effect must the full disclosure of this principle produce on the moral feelings of the army of office-holders scattered throughout the country? How suddenly must they feel the promptings of interest urging them to seek to retain their offices, not by an independent, manly, conscientious discharge of duty, but by a mean and selfish subserviency to the power that dispenses patronage! How, under this system, must patriotism wither at the very approach of Executive influence! How rapidly will principle yield to expediency, and self rise up and take the place of country! With how little ceremony will conscience be thrust aside as an old-fashioned puritanical counselor, unsuited to this age of political refinement and reform! How soon will office-holders come to adopt the maxim that "all is fair in politics;" naturally concluding that, if it is fair for the President to act on the mercenary principle in appointing them, it is fair to carry out the same principle in supporting him; and that, if he may bribe with patronage, they may bribe with money, and resort to every conceivable trick and stratagem to sustain his administration and perpetuate his power.

Sir, a man whose living depends on subservience to power must be "thrice armed" with virtuous principle to maintain a high and uniform political integrity. If his continuance in office is made to depend on a conscientious performance of his duty, then will his very office become the means of strengthening his good principles; while, on the other hand, if it is made to depend on subservience to power, his office will become the instrument of perpetually tempting him to debasing compliances and a total shipwreck of virtuous principle.

Thus, sir, while the great principle on which removals and appointments are made, adds to the power of the Executive, by purchasing subservient friends, it sends, through hosts of office-holders and office-seekers, contamination and corruption through the whole length and breadth of the land.

But the whole extent of the mischief is not yet disclosed. The moral influence of high station is immense and immeasurable. And what a tremendous influence on the general standard of moral feeling must be produced by the known and admitted fact that the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES is perpetually overlooking if not "punishing" honest merit, for the purpose of purchasing support to himself by the "rewarding" of political subservience and profligacy. If the CHIEF MAGISTRATE of this great nation may with impunity thus disregard sound moral principle in the daily exercise of his high functions, in what department of society will not the influence of this example be felt? Sir, it will be to our country what the original transgression was to the world, when

"Earth felt the wound, and Nature from her seat, Sighing through all her works, gave signs of woe
That all was lost."

If political dishonesty is seen in the high places of this nation, what sort of dishonesty will it not encourage and countenance? Well did General Jackson say, when addressing the Tennessee Legislature in 1825, that "corruption would become the order of the day," when but one branch of this system should be carried into execution. But if corruption to that extent was to be the effect of the practice of appointing members of Congress to office, what shall we say of the effects, direct and indirect, of the application of the mercenary principle to the entire administration: of the removing and appointing power? Sir, it is like the pestilence that walks in darkness. It contaminates the very air we breathe, and sends disease through every artery and vein of the body-politic.

But, sir, this corrupting process is carried on not only through office-holders and office-expectants, and the influence of presidential example, but through a purchased and prostituted press. The poison is thus mingled with the daily food of thousands and hundreds of thousands of minds which are fed by the newspaper press of the country, and to which it is thus administered, under disguises which render them alike unconscious of its nature, and unaware of its origin.

And, finally, there is given to the whole of these combined influences the greatest possible energy, through a party organization the most perfect, and by a party discipline the most "rigid, exact, unsparring, and inexorable."

Such is the great principle which lies at the foundation of the leading policy of the Administration: such the means of giving it efficacy; and such its withering, blighting influence on public and private virtue.

COMPARATIVE IMPORTANCE OF THE QUESTION OF EXECUTIVE PATRONAGE.

I am aware, Mr. Chairman, that, by many, the leading topic on which I have dwelt may be regarded as of comparatively inconsiderable importance. The abuse of Executive patronage is an old and trite subject. The currency, the markets, and the safety of the public moneys, are matters of present and engrossing interest. If the currency is sound, the markets good, and the public money safe, all is, by many, considered to be well. Questions of power are regarded as abstractions; and Executive encroachment is deemed a matter of no great moment, unless it comes to bear directly on the present interests of the people. Thus, the sub-Treasury scheme (five times rejected by Congress, but still the pet measure of the Administration) is, by many, thought of only in its mere pecuniary relations, without reflecting on the object of the Executive in urging it; without perceiving that its danger consists not so much in the insecurity of "leg treasurers"—manifest as that is—as in the augmented patronage and power which the system would give to the President—and which, in fact, has formed his leading motive for pertinaciously pressing it upon Congress and the country.

I am, sir, far from undervaluing the importance of these questions of the currency, the markets, and the safe-keeping of the public moneys, in their pecuniary bearings. But there are matters of mightier moment connected with them. While the last of these questions sustains a relation to that of Executive patronage and power, which gives to it its chief importance, the two former involve interests which lie quite beyond the mere comfort and gratification of pecuniary competence and independence. The true value of nothing on earth can be estimated, independently of its bearings on the higher nature of man. It is in this light only that we can justly estimate the value of individual and national prosperity; which confer the full measure of their blessings only when they minister to the high and noble purposes of moral and intellectual improvement—the truest wealth and glory of a nation. But there is danger of overlooking these interests, and making the acquisition of wealth, the advance of population, the improvement of the face of the country, the development of its physical resources, and the augmentation of its physical power, the great and all-absorbing objects of regard and effort. There is danger of forgetting that, in all these respects, we may make very rapid advances, while, in the process of doing it, we may plant, and nourish to rank vegetation, the seeds of national corruption and decay. Sir, it is not great wealth, nor natural or artificial defenses, that constitute a truly prosperous and secure commonwealth;

"But men, high minded men;
Men who their duties know, yet know their rights,
And knowing dare maintain."

Let the currency be deranged; let banks be driven to suspension; let property fall in value; let millions be sacrificed, and yet the energies of a people may remain substantially unimpaired; and they may rise from the pressure, profited by its experience, and wiser for its severe and painful inflictions.

The nation, too, may be assailed from without; it may be pressed with the demands of injustice; it may feel the shock of invasion; it may be compelled to pour out its treasures and its blood in its defense; it may be doomed to suffer reverses, and be brought to the brink of ruin; and yet it may retain unimpaired, and even invigorated, the elements of its triumph and prosperity. Invasion may unite its people; injustice may deepen their sense of right; oppression may make them feel for the oppressed; dangers may develop their resources of skill and courage; privation and hardship may give patience to endurance; and adversity may impart strength to virtue. Our own glorious Revolution presents an illustrious example of all this. The noble minds that founded our institutions, and the stern virtues that sustained them amid the perils and weakness of their infancy, exhibit some of the fruits of that severe and trying conflict.

But, Mr. Chairman, where are the redeeming qualities of that influence which silently infuses corruption into the life-blood of a people? What shall restore a nation thus contaminated? What shall change corruption into purity, convert base servility into love of country, and give to selfishness the lofty elevation of stern, uncompromising virtue? Will the Ethiopian change his skin, or the leopard his spots? Then will corruption cure its own leprosy, and the worm which is gnawing at the root of our republican institutions consume itself.

Sir, one good, sound moral principle effectually wrought into the very heart and soul of this great nation, and watchfully cherished there, is worth more for its permanent defense from foes without and its security from foes within, than all the wealth of both the Indies, and all the fleets and armies which that wealth can purchase and employ. Let the great moral principles on which our institutions are based, and which were bodied forth in the persons of our revolutionary and constitutional fathers, cease to exert a controlling influence upon the men to whom is intrusted the government of this country; and let their dereliction from these principles receive the deliberate sanction of the American people, and this nation, with all its show of high health and vigor, shall feel to its very extremities a paralysis from which it will require little less than a miracle for its recovery.

CAUSE OF DEFALCATIONS.

There has, Mr. Chairman, been much said recently about the defalcations of public officers; and the amount of losses through public agents, especially one of them, has been dwelt on with much emphasis. Sir, this is right. We may well feel the loss of the large sums of which the Treasury has been defrauded. But the amount of money lost is not the true measure of the mischief; nor would it be if it were twenty times multiplied. It rouses, indeed, the public attention; but if that attention is not fixed upon something beyond the mere loss of money, and beyond even the means of future security by checks and penalties, it will be employed to a very inadequate purpose. These defalcations have been the results of the dangerous and corrupting principle of Executive removal and appointments, to which I have called your attention.

The appointment of Samuel Swartwout—who has been suffered, by a most culpable neglect, to accumulate in his hands and squander $1,250,000—was, as I have before intimated, one of the first of the appointments made by General Jackson, after dismissing the Senate in 1829; an appointment made upon the removal of a competent and faithful officer, for the express purpose of rewarding an active and devoted partisan. The question of trustworthiness was not made the question in that case. If it had been, Jonathan Thompson would have been retained. But, no; partisan friendship and partisan services outweighed all other considerations, and Thompson was removed and Swartwout appointed.

That removal and appointment was a fair sample of the great mass of removals and appointments made under this dynasty; and it will be found that the numerous cases of defalcation have been those of men who have been thus appointed upon removals for opinion's sake. They have, as a matter of course, been more solicitous to serve the Executive than to discharge their official duties; and have, moreover, felt that they might expect special indulgence from an Executive bound to them by strong party ties, and reluctant, from motives of party pride, to have them exposed. It would have been a miracle if the public moneys had not been plundered, under such circumstances. The defalcations, therefore, which have so startled the country, have been the legitimate fruit of the corrupt use of Executive patronage with which it has been cursed for ten years, under the name of "reform." If, sir, this fruit shall lead the people to consider the nature of the tree which has produced it, and shall beget a determination to cut it down and destroy it, the nation may well afford to sustain all the losses complained of. Yes, sir; if a hundred millions, and twice a hundred millions could purchase for the country a perpetual exemption from that abuse of Executive power which I have described; if it could secure an indefinite succession of administrations, formed, in this respect, upon the model of the "pure" Administration which General Jackson "put down," it would be a richer purchase than two hundred or ten hundred millions ever made.

But, sir, what cannot be purchased with money, the people may be roused to accomplish by their votes; and I trust they are preparing to accomplish it in a manner which will be long remembered by those who have abused their confidence and betrayed their rights. They are beginning to feel their strength, and put it forth upon the massy pillars of the temple of corruption. Give them one full and fair "heave," and it shall tumble into ruins.

PRETENDED REFORM OF 1829 REALLY NEEDED IN 1839.

It is not a little remarkable, Mr. Chairman, that the abuses which the Whigs are now laboring to reform, by putting down the Administration, are of the very same nature with the pretended abuses whose reform was promised by the leaders of the present Administration party, ten years ago. If, sir, I were to search for an exhibition of the principles of Whig reform, I could find them nowhere more clearly and fully set forth than in General Jackson's letter to Mr. Monroe, in 1816; in his address to the Tennessee Legislature in 1825; in the Executive patronage report of 1826; in the retrenchment report of 1828; and in General Jackson's inaugural in 1829. What a revolution would be effected in the administration of this Government, if the principles contained in those papers could be carried out for the period of a single administration of four years. What a gratification would it be to every true Whig in the United States to see elevated to the Presidency a man who would stand up in this Hall on the 4th of March, 1841, and put forth the very language used by General Jackson on the 4th of March, 1829; provided there could be a reasonable assurance that it would be honestly and faithfully carried out in his administration. How consonant to genuine Whig principles, and how appropriate to the present state of things, would be the following portion of General Jackson's inaugural, in the mouth of a Whig President:

"The recent demonstration of public sentiment inscribes on the list of Executive duties, in characters too legible to be overlooked, the task of reform; which will require particularly the correction of those abuses that have brought the patronage of the Federal Government into conflict with the freedom of elections, and the counteraction of those causes which have disturbed the rightful course of appointment, and have placed or continued power in unfaithful or incompetent hands. In the performance of a task thus generally delineated, I shall endeavor to select men whose diligence and talents will insure, in their respective stations; able and faithful co-operation, depending, for the advancement of the public service, more on the integrity and zeal of the public officers than on their numbers. A diffidence, perhaps too just, in my own qualifications, will teach me to look with * * * * * veneration to the lights that flow from the mind that founded, and the mind that reformed our system. The same diffidence induces me to hope for instruction and aid from the coordinate branches of the Government."

Mr. Chairman, I ask no better Whig Administration than one that will make these promises and faithfully fulfill them in their true spirit. But, for one, I want no more violations of pledges—no more "keeping the word of promise to the ear, and breaking it to the hope." I would rather have an Administration that will not vow at all, than one that vows and will not pay. Let us have, at least, the reform of frankness and straightforwardness. If we must have such an Administration as the Jackson-Van Buren "reformers" have given us, let us not have it under a Whig name. Let it carry its own appropriate colors. Let it bear aloft the black flag.

CAN ANY ADMINISTRATION EFFECT A REAL REFORM?

But, Mr. Chairman, can we have an Administration that will make these pledges and faithfully redeem them? Sir, I fear we cannot; and that fear is much stronger than I entertain that we shall not have a nominally Whig Administration. Such an Administration, I trust the people are prepared to give us; but that such an Administration, or that any Administration, can now come into power and effect a genuine, thorough reform in the great matter of Executive patronage, I lament to say I very much doubt.

Sir, it is among the worst of the evils connected with the misrule of this Administration, that, while it has given to party spirit great bitterness, it has begotten an alarming indifference to the character of the means by which it may be gratified. The danger of retaliation on a change of Administration, none can fail to perceive. Such an exercise of the appointing power as shall be necessary to restore a just equilibrium, and give to each of the parties of the country their just proportion of offices, so as to divest the exercise of that power of its present party character, would, under the influence of party feelings, and a remembrance of party injustice, be very liable to degenerate into the same abuses that have marked the course of this Administration; and this liability would be increased by the diminished restraint of public opinion which has, under a ten years' Administration upon the mercenary "spoils" principle, become accustomed to the application of that principle in the exercise of the removing and appointing power. The thirst for office has been greatly increased within the last ten years; and the men who feel it have too often thought its gratification, in connection with the removal of incumbents, to be satisfied with a President who will not furnish them such gratification at the expense of such removal.

Under the influence of a perverted public sentiment, there are doubtless many Whigs who would deem a Whig President quite too scrupulous and "strait-laced," who should hesitate to follow the fashion of "rewarding friends and punishing enemies." To stay the downward progress of public sentiment in this respect, and bring it up, at once, to the point of demanding, in accordance with General Jackson's advice to Mr. Monroe, the appointment to office of men "most conspicuous for probity, virtue, capacity, and firmness, without regard to party," and requiring that the President should "act for the whole, and not a part of the community," would be an achievement little less than miraculous. General Jackson might have adopted this principle and carried it out in his Administration; for it would have been not only following his own advice, but the example of his immediate predecessor. But can it be done now? Sir, we want a President who is able to do it. It is an object of the very highest importance. He must not only have the inclination, but the power. He must possess such a weight of character and have such a hold on the confidence of the country, independently of party associations, as shall enable him to sustain his Administration upon the basis of such a reform; and carry it out successfully and triumphantly. Long enough have we had Chief Magistrates whose influence has been used to pervert the public mind to an approval of a corrupt policy. May we not have a President, at length, who will nobly take the true ground, and who can carry into his high station such a moral power as shall enable him to purify and elevate a public sentiment which that station has, for ten years, lent its whole influence to corrupt and debase?

Sir, the Whigs have a mighty work to do to achieve a victory; but, if that victory shall be achieved, there will remain a greater work to accomplish—that of wisely and justly improving it. Indeed, the victory will not, in truth, have been achieved until the principles of this Administration shall have been put down, and superseded by an elevated, disinterested, manly policy, in opposition to the groveling, selfish, vindictive one which we have witnessed for the last ten years. And, sir, let me say, that the man who can come into the Presidency in the midst of the corruptions of this period, and commence and carry forward and sustain his administration on right principles, will have achieved a triumph whose glory shall as far transcend the glory of the highest military achievement as that falls below the triumph of truth over error, patriotism over selfishness, and purity over corruption.

RIVER AND HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS.

SPEECH OF HON. R. P. MARVIN, OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 5, 1839,

On the report of the Committee of Ways and Means relating to the state of the Treasury and the expenditures of the Government.

Mr. MARVIN said that, before he concluded his remarks, he intended to move a recommitment of the report to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report a bill making appropriations to continue the improvements of the harbors and rivers, according to the estimates reported to Congress from the proper Department.

I have examined with some care (said Mr. M.) this report from the Committee of Ways and Means, and I have done so with no little astonishment. For some time previous to the coming in of this report, I had anticipated that the committee would report the usual bill for the continuance of the public works upon our northern lakes, and the improvement of the navigation of rivers, which works had been commenced under the former legislation of Congress. From the little experience I have had here, I did suppose that it was almost a matter of course that the committee should report those bills making appropriations for the continuance of those works which had been provided for by previous legislation.

I well recollect that at the last session of Congress, when we had a discussion upon the bill making appropriations for continuing the Cumberland road, a question was raised as to the opinions of a majority of the Committee of Ways and Means which had reported the bill, and that the chairman rose in his place and stated that if the committee were to report no bills to the House except such as a majority of the committee approved, very many of our appropriation bills would never be reported at all. A majority of the committee was opposed to the bill for continuing the Cumberland road; and I have understood the fact perfectly well that the majority of that committee were also opposed to the harbor bill; nevertheless it was reported at the last session of Congress, according to the recommendations of the proper department, and that, too, in exact accordance with the estimates for each work as proposed by the Department. And when I learned from this report that the committee had decided not to report a bill for the action of Congress continuing these improvements, I confess, sir, I was greatly astonished; and though generally silent here, I determined to avail myself of the earliest opportunity to vindicate these improvements from the dangerous attack which has been made upon them, and to speak freely of this report, and of the course which the Committee of Ways and Means have decided to pursue. They have taken the responsibility of nullifying the former legislation of Congress, and the recommendations of the Department having charge of these works. They have taken upon themselves the responsibility of discriminating between the recommendations of one Department and another. And so far as their action is concerned, they have determined that this House—that the Representatives of the people—shall not be trusted to vote upon the question whether these works shall be continued or abandoned. I ask whether it would not have been more respectful to the House if the committee, in accordance with well-established precedent, had reported the bill to the House, and left a majority of the Representatives of the people to act their pleasure in relation to it? We all know that the rules of the House are such, that it is very difficult to get an expression of opinion upon propositions which a member may wish to submit. If the committee will report the bill, and after a fair and full consideration, the majority here shall decide against the continuance of these works, then it will become me to submit to such decision; but until there be a fair discussion and vote upon the question, neither I nor my constituents will be satisfied.

This report, sir, is prepared with considerable ability, and displays much ingenuity in the arrangement of its matter for the purpose of accomplishing the object which the writer doubtless had in view. It goes on to speak of the increase of the expenditures of this Government from its organization to the present time. It institutes comparisons between many items or classes of expenditure in 1829, and for a few years past. It speaks of the enormous increase of expenditures under the civil list, in the Army, the Navy, and in other branches of the administration of public affairs; but, generally, these are mentioned only to be defended. Suggestions are thrown in all along to palliate and excuse the enormous increase of these expenditures, with very few exceptions, one of which is the pension system. The report then comes down to what is called the internal improvement system, and thus solemnly introduces the subject:

"The committee feel it to be their duty to bring to the special notice of the House the heavy and rapidly increasing expenditures upon harbors and rivers."

The residue of the report, constituting more than one third of the whole, is devoted almost exclusively to an assailment of these works.

I do not understand, sir, that the chairman of the committee, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] who is the author of this report, maintained that these appropriations are positively unconstitutional. It is true, he has thrown out suggestions of doubt, and has spoken of expenditures, "foreign, as your committee believe, to the original design of the Constitution;" but I say I do not understand him, anywhere in this report, to avow the opinion that such appropriations are without constitutional authority. If gentlemen shall be disposed to meet the question on constitutional grounds, I shall not object to do so at any time, as I have no doubt of the authority in the Constitution to make these appropriations for the construction of those works which are national in their character, and which are necessary to facilitate the commerce of States, and in time of war greatly enlarge our means of defense and powers of resistance. If we may rely upon the opinions of the framers of the Constitution, of those eminent statesmen who were contemporaneous with it, upon the precedents established by them, and acted upon by all Administrations, from that of General Washington down to the present; if we may rely upon the commentators upon the Constitution; if any question in this country is ever to be settled by the combined authority of legislation, of practice, and the opinions of men eminent as jurists and statesmen, then I say the constitutionality of these appropriations is settled. I will not, however, at this time, enter into a discussion of the question. Were I, however, to do so, the principal authorities which I would cite should be from that portion of the United States where this authority is now the most stoutly denied.

As to the policy and expediency of these appropriations, I will ask the attention of the House to a few facts, and, in the outset, I wish to disembarass the subject, and to relieve the harbors on the northern and northwestern lakes (for I propose to confine my remarks principally to them) from the odiousness of the large expenditures charged against them. Congress has for several years annually passed a bill, which, in common parlance here, has been called "the harbor bill." It is a bill making appropriations for harbors on the lakes and sea-coast, and for the improvement of the navigation of rivers, and for other purposes. This report states that over twelve million dollars have been expended for these purposes—for what has been denominated internal improvements. I will hereafter remark upon the manner in which these $12,302,533 66 are made up. Now, sir, what portion of this large amount has been appropriated for the lakes—for the northern coast—upon the most important frontier of the United States? The whole amount appropriated is but little over two million dollars. Previous to the last session of Congress the whole amount which had been appropriated was a little over one million six hundred thousand dollars, which had been nearly all expended upon twenty-eight works of the United States on the northern lakes.

I ask gentlemen, if they can, to point me to any part of the United States where the sum of $2,000,000 has been expended for objects more national, or where greater national benefits have been produced. It is idle to say that it is constitutional and proper to appropriate money for the improvement of harbors on the sea-coast, and for the protection of commerce upon the high seas, but that it is unconstitutional and improper to appropriate money for the improvement of harbors and for the protection of commerce on these vast inland seas. What is the amount of commerce upon these waters? How much business is done there? On Lake Erie alone the amount of tonnage is thirty-four thousand. There are upwards of fifty steamboats, and they are among the largest in the United States. The amount of commerce is now very great and is rapidly increasing. This commerce cannot be safely carried on without the protection which these harbors afford. It is out of the question. There is no natural harbor on the whole southern coast of Lake Erie.

These works were originally commenced as experiments, and they have been eminently successful. They were cheap structures in the first instance, and it is now necessary to repair them in a more permanent manner. If you withhold appropriations, what would be the consequence? what would be the condition in which these works would be left? Many of them are much exposed, and would necessarily go to decay. Could not the Committee of Ways and Means select out any other items of expenditure as the objects of retrenchment, except those which are actually necessary for the protection of our commerce and for the defense of our frontier; or was it necessary to assail these works in order to yield to the demands of a party representing another section of country, from which so much declamation is constantly heard against these appropriations? Why, sir, I am astonished at the view taken of this subject. The other day a bill came up here appropriating $500,000 for the protection of the northern frontier, and upon the bare request of the chairman of the committee, the bill was passed almost sub silentio, and I believe without a single dissenting voice. Last winter, the sum of $625,000 was appropriated for the same purpose, and the bill passed without opposition; thus, more than half as much money has been appropriated by these two bills as has ever been expended on all the harbors upon the lakes.

Mr. M. was here interrupted by the expiration of the morning hour, and the House proceeded to other business. The next day the morning hour was consumed without taking up the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, and on the day following the select committee on the public lands made a report, which took precedence for the morning hour over the consideration of the report from the Committee of Ways and Means. A bill, however, making appropriations for military purposes, came up in the House, with an amendment making the usual appropriation of $30,000 for surveys, &c.; when Mr. M. continued his remarks as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I understand that the report made this morning from the select committee on the public lands takes precedence of the consideration of the report of the Committee of Ways and Means upon which I submitted a few remarks the other morning. A debate has sprung up upon this land report, and from present appearances I presume it would not be a very extravagant prediction to say that it will occupy the morning hour for the remainder of the session, unless some other committee should come in, and by permission make a report which shall take precedence of this, and thus override it; in either event, I do not see but I am fairly cut out of my remarks if I wait for the opportunity of continuing them upon the order of business upon which they were commenced. I am assured, however, by all the old members about me, and particularly by the chairman of the Committee of Ways Means, that my remarks upon his report and in defense of harbor and river improvements will be perfectly in order in the present debate. At any rate, sir, I shall not be liable to interruption from the expiration of the morning hour. I will, therefore, proceed now in my remarks.

When arrested, the other morning, I had just called the attention of the House to the fact that two bills had been passed by the present Congress appropriating $1,125,000 for the defense of the northern frontier, a sum equal to half the amount which had ever been appropriated for the construction of harbors upon that extensive frontier. My object in calling the attention of the House to these appropriations was not for the purpose of condemning them, for I approved of them at the time, and I believe that the amount appropriated for that purpose at the last session was fruitful in good; but my object was to show that, without the aid derived from the existence of these harbors, we might have been obliged, for the purpose of accomplishing the same objects, to have appropriated double or treble that amount. I maintain that these harbors are absolutely necessary for the protection of your northern frontier, and that there are no other objects upon which money can be so judiciously expended, having in view the defense of that extensive frontier; and for the correctness of this opinion I think I might safely appeal to all your military officers having any knowledge upon the subject. Had it not been for the existence of these harbors, it might have been very difficult, during the last year, to have preserved your neutrality laws. After the patriots had abandoned Navy Island, and had dispersed themselves, with an understanding that they were again to meet at some point on the western extremity of Lake Erie, after having forwarded their arms and such munitions of war as they had, Colonel Worth, one of the most active and enterprising officers in your Army, chartered a steamboat at Buffalo, and, with a small body of men, in eight and forty hours, traversed the whole length of the lake, having landed at the principal harbors along our shore. He ran into the harbor of Dunkirk, forty-five miles from Buffalo, early in the morning, landed his men, and marched to the village of Fredonia, three miles from the lake, and seized a large quantity of the arms of the Patriots, returned to his boat, and continued his voyage, and was entirely successful in breaking up the enterprise of a set of misguided men, who were doing all in their power to involve us in a war with Great Britain. Now, sir, if these harbors had not been in existence, this enterprise of Colonel Worth could not have been performed; no such voyage could have been made.

I am now considering these works in a military point of view, and as necessary for the defense of the country, or rather as very important and necessary means of defense. I take it that it is not denied by any one that the obligation to protect and defend the country, the entire country from foreign invasion, rests upon this General Government. If I show that these works are necessary in a military view, for the defense of the country, it will then at once be conceded that they are national. I shall call the attention of the House to some extracts from the reports of United States engineers, who are superintendents of these works. I read first from the report of Mr. Smith, the engineer superintending the construction of several of these works on the southern shore of Lake Ontario. He says:

"The harbors on the southern shore of Lake Ontario are important for two purposes, commercial and military."

He then speaks of them as agents of commerce, and adds:

"The existence of such places of refuge is of great importance to those navigating the lake; for, where harbors abound, shipwrecks seldom happen, but where they do not they are frequent. The safety thus insured in the navigation of the lakes, is one of the greatest benefits that the General Government could confer, and is one, too, clearly its duty, as well as interest, to bestow."

"It has been said that these harbors are important for military purposes. In the event of a war between the United States and Great Britain, this frontier would necessarily become one of the scenes of active operations. On the Canada side of Lake Ontario, there are a great number of good natural harbors, in which vessels might be fitted, stored out, and manned, and from which, after the Welland canal has been enlarged, they might be sent out to harass the whole of the northern inland coast; and, were it not in the power of the United States to meet them with their own weapons, disastrous consequences might ensue."

"Moreover, there now exists between Kingston and Montreal an internal communication, confessedly for military purposes; and, when the contemplated ship canal around the rapids of the St. Lawrence has been constructed, the whole of this same coast might not only be exposed to the mercy of vessels from Canadian ports, but likewise to a British fleet from the ocean."

I will read, sir, another extract or two from this able report, bearing upon the question I am now considering; for I am anxious that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means should take a more enlarged and comprehensive view of the whole subject. I wish to satisfy him that the whole country has an interest in them, and that their benefits are not confined to "cities, towns, and villages," which may be located near them:

"All the artificial harbors on the southern shore of Lake Ontario, will admit, when completed, vessels drawing thirteen feet water; and Big Sodus bay is large enough to contain a fleet of any size, and well adapted for such purposes. Not only, then, will the whole of the coast be amply provided with good harbors, but the connection between them and the interior of the country is such that, at any one of them, all the munitions of war and men necessary for a military expedition could be concentrated with the utmost celerity. The facilities for conducting military movements with unusual rapidity in this section of the country are now very great, and must in a short time be still greater. For, along the whole southern coast of Lake Ontario runs the Erie canal; south from Rochester, extending across the State of New York, will be the Genesee valley canal; stretching from Big Sodus bay to the Susquehanna river, another communication; from Oswego to the Erie canal is another; from the same place to Syracuse or Utica will be a railroad; parallel to the Erie canal, the Great Western railway, beginning at the Atlantic, and terminating at the lakes; and through the southern part of the State still another, intersecting the two transverse communications."

Sir, we might here stop and pause in admiration at the wonderful change which has been wrought on that frontier since the war of 1812, and in that noble State whose shores are washed by the billows of the Atlantic, and the waves of Erie and Ontario. The question might be asked, and it would be pertinent, to what power, to whose enterprise, is the United States—yes, sir, the United States—indebted for these works of intercommunication, which enable them to transport troops and munitions of war with a celerity and at an expense unknown in any other part of the world? But, sir, I will continue to describe things as they exist, and for the present leave gentlemen to make the application, begging them to bear in mind that my proposition is, that this Government is bound to defend the country, and that these harbors are necessary for the defense of one of its most important frontiers.

In the extract which I have just given from Mr. Smith's report, mention is made of Big Sodus bay, and it is said to be large enough to contain a fleet of any size. In the report made last year by the local superintendent, Mr. Swift, I find this description of Big Sodus bay:

"This bay extends to the south five miles from its entrance into Lake Ontario, and two and a half miles in width, which forms a sheet of water of twelve square miles, affording an anchorage to any number of vessels of the increasing navigation of the lake in water of from twelve to forty feet in depth."

He adds that "it is now connecting with Lakes Cayuga and Seneca and the river Susquehanna by a canal and a railroad."

Now, sir, this harbor or bay was inaccessible from the lake by reason of a sand bar at its entrance or communication with the lake. At a moderate expense the obstruction may be removed, and vessels in time of war may take shelter here, where they will be perfectly safe, as the entrance to the bay may be easily defended.

Sir, I have not been thus particular in calling the attention of the House to a particular description of some of these harbors on Lake Ontario because they are more important, in a military point of view, than others; for such is not the fact. They are all important, and are all intimately connected with the interior by means of roads, canals, rivers, and railways; and most of them have a large commerce with Canada, and with remote parts of the United States. The trade between Oswego and the upper lakes is very great. And are these mere works of local interest, constructed for the sole benefit of the towns or villages near them? This is a narrow, limited, and illiberal view of the whole matter, unworthy of the spirit of the age in which we live. I have already remarked that there are no natural harbors on the southern shore of Lake Erie; and perhaps there is no more dangerous navigation in the world than upon this lake. If, in case of a war between this country and Great Britain, we are to have the command of this lake, we must complete the harbors on our coast, and keep them in a safe condition. Without them, it would be impossible to maintain a navy upon the lake. Your ships might be destroyed by the elements in a much less time than was consumed in their construction. If hostilities shall ever break out on that frontier, the battle must be fought on the water. The enemy must never be allowed to set foot upon our soil. Our cities and villages are now scattered all along upon the border; and if an enemy were allowed to land upon our shores, the destruction to property would how be far greater than in the late war. The report of the committee speaks of "steam batteries" for the defense of harbors, and suggests the propriety, instead of authorizing any further expenditures for fortifications, that, for the present, we confine our expenditures to the armament of the fortifications we have finished, and await the result of future experiments, which will become necessary to ascertain whether floating steam batteries are not superior to stationary fortifications in guarding the entrance into, and in defending harbors.

I am inclined, myself, to the opinion, that our system of harbor defense along the coast will, in a short time, undergo an entire revolution, and, instead of depending upon fortifications on the land, our fortifications will be built upon the water, and will be floated by the power of steam from place to place in our large bays and harbors. But if this mode of defense is to be resorted to, will it dispense with the necessity of harbors? Most assuredly not. Perhaps the gentleman, while writing this part of his report, had no thoughts of these inland seas which divide us from a foreign country, and over which, in case of war, we must have the command, over which we must be supreme, cost what it may, for we have no fortifications along their shores to defend our numerous cities and villages. I am of the opinion, sir, that our supremacy upon these waters is to be secured and maintained by armed steamboats, which, instead of being subject to the instability of the winds, will be, under ordinary circumstances, propelled by steam, and move from one end of the lake to the other. A very few of them will, in all probability, be sufficient to defend our commerce on the lakes and the country bordering on them. But you can neither have steam batteries, steam ships, or boats, or vessels, or navy of any kind upon these lakes without harbors. Why, sir, I have been, and still am, astonished at the persevering opposition which is made to all appropriations having for their object the improvement of the country. On the score of economy, there never were, in my judgment, any $2,000,000 more judiciously expended, if we look simply to the placing of the country in a proper state of defense, than the $2,000,000 expended upon these harbors. I have been looking into the expenditures of this Government, and I find that, previous to 1812, the expenditures for what is called "military services, including fortifications, arsenals, armories, ordnance, internal improvements," &c., varied from $632,807 to (in 1809) $3,335,772. In 1811 they were $3,032,828. The average to 1812 is between one and two millions annually. In 1812 these expenditures rose to $11,817,798; in 1813 to $19,652,013; in 1814 to $20,350,806; in 1815 they were $14,794,294; in 1816 they were $16,012,096; thus showing the expenditures under this head in five years to amount to $82,627,007. This, sir, was a part of the cost of the second war of independence; and I have called the attention of the House to these items for the purpose of remarking that wars are very expensive at all times, and that their expense is very greatly enhanced in the absence of all facilities for carrying them on. A large portion of this amount was expended in the defense of the northern frontier.

I maintain that at the present time, in the present improved condition of the country, with our extensive works of internal improvement connecting all sections of the interior with the frontier, with our numerous harbors on the lakes, and with the great resources of the country in the immediate neighborhood of the seat of war, all the military operations which were then performed could now be performed at an expense to the United States not exceeding fifty per cent. of the amount which was then actually and necessarily expended. How immensely important, then, in a military point of view, do all these improvements become. Our documents show us that the war in Florida with a few Indians, which has been going on for two or three years, and which is not yet terminated, has cost us about $20,000,000. And why has it been so expensive? One reason is that you had to create and bring into existence there nearly everything which was necessary for the prosecution of the war. Large sums have been expended in making roads and constructing bridges for the army—your wagons were to be imported—from five to ten thousand dollars a month have been paid for the use of steamboats—nothing could be done without great expense, owing to the condition of the country, and the want on the spot of all the facilities for conducting the war. I do not mean to say that there has not been great extravagance there, a wasteful and prodigal expenditure of the public money. I believe that there has been; but in the unimproved condition in which that portion of the country was at the time that the war broke out—I mean, sir, destitute of all the resources, the aids upon which an army relies—the expenditures at best must have been great. Would it not have been good policy, if this war could have been foreseen, to have expended a million or two of dollars in creating in that country the necessary facilities for the army?

Sir, there have been expended since the organization of the Government under the present Constitution, up to 1837, inclusive, for what is called the "military service," including fortifications, &c., $234,549,966. The "naval establishment" has cost us, for the same period, $134,881,122. Out of the former sum about two millions have been expended in the construction of harbors upon the northern and northwestern lakes, upon a coast of about two thousand miles in extent, for one of the most important and exposed frontiers; and which expenditure, I venture to say, has been more productive in developing the resources of the country, in strengthening and increasing its power, in binding together in the strong bonds of interest distant and remote sections of this great country, than double the like expenditure anywhere else; and yet, notwithstanding all these beneficial effects, these great national results from so small an outlay, the cry of denunciation, from a certain quarter, is constantly heard upon this floor, and now the Committee of Ways and Means come in, and, with all the power which their position gives them, unite with the enemies of these works.

But it is time, sir, that I proceed to consider the importance of these works in their relation to commerce; and here I greatly deceive myself, if I shall not be able to vindicate the national character of and general interest in them. I lay down the proposition, in the beginning, that it is the duty of this General Government to afford protection to the commerce of the country. It is a national obligation, and arises out of the very nature and objects of the Union. This Government possesses the exclusive power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States. It possesses the exclusive power of levying imposts, and collecting duties. One great object in the formation of the present Constitution was the protection of our commerce, and that there should be a system of commerce for the whole country—a uniformity in commercial laws and regulations. The proposition which I lay down will not be disputed as long as we expend annually so many millions in supporting our Navy upon the high seas for the protection of our commerce in all parts of the world, and in constructing harbors along the sea-coast for the safety of the merchantman.

Well, sir, I contend that the commerce on the lakes is equally entitled to protection with that upon the high seas. The internal commerce of any country is as important to it as its external; indeed, it will have little foreign commerce if its internal commerce be limited and obstructed. Facilities must be afforded for the transportation of the productions of the interior, and for the introduction of foreign articles for consumption in exchange.

If gentlemen will turn their attention to the actual state of things in this country, I apprehend that they will find that the internal, the domestic trade of this country, far exceeds its foreign trade. I mean, that the commerce, in the productions of the country, among the several States of this Union, and the people of those States, far transcends all the foreign commerce of this country. Much of this commerce is carried on between States separated many hundred or a thousand miles from each other, and the channels of communication are the great lakes upon your northern border, your mighty rivers which penetrate the interior for thousands of miles from the ocean. Now, sir, it is idle to say that you will spend millions annually for the protection of foreign trade, and that you are under no obligation to expend a dollar to facilitate and protect the internal trade of the country. Allow me, sir, for a few moments, to call the attention of the House to some of the data, showing something of the extent of this internal commerce, and every American citizen may well be proud of his country, as its resources, its power, and its wealth are developed and spread out before him.

River and Harbor Improvements—Mr. Marvin.

In a document recently laid upon our tables, coming from the Secretary of the Treasury, it is stated that "the tonnage of all the steamboats in the United States is computed to exceed one hundred and fifty-five thousand nine hundred and seventy-three. Of this, one hundred and thirty-seven thousand four hundred and seventy-three is in boats ascertained or reported. By the official returns, the whole tonnage would now probably equal near one hundred and sixty thousand tons, having been, in 1837, equal to one hundred and fifty-three thousand six hundred and sixty." The report adds, that "in England the tonnage is estimated to have been sixty-seven thousand nine hundred and sixty-nine, in 1836." This great amount of tonnage is all employed in the home trade, the internal commerce of the country. Our steamboat tonnage is considerably more than double that of Great Britain. I read further from this interesting document:

"The whole number of steamboats ascertained and estimated to be now in this country is eight hundred. In England, in 1836, the whole number is computed to have been six hundred. On the western and southwestern waters alone, near four hundred are now supposed to be running, where none were used till 1811, and where, in 1834, the number was computed to be only two hundred and thirty-four."

From this extract, and the one I have just read, showing the amount of tonnage, it appears that the steamboats in the United States are much larger than in England. It is stated, in this report, that the average tonnage of the steamboats in the United States is about two hundred. Observe, too, sir, the rapid increase of steamboats on your western waters, "where none were used till 1811, and where, in 1834, the number was computed to be only two hundred and thirty-four," and, but for the expenditures of the General Government, in removing the snags and sawyers from the noble rivers upon which these boats float, how many do you suppose there would now be? But it is time, sir, that I called your attention to the water craft upon the lakes, as showing the amount of business done upon them. And here, sir, I think I shall have no difficulty in showing the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means that they have kept pace with the "rapidly increasing expenditures" so much condemned in his report.

Mr. Brown, an intelligent and enterprising United States engineer, having charge last year of several of the works on Lake Erie, states, in his report of last year, that "There are now fifty steamboats on Lake Erie, whose tonnage amounts to ten thousand five hundred tons; and eleven more launched and on the stocks, which will be ready next season, whose tonnage will be about five thousand tons; and there are two hundred and thirty ships, brigs, schooners, and sloops, amounting to fourteen thousand nine hundred and thirty-one tons. The steamboats make their trips once a week, and the sail vessels once in two weeks; so that the coasting trade of the upper lakes, next season, will amount to seventy-five thousand nine hundred and four tons per month. To the residents in this section of the country, it is well known that the whole of this immense commerce owes its safe existence to the United States harbor improvements."

Allowing six months as the period of navigation, it shows you an amount of tonnage per annum, of over four hundred and fifty-five thousand tons.

Mr. Williams, an able engineer of the Topographical Corps, who is the present general superintendent of the United States works on the lower part of Lake Erie, in his report of last fall, states the aggregate tonnage for Lakes Huron, Michigan, and Erie, the bulk of which, he says, belongs to the latter, at thirty-four thousand tons, and that there are in all about three hundred vessels. The amount of tonnage belonging to Buffalo and its immediate vicinity is ten thousand three hundred and forty-one tons; and he adds:

"The whole amount of tonnage belonging to the port of Buffalo and vicinity, in 1830, was one thousand nine hundred and fifty tons; being an increase of eight thousand four hundred and eleven tons, or four hundred and thirty per cent., at Buffalo alone, in seven years."

Here is an increase of tonnage and business, I venture to say, not paralleled in any other portion of the world; owing their existence, in the emphatic language of Mr. Brown, to the United States harbor improvements. In 1832 the amount of canal tolls received in Buffalo, principally on freight going forward on the Erie canal to Albany, from the country bordering on the lakes above, amounted, in round numbers, to $66,000; in 1836, to $158,000. It is well known that this is no fair index of the increase of business upon the upper lakes. During all this period the emigration into this vast country bordering upon the upper lakes, particularly into Michigan, the northern part of Illinois, and Wisconsin, has been so great that heavy drafts have been made upon the country bordering upon the southern shore of Lake Erie, principally Ohio, for breadstuffs to feed the new settlers, till they should be able to produce a supply for themselves. This state of things will not long exist; indeed, it is now nearly, if not quite, at an end; and hereafter all these sections of country will produce a surplus which must seek a market east of the lakes. The business, therefore, in my judgment, will go on increasing for some years to come, in a much greater ratio than heretofore.

It will be seen by the extracts I have read from these documents, that about one tenth of all the steamboat tonnage of the United States is upon Lake Erie alone. What reflections does this fact alone produce? In number, they are one sixteenth part of the whole. This shows that they are, on an average, larger than the other boats in the United States.

The first steamboat which floated upon Lake Erie was launched in 1818. It was named the Walk-in-the-Water. And we have now the largest steamboats in the United States, with the exception of one—the Natchez.

Mr. GIDDINGS remarked that the Great Western, recently launched on Lake Erie, was larger than the Natchez.

Mr. MARVIN. Well, sir, we have, then, the largest steamboats in the United States upon this lake, and I think my friend from Ohio for correcting me, and claiming the honor as belonging to the enterprising proprietors of steamboats on the lake. The tonnage of several of these boats is between seven and eight hundred tons. But, sir, the comparison is not fairly and fully made if we confine ourselves to steamboats alone. Nearly all the commerce upon your great western rivers is carried on by means of steamboats, and no ships or schooners are employed but upon the lakes. We can avail ourselves of the power of the winds as well as steam; and hence it is that there are employed on the upper lakes near two hundred and fifty ships, brigs, schooners, and sloops, which, in the aggregate, exceed eighteen thousand tons.

Now, sir, all these steamboats in the United States, together with the other vessels on the lakes, are employed exclusively in the inland, the internal trade of the country, in the commerce between and among the several States, in transporting the productions of one State to another. None of them are employed in the foreign trade, though they feed and sustain with the rich productions of the interior your foreign trade, and receive in exchange the various products of foreign climes, and distribute them among your citizens in all parts of this wide-spread Confederacy, from the Atlantic to the Rocky mountains. I now ask, sir, in all candor, whether the construction of works absolutely necessary for the safety of this immense business, and without the construction of which this commerce could not exist, is a matter beneath the notice or care of this Government? Are works which are prominent agents in producing such results mere local "county, city, town, and village improvements?"

Near four hundred of these splendid floating storehouses which are propelled by steam are to be found in the valley of the Mississippi; upon that mighty river and its tributaries, many of which claim for themselves the proud career of more than a thousand miles before they are lost in and swallowed by the Father of Waters, which, without apparent augmentation, pursues its majestic course to the ocean. The power of steam has successfully combated and overcome the powerful current of these great rivers, and your noble steamers now plow their way in safety from the Gulf of Mexico up these rivers nearly to their sources. On these rivers and in these boats the commerce of a region of country unsurpassed in fertility and natural resources, sufficiently extensive to afford a comfortable home for all the inhabitants of Europe, is carried on; and the commerce of this vast region, accumulating and increasing from year to year and from age to age, is always to continue to flow in these natural channels, supplying the millions of our people who are to inhabit the country with the comforts and luxuries of life, stimulating them to industry by the advantages that they possess in sending their abundant surplus to market and bring their labor and their enterprise into competition with the labor and enterprise of the whole world. Sir, a home in the center of this vast continent would be little desired and would possess few attractions if there were no natural inlets or outlets to it. Few would be found to make it an abiding place. Our admiration and our patriotism should ever be deeply awakened when we contemplate the great extent and wonderful resources of our country. And where nature has not accomplished all that we desire, but has left something for man to do in removing obstructions, or erecting safeguards, instead of grudging the means necessary, it is the part of wisdom and patriotism to grant them liberally. Appropriations have been made by the General Government to remove obstructions in these rivers, and without the removal of those obstructions no business could have been safely done upon them. Will it be contended that these appropriations are local? for mere local objects? that they are not of general interest?

Sir, these rivers are the highways for the commerce of States, of numerous States, of half the States in the Union; and there is no State in the Union that is not deeply interested in them. Ask Massachusetts whence comes the pork for the supply of her people engaged in manufacturing; and she will answer, much of it from Cincinnati, by the way of the Ohio, the Mississippi; and the ocean; and the cotton to feed her million spindles comes from Arkansas, Mississippi, and Louisiana. And Massachusetts pays the debt thus incurred by returning from her manufactories the fabrics necessary for the comfort of their people. The objects of these appropriations are not local, they are general. Suppose, sir, some snag, or sawyer, or other obstruction, is required to be removed from that part of the Mississippi river which washes the shore of the State of Mississippi: which State shall perform the service? Shall Mississippi do it? She may say no; Kentucky; Missouri, Ohio, or even Pennsylvania, is as much, and perhaps more, interested in it than Mississippi. Say to Kentucky, "you must do it," and the answer would be, "no; Kentucky will not expend her means for making an improvement in which a dozen other States have as direct and deep an interest;" and thus the snag or sawyer will remain, endangering the whole navigation of the river, and putting at hazard the lives of thousands of our citizens. It is possible, indeed probable, that Mississippi, or some private company under her authority, would consent to undertake the business of keeping the river clear and free from obstructions along her border, if you will permit them to levy a duty upon all the commerce and all the passengers that use the river; but this would not for a moment be endured. The navigation of the river is free, and so it must forever remain.

No, sir; these are great national works, of national interest, of general concern; they affect large portions of the people of the United States directly; and all of them, in a greater or less degree; they must be under the direction and control of one head; of a single power, a common power; that power which regulates trade with foreign nations, and among the several States.

But, sir, I will return to the lakes; and I must be indulged in reading still further from the reports in relation to these harbor improvements. I fear that the Committee of Ways and Means have not read them. They are full upon the questions I am now considering, and their importance is urged in a manner more forcible than I can employ.

The proposition which I have laid down is, that it is the duty of the General Government to protect the commerce upon these lakes; and I have already remarked that there can be little or no commerce on these waters without the creation of artificial harbors as places of resort and refuge, and that in the natural condition of Lake Erie there are no harbors. All our harbors upon that coast are artificial; often, and I may say generally, made at a small expense, compared with their importance. I read now, sir, the general remarks of Mr. Smith, the general superintendent of most of the public works on Lake Erie, contained in his report of last year, and which preceded the particular description of each work under his charge:

"Until the commencement of the system of improvement of the lake harbors by the Government of the United States, the immense extent of country occupying the south shore of Lake Erie, or dependent on it for commercial facilities, was a wilderness. The navigation of the lake was attended with the utmost delay, difficulty, and danger. The mouths of the several streams emptying themselves into the lake were uniformly obstructed by sand and vegetable matter, creating stagnant bodies of water which overflowed the lowlands for miles, generating an atmosphere which rendered the country nearly uninhabitable from disease; at the same time that the streams themselves were entirely inaccessible as a refuge for vessels, and in all respects an evil rather than a benefit to the surrounding country. It is almost unnecessary to say that the judicious improvements made under the acts of Congress have entirely changed all this; and many millions of acres of land of the most fertile description, embracing the western portion of the State of New York, the northern part of Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois; and the whole of Michigan, owe their present settlement and improvement, in a very great degree, to this cause. These improvements have also been the direct cause of the unexampled sales of the public lands in the northwestern States and Territories, lying along or dependent on the great lakes for their principal means of access and commerce. The mouths of the Huron, Black river, Cuyahoga, Grand river, Ashtabula, and Conneaut—across each of which the beach of the lake was continuous, and the only drain for which was by filtration through the sand—were opened, and kept open by piers and other improvements; beacon light-houses have been erected, and these streams, as well as other works at the east end of the lake, now afford secure harbors, accessible at all times to vessels navigating the lake. The improvement at the mouth of the Raisin, the only one on Lake Erie within the State of Michigan, is of similar character, though from its greater difficulties it has been rather more expensive."

This extract furnishes much matter for reflection. It clearly sustains my position that the commerce on the lake is dependent upon the harbors, and that without them, it could not be successfully prosecuted. Observe that many of those rivers in the mouths of which our vessels now find safety from the storms, and upon which are now located many of the finest and most flourishing cities and villages of Ohio, formerly found their way into the lake by filtration through the sand thrown up by the action of the water. In times of freshet or high water, they would open a passage for themselves into the lake, and the improvement now consists simply in extending parallel piers or jetties into the lake to a sufficient depth of water, and beyond the action of the beach or sand, and thus confining the current of the river, and enabling it, at all times, to preserve a clear and open channel.

Mr. Smith stated further that "These works, originally but experiments, though now found so admirably to answer the purpose for which they were designed, were built of perishable materials; it is generally to render them permanent, that the appropriations are recommended on the estimates for the coming year. The nature of the permanent improvement is to remove the woodwork of the piers, already much decayed, to the depth of two feet below low water mark, and erect on the old foundation a superstructure of stone. Unless this course is adopted without delay, the action of time and the elements will speedily render useless all that has been found of such vast benefit to the commerce of the West. This has been done at Buffalo heretofore, and has since my last report, been, under the appropriation of last year, fairly commenced at Cleveland. By using the old work as a foundation, permanent works may be erected at comparatively small cost, sufficient to defy the action of the elements for ages; but I beg leave to urge again that the commencement should not be delayed for a moment."

Other engineers take the same view of this matter, and press upon us the importance of rendering these works permanent, and completing them in a style which will insure their durability, and relieve them of the constant expenses which are now necessarily incurred in making repairs to prevent their entire demolition. Mr. Brown says, speaking of Dunkirk harbor,

"That the timber work above water decays rapidly, and this cause has already been productive of great expense and injury. In the last three years the sum of $8,000 has been laid out in repairs, which would have been unnecessary if the material used above water had been stone. Nothing can show more forcibly than this fact the propriety of proceeding, without delay, to place on a permanent footing these Government works, which experience has shown to be productive of such immense benefits."

These works were originally but experiments. And it was a matter of great doubt whether they would succeed. Their success is now fully tested; they are built of cribs formed of timbers, which are sunk in the lake and filled with stone; they adhere firmly to the bottom, and there is no danger of their being displaced or removed by the action of the water, unless it makes a breach over them. The timber part above water is rapidly decaying; and in some instances is now in a dilapidated condition. It will readily be perceived that if they are suffered to remain in their present exposed condition, there is imminent danger of the upper part being washed away; and whenever this is the case, it will be the work of but a few hours, in a violent storm, to plow up and sweep away the whole structure, thus destroying your harbor, and wasting, by your ill-advised and unwise parsimony, all which you had previously expended. The plan now is to remove all the wood-work which is exposed to the action of the wind and water, or, in other words, to decay, and erect upon the present foundation, which is the best in the world, a permanent superstructure of stone and masonry. It is believed that these works will then be safe and permanent, and that but very little, if anything, will thereafter be required to keep them in repair. If you enter upon this work at once, without delay, the expense will not be great; the foundation, the most expensive part, is there—is completed. But if you delay you may lose this foundation entirely. Is it the part of wisdom, then, to procrastinate, to stop here? I think not, sir. I think with the engineers, that it is all-important that not a moment be lost.

Sir, true economy demands that the works be prosecuted without intermission. Your engineers and superintendents are now on the spot, with all the information they have acquired from past experience. You have now the tools and implements necessary; you have dredging machines; you have men, laborers who have acquired experience in this business. Is it wise to discharge them? But it is said that one half of the amount appropriated last year is to be expended this. There are nine harbors out of the twenty-five on the lakes, for which appropriations were made, where the appropriation was, in each case below twelve thousand. And, in these cases, nothing was reserved for the present year, and some of them are now much exposed, and require immediate appropriations.

Mr. LEGARE was understood to admit the importance of these works, but asked why the States did not make them?

Mr. MARVIN. I will endeavor to answer the question of the honorable gentleman. Sir, I have maintained all along that this Government should construct those works which are national in their character; which are of general interest; in which the commerce of States participated. I do not advocate the construction of works by this Government in a State, such as roads, canals, and railways, which are peculiarly State works, and upon which the State may charge tolls. I would not to-day vote an appropriation of a million dollars to aid my own State in the enlargement of its Erie canal, or for the construction of a turnpike or railway. These are works which can be much better performed by State authority. They may be used for national purposes, and may partake, in many instances, of a national character, but the State can and should make them, and control their use, and charge a reasonable toll upon them for its own indemnification. But how is it in relation to these harbors along your northern coast? They are for the protection of commerce generally—the commerce of many States.

Why, sir, to illustrate, take the harbor of Dunkirk, in my district, situated forty-five miles from Buffalo; steamboats leaving Buffalo daily, bound up the lake to Cleveland, Detroit, or Chicago, run into Dunkirk for a supply of fuel, land and receive passengers, and pursue their voyage. Ships going up or coming down the lake, encounter a storm, and run into Dunkirk as a place of refuge and to avoid shipwreck. Now, does not the honorable gentleman perceive that Ohio, Michigan, and all the country beyond Dunkirk, are more directly interested in this harbor than the State of New York, although it is situated in New York? Which State, then, shall construct it, and keep it in repair? Is this a local work? No, sir; Massachusetts and all the eastern States are directly interested in it. Indeed, sir, so far as western New York is concerned, I might say, if I could be actuated by so narrow and illiberal views, that all these harbors on the upper lakes are prejudicial. The staple production of that part of the State is wheat, which finds a market in our eastern cities and the New England States. Now, sir, break up the commerce of the lake by destroying the harbors and preventing Ohio from coming into competition with our farmers, and they will enjoy a monopoly to a great extent. But I repudiate the argument; I go for the great good of the whole, for facilities which will enable us to trade with all parts of the country, and thus equalize the value of labor and the productions of the country. And we maintain that those harbors along the lake coast are as much national as those along the Atlantic coast, and that this Government is as much bound to construct them as it is to improve the harbor at Charleston, or to erect and keep up the numerous light-houses on the sea-coast. The great difference is, that where one dollar is required for the protection of our trade on the lakes, hundreds are required and expended for the same purpose on the high seas.

Let this Government perform its duty and its part in these great enterprises, and the States of the North and Northwest, at any rate, will perform theirs. Why, sir, they are now greatly in advance. There are now over two thousand five hundred miles of canals and railways already constructed, or in the process of construction, by the States bordering on the upper lakes, whose common center is Lake Erie. Illinois is tapping, by a gigantic work, Lake Michigan, thus connecting that lake with the Mississippi. Indiana is engaged in some of the most noble enterprises of the day, and the extent of her canals and railways will soon enable her to take her place by the side of those States which led the way in internal improvements. Ohio has connected her noble river with the lake, and she is still pressing forward with other important works calculated to develop her great resources. Michigan, though a State of but yesterday, has boldly put forth her strength, and is connecting by several lines one great lake with another. Eligibly situated, nearly surrounded by the lakes, possessing many valuable harbors, she is connecting the interior with them. I need not mention generally the works of Pennsylvania, but I will call the attention of gentlemen to one which has been recently undertaken, and its importance to the United States for military purposes will readily be perceived. I allude to the Sunbury and Erie railway, which will open a direct communication between Philadelphia and Erie, upper Lake Erie, and bring Philadelphia within about four hundred miles of the lake. Sir, suppose, during the last war, that Erie harbor had been improved as it now is, and this communication by railway between Philadelphia and Erie had been completed; how many million dollars could have been saved to this Government in carrying on the operations of the war?

As to my own State, it will not be denied that she has performed, and is performing, her duty to herself, to the States west of her, and to the United States. She asks no aid from this Government, or any other, in constructing her great works and completing her splendid and magnificent system of internal improvement. She has decided, and is now prosecuting vigorously the enlargement of her Erie canal, at a cost which will probably exceed fifteen million dollars. This is done for the accommodation of the trade of the great West bordering on the upper lakes.

Mr. LEGARE inquired as to the tolls collected on the canal.

Mr. MARVIN. It is true, sir, that the State expects that the revenue to be derived from the canal will, in time, reimburse the State; but, at the same time, the enlargement is for the benefit of the West. As you increase the volume of water in the canal, you will lessen the cost of transportation. While upon this subject of the State improvements, I will read an extract from Mr. Smith's report, to which I have already called the attention of the House, showing the important and intimate connection between the United States works on the lakes and State works leading into the interior, into the very heart of the Republic; and hence their importance in military and commercial points of view:

"In regarding them in a commercial point of view, not only must the nature of the harbors themselves be considered, but likewise their relation with the interior of the country, with other States, and with Canada. Their relation with the interior of the country is highly important; for nearly all the improvements now going on or contemplated within the State of New York will be connected, either directly or indirectly with the waters of Lake Ontario. The enlargement of the Erie canal, which runs parallel with, and is but a short distance from, the shore of the lake, has been commenced, and will be prosecuted with all the energy possible. The increase to be given to its breadth, and depth will make it large enough to receive vessels navigating the lakes; and when it has been completed, the communication between the Atlantic and western States will be greatly facilitated. The construction of the Genesee Valley canal, by which the Erie canal at Rochester will be connected with the Alleghany river at Olean, will open one of the most extensive and fertile regions in the State of New York to this channel of internal communication. The pine lumber of Alleghany county, the wheat of the Genesee valley, and the bituminous coal and iron ore of Pennsylvania, will all seek a market by this route, until the New York and Erie railroad has been constructed, or the navigation of the Alleghany river improved. The improvement of the navigation of the Alleghany river, which is said to be quite feasible, would at once open an internal navigable route between the Genesee valley and that of the Ohio river, thus facilitating still more the increasing business between the eastern and western States. Besides opening the whole country south of Rochester to Lake Ontario, the construction of a ship-canal between Big Sodus bay and the Erie canal at Clyde, to be continued from thence to Cayuga lake, is contemplated. The Cayuga, Seneca, and Crooked lakes are connected by means of canals, and are surrounded by a country well settled and in a high state of cultivation, with a rich soil, producing wheat, grass, and fruit in great abundance. The construction of such a canal would not only give great water power near its debouch into the lake, but would open the whole of this fine region of country to Lake Ontario, thereby forming a line of internal navigation of six hundred miles in extent, and, when taken in connection with the Ithaca and Owego railroad and the Chemung canal, opening a direct communication between the lakes and the Susquehanna river."

Here, sir, are collected, in this extract, some of the great enterprises of a single State, and their direct connection with the works of other States, and the harbor improvements of the General Government. The latter are necessary to complete the system, and to connect the State works together, and as I have endeavored to show, are of such a character that they cannot be constructed and controlled by the States. The amount expended and to be expended by the General Government is a mere fraction of the amount which the States will have expended. And is this whole system to be broken up, and all the commerce dependent upon it to be abandoned, from the neglect of this Government to perform its duty? I trust not, sir. But, sir, I have not done with this report of the Committee of Ways and Means, this general declaration of war against harbor and river improvements.

"Should these Federal expenditures be permanently continued, [says the report,] they must corrupt the legislative branch, and entirely change the practical operations of our Government from its original and constitutional design."

Really, sir, I am at a loss to discover how the Government is to be entirely changed "from its original and constitutional design" by carrying out the very objects of the formation of the Government. I have always understood that one of the main objects of the Union was general protection to the whole country and its commerce. But, it seems, it will "corrupt the legislative branch." May not the legislative branch be trusted with these appropriations as well as others?

"The whole amount appropriated and invested is $12,300,000, of which $5,190,000 has been granted to a district of country not one hundred and fifty miles from the capital."

Is it quite fair, in presenting the indictment against harbors and rivers, to include over three million dollars which have been assumed for the corporations of this District, contracted in building a canal, on which I have never yet seen a boat, and assumed by the United States to save these corporations from being sold to the Dutch? I, sir, am not defending such appropriations. I only advocate those great national works which serve to connect the State works and bind the Union together. I place the question upon broad and comprehensive grounds; I ask not for money to build roads and canals in the States; but when great and remote sections of the Union may be connected and bound together in the strong bonds of interest, by overcoming or removing some intervening obstacle, let it be done. This great country is naturally divided into three great sections, the East, the middle, or the Mississippi valley, and the North. And is it not of national importance to unite them; and, by a few great connecting links, bind the whole country together for its common defense and common welfare? Take the Alleghany river, which is one of the principal branches of the Mississippi, and which flows out of the northern "section." By rendering it navigable from Pittsburg to Olean, in the State of New York, you at once connect the whole valley of the Mississippi with the northern section of the Union. You supply the connecting link between all the works of internal improvement in New York, and all the rivers, and State works communicating with them, in that vast valley west of the mountains. Nature had so strongly indicated this river as an important connecting link between the North and the South-west, as an important channel for military and commercial purposes, that Mr. Calhoun, while Secretary of War, in his celebrated report of 1819, in relation to national improvements, mentions it as one of the great channels to be improved by the General Government. Sir, this river furnishes four fifths of the water constituting the Ohio below the junction of the Monongahela and the Alleghany; while the former furnishes twenty thousand cubic feet per minute, the latter furnishes eighty thousand cubic feet. The improvement of this river is a mere extension of the navigation of the Ohio into the State of New York.

If the navigation of this river had been improved previous to the last war, this Government would have saved double and triple its cost in the transportation of cannon and munitions of war to the frontiers. Mr. Calhoun, who was Secretary of War, saw and appreciated all this. And will it be maintained that this is a local work—a work not national in its character? Why, sir, the present Secretary of War, in his annual report, called our attention to one of these connecting links. He asks for an appropriation to make a survey between Fox river (which discharges itself into Green bay) and the Wisconsin. Only a few miles divide these streams, and he recommends a survey, "with a view of establishing a water communication from Lake Michigan to Mississippi river, which would be in the highest degree important to this Department in time of war, and useful for the transportation of supplies in time of peace." These are the kind of works, sir, which I advocate; but I suppose, in the estimation of the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, they are "foreign to the original design of the Constitution."

But, says the chairman of the committee, whose duty it is to point out the "ways and means" for carrying on the Government, we have not the means to go on as heretofore. A plea of insolvency is interposed. Well, sir, this is a humiliating confession. The countless millions which have been poured into your Treasury are gone. And where? and how? and to whom? Sir, I cannot now stop to answer these questions; but I deny, in behalf of the harbor and river improvements, in behalf of the internal trade and commerce of the country, that it has been lavished upon them, though it be the object of this report to convict them.

Nevertheless, such is the fact, according to this report. I quote its last expiring sentence, "the conclusion of the whole matter:"

"Should Congress authorize the usual amount of new appropriations, and the three millions proposed for fortifications, harbors, &c., it will be necessary to provide five or six millions for the Treasury, in addition to all the resources and receipts existing or contemplated."

But let us see how this matter stands. I find some discrepancies between the estimates of this report and the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary estimates the receipts into the Treasury for 1839 at $31,645,342, including an estimated balance in the Treasury on the 1st of January, 1839. This report estimates the whole at $28,900,000, including the sum of $3,200,000, which is now ascertained to have been in the Treasury on the 1st of January, 1839. In this latter estimate, the proceeds of the fourth bond of the United States Bank, $2,380,000, is not contained.

The Secretary estimates the receipts from customs at $19,000,000, which this report states at $18,000,000; a difference of a round million. The Secretary estimates the expenditures for the current year at $30,500,000, and strikes a balance in favor of the Treasury of $1,045,342. Now, sir, I shall not trouble myself about these discrepancies. I take the Secretary, the responsible officer, at his word. He says he will have money enough. And in his estimates of expenditures he has included those for "harbors and rivers," and given us the items in detail, amounting in the aggregate to $1,713,690 55. I prefer his estimates to those of the honorable chairman of the Ways and Means.

Mr. CAMBRELENG remarked that the Secretary had omitted any estimates for the Florida war, and two or three millions which he had included in his report.

Mr. MARVIN. Well, sir, I shall leave these matters to be settled between the chairman and Secretary. If the Secretary, in the midst of all his troubles, had forgotten the war in Florida, I hope he may be excused. But here is a difference in the estimated receipts of a million from the customs. Now, sir, we have every reason to believe that the customs will produce over $19,000,000. All our information from New York shows us that money is rapidly accumulating in the hands of your sub-treasurer there, and I hope it is not expected that he will abscond with it.

But suppose we are a little short in our means: is it right, is it just, is it wise, is it true economy, to withhold all appropriations for the harbors and rivers, those great agents in promoting the internal trade of the country, and thus augmenting the very sources from which you derive revenue? No, sir; they are among the last objects you should abandon. Could not the chairman's keen eye discover, in the almost infinite variety of expenditures, any other items for retrenchment? Can there be no reform in any of the Departments—in the bureaus? How many Indian agents and commissioners have you, spending their summers in making tours of pleasure through the country, and their winters here, at eight dollars a day? Can there be no retrenchment there? Or would this, in very truth, retrench the patronage of the President? Is there nothing to retrench in your civil list, which has increased so enormously for a few years past? Can nothing be found to retrench and reform in your Navy, where I see the estimate for this year is $5,891,096 07? Is all right in your Army? Can no retrenchment be made there? Is all this mighty effort of the Administration for retrenchment to fall upon an item of some million and a half for the improvement of your rivers and harbors throughout this vast country, and having accomplished so great an object, then to expire? Verily, it would seem so. Else why single out this item for attack, and palliate, if not justify, all others, always excepting the late pensions?

I, sir, am for retrenchment, for reform, and always have been. I am in favor of an economical administration of the Government, but I would not select the item which protects and sustains your great internal trade, in which the great body of the people are all interested, which seems to develop the resources of the country, and which, in its results, returns into your Treasury tenfold the amount of the expenditure. Why, I repeat, is the whole artillery of retrenchment opened upon this single item? Is it a party move? Is it deemed necessary for the purpose of strengthening the Administration in a certain quarter? Are further demands made upon the Administration from that quarter? I wish to know all about it. My constituents wish to know—they have an interest in knowing. They will not consent that all their important interests shall be sacrificed by any political arrangement. Last year the committee reported the bill, and it passed with the usual opposition. The Treasury was certainly as much embarrassed then as now; but, sir, the sub-Treasury bill did not then pass. This year the committee refuse to report the bill to the House. All this, sir, looks strange to me. If this cry of retrenchment is really made in good faith, if a retrenchment of some million and a half will do, why not divide it among the appropriations of some thirty millions? There was nothing of this cry last year, when the bill was passed increasing your standing Army from six to twelve thousand. Sir, I opposed that bill, and voted against it. I understood that it would occasion a permanent charge of three or four million dollars upon the people; I believed such an increase of the standing Army unnecessary. I was willing to vote for a small increase; but to double the standing Army at once, and create some hundred and fifty new officers in the Army, was, in my opinion, an act of injustice to the militia, and an unnecessary expenditure of the people's money. Yet this measure is palliated and justified in this report on the ground that our frontiers are very much enlarged, and we require more troops to defend them. Why, sir, how is this in point of fact? Have we really any more frontier which requires troops to guard than we had ten years ago? I had supposed not.

25TH CONG....3D SESS.

What, sir, was our main object in removing all the Indians west of the Mississippi? Was it not to concentrate them upon a single frontier, and thus shorten the line which it would be necessary to defend? Certainly it was. No, sir, though the area of the occupied part of the United States is very much enlarged, our frontier, which requires defending, is not enlarged. All you now need, in ordinary times, is sufficient troops to take care of your fortifications and the public property in them, and to defend the western frontier. Your policy has been to concentrate the Indians there upon the borders of Arkansas and Missouri, against the wishes of the people; and God forbid that any vote of mine should deprive them of protection. I will, as I have done, vote for their military roads, their forts, and for a sufficient force for their protection; but, sir, you do not want a standing army on that frontier of eight or ten thousand men. You want a sufficient force to man your fortifications and suppress the sudden incursion of the savage, and to form a nucleus about which, in the day of danger, the bold and hardy hunters of Arkansas may rally. It is a slander upon the people of the West to say that they require a standing army of ten thousand to protect them. It is an insult to the militia to say that they cannot be relied on to defend their firesides and their homes.

Mr. Speaker, I dislike listening to the denunciations which are poured out against measures which I deem so important to the prosperity and welfare of the country; and that the friends of these measures should be charged with plunging their hands into the public Treasury, and taking therefrom, unconstitutionally and unjustly, these appropriations. I claim, sir, that the people I represent are actuated by motives as patriotic and by views as enlarged and liberal as any people in this Union; and I should be recreant to duty, to the impulses of my nature, were I to suffer these unjust charges to pass unrepelled. I place these improvements upon national grounds, upon high considerations of State duty and State policy. I only demand and insist that this Government shall discharge the duty imposed upon it in the Constitution, of defending the country, and protecting its internal commerce as well as its external.

Every consideration of patriotism demands that you put in a proper state of defense your frontiers upon the lakes; upon them the future battles of the country are to be fought, and, I repeat, we must there be supreme.

We indulge with peculiar satisfaction in the reminiscences of the past, and the mention of Erie awakens within us emotions of patriotism. One of the most glorious achievements of the late war was upon her proud waves. There the gallant Perry, with his little fleet, encountered the power of Great Britain, and obtained one of the most splendid victories ever recorded in history. Your flag was triumphant. The power of Great Britain on the lakes was broken. This was at the darkest period of the struggle; the whole nation was looking on with the deepest anxiety, and as the news of the victory flew, all were amazed. Victory succeeded victory on the land. Had the enemy acquired the ascendancy on the lake, no one can say how long the war would have been procrastinated, or the calamities which would have been inflicted on that frontier. If, in any future war, we shall loose our ascendancy upon these inland seas, the heroes who fought and triumphed on Champlain and Erie would rise from their graves and rebuke us for degeneracy. But, sir, give us harbors, encourage and protect our commerce, and the day is gone by when England's power on the lakes is to be feared. Our commerce on the lakes is a school for sailors. While you make appropriations on the Atlantic for schools for the education of boys for your Navy, our commerce on the lakes is making sailors of lads who may hereafter man your fleets. Abandon these harbors, and let them go to decay, and you abandon everything on the lakes. You surrender all up; but I will not believe that this course, so suicidal to the best interests of the country, so disgraceful to it, will be adopted.

Sir, complaints are sometimes made here that in these appropriations injustice is done to certain sections of country, by not fairly distributing what some choose to call the bounties of the Government. Such suggestions are rare, and I have always looked upon them as unpatriotic. I had supposed that these appropriations were for national purposes, or objects of general not local interest—for the defenses of the country. Well, sir, judge of my surprise, then, on finding in this report of the Committee of Ways and Means, this sentence:

"Should we continue to increase them, appropriations for national defense will become of secondary importance, and will be reduced, to increase the expenditures of our CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICTS."

How, sir, is this language to be understood? Is it intended as an invitation to gentlemen here to begin a scramble for the public money? Or is it intended to intimate that the Representatives of the people here, on this floor, will cease to be influenced by high and patriotic considerations, and become the mere suitors for the share of their "congressional districts?" What a suggestion! It will not take, sir. There is too much patriotism here, yet. You cannot get Kentucky to listen to such suggestions; she will not stop to inquire how much more Ohio or New York gets than she. All she desires to know is, that the appropriation is for great national purposes, for the general interest; that its fruits will inure to the benefit of the United States as a whole. Why, sir, what does Kentucky want of defenses of fortifications? Her fortifications, her bulwarks, are the surrounding States; no foreign foe can tread upon her soil till one of the great States of this Union shall have been conquered. The battle, for the defense of Kentucky even, is to be upon the borders, and there you want your defenses.

INTERFERENCE IN ELECTIONS.

SPEECH OF HON. W. C. PRESTON,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

IN THE SENATE, February 15, 1839.

The Senate having again taken up the bill to prevent the interference of certain Federal officers in elections, and Mr. CRITTENDEN having offered a substitute for the whole bill, which differed from it in making the penalty dismissal from office, and in exempting postmasters with a salary of less than $200 from the operation of the bill—

Mr. PRESTON said: The attention of Senators, Mr. President, having been somewhat divided and confused in consequence of the multifarious and important topics which have been introduced into discussion, I will briefly make a statement of the case before us, as it has been presented, and as it is now understood, that the various points at issue may again be made for the purpose of giving the discussion a definite and distinct direction on the subject really before us.

The Senator from Kentucky, on his own responsibility, and as he had a right to do, has presented for the consideration of this body a bill; that bill, in the ordinary course, was referred to a committee, and on that the committee have made a report. Now, to understand the points at issue between that gentleman and the committee, and to ascertain the justness and precision of the proceedings on the question by the committee themselves, it is necessary to ascertain both what was submitted to them and what they have reported. The bill introduced by the Senator from Kentucky was a bill to prevent the interference of certain Federal officers in elections; and there is a statement in its preamble, that its purpose and object is to the end that the great powers of the Executive should not be used in interference with elections, which ought to be free and incorrupt; and it was therefore to be enacted by the bill that certain Federal officers therein enumerated should not, in any manner whatsoever, endeavor to persuade or dissuade any elector in relation to the vote which he should give, nor should said officers intermeddle in any of the elections, or use any means with intent to influence or control them. This is the purport of the bill of the Senator from Kentucky, and it was the bill alone that was referred to the committee, thus placing out of their proper sphere all reference to any subject beyond it, or which did not bear on the merits of the bill.

There were, therefore, two points to which the committee might legitimately direct their attention; the first of which related to the general principles of the bill, and the second to the details according to which the mover proposed to carry out those principles; and to these two points their report was, by the nature of the reference, necessarily confined; and it is entirely competent in the committee to approve the principles and reject the details, or the reverse, or to reject them both; or, if they approved the principles, and were not satisfied with the details, it was necessary for them so to fashion the details as to give to the principles their due practical efficiency. These two objects are the main design of such a reference; and, in the present case, the committee have decided against both the details and the principle.

And now, sir, I ask, in the first place, have the committee decided wisely against the principle of the bill? What is it? It is to prevent the interference of certain Federal officers in elections—that is the principle; and the object of the bill is to provide the means for preserving the purity and freedom of elections, which ought to be free and incorrupt. Against both these propositions the committee have reported. They denounce both the principle and the policy of the bill, and advise the very opposite of it distinctly and emphatically; and, therefore, if they had framed an antagonist bill to this, it would have been a bill to enforce and encourage the interference of Federal officers in the elections, to the end that they may be used to influence the elections, which ought to be free and incorrupt. At all events, we have negatived these two propositions, (the principle and policy of the bill,) deliberately and in terms, and we have, at least, declared that we will not assert that these officers ought not to interfere in elections, and that we will not assert that, by the Executive, their offices and exertions should not be used for electioneering purposes.

Now this, Mr. President, in ordinary times and circumstances, would have shocked the public mind so much, that the Senate would have immediately revolted at the mere suggestion of propositions so monstrous. And yet this statement not only shows this fact, that the Senate have negatived the principle and policy of the bill, but I am prepared to demonstrate that the converse of these propositions is now argued and maintained, which is, that it is the bounden duty of the executive officers to interfere in elections, and that any restriction upon them is unconstitutional, proscriptive, horrible, monstrous, and deserving the severest possible castigation by the committee. And now, Mr. President, on what times have we fallen, and what state of things has been produced, when, instead of the usual and uniform direction of argument and declamation against these practices, all at once there is an open and bold avowal that they are not to be controlled, but they are vindicated, and justified, and stimulated by official rhetoric? Heretofore we could not find an argument in relation to them in which they were not regarded and treated as fit subjects of denunciation. Will gentlemen of the committee deny this? They have declared there has been no such mischief, and that, even if the practice existed, it would not be a mischief, and that it is not only justifiable, but desirable and praiseworthy; and such is the language of the report itself. Sir, these are extraordinary propositions; and what has brought us to this monstrous and appalling decision? Sir, I can well understand that in private affairs, and in a private way, things are done which no man dare vindicate in public affairs, and all know that there has in fact been interference in the elections by public officers. But never till now has there ever been the open and daring avowal that the thing is right in principle, and that it is one of the political acts of the country which is expedient and proper, and that it is desirable that it should be encouraged by all possible means.

Sir, principles make practice; and still more fully true is it, that practice makes principles. Because this thing has been done, the idea of it first becomes familiar, though abhorred; then it is seen to be necessary for the support of party; and now they rise up and declare that these practices, which have heretofore been denounced with epithets freezing the blood, are founded on correct principles.

Mr. WALL. The gentleman has assumed things which are not in the report, which I utterly deny, and which are not true.

Mr. PRESTON. I will show the gentleman that he denies what is true, and that these principles abound both in the arguments of Senators, and in the formal report. If it were not so, I might not regard it with the same seriousness. I might think it the temporary effervescence of a heated imagination on the part of the gentlemen concerned, which, when sober, they would not sanction. But the doctrines of the report struck the approbation of the gentlemen at once, as if by an electric movement, and they forthwith sent them abroad in thousands of copies; as the foundation on which the party purpose to place these great questions. Sir, I confess that I had then made up no judgment in regard to this bill. But when this report was heard, and its principles suddenly and instantly received the approbation and applause of gentlemen on the other side, I shrunk from it appalled. And every one of those gentlemen, by voting to print ten thousand copies of that report, has made it his own, and given it the sanction of his name.

And, now, if the gentleman will allow me, I will proceed to show that the principles of the report are such as I have described, and that it embraces every principle to which I have alluded. Well may he be terrified at such a specter, and at the boiling and bubbling clamors of the decoction contrived by his own ingenuity. But has he not said that the principle of the bill, which is to restrict the interference of office-holders in elections, is wrong in terms; and has not the total rejection of the bill involved necessarily the rejection of that principle? Has he not denied the existence of any such interference, and denounced every part and portion of the bill? But I will not make a mere statement of the contents of the report, I will give its words, ipsisima verba, its very propositions.

One of its propositions is, that the elective right of the United States is universal, and not confined to any parts or portions of the people, and therefore it concludes that, as office-holders are all people and citizens of the United States, this circumstance guarantees to them the right to be active in the elections, which cannot be infringed. The report says, (page 2:)

"The elective right belongs to representative government, and springs from its very nature; and the very essence of that right, under our institutions, is the right of electing the members of the General and State Governments."

Here he maintains the proposition that the elective right is universal, not merely by the Constitution, but from the very nature of free government. He then places Federal officers on special grounds in reference to the mass of the people, putting them above and over them:

"The value and the advantage of this right, so far as respects the public, depend on the knowledge of public measures and of the qualifications of candidates for public trust, and, consequently, upon the equal and unrestricted freedom of discussing their comparative merits and demerits. The citizen who, by the choice of his fellows, is distinguished by being selected to perform official duties and trusts, is not thereby elevated above them; nor degraded below them. He parts with no rights of citizenship, but remains an equal among equals; still connected with them by the strong and enduring ligaments of mutuality of rights and privileges. Under our Constitution the people, not the Government, possess the sovereignty; and the doors of office can be opened only by the powerful charm of the public voice, and no degrading sacrifice of any of the privileges of citizenship, or any separation from the community of rights, feelings, and interests, which bind the people to the Government, is required."

Here, sir, the honorable chairman alludes to supposed grounds of peculiar claims to the electoral right; arising from the distinction of serving the public, and of having been selected from the general mass; and, on the high ground of having been thus selected, is placed the right of interfering, of persuading and dissuading, in the popular elections. But the honorable chairman proceeds:

"The object of the Constitution is the protection of the equal rights and privileges of all—the few as well as the many. The spirit of despotism is widely different; erected upon the destruction of the rights of man, its main object is to protect the few against the many. Hence the policy of separating its officers from all sympathy of feeling and interest with the many, by attaching to office attractive distinctions and seductive privileges, which creates a distinct class, and elevates them above the mass, or, by degrading them by unnatural mutilations, below their fellow-men, prepares them to become fit instruments of arbitrary power. Despotism who surround their thrones with eunuchs and mutes act upon the latter principle, and are impelled by the instinct of fear to resort to unnatural and unjust means to retain what is unjustly acquired. Happily our institutions, resting upon the just foundation of popular rights, neither demand nor will admit of the mutilation of the person or the privileges of citizenship as a prerequisite for office."

Now, sir, it is somewhat difficult to perceive the course of reasoning of the honorable chairman. [Here Mr. P. made some remarks not well heard by the Reporter, in which he was understood to argue some inconsistency in the report in relation to protecting the few as well as the many, and to insist that the object and actual effect of the English election laws was to protect the many against the few, and that this was precisely what was now proposed by the bill. He thought the argument of the report on this point was greatly confused, even if it was not full of sophistry.]

But, says the honorable chairman, "the object of the bill is to render what is lawful and praiseworthy, and in strict conformity both with the letter and spirit of our institutions, for all citizens, criminal in a particular class, who have been honored by the confidence of the people of the whole States." Now, sir, I hold him to his words in the face of his denial that I had quoted him rightly. Praiseworthy! Praiseworthy! I have said that he represented the interference of Federal officers in elections as deserving of eulogy; and has not he pronounced it praiseworthy? I said that he vindicated it; and does he not say that it is praiseworthy? What, sir, is the object of the bill? It is to prevent interference in elections. This is not disputed. But the report says the object of the bill is to render that illegal which is praiseworthy. This interference, the bill implies, is wrong, and demands legislation; but the report in terms not only denounces this, but goes much further, by vindicating such interference, and declaring it praiseworthy; thus eulogizing it, while the object of the bill is declared odious because it provides to do away that which is praiseworthy; and the whole argument of the report goes to this result. But to the extract:

"The object of the bill is to render what is lawful and praiseworthy, and in strict conformity with both the letter and spirit of our institutions, for all citizens, criminal in a particular class, who have been honored by the confidence of the people of the whole States. It is not to punish a crime malum in se, but to create a new crime. It is not to punish bribery and corruption, the robbery of the ballot-box, the suppression or forging of returns, or usurpation or neglect of official duty in giving effect to the will of the majority in elections, but the use of persuasion or dissuasion of intermeddling to control or influence voters by means that are lawful and right in others."

The very terms which are used in the bill of the Senator from Kentucky, and this intermeddling of these officers is the precise thing which the gentleman calls praiseworthy.

Sir, let us pause a moment. It is not, says the gentleman, malum in se, an offense in itself. Sir, the gentleman is a lawyer, and let me ask him, is there no political offense subject to legislation but what is malum in se? Is there any one in the whole catalogue of political offenses which is malum in se? If the gentleman should find out that the ballot-box has been abstracted after the polls were fully made up, is that malum in se? Is to offer or take a bribe malum in se? Is it a thing at which nature revolts as criminal in itself? Sir, all these are but creatures of the law, conventional crimes, depending on broad and general principles; and yet the Senator from Kentucky is censured because this thing is not malum in se. But the report proceeds:

"Every citizen ought to qualify himself by study, conversation, and every other means of acquiring knowledge, to understand the theory and principles of our institutions, and to ascertain the best mode of administering them in their true spirit, so as to promote the greatest good of the greatest number, and to render himself capable of discharging any trust that may be conferred on him by his fellow-citizens."

It is their duty to do all; to agitate, to discuss, to enter into an interference illimitable, in direct contact with elections is declared not only to be praiseworthy by the committee, and good in itself, but they simultaneously announce that it is not only right and praiseworthy, but it is a duty, to make use of patronage and power in elections, to take the lead and control them, (for the very word control is used.) And now, sir, will the honorable gentleman tell me that he does not rally the office-holders to interference in the elections? That he is not contravening in terms the purpose and object of the bill by declaring it the duty of Federal officers to control the elections? And is not this using a power of interference in elections, against which they ought to be free?

But further, sir, the report says:

"It is as well his right or his duty to dismiss and promulge freely the measures of any Administration, and the character and conduct of those who support or oppose it, as well to control them by the censorship of public opinion as to subject them to the test of the Constitution."

To control them by the censorship of public opinion! The public officer is bound to advocate or contest against the men and measures of an Administration, thus controlling them, and working themselves up into a censorship of public opinion; that is, any public opinion which may be held by the office-holders of the country, for that, by the committee, is made the standard to which the acts and the character of an Administration are to be referred; that is, to the public opinion which they make it the duty of the office-holders to establish.

The report says further: "In doing so, he may win the confidence of his fellow-citizens"—an emanation from, and a dependant on, the Executive—"by his declared opinions; or may become identified with some great principle which conciliates their support."

Sir, the report not only declares it his duty, but furnishes reasons and arguments why he should go forward and endeavor to identify himself with some great principle; and what will that principle be in fact? The principle of self-preservation—my bread, my office, my support: they will be led by that principle; and a control over the elections to the great end sanctifying this principle of self-preservation.

But the gentleman denies that he has vindicated this interference, while in his report he says, "all this is innocent and praiseworthy." Yes, sir, all this interference, in every possible way and to every possible extent, is not only innocent, but praiseworthy; and further, and more than this, I have adverted to the usual motive of the interference as a reason why it should not take place: and why? Because that motive is selfish, having no direct reference whatever to the public good. But this reason the gentleman has rejected. He assures us, first, that the motive for interference is such, and then he vindicates the proceeding on the ground that the motive is corrupt. Hear him:

"All this is innocent and praiseworthy, even if the motive is the acquisition of office, because it promotes the public good."

All this the gentleman encourages and stimulates to it; for all he says is not only innocent, but praiseworthy, even if it is done with no motive but the acquisition of office. Sir, this course of argument would revolt the mind and conscience of Machiavel.

Sir, what is the purity and absence of corruption in our institutions? What is the great safeguard of our rights? What is the broad principle of suffrage which lies at the bottom of our institutions? It is purity of motives, patriotism, and public good, moving and directing the vote of every citizen. And yet this report, with unappalled step, enters the very penetralia of the temple of freedom, and gives this cup of pollution to the officers themselves, and says, this is the sacrifice; take no care as to your political motive, which by admission is known to be unworthy to exist; for though it is the corrupt motive of office-seeking, it is not the less to be received, and is even more to be valued than a regard for the people.

25TH CONG...3D SESS.

Interference in Elections—Mr. Preston.

And now, Mr. President, have I rightly characterized this report? I have used perfect freedom with its doctrines, not to wound the gentleman, but the report itself sets an example of a strength of language and tone of denunciation which doubly surpasses all to which I may have been excited; and if, in the execution of this document, drawn up in the closet, under a sense of the responsibility of sending it abroad as the manifesto of the leading principles of the party, if in all this what was due to candor and decorum was forgotten, surely I may be indulged in some freedom of remark on so uncommon a production. But if I, for words used in denouncing it, should fail of excuse, and with the bill itself and the Senator from Kentucky should also be denounced, I will at least ask the indulgence of the Senate when I say great freedom of debate ought to be allowed on a document which is itself covered all over with the spirit of vituperation.

I have now proved that the principle and policy of the bill is not only contradicted and contravened by the report, but that it justifies and eulogizes the interference of executive officers in elections; and not only so, but proscribes it as a duty to be performed by them all.

The report says further:

"Is it [the discrimination made by the bill between 'one set of functionaries of the Federal Government, all those of the State governments, the officers of the corporations of associated wealth, and a few proscribed men upon whom this bill puts a gag and fetters'] to guard against the corrupting influence and patronage of the Federal Administration? If so, the effect of the bill would be still more objectionable, as, in degrading them by taking from them the rights common to all others, it would prepare them to become the willing instruments of corruption or ambition."

And yet it is settled by the report that these officers may, in their own behalf, act as instruments of corruption, because it is for the public good; and surely ambition is not less praiseworthy. But further:

"This bill would create a caste among office-holders, deriving their authority from the same high source, the people, and requiring the same high qualifications to discharge their duties. Those enumerated would be degraded by the very acceptance of office, which would cut them off from all identity of feeling, interest, and sympathy with their fellow-citizens, by the voluntary mutilation of the very manhood of citizenship. It converts those officers into imitators. It enforces temporary outlawry of the dearest and most inestimable rights of citizenship, with a penalty suspended over their heads during the continuance of office, which may be cut by a word, message, writing, or even a look, and dooms them to become outcasts—political lepers. They would be dishonored by the very act of surrendering such rights for the mercenary motives of pecuniary gain and rewards of office, and proclaim themselves slaves, and the fit instruments for making slaves of others. They would find the badges of slavery and dishonor written upon their commissions."

Well, sir, the officer is not to be thus degraded and prevented from interfering in elections; and if he does not reject his office under such conditions with disdain, he is mercenary and corrupt, and he is a fit instrument for power to use in effecting its corrupt or ambitious purposes, if he will consent to be appointed to office on these terms. Yet the report says that if he endeavors to control and influence the polls for the purpose of attaining office, it does not disqualify him; "all this is innocent and praiseworthy, even if the motive is the acquisition of office;" but he would be a mercenary and corrupt tool if he would forego the privilege of interference.

I will make one more remark as to the intention of the committee in this report to contravene the bill. On the eighth page they say:

"The committee will only advert to one other objection to the policy of the bill."

And what is the policy of the bill? It is to prevent interference in elections. And what do they say against the policy of the bill?

"Its obvious tendency is to alienate the people from the Federal Government, by infusing a jealousy of its powers and officers, by unjust discriminations between the two sets of functionaries chosen by the people, to carry on the two coördinate departments of the one single and integral Government formed by the compact of the States; to array the State government and its functionaries against the Federal Government and its functionaries, and thus gradually to undermine or weaken it; by treating as aliens the State governments to those who accept office under the General Government. In short, its tendency would be to 'alienate one portion of the country from the rest, and to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts,' and therefore, in the opinion of the committee, it ought to be resisted in the beginning."

Here is the general summing up of the whole report in a single sentence, in the last remark, which embraces and contravenes the whole policy and object which is at the bottom of the bill itself. And what is that? It is to prevent the jealousy of the people against office-holders; and what is especially taken for granted in this report is, that the office-holders and the people are all one, and this is done with a view to prevent that very jealousy. Sir, what is the price of our liberty and of our free Government, and how are we to sustain them? It is by eternal vigilance alone that the public liberty can be maintained, and it is by this very jealousy, denounced and depreciated by this report, by this jealousy alone, unslumbering and undying, that our form of Government can be preserved. It is passed into a proverb that only by watchfulness and jealousy can a free government long be maintained. What is Government, in its very nature? Is it not the concentration of power from the many in the hands of the few, which is ever more or less liable to be turned by them against the public liberty? Are not we simply a part of the Government in whom power resides, and have we not now unanimously and exclusively acted on the ostensible ground of the jealousy of power, the one side denouncing this bill as tyrannical, and the other as a salutary and necessary measure in giving effect to this very jealousy of power? And yet this report insists that the people must be lulled, that they must not be separated or alienated from their fellow-citizens, the holders of office, by any kind of jealousy, but receive them to their bosoms as equal brothers in one common interest, and be carried along on one common stream of sympathy with office-holders, and as unsuspecting sacrifices, perchance, to the iron embrace of a despot.

Nor does this even give a full and sufficient view of the argument of the report, which is, that we should not be jealous of ourselves, nor divided from ourselves; and what more than this could be said to lull us into security in regard to the Government, and to close the eyes of the people against the eternally encroaching spirit of power? What sort of an argument is it to say that this is to divide one portion of the people from the other, and to enfeeble the sacred ties that link them together? What language is this? The Government is to be preserved by the strong domination of aspirants, being regarded as simple portions of the people of the country; and this argument is pressed for the purpose of blindfolding the people to the movements of Executive power, as if it were also for the purpose of surrendering our rights. Bind together portions of the country! And what portions? The office-holders, the postmasters, and the people; these are to be bound together, and they are to listen unanimously to the sly office-holders at elections, embrace them as brothers, and give them their confidence, and wish them prosperity; and if this is not done, the tendency is to divide one portion of the country from the rest, and enfeeble the sacred ties that now link together its various parts! Ay, sir, these are the sacred ties of the office-holders and people which are bound around us; and it ought to cover our cheeks with shame that we have permitted these ties thus to be put around us. But let these ties, and those who make them, beware. The time may come when the people, perceiving the kind of brotherhood in which they are linked, will snap these ties asunder.

Now, I think, Mr. President and Senators, I have shown that the policy of this measure is distinctly contravened by the report; and that interference in the elections has, by the highest considerations of honor and duty, been inculcated on office-holders. This result has been reached in an oblique manner by the committee, rather than by any direct action on the bill itself. And allow me to remark, though in no spirit of giving offense, that I have come to the conclusion that this whole report is absolutely incompatible with the opinions and principles of some gentlemen of the Republican party; and it is not in the nature of things that gentlemen who, in the earlier portion of their lives, have been devoted to principles different from those of the resolutions of 1798, should come to a just conclusion on the principles of those resolutions, or understand the premises from which they derive their deductions. Gentlemen who were Federalists in ancient times now propose to build up a new theory of government on the doctrines of republicanism.

Mr. President, it may not be, it is not possible, that he who in his youth has been indurated in his advocacy for power will be found in his age with a disposition to pull down that power. These principles of freedom are peculiarly congenial to the counsels of young and ardent bosoms. But when in early life all this has been rejected, when the youth of twenty-one does not feel the fire of Grecian and Roman liberty, he may, indeed, believe in after life that he is approaching the great doctrines of republicanism. But it cannot be. In youth and age it is the same in politics as in love; and for a man to grow republican by age is equally absurd as if he should pass his youth in utter coldness and apathy to the feeling of love, and then in his old age should assume or affect the passions and emotions appropriate to his younger years. It cannot be.

It has been said that the young man who is not a Democrat is a fool, and the old man who becomes so is a knave. It is the natural tendency of things. I can well imagine that in youth a man may struggle against free notions, and in after life he may endeavor to square his principles to the state of things in which he finds himself under free institutions; and, while his heart grows cold and his head hot, he may fancy that he is changed in his political principles; but it is altogether a mistake. Once a Federalist is always a Federalist; and I venture the assertion that no gentleman who in his younger days has denounced the truth of the resolutions of 1798, and seceded from them, whatever may be his motives, will find his heart warm toward them in after life. And therefore I, for one, who was born under the influence of these principles, had them infused into me during the whole of my youth, and have cherished them ever since as the breath of life, will not permit myself to be schooled in these doctrines by those who in their youth have been devoted to different and opposite principles. Not that I intend these remarks but in the most general sense; for I am not one of those who denounce the Federal party. They were a high-minded, intelligent, and generous party. But they were wrong, though they were apparently following that great light of a glorious horizon who was regarded as one of the party. But even if theirs were the notions of Washington, I humbly think those notions were wrong, and I do not believe them. I have rejected them from my earliest days, and have adopted the resolutions of 1798. On these resolutions gentlemen propose now to proceed; and I have discussed their construction and application of them, contrasted with their construction and application by the Senators from Kentucky and Virginia, [Messrs. CRITTENDEN and RIVES,] who are both native to these resolutions. They may be mistaken, but I would in preference cling to them; and I am not to be told that such gentlemen as they are are to be schooled by those who have ever differed from them on the great principles on which our Revolution and Government were founded.

And now, sir, what application has been made of these glorious principles in the present case? And what are the principles of the resolutions of 1798, and for what purpose were they drawn up and adopted? It was on a question between the State and General Governments in respect to their relative powers, and their object was to define and lay down the legitimate powers of the General Government, for the purpose of vindicating the rights of the States, and of comparing them with those of the General Government. And what did those resolutions inculcate? They urged restriction upon this Government. This Government had transcended its powers, by abstracting and appropriating to itself the powers of the States, and a war was waged by means of these resolutions against this Government and its office-holders, on the part of the States and their office-holders, to prevent the interference and encroachments of the general authorities. And yet the doctrines of this report are laid down now to establish the principle that this interference is praiseworthy; that it is the duty of the General Government to make it, and that it is desirable in every respect. That is the principle, and it is attempted to be established on the ground of our second bill of rights—the resolutions of 1798—because that secured to all equal rights. All this is the result of the fundamental and irradicable mistake that the officers of this Government are the true people. That radical mistake, owing to the school in which gentlemen have been nurtured, never can be worn off, that the office-holders and the Government are the people, and in prescribing the rights of the office-holders and the Government, they have but to make a transcription of the rights of the people.

But who are the office-holders? Are the office-holders the people? The report goes on the ground of protecting the guaranteed rights of the people. But are they the people, in any meaning of the terms? In all political meanings, the Government and the people are disconnected and divided. The Government is to be guarded and limited; but is that true of the people? Are not the office-holders part and parcel of the Government of the United States; and, in guarding against them, do you not guard against the Government? These officers embraced by the bill hold their office at the will of the Executive; and are they not a portion of the Government? The Government consists of three departments, one of which is the executive, and are they not executive officers? They, therefore, in a most important sense, are a part of the Government; and on this, from its very nature, you impose restrictions.

It has been repeated, till the words are almost disgusting, that Executive power has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished. And are these officers not part and parcel of the Executive? Gentlemen talk about putting fetters on the people; but on whose hands do we propose to put fetters? It is on the Briarean hands of power, which the President has emphatically proclaimed to be his own hands, and in their official functions and tenure, as I said before, they are part and parcel of the Executive—the mere ministers of his will; and here, [on Mr. P.'s desk,] in a somewhat unwieldy shape, are papers from the celebrated President Jackson, in which he maintains the doctrine that they are to report every part of their doings to the Executive; that they are but an emanation from his center light, exercising his functions, and that he is President in and over them all, and, annihilating time and space, he, in effect, is everywhere, and at every time present. That is his language when he was President. But I will not trouble the Senate any further, for they know his doctrines on this point. This, then, is a portion of the Executive, through whom we propose to restrict the President himself, when acting in this way.

Well, sir, will the gentleman go on to the monstrous conclusion that in forging fetters for the Executive we are forging fetters for ourselves? That we are not only not to be jealous of him, but that he is amalgamated with ourselves? And will he believe that when we put fetters on the Executive, we in fact put them on the hands of the people? Sir, I know full well how much more easily a delusion of this kind may arise in our Government than in the British or any other monarchical Government, and it is true that there is danger of an imperceptible increasing of Executive power unknown to us from this circumstance, that the Executive is but an emanation from the people; he is the individual, for the time being, whom the people delight to honor, and thus, when fetters are imposed on the Executive, he and his supporters can all the more readily persuade us that they are imposed on the people themselves. General Jackson took the ground boldly that he was the people, the very impersonation of the Democracy; that he represented the Democracy; and he argued that all the powers of the people were in his own person; that he was to be looked to as a sound impersonation of the people, providing and controlling everything. Ay, sir, and he did; he trampled down everything that came in his way, even to the Capitol itself; at one fearful blow he crushed us, and the record of our shame is to be found in the proclamation and law in regard to South Carolina. The legitimate effects of his doctrine on this point were felt everywhere, and it was felt because General Jackson was regarded as the impersonation of the Democracy of the whole country. And he was so; and, in consequence, the Government was turned topsy-turvy. But this was not our Government, this was not a republican Government with distinct and different departments. Sir, the very object of your occupying that chair is to watch the Executive. And are gentlemen to tell us that to forge manacles for that power is to forge them for the people? De Tocqueville speaks of the danger of our Executive power as comparatively imminent and alarming, for in the contest between the crown and the people, at every doubtful or suspicious movement of the Executive, many are alarmed for their rights, and rise up at once; but in this country, where the people feel that the President is an emanation from themselves, they are liable to argue that when he augments his own power, it is for the people, and thus every Executive may go on in the acquisition of the proper power of the Legislature and the Judiciary. And we have all been mutually waging war against each other as different branches of the Government, but none for the people; yet it was a war of one branch against another. And we have, in fact, permitted the power of one man to rule the country; and now we have a proposition, settled, as far as the approbation of this Senate is concerned, that Executive office-holders are the people. Sir, it does not require to go one inch further to prove that the President is the people.

Before I proceed to answer another branch of the subject, I wish to advert to two alleged and principal facts which serve as the foundation of this report, and I will show that no such facts exist. On page 3 of the report, it is stated as a fact, and an inceptive principle on which the committee rested, that the State governments have made no discrimination between the mass of their citizens and the office-holders of the General Government. Now, sir, the fact is exactly the opposite; for such is the habitual jealousy of the States, and their watchfulness of your power, that, I believe, in every State there is a fundamental law forbidding the officers of the United States Government from holding any office of profit or trust in the gift of the State. The very fact of holding office under this Government is regarded as a disfranchisement in all the States of the Union. But I beg leave to quote the language of the report:

"Happily our institutions, resting upon the just foundation of popular rights, neither demand nor will admit of the mutilation of the person or the privileges of citizenship, as a prerequisite for office. Under the existing laws, a citizen of a State does not by accepting any of the offices (designated in the bill) under the Federal Government, forfeit any of the rights and privileges which belong to him as a citizen of a State."

Forfeits no right! Sir, he is disfranchised if he holds office under this Government. And what is the fact in regard to the soldiery of the United States? And on what principle can you disfranchise a soldier any more than an office-holder, if these rights are inherent in him as a citizen? Unquestionably you have in that case no such right. Yet a United States soldier does not vote; and gentlemen from all parts of the House, vis a voce, have declared that the office-holders are the enlisted soldiers of the Executive, thus identified as the very persons who are disfranchised. And yet these persons who are thus characterized as enlisted soldiers, it is now declared are not to be disfranchised, while the whole Army proper, of eight or ten thousand, are so in fact.

Mr. President, the report proceeds to make another assertion which is altogether at variance with fact, and which is the fatal source of all the evil principles which flow out of it; and to that I beg the attention of the Senate. It is the alleged fact that office-holders are appointed by the people, that they are emanations from the people, and the agents of the people. But is that the fact? No, sir; they hold their office in spite of the people, by Executive power, and for Executive purposes.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky. And often against their wishes.

Mr. PRESTON. Notoriously so. The people are flouted, and their opposition is a reason why these men are appointed and retained in office. Sir, look at my own State, where four fifths of its citizens are on the other side. What is the case in respect to office-holders with us? The very fact that the people wished certain office-holders appointed was the very reason why they were not appointed. They were appointed against us, and over us, to control us in spite of ourselves.

Another alleged fact in the report is, that the committee have not known this power to be brought in conflict with the elections. Let us recapitulate a little. In 1821 or 1822, by a distinguished Governor of a State, it was solemnly declared to be a fact. De Witt Clinton presented it solemnly as an existing evil which required correction, under the administration of Mr. Adams; and it was proclaimed and blazoned forth in every corner of the country, that the office-holders had interfered with the freedom of elections, and General Jackson received a torrent of applause in the expectation that he would crush this mass of evil, which put the country in a foam, and raved round the land; and yet the gentleman never heard of it! Mr. Jefferson and General Jackson came in under the same conditions, denouncing this as an existing evil, and promising to correct it. And now, as I have adduced the testimony of Jefferson, Jackson, and Clinton, what is the testimony of this report? It contradicts and denies the truth of their testimony. Even if it were admitted to be in its nature a grievance, the report and the committee deny the fact, and they also repudiate the principle; and gentlemen have sent abroad ten thousand copies of a report which says that they give Mr. Jefferson the lie; and further, it declares them guilty of the enormous crime of giving General Jackson the lie, declaring that all which both these gentlemen asserted on this point, is a lie. Mr. President, this is a very intrepid report. It boldly marches up to the face of Mr. Jefferson, and denounces him at the very moment when it professes to ground its doctrines on his principles. Mr. Jefferson said this was an evil; the report says it is none; he says it existed; the report denies it; he said he would correct it; the report says that it is unconstitutional and tyrannical. And this is not all; but, bolder than this, though it might be supposed that the bones of Jefferson were not to be desecrated or passed by with irreverence, the report goes higher and further than this; it denounces Jackson, and gives him the lie in relation to a matter of fact. It dares a conflict with the power of his opinion.

And with what face can gentlemen tell me that the combined power of this Government cannot suppress a grievance which is acknowledged to exist? What did Mr. Jefferson propose to do by his individual power? He pledged himself to suppress this evil before he entered upon his office; and he did suppress it.

I will not read the report of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] but refer to a passage or two, and see how it squares with this report, in which honorable gentlemen say, in regard to these officers, that the people are delighted to trust them, in blind confidence, with all their rights and functions. And what said the Senator from Missouri, when, in a different position from his present one, he was a leader in the Opposition?

"That the whole of this great power will center in the President. The King of England is the fountain of honor: the President of the United States the source of patronage. He presides over the entire system of jobs and contracts. He has power over the support of the individuals who administer the system. He makes and unmakes them. He chooses from the circle of his friends and supporters, and may dismiss them; and, upon all the principles of human action, will dismiss them, as often as they disappoint his expectations. His spirit will animate their actions in all the elections to State and Federal offices. Again, we must then look forward to the time when the public revenue will be doubled, when the civil and military officers will be quadrupled, when its influence over individuals will be multiplied to an indefinite extent, when the nomination of the President can carry any man through the Senate, and his recommendation can carry any measure through the two Houses of Congress; when the principle of public action will be open and avowed: the President wants my vote, and I want his patronage; I will vote as he wishes, and he will give me the office I wish for. What will this be but the Government of one man, and what is the Government of one man but a monarchy? Names are nothing."

Perhaps I have satisfied the Senate in reading from all the wise objections to this report, and I now put it to gentlemen whether it would not be proper for them, if they will not censure this report, to declare their disapprobation of what the Senator from Missouri expressed on this subject in 1828. Such were his sentiments then; and yet we have now declared in this report that office-holders are not in conflict with the people; and more: the report has argued (page 4) that the patronage of the Government is a disadvantage to those in office, and that, on the whole, they would be better without patronage. But, if it is so, let them cease to exercise it. They say these officers have not interfered. Sir, is not this erroneous, and in the face of the fact throughout the country? Where have these gentlemen been? All these officers are continually engaged in the elections everywhere. Every officer of this Government is an electioneering outpost. Sir, I would not discuss the matter in the face of a fact of that kind. There are twelve thousand postmasters, of which, perhaps, one thousand make a pecuniary sacrifice for the office, and I usually take it for granted that where there is an act of self-deprivation the occupant is a Whig. But show me the office of which the income is $200, or more, where they are not continually tugging at electioneering for the Administration. We have a postmaster in our own little village, who is a most thorough electioneer, devoting his days and nights to that praiseworthy employment, and in his little caboose of a post office I have found electioneering interferences, which the honorable gentlemen of the committee must have been able to discover if they had been on the spot. At the times of elections, the office is unusually incumbered with electioneering pamphlets. I have seen the room crowded all up with "addresses to the Republican party," calling on the people of the United States to support this Administration. [Laughter.] After a public meeting at the Capitol, scraps from General Jackson, the Globe, &c., were served up as a cold hash for breakfast, and were sent forth to the country as the manifesto of the Republican party. I cast my eyes around the post office, and there, in staring capitals, were to be seen, "Glorious Triumph!" "The erect Democracy have carried Constantinople!" "Grand news from Alabama!" "The Democratic party in the ascendancy!" "One hundred guns!" and there present, with his wand, was the master of these cabalistics, putting the question, "Will you not vote for the Democratic party?" He was advocating the principle which the party once avowed, "Principle in proportion to interest!"

And now I put it to Senators whether any one will rise in his place and say, on his honor, that he believes Federal officers do not pay a tax, pro rata, for electioneering purposes. Will any gentleman even say that he doubts it? [No sign.] I do not yet assert it, but do we not know it? I do not especially urge this as an attack on the present Administration, but it is in the nature of these things when they are under instructions from high quarters to that effect. The Senator from New York says it is the duty of office-holders to interfere in elections.

Mr. WALL. There is nothing of that in the report.

Mr. PRESTON. I have just read it to the Senate. And the Senator from Pennsylvania says, if he were President, he would appoint officers of his own political principles.

Mr. BUCHANAN, in a low tone, was understood to say either that he should not be President, or that he did not make the supposition that he might be President.

Mr. PRESTON. May be so; but the gentleman represented it as the duty of the President to appoint men only of his own principles. And what then? He would have none in office but men of his party. And then what? He would have one hundred thousand men bought and paid for, imbued with the spirit and principles of one man. And will gentlemen say that all this would give the party no support? Will they say they would have lost ground notwithstanding? Ay, sir, and but for these, how long ago would their political stronghold at New York have been broken up? What has been done there with their millions at the custom-house, which have at length proved unavailing? And I hope that in spite of these myrmidons, they will effectually storm that fortress, and that the party are doomed by the handwriting already on the wall.

Sir, I had hoped, from the growing weakness of the party in power, they would have manifested a disposition to reform. But this report clouds that prospect, and there is again every cause of alarm. I have seen that their ultimate purposes, when matured and manifested, cannot but revolt every honest and patriotic mind; and I say there is a natural condemnation in our bosoms of the interference of office-holders in elections. No man really approves it. And I will venture to say that there is no gentleman now on this floor who will say in terms that he approves it. There is an impropriety which we ourselves feel, if we would but announce it, in entering the canvass for the purpose of sustaining or prolonging our power. But all the principles of liberty on this subject come from the minority for the time being, and they are in uniform contrast with the doctrines of the report of the Senator from New Jersey.

Sir, in what condition do we find ourselves in regard to the question of patronage? It became the duty of a distinguished member from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] to examine into and to report on the power of the Executive, and its alarming increase within a few years, and, in doing that, he pointed out the various sources of this power, and spoke of this very source as endangering the liberties of the country. In this report the subject was more expanded than in that of the Senator from Missouri; and it was made eight years afterwards, when Executive power had assumed a more fearful aspect. [Mr. P. read some passages from this report, in which it was said that so long as offices were considered as a public trust, they were filled with those who would best and most faithfully perform the duties of office; but that gradually a great change had been effected, so that a faithful performance of duty no longer assured an appointment to office, or a continuance in it; and it might in truth be said that the expenditures of the revenue had become corrupt and subservient to corruptions.]

Sir, there are twenty passages of this kind, but I will not consume the time of the Senate in adverting to them. They are full of wisdom; and yet all this is now denounced which it was the policy of this bill to carry into practical effect, and it is declared unconstitutional, unwise, and tyrannical.

Mr. P. further remarked that this report was made five years ago; that the rapidly increasing patronage of the Government was then held up as greatly alarming; that from the Administration of Mr. Adams to that time, which was nine years, there had been an increase of annual expenditure from $12,000,000 to $25,000,000; and now, in five years more, it had increased to $40,000,000. And now, with such an increase before us, will gentlemen tell us that there is no danger from this source, and that it is wrong to guard against it? They have heard the testimony of Mr. Jefferson, of De Witt Clinton, of Andrew Jackson, and of others distinguished among themselves, and now, if they sanction the doctrines and principles of this report, they will subvert all that these gentlemen have said on this subject.

But, sir, I will take higher ground than all this. All the essential principles of liberty known in the history of our ancestors, are repugnant to the abominable principles of this report. Well and consistently did the gentleman act in flouting and repudiating the free doctrines of our European ancestors. Well does it become him, under a democratic Government, to denounce all control of public officers; ay, and when monarchical Europe, with its Kings and its despotic laws, yet impose fetters on their executive officers for the security of popular rights, and the gentleman's mind is all on fire in behalf of the American Government and its liberties, as the liberties of the people. He says that this restriction of executive officers is a tribute to English despotism; and so, in the same way, would our restrictions be a tribute to office-holders. English liberty says the wolf shall be caged; but the gentleman says, no; keep down the iron bars; he is a part of the flock. English despotism!

I know, sir, it has been a trick with certain politicians of this country to denounce anything that is English. But I have not the heart to denounce the native country of liberty, which has erected the proudest and most glorious temple of freedom of any country in Europe. She is an old nation, proud in arms, and has long battled in the cause of liberty through blood and carnage. And she has propagated it in this country. Think you that we should have found it without her? Hers was the native soil of our freedom and our blood. And did it ever stagnate in our veins or blanch in the fight? No, sir, no; wherever it is found, in Europe, Asia, Africa, or America; where ever the sun has blazed upon it, its native tint remains indelible, and we still feel proud of our blood, and honored from our illustrious ancestors. And yet you say they have fought for despotism there, while in effect you are so making manacles for our people as no one there dare do. Since the time of Walpole, no English Minister would have dared to present such a report as this. He could not have done it and retained his place. The King of England, from the house of Hanover, whose German notions were not yet obliterated, denounced the bill restricting his executive officers, and called it a villainous bill; and the King's language in this was the language of a King. But the Commons and the people held a different language, and determined that the King should take the bill, villainous though it might be.

And when such was the language of the British Commons, what is said of a British lord, with blue ribbons? One instance of the interference of the Executive with the elective franchise was brought before the Commons in this wise.

[Mr. P. read from history, that the almoner of the Queen in the county of Worcester wrote to several of his friends, soliciting them to oppose the election of one of the candidates for Parliament. The Commons voted that this was a violation of the liberty of the people, and asked the Queen to dismiss the offender from office; and the Queen dismissed him accordingly. Mr. P. also read another example of the kind, which occurred in 1779, when an executive officer was detected, in the county of Southampton, taking part in the election; and when the case was brought before the House of Commons, Lord North remarked that it was a case in regard to which there was no great cause for alarm; and instantly, on all sides of the House, the remark was followed by such indignant clamors and uproar that Lord North was compelled to explain; and the House forthwith adopted a resolution that it was highly criminal for an executive officer to use his office in influencing elections to Parliament.]

Thus, under what gentlemen call a despotic Government, were the liberties of the people jealously guarded and protected; and wherever there is power and patronage and interference of this kind, they are part and parcel of the Government. Even there, an interference in elections by a letter of an officer of the Crown was held an indignity, and the silence of Lord North in regard to it has consecrated it to us as the evidence of the genuine spirit of British liberty. Sir, I call on Senators to place some mark of their reprobation on the report which has been submitted to us.

Mr. President, I did not feel myself called on to support the bill, because for that task I deemed the ability of the Senator from Kentucky abundant; and I should not now have troubled the Senate, but that I was alarmed at the doctrines of this report, and at the fact that gentlemen were about to send them through the country as the principles of the party in power, on which they intend to act. If gentlemen do so, the people will be forewarned and forearmed; and, knowing the purposes of those in power, they will be sufficiently notified that they ought to be on the alert against them; and if they do not then defend their liberty, it will only be another proof that it is not tyrants who make slaves, but slaves who make tyrants.

PARTY POLITICS.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN POPE,
OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 15, 1839,

On the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic service for the year 1839.

Mr. POPE said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I hope that no apology is necessary on my part for addressing the committee at this time at large on the several topics of public policy and political principles to which the attention of the country has been called in our debates, here and elsewhere, and in the public journals. My colleague, [Mr. CHAMBERS,] the able and faithful chairman of the Committee of Claims, knows that I have remained at my post, late and early, to aid him to obtain the action of the House in favor of the poor and humble and suffering citizens who have fair demands on our justice; and the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, of which I am a member, will have the candor to admit that I have not taken a course to impede his Administration measures, whether I concurred with him or not. I have been ever willing to afford him a fair opportunity to present them, with his views, to the consideration of the House and nation. In order that the necessary public business might be done at this short session, I have abstained from wasting time in useless debate on plain and unimportant subjects, and I would exhort gentlemen of the legal profession, who so often hammer us for two or three hours, like an ignorant jury, on trite questions, to believe that those of us who are not fond of speaking merely for the sake of speaking have some small stock of sense and information as well as themselves.

I am inclined to present my views on the political state of the nation, and the principles and measures involved in the approaching contest, not only to this House and the public, but to my immediate constituents, to whom I am directly responsible, and before whom I am to appear at the approaching election in August next. It is my duty to treat them with fairness and candor, to explain my position here, and to give them my opinion on public affairs. The crisis is deeply interesting to every American citizen, and requires every man to speak out with decision, calmness, and truth. A man of observation, who takes a survey of the present state of things in this country, will be surprised to discover that questions of policy, constitutional law, and all subjects connected with the course of the National Government, are less settled and more afloat than forty or forty-five years ago, when our present Constitution was first put into practical operation. The power to protect navigation, manufactures, and agricultural productions, by duties on foreign articles, even mere discriminating duties, or bounties on fishing vessels in the northeast, that great nursery of seamen to man our Navy, the right arm of our national defense, is denied. The power to establish a national bank, declared to be necessary by the wise, patriotic, and godlike Congress of 1780, that of 1791, of 1816, and of 1832, approved by Washington, Hamilton, Gallatin, Dallas, Crawford, Madison, and a host of others, the most enlightened statesmen of our country, is also denied, and the institution denounced as dangerous and wicked, after a successful experiment of forty years. Yes, sir, the political men of yesterday boldly denounce the great, wise, and good men who have gone before us, the authors of our independence and founders of our Republic, as incompetent to construe the Constitution, the work of their own hands, or to judge of the utility of such an institution as a fiscal agent and a check on the excessive issues of a paper currency. The scattering fires and random shots constantly kept up by the different parties at each other render it difficult for a stranger, or even for ourselves, to understand with definite clearness the questions in issue between them, or the leading principles involved in the mighty struggle now pending before the great jury of the American people.

I am constrained, Mr. Chairman, to express my high approbation of the manner in which my colleague, [Mr. MURRAY,] the other day, made the best defense I have heard of the course of the Administration. It is just to say to him, if he has not convinced me of the soundness of his views, and correctness of the facts he has asserted, that his course in this debate has been marked by that decorum and propriety which ought to characterize this representative body. He has not applied to his adversaries offensive epithets or unpopular names, or dealt in mere denunciation of his political opponents; he has not substituted the terms Democrats, Whigs, or Federalists, for argument. He has considered the two great parties which now divide the country as supporters and opponents of the Administration. Those who believe, as he does, that the principles and measures of this Administration are sound and will conduce to the preservation of the public liberty and to advance the general prosperity, ought to support it; and it is the duty of those who entertain a contrary opinion to oppose it. A gentleman, by calling himself a Democrat or a Whig, does not prove the course of the Administration right or wrong. The tendency of the principles and measures of the Administration is to be shown by reason, argument, and fact, and not by mere names and electioneering slang. When I hear members of this House talk of Democrats and Democracy, to prove one party right and the other wrong, I am reminded of a conversation I had with Mr. Gideon Granger, a citizen of Connecticut, thirty years ago, when Postmaster General under Mr. Jefferson.

In one of the newspapers there was an account of a large meeting of the people of New Haven, in that State, indicating an intention to resist the embargo law; but before they proceeded to business, some of the reverend clergy were called on to say grace over them. I expressed my surprise to Mr. Granger that the clergy should give open countenance to an insurrection against the laws. "Friend Pope," answered he, "you don't know us Yankees; whatever we do, whether we work for God or the devil, we do it all in the name of the Lord." And some gentlemen seem to imagine that whether the Administration works for the good of the people or the ruin of the people, for God or the devil, all their doings can be sanctified in the name and by the high priest of Democracy. A man in my own State of some intelligence, many years ago, made a deep impression on me in reference to this subject. He told me that a son of his, a distinguished citizen of Tennessee, from the commencement of his career in life, had determined to act on the assumed ground that the people were to be fooled by somebody, and that a man was a fool who did not fool them for his own advantage. And not many years ago, I addressed the people at what is called a candidate's meeting, and explained my views of a national bank, besides touching on other topics. In the evening, after the people had dispersed, a warm personal friend of mine, of good talents, whom I considered, as everybody else did, among the most thorough-going Democrats, rode with me a few miles, and in the course of our conversation, observed that the world supposed me to have much more sense than him; but, said he, they are mistaken, you have not half my sense. You talk about a national bank, give large national and extended views of the benefits and utility of such an institution, but very few of your hearers can appreciate the merits of what you consider statesmanlike argument. Now, says he, I go for Democracy and Government, or treasury people's bank. I have no faith, said he, in this Democracy, but it is the road to success. I tell you, I have no faith in it, but I am determined to go for Democracy, and no fellow shall out-Democrat me. He assured me that he would support me, when a candidate, whether I was right or wrong, but he must condemn my opinions before the people, for I tell you, said he, that I don't intend to be beaten at the game of Democracy.

Mr. Chairman, I have no particular objection to the word Democrat, Whig, or Federalist. Gentlemen are at liberty to assume any name they please; but I protest against the use of any such epithets to prove a measure right or wrong. He had been, and ever should be, democratic in his feelings and actions towards his fellow-men. He had never oppressed the poor, or dealt hardly with them; and in his public course, both in the Kentucky Legislature and in Congress, he had been uniform in defending the fair claims of the actual and bona fide settlers of our new lands. He was in favor of a kind and liberal policy towards the poorer classes, who, unable to purchase lands at high prices in the old and rich States, had migrated to the new and unsettled regions of the West. Some of his public acts may have been wrong, and some of his opinions, and especially about a national bank, were called by many Federal. He had formed his opinion on that subject at an early period of his congressional career, after profound consideration and an earnest inquiry after truth. He had maintained that opinion through good and evil report, and had discovered no good reason to change it. Whether his opinion was called Federal or Democratic, was a matter of indifference to him; and he had little respect for a man who was afraid to obey the conviction of his understanding, lest he should be called Federalist, Whig, Democrat, or anything else. Let every man be persuaded in his own mind that he is right, and go ahead.

Mr. Chairman, I repeat that I like the course of my colleague in recognizing but two parties—the party for the Administration, and the party against it. Those who disapprove of the principles and measures of the Administration owe it to themselves, their country, and their immediate constituents, to put in good and substantial pleas in bar to their continuance in power with a verification, and to sustain their pleas by proof and argument at the bar of the nation. There are, however, some other parties or squads of parties that merit a passing notice. I hear of a State-rights party, whose creed I would be as much at a loss to define as that of the Mormon party of the far West. I do not know any anti-State-rights men anywhere. If there are such, I know them not. I have heard of anti-Masonic party; and we have an abolition party, more dangerous in its character, tendency, and objects than any which has arisen since the foundation of this Government—a party which threatens to weaken, if not destroy, our Union, disturb our domestic tranquillity, and shake the foundation of private property. Until lately, I have been disposed to receive their petitions without attaching much importance to them; but I am now satisfied that no such petitions, tending to engender discord here, and disturb the general tranquillity, ought to be received. I had not before this felt any serious concern about this matter, for I have never known a Yankee emigrant to the South or Southwest to set a slave free. A very cultivated and intelligent gentleman from New Hampshire settled in my neighborhood about twelve or fourteen years ago, and was at first clamorous and rude in his remarks about slaves and slaveholders. After he had been with us two or three years, he took a fancy to a fine widow, a friend of mine, who had some very valuable slaves. Some of her counselors were opposed to the match, and she, knowing that I was very much disposed to encourage matrimony, and that I would advise her to do precisely what she wanted to do, conversed with me upon the subject. Having never indulged or excited prejudices against Yankees, I told her that the first article in their creed was to provide well for their household; that he would make a good husband, and urged her to marry him, which she did, and their union has been fortunate and happy; and he has never, I believe, said one word about abolition from that day to this. He is a good husband, and a much better master than most of us, for he gets twice as much labor out of his slaves as I ever could.

Mr. Chairman, about the close of the last war I felt proud that we had at the city of New Orleans a military chieftain who, by his bravery and military skill, defended our soil against the finest army that ever crossed the Atlantic, and shed a luster on our national character. About the same time, I was gratified to learn that we had an enlightened statesman, an intellectual Hercules, at the head of the American mission at Ghent, sent to negotiate a treaty of peace with Great Britain, who, with the weapons of reason and argument, vanquished the first statesmen of the British empire on the contested question about the fishing rights and privileges of the Americans on our northeastern coasts and seas. The British commissioners contended that, according to the law of nations, the treaty of 1783, by which our fishing rights and privileges were acknowledged and secured, was abrogated by the war of 1812. My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. Adams] admitted the general rule settled by the law of nations in regard to ordinary treaties, but insisted that, as these fishing rights and privileges existed and were enjoyed before the peace of 1783, they were not abrogated by the war; that it was not a debatable question; and he ultimately silenced the British pretensions in relation to the fisheries.

Ten years ago I read a letter of that gentleman [Mr. Adams] on this question; and have reviewed it a second time during the present session, among the most able and eloquent productions of his or any other pen. Mr. Chairman, (continued Mr. P.) before that gentleman presents any more petitions for the abolition of slavery, I beseech him to review that letter, and see if his argument will not bear with great force on the slavery question; because slavery existed not only before our Constitution was formed, but before the peace of 1783 or the Articles of Confederation. If our fishing rights and privileges were not abrogated by war, and were not debatable, because they existed and were enjoyed before the Revolution, upon what ground can our northern brethren claim the right to petition, or in any way disturb, the institution of slavery? Sir, I must deny that slavery is a grievance of which the people of the free States have any right to complain by petition, or to ask the interference of Congress. The President has called on us for severe laws and a million dollars to prevent our people from interfering in the affairs of Canada, when it is known that Upper Canada is a place of refuge for our fugitive slaves; and when they get there, neither the people nor the British authorities will have them surrendered to their owners. Mr. P. said that he did not think the British Government, in relation to Upper Canada, had much claim on us to use extraordinary means to protect it from the interference of our citizens. He was willing to do what our character as a nation, and our amicable relations with that Power, demanded, to maintain neutrality; but it seemed to him that the slave States of this Union had as high claims to the protecting authority of the President and Congress against the abolition schemes of the North. If the slave and free States were separate communities, combinations, if permitted in the free States to disturb the slave institutions of the South, would be deemed just cause of war: and now that they are united by political compact, one leading object of which was to preserve our internal peace and tranquillity, ought not the President, in his message which expressed so much solicitude about Canada, to have called on Congress, if not the free States, to exert their whole constitutional power to suppress all combinations against our internal peace; and, if necessary, to have placed a force on Mason and Dixon's line, to enforce neutrality in relation to our slave property?

Mr. P., with some pleasantry, remarked, that if he could be assured that he would be reelected next August to this House without opposition, he believed he would make a tour through the northern and eastern States, and deliver lectures to them on this very interesting subject, and exhort them to pause before they cut asunder the ties of interest, amity, and blood, by which this great and rising nation was united; and he would more especially appeal to the ladies, who, by artful addresses to their finer sympathies, had been induced to take a warm and active part in behalf of the slaves of the South.

At this moment Mr. POPE was arrested in his remarks in relation to abolition, as he had been once before, by a call to order, on the ground that he was departing from the matter under debate, and that the question of abolition was not a debatable subject.

Mr. P. disavowed any intention to discuss the question of abolition, and had only designed to present to the committee, in a concise manner, his view of this right of petition. He, however, acquiesced in the decision of the Chair, and, with leave of the committee, proceeded in the discussion of topics admitted to be within the scope of the debate.*

Mr. P. assured the committee that nothing but a strong solicitude to present this right of petition in its true aspect could have prompted him to this departure from the usual course of debate. He would now call the attention of the committee to those principles and measures of this Administration in issue between the two contending parties, here and in the nation. My colleague, and other friends of the Administration, not content with defending their measures and principles, have, to make out their case, gone back for years to assail the measures and opinions of other men, and especially those supposed to be candidates for the next Presidency. All this seems to me to be irrelevant. We are not here, or ought not to be, engaged in making or unmaking Presidents. We are here discussing the principles and measures of public concern. The conduct of the Administration, and their principles, are arraigned at the bar of the public. Is it a fair or legitimate defense to say that other men have done wrong, and been in favor of bad measures? Could a judge, impeached at the bar of this House, screen himself by telling us that other men had done wrong, and that, if he was removed, another as bad would be appointed in his place? Would it do for a Representative on this floor, when censured by his constituents, to tell them that they must select him, because, although he had acted badly, and had abused the trust reposed in him, another would do as bad, or worse? that those who were opposed to him, and found fault with his conduct, were not Democrats, but rag-barons, aristocrats, &c.? Would this be a fair and honorable defense?

* If permitted to examine the right of petition to the extent contended for, Mr. POPE would have insisted on the impregnable ground assumed by Mr. ADAMS in relation to the fisheries, and ultimately assented to by Great Britain, that the rights and privileges which existed and were enjoyed before the foundation of this Confederacy, and recognized by the articles or compacts of union, did not admit of debate or controversy, and were not grievances coming within the scope, right, or intent of petition in its broadest sense. The right of petition for redress of grievances implies the existence of a grievance of which the petitioners have a right to complain, and a power in the body to which it is addressed to afford the relief called for; and I might contend with force and plausibility that the subject and object of the petition ought to be consistent with the peace and safety of the nation. Mr. P. could never admit that any set of men had the unconditional, unrestricted right, under color of the right of petition, to cast firebrands into this Hall tending to sap the foundation of our social harmony and political union. It is monstrous to contend that the time of this House must be wasted, and our deliberations disturbed by such vain if not wicked efforts. The Representatives of the people must on this as on all other subjects of petition, exercise their sound discretion under the high responsibility which they owe to their country and constituents. If the free and slave States were separate communities, could the free States, consistent with the principles of international law, permit societies and combinations to be organized within their limits to interrupt the peace and property of their neighbors? Would it not be cause of war? Mr. P. would, if he could address the single Indies of New England, endeavor to give their finer feelings and sympathies another direction. He would hold a very different language to them from that which they so often hear from puritanical lecturers, who appeal to their sympathies and their pockets in behalf of the imaginary sufferings of the southern slaves. Mr. P. would tell them that he had lived in the far West; that those fertile regions abounded with active, enterprising, and promising young men; that young ladies were rather scarce; and he would with sincerity and zeal exhort the ladies of the East to turn a deaf ear to the idle tales and appeals of the artful agents of the Abolitionists, and take up their march to the West. They would soon, do doubt, get good husbands in those new regions, and will render more essential service to this great and rising Republic in raising up good Democrats to fight the future battles for liberty and their country, than in sending petitions here to wound the feelings of their southern friends and brethren. Mr. P. regretted that the rules established at the present session precluded him from presenting his views more in extenso on this subject of abolition. Negro slavery, whether right or wrong, whether for good or for evil, had been so long incorporated into our system, that it must be left to the operation of causes hidden from human ken, and to the mysterious plans of a wise Providence—not to be seen even through a glass darkly. Let every citizen of this Republic remember, with deep concern, that this is a most delicate and dangerous topic, and cannot be touched without hazard to our peace and union, prosperity and happiness. Mr. P. would have declared his disapprobation of the last resolution of the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. ATHERTON], because by implication it seemed to concede the right to present abolition petitions, instead of refusing to receive them. It is the duty of this House, Mr. P. would have insisted, to tell the Abolitionists in a decided tone that their petitions would and could not be received, because they asked an interference with this Government for purposes and objects incompatible with our peace and safety, and the legitimate objects of the Constitution.

Would a people of common sense, with ordinary concern about the administration of public affairs, listen to a defense of this sort? Certainly not. The course of argument pursued by these gentlemen would prove too much; it would prove that this Administration and themselves ought to be perpetuated in power, whether they did right or wrong.

Now, the true question is, are the principles and measures of this Administration right? have the public affairs been fairly and honestly administered? and is it not necessary that the Administration should be changed, to correct and reform those abuses, blunders, and the derangement of our currency and other branches of the public service, which have occurred under this Administration? When gentlemen talk of aristocrats, bankites, &c., I really do not understand them in reference to the people of the district I represent. In the five counties comprising that district, there is no bank, or branch of any bank; nor do I know that there is $10,000 of bank stock held in the district. There are no very wealthy men there, and but few so poor as not to have the reasonable comforts of life. They are farmers generally, with a portion engaged in other pursuits. They constitute the industrious middle class of society, which, in all countries, is the most virtuous, happy, and independent class—the salt of the earth. We have no public officers among us, except postmasters with small incomes. No public money is expended there. We pay our full proportion of the revenue; more than South Carolina; and more, in proportion to our population, than any of the southern States east of the Alleghany. The people do not complain of all this, if no more is drawn from them than is necessary, and fairly expended. They ask nothing from this Government but good laws, good money, and that their money may not be stolen or plundered by unfit and unfaithful officers and agents.

Mr. Chairman, I am not a mere partisan here, nor do I indulge any unkind feelings towards the President, or those in power, or those who support the Administration. I do not predicate my course here on the ground that gentlemen of either party are enemies to our republican institutions or their country. I should be very unwilling to indulge any such uncharitable opinion of those who may happen to differ from me in my political views. We know that the best republicans become spoiled and corrupted by too long enjoyment of power. They too often feel power and forget right, and become aliens in some degree to that republican spirit and feeling which animated them before they came into power. We know, too, that adversity in both private and public life is the school of virtue, and tends to purify those who have been too much exalted by prosperity or long continuance in authority. It is well known that in England the Whigs, after long contending with zeal and sincere patriotism for the power and privileges of Parliament and the people, against the prerogatives and usurpations of the Crown, have often, after ousting a Tory Ministry, and getting into power, turned Tories in principle and practice; and the Tories, stripped of power, and identified with the popular party, have, in time, in their turn become Whigs. Such is human nature, and such the course of human affairs; and occasional changes of the high executive officers of the Government may be justly deemed the great conservative principle of freedom. I believe that a change of this Administration is essential to the healthy action of the body-politic, and necessary to restore the constitutional balance of the Government. I am willing to see the Whigs come into power; after being so long out, they will, probably, administer the Government well for a while. I have no confidence in their extraordinary purity or infallibility, nor do I know that I shall be one of their party if they get in. I shall give no pledges. To me it is matter of no individual concern who is in or out. I act, and shall continue to act, under the influence of public considerations and public duty. Some material errors will, I expect, be corrected, and abuses reformed.

Mr. Chairman, I cannot approve the principles and measures of this Administration, so far as they have been developed since I took my seat in the present Congress. Permit me to say to gentlemen of the Whig party, that they will confuse the public mind by making too many points in their cause, some of them irrelevant and untenable, and others of a doubtful character and not to be depended on in a great contest of principle. When I first came to the bar, I was in the habit of urging to the jury many points when two or three would have been sufficient. I ever found that course unfortunate; my adversary met and defeated me on my weakest ground, and the attention of the jury was too often diverted from the true question at issue. Experience soon demonstrated to me that, if my cause was good, the most honest and best policy was to select my strong points and press them, unobscured by immaterial matters, on the attention of the jury. I must be permitted to say to gentlemen of the Opposition, if their cause is good, honesty and fairness is the best policy. I would advise that good and substantial pleas in bar to the continuance of the present men in power should be put in, and verified by proof and argument.

I will now endeavor to place before this House and the people the principles contended for by the President and his friends. By the third section of the second article of the Constitution, it is provided that the President shall, from time to time, give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient. This is the only grant of power to the President to influence, direct, or control the legislative action of Congress in advance. After Congress has acted, and presented a bill to the President for his approval, he is authorized to consider it, and may return it with his objections, which can only be overruled by a majority of two thirds. With regard to measures which Congress may judge necessary and expedient for the good of the people, the President is not authorized to prejudge or veto in advance, and has no authority to interfere until Congress shall have acted. To denounce a measure beforehand, to prevent the action of Congress, is either an assumption of authority or an exercise of influence incompatible with the spirit of this free system of government. The President, in his first message to this Congress, not content with discharging the duty imposed on him by the Constitution, in recommending measures for the consideration of Congress, imputes an uncompromising hostility to a national bank, and indirectly menaces us with a veto. If the advocates of a strict construction of the Constitution, who protest against implied and constructive powers, can indorse this unauthorized assumption of the Executive, I must declare my dissent from it.

The President next called on Congress for a bankrupt law, to annul the State banks which had abused their powers—banks owing their creation to State power, and responsible only to the States. This appears to me the highest prerogative ever claimed for this Government over the sovereignty of the States, and aims a more fatal stab at their authority and independence than has been ever suggested since the origin of this Federal Government. The alien and sedition laws were trifles compared with this most extravagant pretension. Whether banks deriving their charters from State authority have abused or forfeited their charters are questions of State cognizance exclusively, and beyond the pale of Federal authority. The proposition advanced by the President is so obviously and palpably monstrous, that no argument can be necessary to expose its fallacy; no reasoning has ever been advanced in either House to sustain it. If the State-rights gentlemen can countenance for a moment this assault upon the sovereignty of the States, they will excuse me for declining to be of their party. In the second message of the President to this Congress in December, 1837, he imputes the result of the elections in New York to bank influence, and at least indirectly impeaches the motives of the people when acting in their highest sovereign capacity. Are the motives and conduct of the people, in the exercise of the right of self-government, to be questioned before any human tribunal? If the people are not sovereign in the selection of agents to manage their affairs, how, or where, or when is the principle of self-government seen, felt, or understood? and where, unless at the polls, is the sovereignty of the people displayed? If they are sovereign, who dare to arraign their purity and infallibility? The sovereign is ever to be presumed right, just, and wise; and if wrong, that sovereign alone must correct its own errors. From what part of the Constitution does the President deduce the high prerogative of instituting an inquisition into the motives and conduct of the people, the common sovereign over all public agents and functionaries known to this Government? The polls, the ballot-boxes, are the channels through which the public will is most clearly and constitutionally expressed; and the inquiry can never be made, what influenced the voters? but can only go to the fact, has the popular will been expressed, and how has the sovereign spoken?

The President, in his last message to Congress, has traveled out of the sphere of Executive action, and assailed the decision of the inferior court and Supreme Court of the United States in the mandamus case against the Postmaster General. Now, Mr. Chairman, where does the President deduce the constitutional authority to arraign the decisions of the judicial tribunals at the bar of this House? The executive, judicial, and legislative departments are declared to be separate and distinct, and their respective powers are defined by the Constitution. It certainly does not belong to the Executive to revise and condemn the decisions of the Judiciary; but to Congress, and more to this House, has the Constitution assigned the power to inquire into the conduct of the judges, and to impeach them, if necessary and proper to do so. If the President had suggested the propriety of repealing the power to issue the writ of mandamus in the cases referred to, I certainly should not find fault with him; because, Mr. Chairman, I solemnly protest against the power of the Judiciary or the Executive to order money out of the Treasury of the people without the authority of the Representatives of the people. Congress, and more especially this House, has, by the Constitution, control of the public purse. Mr. P. said he had not read or considered the opinion of the court in the mandamus case, nor was he prepared to pronounce it right or wrong; but he was inclined to concur with the President, that the power, if it existed, to order money out of the Treasury by mandamus, ought to be repealed. The first and vital principle of free government held by enlightened Whigs in England and America, and for which so much blood has been shed by our ancestors, consists in preserving to the representative body the exclusive guardianship and control of the public purse.

This is the cardinal point involved in the mighty political struggle now pending before the nation. Shall the Treasury of the people be divorced from the control of the President, and restored to the care of their immediate Representatives? is the great question to be decided in the present political contest. This is the great conservative principle which has been maintained for ages by the enlightened friends of freedom in England and this country, as the best and only effectual security for the liberties of the people against tyranny and oppression. It is the old question between the friends of liberty and the power and privileges of Parliament and the supporters of the power and prerogatives of the Crown. In that contest, after a long and bloody struggle, the Whigs of England triumphed over the advocates of Executive power, as they will here if they will only make this the prominent plea in bar to the continuance of this Administration. I beseech gentlemen not to obscure this leading point by vague and indefinite talks about large expenditures, for which a large portion of the Opposition voted, or Executive patronage, which they have aided to increase. Mr. P. said that, by the removal of the deposits from the care of those to whom it had been confided by Congress, the custody and control of the public funds had been wrested from the representative body; and this sub-Treasury scheme, urged upon Congress and the nation by the President and his friends, was intended to consummate the usurpations of his illustrious predecessor. The President and his supporters contend that the key of the strong box should be placed in the hands of the President and those under his immediate direction, while his opponents insist that the public money should be confided to agents under the control of, and directly responsible to, Congress. It is, I repeat, in essence, the old question between the power of Parliament and royal prerogative. And I would exhort the Opposition to let nothing divert the public attention from this leading and great question. I shall be one of the last to speak in terms of disrespect or reproach of General Jackson, a brave man and a patriot, who so often staked his life for his country, and shed luster on our national character. Few men have felt more grateful than myself for his public services or more admiration for his brilliant achievements. I was zealous and sincere in my efforts to bestow on him the highest honor in the gift of his country.

While I respect this illustrious individual, and am ready to honor him for his deeds of valor, I can never indorse his assaults upon the fundamental principles of the Constitution, and his disregard of the powers, will, and action, of the legislative body. With his motives I have no concern, nor do I intend to question their purity; but I owe it to myself, to my country, and to my immediate constituents; to raise my voice, on all proper occasions, against that arbitrary, ruinous measure, the removal of the deposits. By that act, the wall of partition placed by the Constitution between the legislative and executive departments was broken down, and the equilibrium of power established by that instrument overthrown. It was done in defiance of the expressed will of the legislative body; and it was an unauthorized interference with the official powers and duties of the Secretary of the Treasury, for which I could never find any justification or apology. The public money was placed in the United States Bank by the Legislature, never to be removed by the Secretary without reasons, and those reasons to be assigned to Congress, instead of the President. I insist that the officer at the head of the Treasury, according to the true intent and spirit of the Constitution and laws, is the officer of Congress quoad the custody and management of the public money; and that the President could not rightfully direct or control the action of that department. The power of removal for gross misconduct does not carry with it the right to direct the fiscal operations of the Treasury Department. No President had ever assumed such direction or control; not even Washington or Jefferson, whose popularity enabled them to enlarge Executive power and influence more than any Presidents, until the reign of General Jackson. By a reference to the first laws creating the several Departments of this Government, a marked difference will be noticed between the Departments of State, War, and the Navy, and the law creating the Treasury Department; that of State, War, and Navy, are called Executive Departments, and placed under the control and direction of the President; whereas the Treasury Department is not called an Executive Department, and the head of the Treasury is to perform such duties as shall be directed by law. This distinction runs through most of the State constitutions, and the money department is considered everywhere directly under the control and direction of the legislative body. The submission of this people and their representatives to this lawless interference of the Executive with the public money, in defiance of legislative will, has surprised and mortified me more than anything which has occurred in our political history.

The reign of General Jackson, in many of its features, may be compared with that of Queen Elizabeth, called by the English commentators the greatest of English monarchs. She maintained the most absolute authority, without losing the affections of the people. By her energy and skill she defeated the most formidable fleet that had ever sailed on the ocean, called the Spanish Armada, and laid the foundation of the naval power of England, and gave to England a rank in the scale of nations unknown before. Her course was, in many respects, tyrannical, but her deportment was popular. She professed love for the people and acknowledged their liberties, but took care to use her own dictionary to define the term liberty. Her will was, in a great degree, the law of the realm. The friends of the free principles of the English constitution were unable to make a stand against her power and overwhelming influence. It has been well remarked by the historian that she obtained a lease for life of arbitrary power, and that if the force of free principles and free institutions were not destroyed, they were suspended during her reign. Her successors attempted to tread in the footsteps of their illustrious predecessor, without the ability, energy, or popularity to sustain the high ground of royal prerogative occupied by Queen Elizabeth; and, after her death, the friends of freedom rose in all their strength, resisted the arrogant and tyrannical pretensions of succeeding monarchs, and, after a long and bloody struggle, settled the principles of English liberty by the revolution of 1689.

General Jackson was elevated to the presidential chair by the gratitude and affections of the American people for his heroic achievements. His military career, his energy and decision of character, his admitted patriotism, his popular deportment, his professed devotion to the principles of the Constitution and the liberties of the people, as he took the liberty to understand them, gave him an ascendancy over the public mind which rendered resistance to his administration vain and fruitless. The affections and admiration of the American people granted him a lease for his term of service to act in a great degree according to his own will. Besides removing the deposits, he exercised the veto power in a manner and to an extent unexampled in our Government, and beyond anything known in the history of Great Britain in modern times. Indeed, it can hardly be presumed that such an exertion of the veto power by a British King would be tolerated or submitted to, and the probable result would be rebellion and civil war. He ordered the public money to be removed from the place assigned by law, without the consent of Congress, and deposited it in the hands of bank agents created by State authority, and in no manner responsible to this Government.

I will not advert to other matters often presented to the consideration of the people. The present Administration is pledged to maintain the principles and measures of the last, and it is for the good sense of the community to decide whether they will adhere to the successor of General Jackson in support of the measures and the principles to which I have adverted. I was born in the Old Dominion, and have ever been proud to claim it as the land of my birth, until that State bowed in submission to these usurpations of the Federal Executive. But I was still more mortified to hear that this great Commonwealth had required the Senate of the nation, composed of the representatives of the States, to be degraded and humbled in dust and ashes at the feet of the American monarch, because they had dared to disapprove his usurpations. The enlightened friends of liberty throughout the world must be astounded at the fact, that the people of Virginia, the birth-place of Washington, Henry, Jefferson, Mason, Madison, and a host of others of republican stamp, could look on with composure at these outrages on the principles of our free system, and in derogation of powers and privileges confided to the legislative body. I will not, Mr. Chairman, despair of the Republic, but indulge a hope that there must be a political regeneration in the Old Dominion, and that we shall soon see on this floor her sons animated with the spirit of Washington, Henry, and other friends to constitutional liberty, ready to restore to Congress, and especially to this body, their control over the public purse, and to rebuild the partition wall reared by the founders of our system, between executive and legislative power. I trust we shall soon have a majority here who will order the original mandate for the removal of the deposits to be brought to this House, and marked and branded with public condemnation, or burnt like the Yazoo act of Georgia, by fire from Heaven. When this solemn duty shall be performed, I will then believe this Republic still lives in substance, as it came from the hands of our forefathers.

Mr. Chairman, the President denounces corporations and associated wealth. Such slang might be tolerated at cross-roads or grocery taverns; but

I feel surprised and mortified to find such in a State paper emanating from the Chief Magistrate of a great nation. It is not the language of a dignified statesman, but the slang of an electioneering demagogue. Whether I agree with a President or not in his views, I can respect him as the first officer of my Government, if his course is marked by dignity and propriety. In this war on corporations and associated wealth, he only imitates a British tyrant, James I., or one of the Charleses, who, in the plenitude of his royal prerogative, asserted the right to annul the charters of incorporation in England. I think he annulled one, that of the city of London, and alarmed others into a surrender of their charters, and they obtained new charters from his Majesty upon the payment of a bonus. He did not make war on corporations to secure the liberties or good of the people, but to increase the power and patronage of the Crown, and to fill the coffers of the King. Whether any higher motives influence those who denounce corporations here, I leave to others to determine. What is meant by associated wealth to create prejudice or odium, I do not understand. This slang either has no definite meaning, or is the lowest sort of Locofocoism—intended, as I imagine, to array the poor against the rich. A State, every political association or body-politic, is a corporation; it is associated wealth; men unite and form a State or body-politic, to secure property as well as life and liberty, and for the general happiness and prosperity. An incorporated city or town is a body-politic; an association of wealth or property, for the better security of property, as well as life and liberty, and every other blessing incident to the social state. Many corporations are composed of individuals with small funds, who put small sums together to accomplish some useful object, to which the surplus capital of no one individual is competent. Bridges, roads, insurance companies of every kind, are formed in this way. But I will not detain the committee by details on this subject. These corporations, formed by many individuals, create a common interest, and are so many fixtures in the State, giving strength and stability to the whole frame of human society.

From the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, drawn and presented by the chairman, the organ to this House of the executive Administration, we must infer that the Executive is against a tariff to protect American industry; against internal improvements of any kind, national or local, including harbors. He is against the distribution of the public land, or its proceeds, among the States; he is for holding the proceeds as a part of the permanent annual revenue. With regard to a protective tariff nothing need now be said, because that subject has been compromised and settled until the year 1842. I do not understand that any man, of any party, is for disturbing the question before that time. With regard to internal improvements, no discussion is necessary, because, with the exception of two or three roads of a national character, and of great necessity and utility, which this Government has commenced, and seems to be bound in good faith to complete, I am not aware that any public man is urging on Congress or the nation the policy of engaging in a system of internal improvements. General Jackson conceded the power to make improvements of a national character; and I believe no person contends for more, and but few for that much. It may be necessary to make a few roads with reference to military operations or carrying the mail. I consider these questions of tariff and internal improvements disposed of for the present. If my friend from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON] will read a part of my speech on the bank question, in 1811, he will find that, although we may not agree about a national bank, we are nearer together about the line of demarkation between Federal and State powers than he supposes. I there contend that this Government ought to avoid, as far as possible, any agency in the interior of the States, and leave to them all matters of local concern, confining this Government to matters strictly national.

The President, as I have before stated, contends for a sub-Treasury to place the public money under the control and in the keeping of the Executive and officers holding at his pleasure, and is opposed to a national bank to be made our fiscal agent and directly responsible to Congress. I shall not at this period discuss this subject at large. At the called session, I presented a proposition for a national bank, reserving one third of the stock to be divided among the States, and precluding foreign stockholders from any control or management of the institution, with other provisions, to be found in the proceedings of this House. Without discussion, that subject was silenced by the previous question. There never has been a majority in this Congress for a national bank, sub-Treasury, or the State bank agency. I must ask leave, on this occasion, to say to the conservative gentlemen that I cannot indorse their scheme of State banks, because I have no faith in them; they will multiply and expand until they explode again. I may vote for them in preference to the sub-Treasury, but it will require an effort with myself to make a choice. Gentlemen talk much of the danger of one bank monster which has proved useful and safe, and stood the test for years. Now, sir, a many-headed monster of State banks is more frightful to me than one. We are called on to appoint at least twenty-six bank agents, under the authority of the twenty-six States, not under the control of this Government, or responsible to keep the public money. In the city of New York half our revenue is collected; and suppose twelve or fifteen millions of the national revenue deposited in the New York banks, and that great State was to array herself against the laws and authority of this Government, and renew the scenes of nullification, tell their banks to withhold the revenue, and give them a pledge of indemnity—what, sir, would be our condition, and how could the funds be reached when perhaps most wanted? I beseech gentlemen to weigh this matter like statesmen, and not sacrifice their country to preserve their consistency in error. Every candid man must perceive at once that if bank agency is necessary and proper for this Government, it must have the power, and ought to exercise it, to create a sound, safe, and responsible bank agent, with branches in every State to receive and pay out the public funds, according to the directions of Congress. This Government, with regard to cardinal powers clearly and distinctly granted, ought to be independent in its action of any other authority, and the public purse should be divorced from the control of executive, judiciary, and every authority, except the representatives of the people in Congress. This is the great principle for which I contend, and the leading question now before the American people.

I repeat, that I have a mortal aversion to this many-headed monster, the State banks; and, if I should vote for any such project, it will be for no other purpose than to defeat another measure, the sub-Treasury, the leading object of which is to place the public purse more directly under Executive direction. There is but one right course about anything; the course marked out by the wise and enlightened statesmen and patriots who have gone before us—and that is in relation to our fiscal agent, a national bank; and their wisdom has been fortified by the experience of forty years. Every other experiment has failed, with great loss and injury to the country; and yet gentlemen insist that they must be consistent. The more I reflect on this State bank system, in connection with this Government, the more I dislike it. It has a tendency to bring the moneyed interest and institutions of the States in contact, and under the influence of this Government. Previous to the year 1811, when the charter of the first bank expired, our monetary system was safe and sound, the banking system had been generally honestly and prudently conducted, and no redundant or spurious paper currency had cursed this people. Many enlightened and disinterested men of the Republican party assured me at that time that no bank in the world had been better managed than the bank created with the sanction of President Washington, the charter of which was then about to expire. It was generally believed for some time before that period that the charter would be renewed, and every vote given in the two Houses of Congress had indicated that result; but from causes not necessary now to explain, the bill to renew the charter failed in the Separate by the casting vote of the Vice President. This event gave birth to a host of State banks, the history of which is well known. After an experiment of four years of this State bank system, another national bank was created, with the sanction of Mr. Madison and his friends. The State banks, without the controlling check of a national institution, will not, I fear, succeed in securing to the people either a uniform or sound currency. A Bank of the United States, with a large and sound capital, will not only be a useful fiscal agent, but will furnish a currency of unquestionable value. The Constitution has assigned to Congress the power to coin money and regulate the value thereof; and, if gold and silver will not answer over this extensive country, and if a paper representative is to be furnished for the convenience of the people, it has ever seemed to me that it ought to emanate from the authority of the National Government.

HO. OF REPS.

Some object to depositing the money in a bank for the benefit of the stockholders; and in that I agree with them, and will only do it for an equivalent in money or public services. The bank is an insurer of the safety of the fund placed in it; if the bank is robbed, the Government does not lose it, but the bank; the bank must place the public money in different parts of the United States where it is wanted, without risk or expense to the Government. In the language of the Constitution, and in the spirit of our free institutions, I am opposed to the grant of any privileges to any man or set of men, but in consideration of public services. Are not the public funds more safe in sound banks, under our control and responsible to this Government, than in the hands of individuals, with whatever security they can give? Government rarely makes anything out of securities; and, indeed, it is probably better that the Government should lose by the appointment of a bad officer, than that innocent individuals should be ruined. On this subject I will only add, that I can make no compromise of opinion or principle, unless controlled by the will of my constituents. Mr. P. could not avoid expressing his astonishment at the assault made by his colleague [Mr. MURRAY] on the Bank of the United States. A man may have honest scruples about the constitutionality of a national bank, but the utility of such an institution has been generally admitted by the intelligent portion of all parties in the nation. It is most wonderful to me that a western gentleman of sense and candor should object to it. Our trade is carried on with distant States, and a national currency is more important to us than to any portion of the Union. Our traders now bring the notes of distant banks and diffuse them among the people, the value of which I cannot tell my neighbor, if he asks me; but send him to the merchant; if he is a poor man or a laborer, he may want a ten or a twenty-dollar note converted into silver to pay small debts; and the merchant will tell him, probably, that it may be good, but not very current; he will, however, change it, if the man will take the whole or part in goods, or discount one, two, or three, or ten per cent.; and the holder will be driven to accept the terms; and in this way the poor and laboring classes are shaved constantly, for want of a currency stable, sound, and which can anywhere and everywhere be converted into gold and silver. In this state of things, every merchant, besides a host of others, is reaping a rich harvest by shaving and robbing the ignorant and laboring classes of the country.

One of the first and highest duties of this Government is to relieve and secure the people against a ruinous, inconvenient, or uncertain medium. No part of this Union was more injured by fictitious and swindling banks and depreciated bank notes than the West; and it took many years after the last Bank of the United States was established to redeem us from the evils to which I have adverted. A sound and uniform currency was ultimately restored to the West, chiefly by the operation of the branches of the United States Bank established there. At first they were not as prudently managed as they ought to have been; but for about ten years before the removal of the deposits, we had a good currency, and our condition in regard to currency and commerce was sound and healthy. Branch banks were established at Pittsburg, Chillicothe, Cincinnati, Lexington, Louisville, St. Louis, Nashville, Natchez, and New Orleans, and all worked well; and I never heard that any of them engaged in the party politics of the country. Something was said against the Louisville branch, and promptly repelled by two or three directors, warm Jackson men of high standing. It may not be improper or irrelevant, in connection with this subject to allude to the pecuniary condition of the western and southwestern States. They have no surplus capital to make banks or internal improvements, and resort to loans for such purposes. Not only the States west and south, but many States on the Atlantic, have made large loans for those objects. The several States are now indebted, and a great part to foreigners, between one hundred and one hundred and fifty million dollars, at an annual interest of five or six per cent. Yes, sir, after all the clamor about foreigners and foreign influence, the States owe a large amount to foreigners for loans to make banks; and if the funds should be badly managed, or swindling directors get the control of the banks, the money may be plundered, and then the people must be taxed to pay the principal and interest of these debts, or this Government may be called on again to renew the funding system. I trust no such consequences may grow out of this state of things; but I must appeal to the gentleman to answer me with candor, whether it would not have been better to create a national bank, require at least one branch, with a reasonable capital, to be placed in every State, and to lend money at five or six per cent. to aid the business and enterprise of the people? On this plan no debts could have been incurred by the States, and a better currency would have been furnished. It would certainly have been the interest of the bank to furnish as much capital to each State as their business required. It must be admitted that the branches in the West were well conducted for the last ten years of their existence, whatever may be said of the mother bank in her struggle with the Government. I have never looked into the controversy, but can readily suppose that the bank may have been guilty of some impropriety and indiscretion, such as are incident to every human association. They are, however, unworthy the grave consideration of statesmen in deciding on a great measure of national concern. I repeat, that a man may object, with some plausibility, on constitutional ground, but a western man can have no other reason for clamoring against the bank, but because General Jackson denounced it.

My colleague, without using any personal or offensive language, has made a lunge at Mr. CLAY, a distinguished Senator from our State, in relation to the American system, which seems to me to have been uncalled for and unjust, owing, I must believe, to misapprehension of facts and the history of that system. Whatever my relations to that gentleman have been, or are now, I feel it my duty to place him, with regard to that policy, in a proper light before this committee and the public. At no time in my life, whatever may have been his course towards me or the country, have I treated him unfairly. At one period, I had reason to complain of the intolerant and proscriptive spirit of himself and his friends; free, however, from any personal bitterness on either side. After he became Secretary of State, in alliance with my friend from Massachusetts, he never offered me the hand of fellowship, and he was armed with additional power to deprive me of any share in the political concerns of my country. I thought I owed him a debt, which, with the aid of the hickory stick, I concluded to discharge. I did so, and balanced the account between us. I now am ready to act towards that gentleman under the influence of public considerations alone. My colleague seems to impute the American system, with all its imaginary evils, to him; for he has not told us of the mischief it has done, nor have I ever been able to find out, from the writings, speeches, and denunciations of gentlemen, what the evils are to which they refer. They seem to suppose that the surplus in the Treasury was the result of the American system. There is certainly no foundation for the assertion, and Mr. CLAY is not responsible for what accumulated in 1835 and 1836, and was deposited with the States by the act of 1836. That surplus was the result of the transfer of the public moneys from the Bank of the United States to State banks, with a recommendation to expand their issues, which gave birth to that scene of wild and extravagant speculation in public lands in 1834, 1835, and 1836, that brought into the Treasury or the banks that enormous surplus distributed among the States in 1836 and 1837; and which, by withdrawing so large an amount from the ordinary channels of trade and business, conducted much to that derangement of the currency and convulsion in our commercial affairs in 1837. The deposit act of 1836, with a small variation, was, in substance, a division of the land fund among the States, according to Mr. CLAY's views. Mr. CLAY made every effort in his power to prevent a surplus in the Treasury, by a distribution of the proceeds of the public lands among the States; and if his bill had not been defeated by President Jackson, there would have been no surplus. Cut off the land fund from the Treasury, and the tariff would not have produced more than was necessary to meet the usual demands on the Treasury.

A very small amount was expended for internal improvements during the administration of Mr. Adams, compared with that expended under the administration of General Jackson. The first great national improvement—the Cumberland road—had its origin under the administration of Mr. Jefferson; the work was commenced under that of Mr. Madison, and continued under every Administration since. In 1811, the State of New York applied to this Government to aid her with funds to make a canal from the waters of the Hudson to Lake Erie. Mr. Madison sent a message to Congress, recommending the subject to our favorable consideration, and commending in the strongest terms the policy of connecting by internal improvements the Atlantic with the western country. To cut down the mountains and facilitate the intercourse between the East and West, was a popular doctrine at that time, as well as to render this country independent of the workshops of Europe. The southern, western, and middle States, were generally, at least a large majority, for this policy. The people of New England were less favorable to it than any portion of the Union. I might with truth and justice deny that Mr. CLAY is entitled to the credit of originating the American system; for I believe Virginia, South Carolina, and New York, have equal if not superior claims. The system became popular, and the eastern States, after some resistance, acquiesced; and Mr. CLAY, with his usual political tact, made himself the prominent actor. When he became Secretary of State, and seemed to be on the high road to the Presidency, other aspirants were alarmed, and determined, if possible, to blast his prospects. To render the American system unpopular was an object of the first importance with the enemies of Mr. CLAY. The system was too popular then to be directly resisted; and the high tariff of 1828 was a contrivance of the Jackson party for effect on the system, calculated to injure Mr. CLAY, whether his friends supported or opposed it. I was one of that party at the time, and it is well known that Mr. Van Buren and most of the Jackson men supported it. I was a zealous supporter of General Jackson at that time, and we were very unwilling for the General to commit himself, in a manner to embarrass his friends or injure himself. We were fortunately soon relieved by the old hero, who came out for a judicious tariff, a ground which rendered him unassailable from any quarter. Mr. Chairman, a review of our past political history will show that many of the leading measures of this Government have been carried or rejected by reference to a presidential election.

My colleague [Mr. MURRAY] professes to admire Mr. CLAY much, although the author of so much mischief, but seems to admire nullification more. At the moment General Jackson was preparing, by proclamation and force bills, to demolish nullification and its supporters, Mr. CLAY interfered and averted the storm. This I have considered the best and most patriotic act of his life, and have ever given him full credit for it; and I think my colleague, as an act of sheer justice, while eulogizing General Jackson and nullification, might have bestowed on a distinguished citizen of our State some little praise for it.

Much is said about the increase and extravagance of our public expenditures, but to what extent this Administration is responsible I am unable to form a clear and satisfactory opinion. That there have been many improvident expenditures is certain, and that many of these have been voted for by a portion of both parties is equally true. During the present Congress at least two million dollars have been appropriated against my will and vote, and carried by a combination of a part of the Whigs with a portion of the friends of the Administration; and I therefore hesitate to rely on this as a substantial ground of objection to the men in power. My objections are not so much to the amount of expenditure as the manner of expenditure. Has the money collected from the people been fairly and carefully expended for their benefit? Public money, honestly and fairly disbursed for necessary and beneficial purposes, generally benefits the poor and laboring classes. That there have been many instances of improper expenditure, I have no doubt; but so many have participated in them, that I find it difficult to fix the blame exclusively anywhere. My impression is strong that the Indian war might have been avoided, and the sum of $10,000,000 saved to this Government, if the advice of General Eaton, when Governor, and others, had been followed. The war was badly managed. The expenses were increased by drawing volunteers from the distant parts of Missouri, and employing the northern Indians at much expense, and without the least utility. I confess that I am not surprised at a considerable increase of our expenses. They have grown, and will grow, with the growth and wealth of the country and the extension of our settlements. I repeat that my objections are to the manner of expenditure. I fear that we are plundered to a great extent, from want of vigilance in the selection of officers and agents. The good and success of the party enter too much into the consideration of the appointing power.

With regard to Executive patronage, about which we have heard much, I have little to say, because it must continue, to a great extent, so long as the Constitution remains unaltered. To the President the Constitution has assigned the power of appointing all officers except such of a subordinate character as Congress may think proper to confide to the heads of the Departments. How far the abuse of this power can be restrained or regulated by law, I have not time to examine. The officers of the Treasury Department ought, I think, to be rendered more independent of Executive dictation in the performance of official duty, and the power of removals may possibly be subjected by law to some salutary checks. The general power of appointment, the founders of our Republic deemed it most wise and safe to place where it is. To remove a man fit and faithful, without other cause than a difference of political opinion, seems to be tyrannical; and good behavior and fitness ought to be the guarantee for his continuance in office. Whether this power can be controlled by law or public opinion, is matter of grave consideration. When a new President is elected, and enters upon the duties of his office, there would seem to be some strong political considerations in favor of the right of the President to select the prominent executive officers, not only of the Cabinet, but throughout the Union, on whose fidelity and ability he must rely for the execution of the laws, and the executive administration of public affairs. But, after he has made his selection, and they have proved fit and faithful, I would deem it an impeachable offense to remove for expression of opinion. Such tyranny tends to make slaves and hypocrites, and to break down that spirit of independence and freedom of thought and action which belong to the genius of our system. The public officers and the people should be told by the Chief Magistrate that moral worth and fitness are paramount to party merit. This course is essentially necessary to preserve that moral force in the nation, upon which the durability of this Republic depends.

I am satisfied that many defalcations and official abuses have occurred, because the selections have been made more with reference to the good of the party than the good of the public. Party efficiency is estimated higher than integrity or qualifications; and here I must be permitted to say that I cannot admit the excuse for bad appointments usually offered—that the President and other executive officers have been deceived. He who is determined not to be imposed on, and will be honest and vigilant in his inquiries, will not be mistaken once in a thousand times. Sir, they are in most instances willing to be deceived, if the good of the party is to be advanced. I am aware that there are many useless offices and agencies, adding to the patronage and influence of the President, which ought to be abolished. There are, I am convinced, at least forty land offices which might be dispensed with; forty registers and as many receivers, making eighty or ninety in the whole, receiving salaries, besides the contingent expenses of these forty offices; and, if I should be honored again with a seat here, I will avail myself of the first opportunity, when there is the least prospect of success, to prune, if possible, this branch of Executive patronage. There are, no doubt, other offices and agencies which ought to be pruned off.

Mr. Chairman, the disposition of the public lands is another subject of deep interest to the people of the United States, to which the attention of this House and the nation has been called during the present session, on which the parties seem to be divided here. The leading question appears to be whether the proceeds shall be divided among the States, or brought into the national Treasury as part of our permanent annual revenue. The President and most of his friends are against the distribution among the States; and I infer that my colleague goes with the President. If I am mistaken in regard to the views of the President on the questions to which I have adverted, and more especially about the public lands, of such cardinal importance, I wish to be corrected. I desire to know whether his friends endorse his views. I can assure gentlemen that I neither wish to misunderstand him or them, but design to place the Administration fairly before the people. He and his friends, with my colleague, are opposed to distribution.

On this question I would, if practicable, tread in the footsteps of my old friend, President Jackson. In one of his messages to Congress, he says that after the payment of the public debt, we ought no longer to look to the public lands as a source of revenue, but to sell them to actual settlers at a moderate price. With this statesman-like view I entirely concur; but the plan is not practicable; neither my State, nor any of the old States, will consent to it. The next best plan is that presented by Mr. CLAY's land bill, with a little alteration. I am for allowing a preemption to actual bona fide settlers, at the Government price, the proceeds of the lands to be divided among the States, to be applied, at least one half to common schools, and the residue to internal improvements, under the direction of the Legislatures of the States; the distribution to be made according to the apportionment under the next census. The West will then have more than one third of the Representatives of the nation; and instead of the whole land fund being drawn from the West, to be expended in other sections of the Union, more than one third will be retained in that section to be expended there. My colleague's course is strange, passing strange, on this subject. He complains that no public money is expended in Kentucky, while large expenditures are made in other States, and yet supports the President in draining the West of $5,000,000 every year, to be expended in other parts of the Union, without giving Kentucky any portion of it. The estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury of the annual proceeds of the public lands is $5,000,000; the proportion to be received by Kentucky, Tennessee, and Indiana, after the next census, will be about the same, probably near two hundred and fifty thousand dollars each, annually; Ohio nearly double that sum; Illinois and Missouri about one hundred and fifty or one hundred and sixty thousand dollars each. I do not pretend to strict accuracy, but I feel assured that my calculation is substantially correct, so far as concerns the argument in favor of distribution. By this arrangement, the States will be enabled to diffuse common schools for the benefit of the poor classes, and improve roads, rivers, harbors, and other works of internal improvement, without calling on the General Government for aid. And why shall not this fund be divided in this way, by which the expenditure in the interior will be equalized? Because the President, my colleague, and others, say if you withhold the land fund, the tariff may be raised. My colleague admits that Kentucky pays her full share of the tariff, without any expenditure; and yet he is willing to tariff the West by a drain of $5,000,000, without retaining any portion for the use of his own State. While Mr. CLAY is for a general tariff, operating on the whole, he is for dividing this fund so as to give his own State $250,000 a year.

I will beg leave to present the views of a constituent of mine, a zealous friend of President Jackson, and well known to my colleague; a man of strong understanding, bold and independent in the expression of his opinions; when wrong he can never be put right, and when right can never be changed. On a public occasion he contended that public land belonged to the people as tenants in common; and if divided, a poor man would be entitled to as much as a rich man; that if the proceeds of the lands were applied to the payment of revenue, or to relieve the wealthy from the payment of their share of the revenue, it was a robbery of the poor for the benefit of the rich. He contended that if a wealthy man paid a tax of $100, and a poor man only five dollars, and the land fund was applied to pay or lessen the taxes, then the rich man paying $100 would receive twenty times as much land as the poor man who paid five dollars. He insisted that the revenue, according to the principle and spirit of the Constitution, ought to be paid in proportion to the property or ability of each individual; and that to make the land fund revenue was unequal and unjust. In this view there is much plausibility and force, and it is in conformity to the plan adopted by the State of Georgia for the division of their vacant lands. The President and his friends are for taking the fund belonging in common to all, to relieve the consumers of foreign luxuries and finery from any additional burdens. The debts charged on our public lands are paid; and I concur with President Jackson that we ought no longer to look to that source for revenue. According to my plan, the benefits of this fund will be as nearly equalized as practicable, but may be improved after further examination and reflection.

I cannot resume my seat, Mr. Chairman, without a slight notice of remarks made on this floor and elsewhere by gentlemen from the Old Dominion. They seem to make a national bank a test question. How long, I ask, has this been the doctrine of Virginia? Many of the members from Virginia voted for the bank in 1816, and were re-elected; and some were elected by the Legislature to the Senate of the United States, after voting for the bank, unless I am very much mistaken. William H. Crawford was chairman of the committee in the Senate, in 1811, who reported a bill to recharter the first bank, and made a very able speech in support of the constitutionality and expediency of such an institution. Yet Virginia supported Mr. Crawford for the Presidency, with great zeal, against General Jackson; and Mr. Van Buren, the President, notwithstanding his uncompromising hostility to the bank, was the right bower of Mr. Crawford in opposition to the General. The course of Virginia towards Kentucky, her first-born, seems to be unnatural and ungrateful. Kentucky followed in the wake of Virginia for thirty or forty years; supported all her distinguished men for the Presidency; and now, when she presents for that office a man of the first order, born and raised in the Old Dominion, they turn their back on him because he entertains the same opinion now which Mr. Madison and many other Virginians did in 1816, and transfer their influence and votes to a citizen of New York. I could hardly consider a man's opinion about a national bank, whether for or against it, an invincible objection, provided he would follow the advice of Mr. Jefferson, that the President in a doubtful case, ought not to defeat, by veto, the will of Congress and the nation.

I was desirous to call the attention of the committee to other topics of much interest, but I feel too much exhausted to proceed. I hope, on some other occasion, to add to the views now presented to the committee. I have stated with frankness, without any partisan feeling, other than results from difference of opinion, my objections to the principles and leading measures of this Administration. I verily believe, as I have before said, that a change of Administration is necessary to the healthy action of the body politic; and that we have no reason to expect that the errors and abuses which have occurred will be reformed, or that our currency will be restored to a sound and stable condition, without a change. It is necessary, Mr. Chairman, to restore the principles of the Constitution to their former strength and activity.

PUBLIC LANDS.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE,

Monday, January 7, 1839.

The Senate having taken up the bill to reduce and graduate the price of the public lands, and the question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands, in pursuance of instructions, and limiting the benefits of the bill to actual settlers—

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, from the Committee on Public Lands, moved to amend this amendment by extending the benefits of the bill to settlers on lands adjacent to those sold under the bill, for the increase and improvement of their farms; and spoke briefly in explanation and support of this amendment.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, said: I do not think, Mr. President, that, without any disrespect to the committee, the report which they have made is in conformity with the instructions received; and, in the first place, I say that the committee have not reported a restriction as to the quantity of land which the purchaser might be allowed to hold under the bill, at the reduced price, and according to what I supposed the Senate intended in their instructions. The proposition which I made embraced two restrictions, one confining the benefits of the bill to actual settlers, and the other was a restriction as to the quantity for each purchaser, which was not to exceed one hundred and sixty acres. At the moment of putting the question, I consented to strike out the one hundred and sixty acres, leaving the quantity in blank, which I supposed the committee would fill up with one hundred and sixty or two hundred and twenty acres, or something of the kind. The committee notwithstanding, have reported no quantity, but have contented themselves with abiding by the restriction on this point in the original bill, which it may be shown amounted to no restriction to the amount of land to be procured under the bill.

And, in another respect, I think the committee have not exactly conformed to their instructions. According to parliamentary usage, when the bill was recommitted, it was with instructions, and the committee had no power to go beyond them. It was required of them both to comply fully with the instructions, and not to transcend them. But the committee have not only failed to report such a restriction as I have intimated as to the quantity of land under the bill, but they now offer an amendment which was not in the instructions given them. Of this I do not much complain, because, if the committee had offered no such amendment, it would still have been competent in the Senate to make it, but with this important difference, that it now comes with the weight of the name and character of the committee, instead of a single member giving it his own weight and influence. So much for the manner of bringing in this amendment, and now for the question itself.

And I entreat the attention of the Senate to the proposition here made, and, above all, the attention of the Senators from Virginia. Mr. President, there is no difficulty now in the way to prevent any man in the United States, whoever he may be, from procuring any of the public lands in the market by paying $1 25 per acre; and if there are farmers or planters in the new States who desire it, they are allowed, at that price, to enlarge their estates, and add, if they please, to their already almost boundless sections. There is nothing in the existing laws to prevent it. But what is the proposition to which the old States are now called on to submit? Sir, the bill provides for the reduction of the land under it, from $1.25 to 75 cents per acre, which is a reduction on every section of $320; and the reduction to one dollar is equivalent to a grant of $180 on every section. And now what is the import of this amendment? It is that any planter or farmer in the new States shall be allowed to purchase an additional section at the reduced price, while no planter or farmer in the old States is allowed that privilege—a privilege which amounts to an actual grant to each of $180 or $320. The whole amount of the proposition, in the sense which the Senate expressed when the bill was recommitted, was to limit the bill to actual settlers. But this amendment does not propose that; the committee go a step further, and propose that a planter or farmer in Alabama or Indiana, who owns in all half a dozen sections, may add another to them at a reduced price; nay, more, there is an estate on the Mississippi river worth $1,500,000, to which an addition may thus be made under this bill, whilst the owner of an estate in Virginia, of only fifty acres, is not allowed that privilege unless he become an emigrant to the new States. And where, sir, is there authority in the laws or Constitution for this discrimination? As to the privilege of buying land adjoining any estate, no one refuses that privilege, and the owner may buy to any extent, if he chooses, at $1 25 per acre. But on what principle do we grant them this gratuity of $320 or $180? On what principle is this donation to be made, and how shall we go home and say to our constituents in Pennsylvania or Virginia, or the other old States, from some of which the Government has received the most magnificent grants ever made by one State to another—in what a position shall we be placed when going home and saying, “we have allowed the farmers in the new States to purchase land adjacent to their farms at a reduced price, amounting to a gift of $180 or $320 each; but we have refused you the same privilege unless you will leave the home of your family and the tombs of your ancestors, and emigrate to the far West? We have given them a bounty, a premium, to enable them to purchase adjacent land, but we prohibited to you, we withhold from you, the least gratuity unless you will abandon the homes and tombs of your ancestors.”

Sir, I think it unwise, at the present session, to legislate at all on this subject, for reasons which I assigned on a former occasion; and if the sense of the Senate continues as it was when the subject was up before, the argument in favor of this bill increasing the revenue is of no force, for it was then dissipated by a vote of the Senate, (in favor of restriction.) And nobody believes that the effect of the bill, without such limitations as I have suggested, would be any other than to create afresh the spirit of speculation. But if the Senate are to legislate on this subject at this session, I shall go with the sense of the Senate, expressed on a former occasion, in favor of restriction, and not in favor of discriminating between the farmers and planters of one portion of the Union and of another, to the disadvantage of one and for the benefit of the other; but I would place the whole on the same broad platform: Entertaining these views, I am of the opinion that the amendment is repugnant to the spirit of the Senate as manifested on a former occasion; and if this bill is a process for raising the new States, and if gentlemen desire to increase the wealth and population of those States, they may do it without such discrimination as is proposed, and without depriving the poor emigrant of lands adjacent to other estates, which they otherwise might purchase.

Mr. C. called for the yeas and nays on the amendment; which were ordered.

Mr. WALKER said the Senator from Kentucky had come out more boldly than he had done during the past week. He had then confined himself to considerations connected with the merits of the question, but he had now made a bold and open appeal to the jealousy of the older States, and had called upon them by name, especially on Pennsylvania and Virginia, to vote, by their Senators here, against the amendment. But the Journal of 1837 would show that when the bill of that time was up, restricting the sales under it to actual settlers, the Senator then denounced what he now advocates.

Mr. W. would call the attention of the Senate particularly to the extraordinary position of the Senator from Kentucky. That Senator now said that the amendment under consideration made a discrimination between the old and the new States. But was that feature of discrimination in the original bill? No; that offered its benefits equally to all the citizens of the United States. Who was it then that drew this distinction which the Senator now represented as unjust and unconstitutional? It was introduced, and the Journal would show it, on the motion of that Senator himself, and on his motion the committee were required to confine the bill to actual settlers, thus discriminating between Pennsylvanians, Virginians, and the citizens of the other old States, and those of the new States, and confining the benefits of the bill to citizens of the new States only; yet that Senator now asked what right the Senate had to make any discrimination. This was a two-edged sword with the Senator. While the friends of the bill left it open to all the citizens of the United States, the Senator then announced it as a measure to aid and encourage speculators; and now, when that objection had been disposed of on his own motion, he denounced it as unjust and unconstitutional because it made discrimination. The Senator could not escape this extraordinary position in which he had placed himself.

Mr. CLAY. Yes, he will.

Mr. WALKER. But the Senator complained that the committee had not restricted the right in regard to the amount of land for each individual. Yes, they had confined it to one section. Where, then, was the ground of complaint? The amount had been left in blank by the Senate, and the committee had made it as it was in the bill originally, which was a restriction to one section. Where, then, had the committee violated their instructions? On the bill of the last session the question was put in regard to the quantity; and it was decided at that period, by a solemn vote of the Senate, that the quantity should be limited to one section, so that, so far from acting against their instructions or the sense of the Senate, the committee had acted in accordance with that sense as expressed at the last session.

But the committee were also told that they had violated their instructions by reporting an additional amendment, for the purpose of prompting individual Senators to vote in its favor. It was not for that; but it was because the sense of the Senate required an enlargement of the bill beyond the amendment of the instructions to the committee; so as to make it more similar to the act of 1837, extending the right under the bill to those who cultivated adjoining lands; and the committee only asked that, before the vote should be taken on the restriction, it should be taken on the proposition of the committee to enlarge the benefits of the bill to this class of citizens.

The committee, in this recommendation, had not acted without precedent; so that, if the Constitution should be violated by it, it had been violated before, both by the Senate and the House. A similar principle to this was embraced in the act of April 5, 1832. [Mr. W. here read a provision that no person should enter more than one eighth of a section in his own name, “unless for cultivation or the use of his own improvement.”] And the benefit of this act was to be enjoyed—by whom? First by the actual settler, and secondly by others for the use of their improvements, or for the use of a farm already cultivated. This principle, then, was adopted by Congress in 1832, which was similar to that of the amendment now proposed. And what was the objection? If it was a discrimination between the old and new States, was there not the same discrimination in the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky, confining the benefits of the bill to actual settlers? [Mr. CLAY. No.] Was a resident of Pennsylvania an actual settler in Mississippi? No. He must go to the land, and reside upon it himself, and could not do it by proxy.

If the Senate should adopt this amendment, allowing these refused lands to be added to adjacent farms at the low price, lands which no individual would buy at $1 25, two or three hundred thousand acres of them might be sold, which would perhaps never sell if the Senate should refuse to permit them thus to be sold. The whole of this would be for the benefit of the new States, and also for the benefit of the whole Union, enabling the Government to sell lands which otherwise they could not sell.

Mr. SMITH, of Indiana, said: I understand, Mr. President, that the question now before the Senate is upon the amendment proposed by the Committee on Public Lands to the instructions committed to the committee, and reported back by them, by which amendment the committee propose to grant the graduation privilege to persons owning adjacent lands upon which they reside, as well as to the actual settler upon the refuse lands which may be entered hereafter at the graduated prices. The bill, with the amendments, having assumed its present shape, it appears to me to be a proper time to say something upon the entire subject. I can only promise the Senate as much brevity as the importance of the question, and the views I entertain of the merits of the different propositions, will allow, and a long silence will justify. Before I take up the subject, permit me to recur for a single moment to the history of this bill; it may not be without its use in the progress of the argument. The subject of the public lands, as referred to in the President's message, was sent at an early day to the Committee on the Public Lands. The President recommended graduation, with a special mode of ascertaining their value by actual assessments. The committee, however, reported a bill graduating the price of the public lands, without any restriction in favor of actual settlers, and relying on the efflux of time as the criterion of value.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] then moved to recommit the bill to the committee, with instructions to limit its operation to actual settlers, or those who might enter for settlement and occupancy; a leading member of the committee asked a division of the question, and the question was first taken on the recommitment of the bill, which was decided in the affirmative; and upon the instructions the almost entire vote of the committee and many of the other professed friends of graduation were found in the negative, denying the benefit to the actual settler in preference to the speculator. I must confess, sir, that vote surprised me; I had heard so much said in favor of the settler that I did suppose there would not have been a dissenting voice on the question, but it seems that I was mistaken. After all the cry about speculators by gentlemen, they are now willing to play into their hands to the full extent of the seventy million acres operated upon by this bill. So much for the difference between professions and practice. But, sir, the whole principle of graduation is opposed by certain Senators, and reasons, which to their minds no doubt are satisfactory, have been urged against it; many of them plausible, and some of them conclusive against the bill as it was originally introduced. I propose, Mr. President, to proceed with a brief examination of the objections to the principle, as well as the reasons and arguments which have been advanced in its favor. For, sir, I do not fully concur with either; it seems to me the truth lies between.

First. It is contended that the graduation principle unsettles and disturbs the whole land system of the country under which it has prospered, and the new States have settled beyond our most sanguine anticipations. I admit, sir, that the long-established principles and measures of the Government should not be disturbed for slight causes, nor without mature consideration. I am aware that the greatest novice that may be selected to either branch of Congress no sooner takes his seat here than he feels himself not only qualified, but called upon, by his great love of country, to either change the established laws of the land, or what is still more important, the Constitution of the country. Hence you see, sir, the numerous resolutions to amend that great charter of our liberties not unfrequently introduced by men who have very indistinct views of our form of Government. I admit all this, sir, but still I humbly conceive that, when it shall appear manifest that a change in the policy of Government is required by the public interest, we ought to act in accordance with that interest. If such were not the fact, experience, which is said to be the best and safest teacher, would be entirely thrown away and discarded in our legislation here. But, sir, the land system has been repeatedly changed, modified, or unsettled, if you please, from time to time, as the public good required. From six hundred and forty acre tracts, it has been divided and subdivided, until a purchaser can enter forty acres, giving the poor man an opportunity of obtaining a home for the sum of fifty dollars. The price has also been reduced from two dollars to one dollar and twenty-five cents, and the cash system has been introduced in lieu of the credit. Will any Senator say that these modifications of the system have not resulted in the public good? I trust not; and yet, if the argument that the land system should not be disturbed had obtained at that time, we should have lost the benefit of those valuable modifications of the system. So that I am inclined to believe that we are not estopped to reexamine this subject, and to introduce any other modifications that the best interests of the country seem to require.

Secondly. It is contended that this system inures to the benefit of the land speculator. I am willing to confess, sir, that such would have been the case to some considerable extent had the bill of the committee become a law without any restriction, and I am not prepared to say that the objection would not have been well taken to that bill. But I am not able to discover how the bill with the amendments can possibly benefit speculators; on the contrary, it seems to me that they are expressly excluded from any benefit under it by the clause confining it to the actual settler in limited quantities.

Thirdly. It is contended that the length of time lands may have been in the market is no evidence of their value; on the other hand, the committee seem to have supposed that time is conclusive evidence of that fact. On this point I am satisfied, Mr. President, that the truth lies between the two positions. That time is not conclusive evidence of the value of the public lands, I well know; for, sir, to my knowledge, large districts in Indiana that were acquired by the treaty of St. Mary's, in 1818, lying on the waters of White river and the tributary streams of the Wabash, and Miami of the Lake, of first-rate lands, have been entered within the last five years, after they had been over ten years in market, while other lands greatly inferior in quality had been entered years before, though they had not been near so long in market; and yet, sir, I would not say that the length of time lands have been in market is no evidence of their value; it is, however, scarcely prima facie and will depend much upon the question whether new Government lands in sufficient quantities to supply the demand, by taking a few selections from each new congressional township, are continually held out to the purchasers, or whether they are confined to the old districts until a full examination of quality is made. But, sir, the old adage that "distant fields are green," is applicable in all its force to the emigrant to the new States. Emigrants seem to take it for granted that the best lands are the furthest off; that the promised land is still ahead; and so deeply rooted is this opinion in the minds of most of them, that you can scarcely get one to stop long enough in the old district to look at the lands, until since our works of internal improvement have attracted their notice. Ask them to examine lands in Indiana, they will tell you that they were going to the West. Iowa, I believe, at present, is the most popular point; the further off, however, the better. Purchase a country at the mouth of the Oregon, on the Pacific, running up the inclined plane to the Rocky mountains, and open land offices there, and, my word for it, that country would be all the rage; few emigrants would stop this side of the Rocky mountains. Yes, sir, "distant fields are green" in the eyes of the emigrant; and here let me add, the great benefit I anticipate from the graduation is, to stop a portion of this emigration in the old land districts of the new States, to extract from the rolling tide a few drops at least for the refreshing of the old districts, to offer a bounty, or rather an inducement, for examination and settlement, to those who may desire to purchase in the old districts at the reduced prices. But, sir, I will not further anticipate the argument on this point at the present moment.

Fourthly. It is said that this bill is calculated to reduce the price of real estate, by the reduction of the price of so large a quantity of the public lands. There might be something in this objection if the reduction was to all public lands to all persons; but as it applies only to the refuse lands, and is confined to settlers, the objection loses its force; for each successive improvement that is made by the settler would add more to the value of the surrounding lands than the difference between the price at which the public lands are sold and the proposed graduated price. Hence, real estate cannot be affected in price by the operation. Immediately connected with this question is the objection to the amendment proposed by the committee to extend the graduation principle to those individuals who are already resident freeholders of the new States of contiguous land, to attach to their improvements. It is said this is giving them a bounty that citizens of other States do not enjoy. To this it may successfully be answered that if those settlers have by their labor and money, in improving the lands they have purchased of the Government, increased the value of contiguous lands that would have been otherwise valueless, they ought not to be deprived of the benefit of the reduced price. They are already settlers, and in many cases the contiguous lands are of value for wood or for a range for stock, to the cultivator of other lands, when you could not get settlers to locate on them at any price.

I will now, Mr. President, examine the grounds upon which some Senators have placed this bill. The Committee on Finance attempt to sustain this as a financial measure—a relief measure to an exhausted Treasury. It strikes me, sir, that there has been a great change in the policy of those Senators upon this point within a few years. It will be recollected by the Senate that, upon the removal of the public deposits from the United States Bank to the local banks, the Secretary of the Treasury issued a circular to the local deposit banks, requesting, nay more, requiring them to loan liberally, to supply the vacuum that would be created by the withdrawal from circulation of the notes of the Bank of the United States; and it cannot have been forgotten that the local banks loaned most liberally, and that the currency of the country was greatly increased; that a corresponding rise in the price of produce, as well as in real estate, followed. The public lands remaining at the maximum price of $1 25 per acre, were, consequently, not only the safest, but the cheapest article in the market in which capital could be invested; hence the large sales that followed. The banks were then paying specie; the notes of the banks could, so far as the amount received for the public lands was concerned, have been converted into coin upon demand; the Treasury was overflowing; when, all at once, the whole policy changed; the celebrated specie circular was issued and maintained upon the open and avowed principle that the public lands were selling off too fast; that the sales must be stopped; that the whole of the public domain would go into the hands of speculators; and hence the propriety of arresting the course by the circular requiring our western citizens to pay for their lands in specie, while an eastern debtor to the Government for duties, or otherwise, could pay in bank paper. Yes, sir, the specie circular was maintained upon the ground alone of arresting the sales of the public lands, and upon that ground the President refused to rescind it. And it cannot have been forgotten by the Senate that, pending the question to rescind it before the Senate, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] warned western Senators that the repeal would at once throw the whole of the western domain into the hands of speculators, and called upon them to resist its repeal. I could not then see with that Senator, and I voted to do away the discrimination; and, sir, what has been the result? Look at the case as it is now presented by the same Senator—the specie circular rescinded; and yet, instead of the public lands falling into the hands of the speculators, the Senator now calls upon us to make this question a financial measure, to accelerate the sales of the public lands.

As the Senator from Missouri was not very fortunate in his predictions as to the effect to be produced by the repeal of the specie circular, I may possibly hazard too much when I say to the Senate that I shall be agreeably disappointed if this measure shall benefit the Treasury one dollar in the aggregate amount which will be received for the public lands for the next five years. I agree with those Senators who have stated that the sales of the public lands can never exceed the quantity required for use, either mediately or immediately, unless you make them an object to the capitalist to invest his funds for subsequent speculation, which all admit to be destructive of the best interests of the country, and, not in a few instances, ruinous to the individuals concerned. I do not, Mr. President, therefore, maintain this measure as a financial measure. I place it upon other grounds; and if the Secretary of the Treasury shall rely on any aid from the public lands, to be produced by this bill, beyond about three or four millions per annum for the entire sales, I think he will be deceived.

I have said, Mr. President, that I did not support this bill with the amendments as a financial measure. I maintain it upon the ground that it is the duty of this Government to aid in settling the States as fast as possible, or at least to throw no obstacle in the way of their settlement; that the States have a deep interest in appropriating to actual settlers the domain within their limits. They surrendered, with the Articles of the original Confederation and the adoption of the new Constitution, the right to lay imposts on foreign merchandise for the purpose of raising revenue with which to carry on the State governments. Their principal resort is to direct taxation, and the more there are to contribute, the lighter will be their burdens. But, sir, it is the policy of all good Governments to increase the number of freeholders as rapidly as possible, to attach as many as possible to the soil, not as the serfs of Russia are attached, as appendages, but attached by interest. Persons so situated are the instruments of a nation's prosperity in time of peace and her shield in time of war.

Sir, the Senator from Kentucky has pointed to the unparalleled prosperity of the new States as conclusive upon the land question. He argues, and with great plausibility, that the policy of the Government has been good, and that the lands have been, and are, low enough, or why the vast increase in the population of the new States? He points specially to the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan. Sir, the picture he draws of the state of improvement of these States, however vivid, was not too highly colored; indeed, Mr. President, the half has not been told. Should a person who had never crossed the mountains before, at this day pass through those States, he would scarcely credit his own eyes; instead of finding a country sparsely populated, with here and there an opening to break the solitary dullness of extensive forests, as was the case a few years ago, he would witness a much higher state of improvement than many of the older sections of the Union exhibit. I hope to be excused for speaking of myself, but I see no better way of illustration. In the year 1820 I settled in Indiana, within five miles of the western boundary of civilization; the village in which I lived was crowded with Indians daily, the country west of the Mississippi was a dense forest, except where it was broken by the intervention of a prairie, or an inland lake; not a white man was settled more than five miles west of me. How stands the case now? The whole of that large district of country is laid off into counties; which gave, at the last election, from eight hundred to four thousand votes to a county; our seat of government for Indiana, located fifty miles west of me, has become a beautiful city, and is rapidly improving; other cities and towns, in every part of the State, have risen up as if by magic, and present a most beautiful appearance; the log cabin of the pioneer is giving place to the comfortable dwelling of the prosperous farmer; the State is rapidly developing her resources—works of internal improvement, canals, railroads, and macadamized turnpikes, are being constructed in almost every part of our State, which will shortly place our agriculturists of the interior almost, if not entirely, upon an equal footing with those upon the navigable waters.

By the late report of the chief engineer of our State, made to the Legislature now in session, it appears that there are four hundred and ninety miles of canals, rail and macadamized roads, either finished, or in a rapidly progressive state of construction, in the State, which, with those works yet to be commenced agreeably to the provisions of the internal improvement laws of the State, will, when completed, give the people every reasonable facility for the transportation of their surplus produce, as well as for the importation of their necessities from abroad. And here, Mr. President, it may not be out of place for me to account for the large sales, within the last few years, of our refuse lands in Indiana, that so much has been said about by Senators. I think, sir, it can be accounted for in but one way, and that is, that our works of internal improvement running through, by, and intersecting them, have made them desirable and really valuable, on account of their contiguity to these works, and not because of their original intrinsic value, as some Senators have urged. And, sir, as I said before, here is the consideration you have received for the grants you have made to the States to aid us in those works of internal improvement. Many of these lands could not have been sold for years but for the State works. Sir, such has been the great increase of our population in Indiana, that from one hundred and forty-seven thousand souls which it contained in 1820, we shall return, at the next census, near eight hundred thousand. I have confined my remarks to my own State principally, leaving other Senators to speak specially of the progress of improvement in their respective States.

But, Mr. President, while I freely admit the premises of the Senator from Kentucky, I do not acknowledge the conclusions he draws from them. The prosperity of these States may be traced to other causes, and, amongst the most prominent, I would name the fertility of our soil, the enterprising character of our citizens, and our internal policy, but, above all, our free institutions. The soil of these States, however diversified in character and climate, seems to reward labor most amply everywhere. He who sows will always reap the reward of his industry there. But, sir, I attribute much of our prosperity to the enterprising, industrious, economical character of our citizens. These States are settled with a class of citizens who would make any country prosper—men who know how to labor, and are not afraid of soiling their hands to do it—none of your exclusive consumers. Sir, we have but few drones in the hive, and you know what must be the result. We must, we do, prosper beyond all example. But I said there was another cause which, above all others, contributed to our great and unparalleled prosperity. I allude to our free institutions, or to be more explicit, to the prohibition of slavery by the constitution of our State. I speak of this not to wound the feelings of others, but as a fact connected with our rising greatness.

I do not intend to go into this question at length; it is too vast for the brevity of the remarks I intend to submit; volumes could be spoken upon it. I do say, however, that it is to our free institutions that we owe much of our prosperity. Our population is composed of emigrants, young and enterprising, from the free States, and of the very best of the citizens of the slave States—a class of men who depend upon their own labor, and not upon that labor which consumes the greater part of its value. Of the flowing tide of the entire emigration from the East to the West, few settle east of the Ohio river—the free States receive them; there they find institutions similar to those they left behind, and, though in a strange land, they feel at home so soon as they arrive amongst us.

Mr. President, as the traveler passes down the Ohio river, the first thing that will strike his attention is the marked and palpable difference in the two sides in the value of real estate, the state of improvement, the appearance of the cities, towns, and villages. I think it may be safely asserted that the lands on the side of the free States will bring at least fifty per centum more than on the side of the slave States; and there is even a greater difference than that in the state of improvement and the size and appearance of the towns on the margin of the river. I speak of these things as facts, that require no embellishment to make them strike the mind with all the force consequent upon their truth; but still they speak a language not to be misunderstood, of the great importance we should attach to the frame of our State governments in the States to which the Senator has referred. To the combined causes which I have named may be attributed the unparalleled increase of the population and wealth of these States, and not exclusively to the price of the land or the paternal care of the General Government.

Sir, the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] in a very earnest address, the other day, attempted to trace the rise in the price of western produce to the destruction of the tariff and the price of cotton in the South; and he even carried his arguments so far as to attribute the recent rise of the article of salt in the West to the duty of six cents per bushel on the foreign article. I was surprised, nay, astonished, to hear such arguments from that Senator. Does the Senator believe—does he think he can make others believe—that a duty of six cents could possibly produce a rise from seventy-five cents [Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, here said that he had bought his salt in the forepart of the fall season, at Maysville, at fifty cents a bushel] from fifty cents; then, to two dollars and fifty cents, the price it bore at the time the Senator addressed the Senate? I am told that it now sells for four dollars per bushel at Cincinnati. Will the Senator still contend that this increase is owing to the six cents duty? I presume, Mr. President, the trifling circumstances of the low and frozen stage of the Ohio river, and the almost impossibility of conveying salt from the salines to the points where it is wanted for pork packing and winter use, have quite as much to do with the price as the duty.

But, sir, it is not my intention specially to note this remarkable argument of that Senator. My main object was to say that, in my opinion, the rise of western produce within the last few years may fairly be traced to other causes than those to which the Senator from Missouri credits it like his duty on salt. It seems to me he has overlooked—unintentionally, no doubt—the real cause, in his great anxiety to strike a blow at the dying tariff; although I find he was very willing to keep up a high duty on the article of lead, produced by Missouri, and voted for the high tariff of 1828. Mr. President, may not the rise in the value of western produce be attributed to the great increase of western capital, as well as eastern—bank capital, if you please—to the increase of our circulating medium, to the large sums of money drawn from abroad by the sale of our stocks, and appropriated to our works of internal improvement? Let me put to the Senator from Missouri this question: suppose we were to withdraw all the bank capital from the West, except what we had before the rise of produce in the West, and should be placed upon a specie circulation alone, and should also pay up the amount we owe for the money loaned by means of the sale of our stocks abroad; does he believe, does any one believe, that the price of the produce in the West would be even as high as it was in years before its rise, produced by the causes which I have stated? No, sir. We owe the present prices to the character and quantity of our circulating medium and to the amount of capital of which we have the use, combined; and here, sir, I hope I shall not be considered as digressing too much to allude to a portion of the past history of the times recently.

It will be recollected that one of the most formidable objections that was urged against the late Bank of the United States was, that foreigners held stock in the institution. "British lords and ladies!" This was supposed to be injurious in time of peace, and dangerous in time of war; although they had no vote for the directory. Yet, strange to tell, the very men who raised this objection, and urged it upon the people, now go all lengths for the sale of our State bonds in foreign markets. They fear none of the injuries they predicted from the use of foreign capital. I ought not to complain of this, for I am not one of those who ever were much alarmed for the safety of the country because we had some foreign capital. I believed at that time, and I still believe, that it was capital that we needed, that we required, to give impetus to the industry and enterprise of our citizens, to enable them to develop the immense resources of the West; and I cannot but feel gratified to see that those who appeared horrified at the idea of using foreign capital have become satisfied that it is simply a question, as it always was, whether the use of the capital was worth to us the interest we had to pay for it; and that it mattered not from what country, place, or individual, it was received.

I have now said, Mr. President, what occurs to me as belonging immediately to the subject. I have here condensed my thoughts perhaps too much; but still I hope I am understood by the Senate. And here I should have closed my brief remarks, but for the most extraordinary course that has been taken in this debate by the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. WALKER.] That Senator, sir, has made the charge, in no set terms or measured language, that the distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] is an enemy to the West. It may be asked why I feel called upon to repeat this charge. It is made against the Senator from Kentucky, and not against myself, and therefore the Senator may say, leave the Senator from Kentucky to defend himself. It is most true, Mr. President, the defense of that Senator is most safe in his own hands, and were he alone concerned in the charge, I certainly should not interfere. But it will occur to the Senate that the Senator from Kentucky has been for a long series of years prominently identified with many of the great questions in which the West, as well as the nation at large, has been deeply interested. Neither can it have escaped the observation of the Senator from Mississippi that all the politicians, great and small, of the West, stand committed either for or against all these measures. As for myself, having taken some humble part in the political discussions of the day, it was very natural that I should have become identified with many of the political doctrines, for the advocacy of which the Senator from Kentucky is now stigmatized as an enemy of the West. I, therefore, in defense of myself and the doctrines which I have advocated, feel justified in examining very briefly how far the evidence goes to sustain the charge of the Senator that the Senator from Kentucky is the enemy of the West. I hope, Mr. President, I need not say to the Senate and the country that if I was satisfied that the Senator from Kentucky was the enemy of the West, he could no longer expect me to be his political friend; for, sir, I would sustain no man, however distinguished, who is the enemy of the section of country in which I reside.

It is highly probable that I am too much of a western man, too sectional in my feelings, for a statesman. I acknowledge my warm and devoted attachment to the West, yet I trust I could do justice to the other sections of the Union, for I know I have no unkind feelings towards any section. I do not claim the Senator from Kentucky as exclusively the friend of the West; I believe him to be the friend of the Union, the whole Union. The tree shall be known by its fruit, so shall the public man by the measures he advocates. If some of his doctrines bear hard upon a particular section of country, so far he may be said to be inimical to that section; but if the whole of the measures taken together are beneficial, he cannot, in justice, be said to be an enemy. This is, perhaps, the correct rule; but, in the case of which I am speaking, I do not ask for so much justice as that rule would give me. Ever since I left my native State, Pennsylvania, and settled in the West, I have had my eye directed to the measures brought forward or advocated by the Senator from Kentucky; and, so far from viewing him our enemy, I have looked to him as the great advocate of western interests. Sir, I saw the nation involved in war with Great Britain; I saw him selected by Mr. Madison as one of the representatives of the Government to the convention of ministers at Ghent. I saw the termination of that convention, heard the national rejoicing which followed the sounds of peace, and witnessed the withdrawal of the combined British and savage forces from an infant and bleeding frontier. For his great exertions in extending the jurisdiction and power of the Government west, and to restore to a suffering nation the blessings of peace, and, with it, to the western frontier that repose and security which it so much needed, I could not look upon him as an enemy to his country, much less to the West.

Mr. President, the admission of the new States of the West into the Union, upon an equal footing with the other States, received the support of the Senator from Kentucky at the earliest possible moment that they were constitutionally eligible to become members of the Union. The creation of new Territories in the West has also received his warm support at all times. From these measures I could not infer the hostility charged by the Senator from Mississippi upon him, nor do I believe the people of the West view his exertions in their behalf in that light.

Sir, it is to the votes and active exertions of the Senator from Kentucky for the continuance of the Cumberland road west, that the Senator from Mississippi infers hostility to that section of country? It is very possible that such is his belief, as I find, with all his professed zeal for the West, he uniformly opposes that great western work which, let me say to that Senator, is considered by myself, as well as the people of a large portion of the West, of great, of paramount importance to their interest. And, sir, the Senator from Mississippi will have great difficulty in satisfying them that the Senator from Kentucky is their enemy in supporting it. I cannot leave this subject without tendering to the Senator from Kentucky my thanks for his continued support of this work—a work which will in all subsequent time, as it now does, redound to the national glory, and be viewed as an evidence of the wisdom of a Jefferson and his successors; and while its great benefits shall be daily felt by the East as well as the West, it will remain one of the strongest ligaments that bind the people of this nation together.

It is not very remarkable, Mr. President, that the Senator from Mississippi and myself should view the Senator from Kentucky in such a very different light, when we differ so widely on this great western measure. My object is defense, not crimination, or I might throw back upon the Senator from Mississippi and his friend from Alabama the charge they prefer against the Senator from Kentucky; and let me assure them my charge, unlike theirs, would have evidence to support it. I submit the question, to be decided by the people of the West, whether, in the support of this great measure, the Senator from Kentucky has manifested hostility to their best interest, and whether the charge of the Senator from Mississippi is not wholly groundless, at least so far as this measure is concerned?

Sir, I have seen appropriations made by Congress in aid of commerce, some part of which was directed to be expended in the West, in removing obstructions from the Mississippi, the Ohio, the Cumberland, the Red, and other rivers; and, sir, I have seen funds provided by Congress to clear out and prepare for the reception and protection of commerce the harbors on the northwestern lakes; and how, Mr. President, has the hostility of the Senator from Kentucky manifested itself on these important and indispensable measures to the prosperity of the West? Let the Journals answer the question. He has been at all times their steadfast and powerful advocate. But the Senator from Mississippi, who is "an honorable man," says he is an enemy to the West. Mr. President, the Senator will pardon me if I should give such evidence as this greater weight in deciding upon this charge against the Senator from Kentucky, than the naked assertion of a political opponent, however elevated he may be.

But, sir, it is probable that the Senator from Mississippi alluded to the votes of the Senator from Kentucky in favor of the grants of land to the new States of alternate sections, to aid them in the construction of their canals, railroads, and other works of internal improvement, as evidence of his hostility to the West. If so, that Senator must excuse me for differing from him again, as widely as I did on the Cumberland road question. It is true that the character of these grants has been little understood in many parts of the country, as well as by gentlemen on this floor. We not unfrequently hear them designate these grants as donations to the States in which they lie. This is a very erroneous view of the question. So far from being donations, the General Government has already received a full consideration for the grants in the increased price of the alternate sections, and the large amount received into the national Treasury from the sale of public lands lying contiguous to our works of internal improvement, which would not have been sold for years to come had not the improvements been made, as I have already stated. I view these grants as mutually beneficial to the General Government and the States in which they lie, and as a policy, so far from being against the interest of the West, directly identified with that interest. It is not very remarkable, therefore, that I cannot acknowledge the truth of the charge against the Senator from Kentucky that he is an enemy to the West, while he stands by that interest in these great measures identified with its prosperity.

Sir, did the Senator from Mississippi found his charge upon the bill which was reported by the Senator from Kentucky from the Committee on Manufactures, and which passed both branches of Congress, and was neither signed nor returned by the late President of the United States, for reasons which were, no doubt, satisfactory to him, but which candor compels me to say I could not concur in? Was that great measure at war with the best interest of the West? If so, then, indeed, in this instance, the Senator from Kentucky was found in opposition to that section of country. But, sir, happening to be amongst those who favored the principles, provisions, and objects of that bill, as a western man, I cannot set the Senator from Kentucky down as an enemy to the West for supporting it. What were the views of the Senator from Kentucky as returned to the Senate with the bill. Mr. President, I hold in my hand the very able report that accompanied the bill, and, with the permission of the Senate, I beg leave to read an extract from it, Mr. S. read the following extract from the report made to the Senate on the 16th of April, 1832, by Mr. CLAY:

"Complaints exist in the new States that large bodies of lands in their respective territories, being owned by the General Government, are exempt from taxation to meet the ordinary expenses of the State governments and other local charges; that this exemption continues for five years after the sale of any particular tract, and that lands being the principal source of the revenue to those States, an undue share of the burden of sustaining the expenses of the State governments falls upon the resident population. To all these complaints it may be answered that, by voluntary compacts between the new States respectively, and the General Government, five per cent. of the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands included within their limits is appropriated for internal improvements leading to or within those States; that a section of land in each township, or one thirty-sixth part of the whole of the public lands embraced within their respective boundaries, has been reserved for purposes of education, and that the policy of the General Government has been uniformly marked by great liberality towards the new States in making various and some very extensive grants of the public lands for local purposes."

Does the Senator from Kentucky complain of this liberality? Far from it, Mr. President; hear him on that subject:

"But in accordance with the same liberality, the committee would recommend an appropriation to each of the seven States referred to, [Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Mississippi, Alabama, and Louisiana, Michigan and Arkansas being then Territories,] of a further sum of ten per cent. on the net proceeds of the sales of that part of the public land which lies within it."

Does this look like hostility to the new States? Sir, the bill, as it passed Congress, gave twelve and a half per cent. of the proceeds of the lands to the States in which they laid, and to each of the States named a quantity of land, which, with what they had received, made them equal with Ohio. Under this bill, sir, the State of Indiana would ere this have received over two and a half million dollars as her distributive share, besides a large additional donation of land, creating a fund which would have been amply sufficient, had the policy been continued, to educate every child in the State, and pay the taxes of the people for ages, besides aiding greatly in our works of internal improvement. It will be recollected that we had in the West a doctrine, at one time called the eminent-domain doctrine; a kind of South Carolina doctrine, under which some of our politicians claimed the whole of the public lands within the States, by virtue of our State sovereignty. I say, you cannot have forgotten that such was the claim set up by some of our western politicians; as for myself, I could not bring my mind to the conclusion that the claim was more than plausible, if even so much. But, sir, the friends of that measure exhibited to the people the great advantages which would result to the new States, should it succeed, by making the whole of the public domain within their limits a fund for the education of the youth, the support of the State governments without a resort to taxation, and in aiding them with their works of internal improvement. All this was admitted; but then came the compacts, the deeds, and objects of cession, the means and treasure employed in their acquisition, as barriers to the realization of the fondly-cherished hopes of our eminent-domain men, and for several years we have heard nothing on the subject. But, sir, my object at this moment is not to censure those who believed in the eminent-domain doctrines, but to say to them, as well as the Senate, that the land bill of which I have been speaking was infinitely more advantageous to the new States than their favorite policy. In the one case, your claim ended with the appropriation of the lands lying within your limits, the best of which had been culled and sold by the General Government; and in the other, as proposed by the bill, you received one eighth of that sum, with the additional grants of land proposed in the bill, of the lands lying within the limits of your State, and then received your equal share of the proceeds of the residue in the respective States and Territories, besides your equal proportion, according to your Federal representation, of the proceeds of the seven hundred and fifty million acres that lie beyond the States and Territories. I therefore repeat, that the amount to be received under the provisions of the distributive land bill of the Senator from Kentucky, by the new States, would have been infinitely more beneficial to them than a grant at that time of all the lands within their limits, in a pecuniary point of view.

But, sir, there is another view which struck my mind as being entitled to great weight in the decision of that question—I mean its nationality. It has been said by the wisest and greatest men, and I believe truly said, that it is not the mere parchment scroll, called a Constitution, that binds the people of this great nation together, but an equality of rights and a community of interests; and should this equality or that community be destroyed, as was that between the mother country and the colonies; should the Gordian knot be cut or untied, it will be precisely the same in its results—equally disastrous to the people. That is, therefore, wise legislation which strengthens these ligaments of equality and interest which bind us together as a nation. And it does seem to me, sir, that the tendency of the land bill was to produce that happy effect. The Senator from Mississippi will therefore pardon me if I cannot, with him, see in this great measure of the Senator from Kentucky hostility to the best interest of the West, nor do I believe that a majority of the people of the West so view it.

I come now briefly to examine another of the favorite measures of the Senator from Kentucky. I allude to the act to distribute the surplus revenue. I have heard that measure denounced on this floor in no measured terms, as being hostile to the interest of the West—not specially by the Senator from Mississippi, but by others. It is highly probable, however, that this measure, in the eyes of that Senator, forms one of the hostile acts of the Senator from Kentucky. I propose, therefore, to examine it very briefly, and to show that such was not its operation. What was the state of the case before Congress and the country at the time of the passage of that act? Why, sir, the national debt was paid, and it was obvious that a large surplus of public money would remain in the Treasury after the payment of the usual expenses of the Government. The question then arose as to the proper disposition of these surplus funds. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. Benton] proposed to enter upon a grand system of fortifications, the construction of which would have absorbed the whole of the surplus, and still have required as much more to complete and arm them, without any corresponding benefit whatever to the country. This project had but few adherents; and its rival measure, the distribution of the surplus amongst the States according to their Federal representation, was warmly advocated by the Senator from Kentucky and others, and became a law. By this law, the money that had been drawn from the pockets of the people, principally from the extra sales of the public lands, was returned again to them or to the States, to be appropriated for their use. It is very true, sir, but three of the installments have been received by the States; and it is due to candor to say that I consider the matter settled here that the States are to receive no more, and that the Government is to view the amount received by the States as a donation or gift to them not to be returned. So I presume this matter will end. The States having received the three installments, were clearly benefited to that amount; while the counter project, the fortification system, would have been beneficial to no person, except perhaps the contractors. Between these modes of disposing of the surplus revenue, it seems to me I could not have hesitated; nor can I view the support given to the distribution act by the Senator from Kentucky as hostile to the interest of the West; but, on the contrary, highly beneficial to that section of country.

Sir, the support given by the Senator from Kentucky to the protective system in days gone by has been again and again referred to by the Senator from Mississippi as hostile to the western interest. It is not to be denied by me that the Senator from Kentucky has been the advocate of the protective system, or, in other words, the protection of American industry against a too powerful foreign competition, by duties on the importation of the foreign article. I feel no disposition to revive the argument on this question; much may be said on both sides of it. It has always appeared to me that, as we derive our revenue to support and carry on the operations of the Government from our imposts, it was but right and proper to confine those duties to articles which could be manufactured in the United States in sufficient quantities to supply the demand, and thereby make the tariff for protection and revenue identical. In this light, no one at this day denies the power or duty of the Government to lay protective duties, by whatever name they may be called. The West, so far as I ever heard, was favorable to protecting our own industry. The President of the United States voted for the tariff of 1828, which was the highest protective tariff ever laid in the United States; and yet I have never heard him censured for it in the West. No, sir; we believe in a proper tariff, making revenue and protection mean the same thing, and confining the duties, where there can be no protection, to articles of luxury—such articles as minister only to the vanity and extravagance of life—while we would wholly remove it from the necessities of life, in daily and common use by all classes of the people. I am not prepared to admit that the Senator from Kentucky has shown hostility to the West in advocating the protective system. I might trace the Senator from Kentucky through a long, laborious, and valuable life, (for he has traveled the highways on all important subjects,) would time permit; and I feel very confident that the evidence would still strengthen the defense, and tend even further to remove all probable cause for the charge of the Senator from Mississippi; but I feel that it is useless. Sir, I have seen the Senator from Kentucky the great pacificator on the Missouri, and other questions that were rocking the Republic to its center, not for the benefit of the West alone, but for the Union—the whole Union.

There is one other great measure, Mr. President, to which I presume the Senator from Mississippi points, to show the hostility of the Senator from Kentucky to the West. I allude to the bill which passed the Senate at the last session, and fell in the House, known as the sub-Treasury bill. I do not propose, sir, to revive the debate on that measure at this time; it will probably come up again ere long; and as I have on two former occasions given my opinions on it somewhat at large, concurring with the Senator from Kentucky, it is not to be expected that I can see in an opposition to that measure hostility to the West; far from it. I have said that the great desideratum in the West was capital and credit; the one sufficient to form a just and safe basement for the other to rest upon; and any measure that reduces the one or destroys the other is injurious to the West. It is true, an exclusive specie circulation, divorce of the Government from the banks, collect and disburse the revenues in every part of the country in gold and silver by the officers of Government without the aid of banks, are not unpleasant sounds to the ear; but, in my humble opinion, it is in theory only that they may be tolerated, for then reason is left free to combat them. In practice, I have shown their operation, at large, on former occasions, and full and mature reflection has only confirmed the opinions I then expressed. I believe the whole measure, in practice, would be injurious to the nation, and especially to the West.

Mr. President, the remarks which I have submitted, connected with the measures which have been supported by the Senator from Kentucky, have been entirely defensive. I have not attempted to show who are not the friends of the West; who have, or who have not, sustained those great western measures to which I have alluded. My object was not to criminate or to make charges, but to show some of the evidence which had operated on my mind, creating the belief that the Senator from Kentucky was not an enemy to the West; and now let me say to the Senator, I do not believe one word of his charge. The Senator from Kentucky an enemy to the West! Impossible! If no one act of his long and useful life proved the contrary, his position forbids it. No man, sir, can be an enemy to the West who resides there, whose private interest, whose family and friends are there; even should his philanthropy embrace the whole human family, still the country of his home must necessarily predominate in his affections. I would as soon believe that my worthy colleague, [Mr. Tipton,] who fought side by side with the brave and lamented Spencer in that bloody conflict at Tippecanoe, and who has rendered his State and the West such valuable services since he has been a member of this body, is an enemy of the West. The Senator from Kentucky an enemy to the West! I would as soon believe that charge against you, Mr. President, who have stood by the West in all her great measures; you who poured out your blood like water in defense of the western frontier; impossible—impossible, sir. The Senator from Kentucky an enemy of the West! Satisfy me that the hero of Tippecanoe, the patriotic, the gallant, the distinguished Harrison, who periled his life again and again for the West and his country, and whose long and valuable life has been identified with her interest and glory, is hostile to the West, and you may make me believe the charge against the Senator from Kentucky. Fiat justitia, ruat cælum.

ABOLITION PETITIONS.

SPEECH OF HON. HENRY CLAY,
OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE SENATE, February 7, 1839,

On presenting a petition against the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, rose to present a petition, and said: I have received, Mr. President, a petition to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, which I wish to present to the Senate. It is signed by several hundred inhabitants of the District of Columbia, and chiefly of the city of Washington. Among them

Abolition Petitions—Mr. Clay.

SENATE.

I recognize the name of the highly esteemed Mayor of the city, and other respectable names, some of which are personally and well known to me. They express their regret that the subject of the abolition of slavery within the District of Columbia continues to be pressed upon the consideration of Congress by inconsiderate and misguided individuals in other parts of the United States. They state that they do not desire the abolition of slavery within the District, even if Congress possess the very questionable power of abolishing it, without the consent of the people whose interests would be immediately and directly affected by the measure; that it is a question solely between the people of the District and their only constitutional Legislature, purely municipal, and one in which no exterior influence or interest can justly interfere; that if, at any future period, the people of this District should desire the abolition of slavery within it, they will doubtless make their wishes known, when it will be time enough to take the matter into consideration; that they do not, on this occasion, present themselves to Congress because they are slaveholders; many of them are not—some of them are conscientiously opposed to slavery—but they appear because they justly respect the rights of those who own that description of property, and because they entertain a deep conviction that the continued agitation of the question by those who have no right to interfere with it, has an injurious influence on the peace and tranquillity of the community, and upon the well being and happiness of those who are held in subjection. They finally protest as well against the unauthorized intervention of which they complain, as against any legislation on the part of Congress in compliance therewith. But, as I wish these respectable petitioners to be themselves heard, I request that their petition may be read. [It was read accordingly, and Mr. CLAY proceeded.] I am informed by the committee which requested me to offer this petition, and believe, that it expresses the almost unanimous sentiments of the people of the District of Columbia.

The performance of this service affords me a legitimate opportunity, of which, with the permission of the Senate, I mean now to avail myself, to say something, not only on the particular objects of the petition, but upon the great and interesting subject with which it is intimately associated.

It is well known to the Senate that I have thought that the most judicious course with abolition petitions has not been of late pursued by Congress. I have believed that it would have been wisest to have received and referred them, without opposition, and to have reported against their object in a calm and dispassionate argumentative appeal to the good sense of the whole community. It has been supposed, however, by a majority of Congress that it was most expedient either not to receive the petitions at all, or, if formally received, not to act definitely upon them. There is no substantial difference between these opposite opinions, since both look to an absolute rejection of the prayer of the petitioners. But there is a great difference in the form of proceeding; and, Mr. President, some experience in the conduct of human affairs has taught me to believe that a neglect to observe established forms is often attended with more mischievous consequences than the infliction of a positive injury. We all know that, even in private life, a violation of the existing usages and ceremonies of society cannot take place without serious prejudice. I fear, sir, that the Abolitionists have acquired a considerable apparent force by blending with the object which they have in view a collateral and totally different question arising out of an alleged violation of the right of petition. I know full well, and take great pleasure in testifying, that nothing was remoter from the intention of a majority of the Senate, from which I differed, than to violate the right of petition in any case in which, according to its judgment, that right could be constitutionally exercised, or where the object of the petition could be safely or properly granted. Still, it must be owned that the Abolitionists have seized hold of the fact of the treatment which their petitions have received in Congress, and made injurious impressions upon the minds of a large portion of the community. This, I think, might have been avoided by the course which I should have been glad to have seen pursued.

And I desire now, Mr. President, to advert to some of those topics which I think might have been usefully embodied in a report by a committee of the Senate, and which, I am persuaded, would have checked the progress, if it had not altogether arrested the efforts of abolition. I am sensible, sir, that this work would have been accomplished with much greater ability, and with much happier effect, under the auspices of a committee than it can be by me. But, anxious as I always am to contribute whatever is in my power to the harmony, concord, and happiness of this great people, I feel myself irresistibly impelled to do whatever is in my power, incompetent as I feel myself to be, to dissuade the public from continuing to agitate a subject fraught with the most direful consequences.

There are three classes of persons opposed, or apparently opposed, to the continued existence of slavery in the United States. The first are those who, from sentiments of philanthropy and humanity, are conscientiously opposed to the existence of slavery, but who are no less opposed, at the same time, to any disturbance of the peace and tranquillity of the Union, or the infringement of the powers of the States composing the Confederacy. In this class may be comprehended that peaceful and exemplary society of "Friends," one of whose established maxims is, an abhorrence of war in all its forms, and the cultivation of peace and good will amongst mankind. The next class consists of apparent Abolitionists—that is, those who, having been persuaded that the right of petition has been violated by Congress, cooperate with the Abolitionists for the sole purpose of asserting and vindicating that right. And the third class are the real ultra Abolitionists, who are resolved to persevere in the pursuit of their object at all hazards, and without regard to any consequences, however calamitous they may be. With them the rights of property are nothing; the deficiency of the powers of the General Government is nothing; the acknowledged and uncontested powers of the States are nothing; civil war, a dissolution of the Union, and the overthrow of a Government in which are concentrated the fondest hopes of the civilized world, are nothing. A single idea has taken possession of their minds, and onward they pursue it, overlooking all barriers, reckless and regardless of all consequences. With this class, the immediate abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and in the Territory of Florida, the prohibition of the removal of slaves from State to State, and the refusal to admit any new State comprising within its limits the institution of domestic slavery, are but so many means conducing to the accomplishment of the ultimate but perilous end at which they avowedly and boldly aim; are but so many short stages in the long and bloody road to the distant goal at which they would finally arrive. Their purpose is abolition, universal abolition, peaceably if it can, forcibly if it must. Their object is no longer concealed by the thinnest veil; it is avowed and proclaimed. Utterly destitute of constitutional or other rightful power, living in totally distinct communities, as alien to the communities in which the subject on which they would operate resides, so far as concerns political power over that subject, as if they lived in Africa or Asia, they nevertheless promulgate to the world their purpose to be to manumit forthwith, and without compensation, and without moral preparation, three million negro slaves, under jurisdictions altogether separated from those under which they live.

I have said that immediate abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia and in the Territory of Florida, and the exclusion of new States, were only means towards the attainment of a much more important end. Unfortunately, they are not the only means. Another, and much more lamentable one, is that which this class is endeavoring to employ, of arraying one portion against another portion of the Union. With that view, in all their leading prints and publications, the alleged horrors of slavery are depicted in the most glowing and exaggerated colors, to excite the imaginations and stimulate the rage of the people in the free States against the people in the slave States. The slaveholder is held up and represented as the most atrocious of human beings. Advertisements of fugitive slaves to be sold are carefully collected and blazoned forth, to infuse a spirit of detestation and hatred against one entire and the largest section of the Union. And like a notorious agitator upon another theater, they would hunt down and proscribe from the pale of civilized society the inhabitants of that entire section. Allow me, Mr. President, to say that whilst I recognize in the justly-wounded feelings of the Minister of the United States at the Court of St. James much to excuse the notice which he was provoked to take of that agitator, in my humble opinion, he would better have consulted the dignity of his station and of his country in treating him with contemptuous silence. He would exclude us from European society—he who himself can only obtain a contraband admission; and is received with scornful repugnance into it! If he be no more desirous of our society than we are of his, he may rest assured that a state of eternal non-intercourse will exist between us. Yes, sir, I think the American Minister would have best pursued the dictates of true dignity by regarding the language of the member of the British House of Commons as the malignant ravings of the plunderer of his own country, and the libel of a foreign and kindred people.

But the means to which I have already adverted are not the only ones which this third class of ultra Abolitionists are employing to effect their ultimate end. They began their operations by professing to employ only persuasive means in appealing to the humanity and enlightening the understandings of the slaveholding portion of the Union. If there were some kindness in this avowed motive, it must be acknowledged that there was rather a presumptuous display also of an assumed superiority in intelligence and knowledge. For some time they continued to make these appeals to our duty and our interest; but impatient with the slow influence of their logic upon our stupid minds, they recently resolved to change their system of action. To the agency of their powers of persuasion, they now propose to substitute the powers of the ballot-box; and he must be blind to what is passing before us, who does not perceive that the inevitable tendency of their proceedings is, if these should be found insufficient, to invoke, finally, the more potent powers of the bayonet.

Mr. President, it is at this alarming stage of the proceedings of the ultra Abolitionists that I would seriously invite every considerate man in the country solemnly to pause, and deliberately to reflect, not merely on our existing posture, but upon that dreadful precipice down which they would hurry us. It is because these ultra Abolitionists have ceased to employ the instruments of reason and persuasion, have made their cause political, and have appealed to the ballot-box; that I am induced upon this occasion, to address you.

There have been three epochs in the history of our country at which the spirit of abolition displayed itself. The first was immediately after the formation of the present Federal Government. When the Constitution was about going into operation, its powers were not well understood by the community at large, and remained to be accurately interpreted and defined. At that period numerous abolition societies were formed, comprising not merely the Society of Friends, but many other good men. Petitions were presented to Congress praying for the abolition of slavery. They were received without serious opposition, referred, and reported upon by a committee. The report stated that the General Government had no power to abolish slavery as it existed in the several States, and that these States themselves had exclusive jurisdiction over the subject. The report was generally acquiesced in, and satisfaction and tranquillity ensued; the abolition societies thereafter limiting their exertions, in respect to the black population, to offices of humanity within the scope of existing laws.

The next period when the subject of slavery and abolition, incidentally, was brought into notice and discussion, was on the memorable occasion of the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union. The struggle was long, strenuous, and fearful. It is too recent to make it necessary to do more than merely advert to it, and to say, that it was finally composed by one of those compromises characteristic of our institutions, and of which the Constitution itself is the most signal instance.

The third is that in which we find ourselves. Various causes, Mr. President, have contributed to produce the existing excitement on the subject of abolition. The principal one, perhaps, is the example of British emancipation of the slaves in the islands adjacent to our country. Such is the similarity in laws, in language, in institutions, and in common origin, between Great Britain and the United States, that no great measure of national policy can be adopted in the one country without producing a considerable degree of influence in the other. Confounding the totally different cases together, of the powers of the British Parliament and those of the Congress of the United States, and the totally different situations of the British West India Islands, and the slaves in the sovereign and independent States of this Confederacy, superficial men have inferred from the undecided British experiment the practicability of the abolition of slavery in these States. The powers of the British Parliament are unlimited, and are often described to be omnipotent. The powers of the American Congress, on the contrary, are few, cautiously limited, scrupulously excluding all that are not granted, and, above all, carefully and absolutely excluding all power over the existence or continuance of slavery in the several States. The slaves, too, upon which British legislation operated were not in the bosom of the kingdom, but in remote and feeble colonies, having no voice in Parliament. The West India slaveholder was neither represented nor representative in that Parliament. And whilst I most fervently wish complete success to the British experiment of West India emancipation, I confess that I have fearful forebodings of a disastrous termination of it. Whatever it may be, I think it must be admitted that, if the British Parliament treated the West India slaves as freemen, it also treated the West India freemen as slaves. If, instead of these slaves being separated by a wide ocean from the parent country, three or four million of African negro slaves had been dispersed over England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland, and their owners had been members of the British Parliament—a case which would have presented some analogy to that of our own country—does any one believe that it would have been expedient or practicable to have emancipated them, leaving them to remain, with all their embittered feelings, in the United Kingdom, boundless as the powers of the British Parliament are?

Other causes have conspired with the British example to produce the existing excitement from abolition. I say it with profound regret, but with no intention to occasion irritation here or elsewhere, that there are persons in both parts of the Union who have sought to mingle abolition with politics, and to array one portion of the Union against the other. It is the misfortune in free countries that, in high party times, a disposition too often prevails to seize hold of everything which can strengthen the one side or weaken the other. Charges of fostering abolition designs have been heedlessly and unjustly made by one party against the other. Prior to the late election of the present President of the United States, he was charged with being an Abolitionist, and abolition designs were imputed to many of his supporters. Much as I was opposed to his election, and am to his administration, I neither share in making nor believing the truth of the charge. He was scarcely installed in office before the same charge was directed against those who opposed his election.

Mr. President, it is not true, and I rejoice that it is not true, that either of the two great parties in this country has any designs or aims at abolition. I should deeply lament if it were true. I should consider, if it were true, that the danger to the stability of our system would be infinitely greater than any which does, I hope, actually exist. Whilst neither party can be, I think, justly accused of any abolition tendency or purpose, both have profited, and both have been injured, in particular localities, by the accession or abstraction of abolition support. If the account were fairly stated, I believe the party to which I am opposed has profited much more, and been injured much less, than that to which I belong. But I am far, for that reason, from being disposed to accuse our adversaries of being Abolitionists.

And now, Mr. President, allow me to consider the several cases in which the authority of Congress is invoked by these abolition petitioners upon the subject of domestic slavery. The first relates to it as it exists in the District of Columbia. The following is the provision of the Constitution of the United States in reference to that matter:

"To exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such District (not exceeding ten miles square) as may by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of Government of the United States."

This provision preceded, in point of time, the actual cessions which were made by the States of Maryland and Virginia. The object of the cession was to establish a seat of Government of the United States, and the grant in the Constitution of exclusive legislation must be understood, and should be always interpreted, as having relation to the object of the cession. It was with a full knowledge of this clause in the Constitution that these two States ceded to the General Government the ten miles square constituting the District of Columbia. In making the cession they supposed that it was to be applied, and applied solely, to the purposes of a seat of Government, for which it was asked. When it was made slavery existed in both those Commonwealths and in the ceded territory, as it now continues to exist in all of them. Neither Maryland nor Virginia could have anticipated that, whilst the institution remained within their respective limits, its abolition would be attempted by Congress without their consent. Neither of them would probably have made an unconditional cession if they could have anticipated such a result.

From the nature of the provision in the Constitution, and the avowed object of the acquisition of the territory, two duties arise on the part of Congress. The first is, to render the District available, comfortable, and convenient, as a seat of Government of the whole Union; the other is, to govern the people within the District so as best to promote their happiness and prosperity. These objects are totally distinct in their nature, and, in interpreting and exercising the grant of the power of exclusive legislation, that distinction should be constantly borne in mind. Is it necessary, in order to render this place a comfortable seat of the General Government, to abolish slavery within its limits? No one can or will advance such a proposition. The Government has remained here near forty years without the slightest inconvenience from the presence of domestic slavery. Is it necessary to the well-being of the people of the District that slavery should be abolished from amongst them? They not only neither ask nor desire, but are almost unanimously opposed to it. It exists here in the mildest and most mitigated form. In a population of thirty-nine thousand eight hundred and thirty-four there were, at the last enumeration of the population of the United States, but six thousand one hundred and nineteen slaves. The number has not probably much increased since. They are dispersed over the ten miles square, engaged in the quiet pursuits of husbandry, or in menial offices in domestic life. If it were necessary to the efficiency of this place as a seat of the General Government to abolish slavery, which is utterly denied, the abolition should be confined to the necessity which prompts it, that is, to the limits of the city of Washington itself. Beyond those limits, persons concerned in the Government of the United States have no more to do with the inhabitants of the District than they have with the inhabitants of the adjacent counties of Maryland and Virginia which lie beyond the District.

To abolish slavery within the District of Columbia, whilst it remains in Virginia and Maryland, situated as that District is, within the very heart of those States, would expose them to great practical inconvenience and annoyance. The District would become a place of refuge and escape for fugitive slaves from the two States, and a place from which a spirit of discontent, insubordination, and insurrection might be fostered and encouraged in the two States. Suppose, as was at one time under consideration, Pennsylvania had granted ten miles square within its limits for the purpose of a seat of the General Government: could Congress, without a violation of good faith, have introduced and established slavery within the bosom of that Commonwealth in the ceded territory, after she had abolished it so long ago as the year 1780? Yet the inconvenience to Pennsylvania in the case supposed, would have been much less than that to Virginia and Maryland in the case we are arguing.

It was upon this view of the subject that the Senate, at its last session, solemnly declared that it would be a violation of implied faith, resulting from the transaction of the cession, to abolish slavery within the District of Columbia. And would it not be? By implied faith is meant that when a grant is made for one avowed and declared purpose, known to the parties, the grant should not be perverted to another purpose, unavowed and undeclared, and injurious to the grantor. The grant in the case we are considering, of the territory of Columbia, was for a seat of Government. Whatever power is necessary to accomplish that object is carried along by the grant. But the abolition of slavery is not necessary to the enjoyment of this site as a seat of the General Government. The grant in the Constitution of exclusive power of legislation over the District, was made to insure the exercise of an exclusive authority of the General Government to render this place a safe and secure seat of Government, and to promote the well-being of the inhabitants of the District. The power granted ought to be interpreted and exercised solely to the end for which it was granted. The language of the grant was necessarily broad, comprehensive, and exclusive, because all the exigencies which might arise to render this a secure seat of the General Government could not have been foreseen and provided for. The language may possibly be sufficiently comprehensive to include a power of abolition; but it would not at all thence follow that the power could be rightfully exercised. The case may be resembled to that of a plenipotentiary invested with a plenary power, but who at the same time, has positive instructions from his Government as to the kind of treaty which he is to negotiate and conclude. If he violates those instructions, and concludes a different treaty, his Government is not bound by it; and if the foreign Government is aware of the violation, it acts in bad faith. Or it may be illustrated by an example drawn from private life. I am an indorser for my friend on a note discounted in bank. He applies to me to indorse another to renew it, which I do in blank. Now this gives him power to make any other use of my note which he pleases. But if, instead of applying it to the intended purpose, he goes to a broker and sells it, thereby doubling my responsibility for him, he commits a breach of trust, and a violation of the good faith implied in the whole transaction.

But, Mr. President, if this reasoning were as erroneous as I believed it to be correct and conclusive, is the affair of the liberation of six thousand negro slaves in this District, disconnected with the three million slaves in the United States, of sufficient magnitude to agitate, distract, and embitter this great Confederacy?

The next case in which the petitioners ask the exercise of the power of Congress, relates to slavery in the Territory of Florida.

Florida is the extreme southern portion of the United States. It is bounded on all its land sides by slave States, and is several hundred miles from the nearest free State. It almost extends within the tropics, and the nearest important island to it on the water side is Cuba, a slave island. This simple statement of its geographical position should of itself decide the question. When, by the treaty of 1819 with Spain, it was ceded to the United States, slavery existed within it. By the terms of that treaty, the effects and property of the inhabitants are secured to them, and they are allowed to remove and take them away, if they think proper to do so, without limitation as to time. If it were expedient, therefore, to abolish slavery in it, it could not be done consistently with the treaty, without granting to the ancient inhabitants a reasonable time to remove their slaves. But further: by the compromise which took place on the passage of the act for the admission of Missouri into the Union, in the year 1820, it was agreed and understood that the line of 36° 30' north latitude should mark the boundary between the free States and the slave States to be created in the territories of the United States ceded by the treaty of Louisiana; those situated south of it being slave States, and those north of it free States. But Florida is south of that line, and, consequently, according to the spirit of the understanding which prevailed at the period alluded to, should be a slave State. It may be true that the compromise does not, in terms, embrace Florida, and that it is not absolutely binding and obligatory; but all candid and impartial men must agree that it ought not to be disregarded without the most weighty considerations, and that nothing could be more to be deprecated than to open anew the bleeding wounds which were happily bound up and healed by that compromise. Florida is the only remaining Territory to be admitted into the Union with the institution of domestic slavery, while Wisconsin and Iowa are now nearly ripe for admission without it.

25TH CONG....3D SESS.

The next instance in which the exercise of the power of Congress is solicited is that of prohibiting what is denominated by the petitioners of the slave trade between the States, or, as it is described in abolition petitions, the traffic in human beings between the States. This exercise of the power of Congress is claimed under that clause of the Constitution which invests it with authority to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes. The power to regulate commerce among the several States, like other powers in the Constitution, has hitherto remained dormant in respect to the interior trade by land between the States. It was a power granted, like all the other powers of the General Government, to secure peace and harmony among the States. Hitherto it has not been necessary to exercise it. All the cases in which, during the progress of time, it may become expedient to exert the general authority to regulate commerce between the States, cannot be conceived. We may easily imagine, however, contingencies which, if they were to happen might require the interposition of the common authority. If, for example, the State of Ohio, were, by law, to prohibit any vessel entering the port of Cincinnati, from the port of Louisville, in Kentucky, if that case be not already provided for by the laws which regulate our coasting trade, it would be competent to the General Government to annul the prohibition emanating from State authority. Or if the State of Kentucky were to prohibit the introduction, within its limits, of any articles of trade, the production of the industry of the inhabitants of the State of Ohio, the General Government might, by its authority, supersede the State enactment. But I deny that the General Government has any authority whatever, from the Constitution, to abolish what is called the slave trade, or, in other words, to prohibit the removal of slaves from one slave State to another slave State.

The grant in the Constitution is of a power of regulation, and not prohibition. It is conservative, not destructive. Regulation ex vi termini implies the continued existence or protection of the thing regulated. Prohibition implies total discontinuance or annihilation. The regulation intended was designed to facilitate and accommodate, not to obstruct and incommode the commerce to be regulated. Can it be pretended, that under this power to regulate commerce among the States, Congress has the power to prohibit the transportation of live stock, which, in countless numbers, are daily passing from the western and interior States to the southern, southwestern, and Atlantic States? The moment the incontestable fact is admitted, that negro slaves are property, the law of movable property irresistibly attaches itself to them, and secures the right of carrying them from one to another State, where they are recognized as property, without any hinderance whatever from Congress.

But, Mr. President, I will not detain the Senate longer on the subjects of slavery within the District and in Florida, and of the right of Congress to prohibit the removal of slaves from one State to another. These, as I have already intimated, with ultra Abolitionists are but so many masked batteries, concealing the real and ultimate point of attack. That point of attack is the institution of domestic slavery as it exists in these States. It is to liberate three million slaves held in bondage within them. And now, allow me, sir, to glance at the insurmountable obstacles which lie in the way of the accomplishment of this end, and at some of the consequences which would ensue if it were possible to attain it.

The first impediment is the utter and absolute want of all power on the part of the General Government to effect the purpose. The Constitution of the United States creates a limited Government, comprising comparatively few powers, and leaving the residuary mass of political power in the possession of the several States. It is well known that the subject of slavery interposed one of the greatest difficulties in the formation of the Constitution. It was happily compromised and adjusted in a spirit of harmony and patriotism. According to that compromise, no power whatever was granted to the General Government in respect to domestic slavery, but that which relates to taxation and representation, and the power to restore fugitive slaves to their lawful owners. All other power in regard to the institution of slavery was retained exclusively by the States, to be exercised by them severally, according to their respective views of their own peculiar interest. The Constitution of the United States never could have been formed upon the principle of investing the General Government with authority to abolish the institution at its pleasure. It never can be continued for a single day if the exercise of such a power be assumed or usurped.

But it may be contended by these ultra Abolitionists that their object is not to stimulate the action of the General Government, but to operate upon the States themselves in which the institution of domestic slavery exists. If that be their object, why are these abolition societies and movements all confined to the free States? Why are the slave States wantonly and cruelly assailed? Why do the Abolition presses teem with publications tending to excite hatred and animosity on the part of the inhabitants of the free States against those of the slave States? Why is Congress petitioned? The free States have no more power or right to interfere with institutions in the slave States, confided to the exclusive jurisdiction of those States, than they would have to interfere with institutions existing in any foreign country. What would be thought of the formation of societies in Great Britain, the issue of numerous inflammatory publications, and the sending out of lecturers throughout the kingdom, denouncing and aiming at the destruction of any of the institutions of France? Would they be regarded as proceedings warranted by good neighborhood? Or what would be thought of the formation of societies in the slave States, the issue of violent and inflammatory tracts, and the deputation of missionaries, pouring out impassioned denunciations against institutions under the exclusive control of the free States? Is their purpose to appeal to our understandings, and to actuate our humanity? And do they expect to accomplish that purpose by holding us up to the scorn, and contempt, and detestation of the people of the free States and the whole civilized world? The slavery which exists amongst us is our affair, not theirs; and they have no more just concern with it than they have with slavery as it exists throughout the world. Why not leave it to us, as the common Constitution of our country has left it, to be dealt with, under the guidance of Providence, as best we may or can?

The next obstacle in the way of abolition arises out of the fact of the presence in the slave States of three million slaves. They are there, dispersed throughout the land, part and parcel of our population. They were brought into the country originally under the authority of the parent Government whilst we were colonies; and their importation was continued in spite of all the remonstrances of our ancestors. If the question were an original question, whether, there being no slaves within the country, we should introduce them, and incorporate them into our society, that would be a totally different question. Few, if any, of the citizens of the United States would be found to favor their introduction. No man in it would oppose, upon that supposition, their admission with more determined resolution and conscientious repugnance than I should. But that is not the question. The slaves are here; no practical scheme for their removal or separation from us has been yet devised or proposed; and the true inquiry is, what is best to be done with them? In human affairs we are often constrained, by the force of circumstances and the actual state of things, to do what we would not do if that state of things did not exist. The slaves are here, and here must remain, in some condition; and, I repeat, how are they to be best governed? What is best to be done for their happiness and our own? In the slave States the alternative is, that the white man must govern the black, or the black govern the white. In several of those States the number of the slaves is greater than that of the white population. An immediate abolition of slavery in them, as these ultra Abolitionists propose, would be followed by a desperate struggle for immediate ascendancy of the black race over the white race, or rather it would be followed by instantaneous collisions between the two races, which would break out into a civil war that would end in the extermination or subjugation of the one race or the other. In such an alternative, who can hesitate? Is it not better for both parties that the existing state of things should be preserved, instead of exposing them to the horrible strifes and contests which would inevitably attend an immediate abolition? This is our true ground of defense for the continued existence of slavery in our country. It is that which our revolutionary ancestors assumed; it is that which, in my opinion, forms our justification in the eyes of all Christendom.

A third impediment to immediate abolition is to be found in the immense amount of capital which is invested in slave property. The total number of slaves in the United States, according to the last enumeration of the population, was a little upwards of two millions. Assuming their increase at a ratio—which it probably is—of five per cent. per annum, their present number would be three millions. The average value of slaves at this time is stated by persons well informed to be as high as five hundred dollars each. To be certainly within the mark, let us suppose that it is only four hundred dollars. The total value, then, by that estimate, of the slave property in the United States is $1,200,000,000. This property is diffused throughout all classes and conditions of society. It is owned by widows and orphans, by the aged and infirm, as well as the sound and vigorous. It is the subject of mortgages, deeds of trust, and family settlements. It has been made the basis of numerous debts contracted upon its faith, and is the sole reliance, in many instances, of creditors within and without the slave States, for the payment of the debts due to them. And now it is rashly proposed, by a single fiat of legislation, to annihilate this immense amount of property! To annihilate it without indemnity and without compensation to its owners! Does any considerate man believe it to be possible to effect such an object without convulsion, revolution, and bloodshed?

I know that there is a visionary dogma which holds that negro slaves cannot be the subject of property. I shall not dwell long with this speculative abstraction. That is property which the law declares to be property. Two hundred years of legislation have sanctioned and sanctified negro slaves as property. Under all the forms of government which have existed upon this continent during that long space of time—under the British Government, under the Colonial Government, under all the State constitutions and governments, and under the Federal Government itself—they have been deliberately and solemnly recognized as the legitimate subjects of property. To the wild speculations of theorists and innovators stands opposed the fact, that in an uninterrupted period of two hundred years' duration, under every form of human legislation, and by all the departments of human government, African negro slaves have been held and respected, have descended and been transferred, as lawful and indisputable property. They were treated as property in the very British example which is so triumphantly appealed to as worthy of our imitation. Although the West India planters had no voice in the united Parliament of the British Isles, an irresistible sense of justice extorted from that Legislature the grant of £20,000,000 sterling to compensate the colonists for their loss of property.

If, therefore, these ultra Abolitionists are seriously determined to pursue their scheme of immediate abolition, they should at once set about raising a fund of $1,200,000,000, to indemnify the owners of slave property. And the taxes to raise that enormous amount can only be justly assessed upon themselves or upon the free States, if they can persuade them to assent to such an assessment; for it would be a mockery of all justice, and an outrage against all equity, to levy any portion of the tax upon the slave States to pay for their own unquestioned property.

If the considerations to which I have already adverted are not sufficient to dissuade the Abolitionists from further perseverance in their designs, the interest of the very cause which they profess to espouse ought to check their career. Instead of advancing by their efforts that cause, they have thrown back for half a century the prospect of any species of emancipation of the African race, gradual or immediate, in any of the States. They have done more: they have increased the rigors of legislation against slaves in most, if not all, of the slave States. Forty years ago, the question was agitated in the State of Kentucky of a gradual emancipation of the slaves within its limits. By gradual emancipation, I mean that slow but safe and cautious liberation of slaves which was first adopted in Pennsylvania at the instance of Dr. Franklin, in the year 1780, and according to which the generation in being were to remain in slavery, but all their offspring, born after a specified day, were to be free at the age of twenty-eight, and, in the mean time, were to receive preparatory instruction to qualify them for the enjoyment of freedom. That was the species of emancipation which, at the epoch to which I allude, was discussed in Kentucky. No one was rash enough to propose, to think, of immediate abolition. No one was rash enough to think of throwing loose upon the community, ignorant and unprepared, the untutored slaves of the State. Many thought, and I amongst them, that, as each of the slave States had a right exclusively to judge for itself in respect to the institution of domestic slavery, the proportion of slaves compared with the white population in that State, at that time, was so inconsiderable, that a system of gradual emancipation might have been safely adopted, without any hazard to the security and interests of the Commonwealth. And I still think that the question of such emancipation in the farming States is one whose solution depends upon the relative numbers of the two races in any given State. If I had been a citizen of Pennsylvania when Franklin's plan was adopted, I should have voted for it; because, by no possibility could the black race ever acquire the ascendancy in that State. But if I had been then, or were now, a citizen of any of the planting States—the southern or southwestern States—I should have opposed, and would continue to oppose, any scheme whatever of emancipation, gradual or immediate, because of the danger of an ultimate ascendancy of the black race, or of a civil contest which might terminate in the extinction of one race or the other.

The proposition in Kentucky for a gradual emancipation did not prevail, but it was sustained by a large and respectable minority. That minority had increased, and was increasing, until the Abolitionists commenced their operations. The effect has been to dissipate all prospects whatever, for the present, of any scheme of gradual or other emancipation. The people of that State have become shocked and alarmed by these abolition movements, and the number who would now favor a system even of gradual emancipation is probably less than it was in the years 1798-99. At the session of the Legislature held in 1837-38, the question of calling a convention was submitted to the consideration of the people by a law passed in conformity with the constitution of the State. Many motives existed for the passage of the law, and among them that of emancipation had its influence. When the question was passed upon by the people at their last annual election, only about one fourth of the whole voters of the State supported a call of a convention. The apprehension of the danger of abolition was the leading consideration among the people for opposing the call. But for that, but for the agitation of the question of abolition in a State whose population had no right, in the opinion of the people of Kentucky, to interfere in the matter, the vote for a convention would have been much larger, if it had not been carried. I felt myself constrained to take immediate, bold, and decided ground against it.

Prior to the agitation of this subject of abolition, there was a progressive melioration in the condition of the slaves throughout all the slave States. In some of them schools of instruction were opened by humane and religious persons. These are all now checked; and a spirit of insubordination having shown itself in some localities, traceable, it is believed, to abolition movements and exertions, the legislative authority has found it expedient to infuse fresh vigor into the police and laws which regulate the conduct of the slaves.

And now, Mr. President, if it were possible to overcome the insurmountable obstacles which lie in the way of immediate abolition, let us briefly contemplate some of the consequences which would inevitably ensue. One of these has been occasionally alluded to in the progress of these remarks. It is the struggle which would instantaneously arise between the two races in most of the southern and southwestern States. And what a dreadful struggle would it not be! Embittered by all the recollections of the past, by the unconquerable prejudices which would prevail between the two races, and stimulated by all the hopes and fears of the future, it would be a contest in which the extermination of the blacks, or their ascendancy over the whites, would be the sole alternative. Prior to the conclusion, or during the progress of such a contest, vast numbers, probably, of the black race would migrate into the free States; and what effect would such a migration have upon the laboring classes in those States?

Now the distribution of labor in the United States is geographical; the free laborers occupying one side of the line, and the slave laborers the other; each class pursuing its own avocations almost altogether unmixed with the other. But, on the supposition of immediate abolition, the black class migrating into the free States, would enter into competition with the white class, diminishing the wages of their labor, and augmenting the hardships of their condition.

This is not all. The Abolitionists strenuously oppose all separation of the two races. I confess to you, sir, that I have seen with regret, grief, and astonishment, their resolute opposition to the project of colonization. No scheme was ever presented to the acceptance of man, which, whether it be entirely practicable or not, is characterized by more unmixed humanity and benevolence than that of transporting, with their own consent, the free people of color in the United States to the land of their ancestors. It has the powerful recommendation that whatever it does is good; and if it effects nothing, it inflicts no one evil or mischief upon any portion of our society. There is no necessary hostility between the objects of colonization and abolition. Colonization deals only with the free man of color, and that with his own free voluntary consent. It has nothing to do with slavery. It disturbs no man's property, seeks to impair no power in the slave States, nor to attribute any to the General Government. All its action and all its ways and means are voluntary, depending upon the blessing of Providence, which hitherto has graciously smiled upon it. And yet, beneficent and harmless as colonization is, no portion of the people of the United States denounces it with so much persevering zeal and such unmixed bitterness as do the Abolitionists.

They put themselves in direct opposition to any separation whatever between the two races.

They would keep them forever pent up together within the same limits, perpetuating their animosities, and constantly endangering the peace of the community. They proclaim, indeed, that color is nothing; that the organic and characteristic differences between the two races ought to be entirely overlooked and disregarded; and, elevating themselves to a sublime but impracticable philosophy, they would teach us to eradicate all the repugnance of our nature, and to take to our bosoms and our boards the black man as we do the white, on the same footing of equal social condition. Do they not perceive that in thus confounding all the distinctions which God himself has made, they arraign the wisdom and goodness of Providence itself? It has been His divine pleasure to make the black man black and the white man white, and to distinguish them by other constitutional differences. It is not necessary for me to maintain, nor shall I endeavor to prove, that it was any part of His divine intention that the one race should be held in perpetual bondage by the other; but this I will say, that those whom he has created different, and has declared, by their physical structure and color, ought to be kept asunder, should not be brought together by any process whatever of unnatural amalgamation.

But if the dangers of the civil contest which I have supposed could be avoided, separation or amalgamation is the only peaceful alternative, if it were possible to effectuate the project of abolition. The Abolitionists oppose all colonization, and it irresistibly follows, whatever they may protest or declare, that they are in favor of amalgamation. And who are to bring about this amalgamation? I have heard of none of these ultra Abolitionists furnishing in their own families or persons examples of intermarriage. Who is to begin it? Is it their purpose not only to create a pinching competition between black labor and white labor, but do they intend also to contaminate the industrious and laborious classes of society at the North by a revolting admixture of the black element?

It is frequently asked what is to become of the African race among us? Are they forever to remain in bondage? That question was asked more than half a century ago. It has been answered by fifty years of prosperity but little checkered from this cause. It will be repeated fifty or a hundred years hence. The true answer is, that the same Providence who has hitherto guided and governed us, and averted all serious evils from the existing relation between the two races, will guide and govern our posterity. Sufficient to the day is the evil thereof. We have hitherto, with that blessing, taken care of ourselves. Posterity will find the means of its own preservation and prosperity. It is only in the most direful event which can befall this people that this great interest, and all other of our greatest interests, would be put in jeopardy. Although in particular districts the black population is gaining on the white, it only constitutes one fifth of the whole population of the United States. And in taking the aggregates of the two races, the European is constantly, though slowly, gaining upon the African portion. This fact is demonstrated by the periodical returns of our population. Let us cease, then, to indulge in gloomy forebodings about the impenetrable future. But if we may attempt to lift the veil, and contemplate what lies beyond it, I, too, have ventured on a speculative theory, with which I will not now trouble you, but which has been published to the world. According to that, in the progress of time, some one hundred and fifty or two hundred years hence, but few vestiges of the black race will remain among our posterity.

Mr. President, at the period of the formation of our Constitution, and afterwards, our patriotic ancestors apprehended danger to the Union from two causes. One was the Alleghany mountains, dividing the waters which flow into the Atlantic ocean from those which found their outlet in the Gulf of Mexico. They seemed to present a natural separation. That danger has vanished before the noble achievements of the spirit of internal improvement, and the immortal genius of Fulton. And now nowhere is found a more loyal attachment to the Union than among those very western people, who, it was apprehended, would be the first to burst its ties. The other cause, domestic slavery; happily the sole remaining cause which is likely to disturb our harmony, continues to exist. It was this which created the greatest obstacle and the most anxious solicitude in the deliberations of the convention that adopted the general Constitution; and it is this subject that has ever been regarded with the deepest anxiety by all who are sincerely desirous of the permanency of our Union. The Father of his Country, in his last affecting and solemn appeal to his fellow-citizens, deprecated as a most calamitous event, the geographical divisions which it might produce. The convention wisely left to the several States the power over the institution of slavery, as a power not necessary to the plan of union which it devised, and as one with which the General Government could not be invested without planting the seeds of certain destruction. There let it remain undisturbed by any unhallowed hand.

Sir, I am not in the habit of speaking lightly of the possibility of dissolving this happy Union. The Senate knows that I have deprecated allusions on ordinary occasions to that direful event. The country will testify that if there be anything in the history of my public career worthy of recollection, it is the truth and sincerity of my ardent devotion to its lasting preservation. But we should be false in our allegiance to it, if we did not discriminate between the imaginary and real dangers by which it may be assailed. Abolition should no longer be regarded as an imaginary danger. The Abolitionists, let me suppose, succeed in their present aim of uniting the inhabitants of the free States as one man against the inhabitants of the slave States. Union on the one side will beget union on the other; and this process of reciprocal consolidation will be attended with all the violent prejudices, embittered passions, and implacable animosities which ever degraded or deformed human nature. A virtual dissolution of the Union will have taken place, whilst the forms of its existence remain. The most valuable elements of union, mutual kindness, the feelings of sympathy, the fraternal bonds, which now happily unite us, will have been extinguished forever. One section will stand in menacing and hostile array against the other. The collision of opinion will be quickly followed by the clash of arms. I will not attempt to describe scenes which now happily lie concealed from our view. Abolitionists themselves would shrink back in dismay and horror at the contemplation of desolated fields, conflagrated cities, murdered inhabitants, and the overthrow of the fairest fabric of human government that ever rose to animate the hopes of civilized man. Nor should these Abolitionists flatter themselves that, if they can succeed in their object of uniting the people of the free States, they will enter the contest with a numerical superiority that must insure victory. All history and experience proves the hazard and uncertainty of war. And we are admonished by Holy Writ that the "race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong." But if they were to conquer, whom would they conquer? A foreign foe—one who had insulted our flag, invaded our shores, and laid our country waste? No, sir; no, sir. It would be a conquest without laurels, without glory—a self, a suicidal conquest—a conquest of brothers over brothers, achieved by one over another portion of the descendants of common ancestors, who, nobly pledging their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor, had fought and bled, side by side, in many a hard battle on land and ocean, severed our country from the British Crown, and established our national independence.

The inhabitants of the slave States are sometimes accused by their northern brethren with displaying too much rashness and sensibility to the operations and proceedings of Abolitionists. But, before they can be rightly judged, there should be a reversal of conditions. Let me suppose that the people of the slave States were to form societies, subsidize presses, make large pecuniary contributions, send forth numerous missionaries throughout all their own borders, and enter into machinations to burn the beautiful capitals, destroy the productive manufactories, and sink in the ocean the gallant ships of the northern States; would these incendiary proceedings be regarded as neighborly and friendly, and consistent with the fraternal sentiments which should ever be cherished by one portion of the Union towards another? Would they excite no emotion, occasion no manifestation of dissatisfaction, nor lead to any acts of retaliatory violence? But the supposed case falls far short of the actual one in a most essential circumstance. In no contingency could these capitals, manufactories, and ships, rise in rebellion and massacre inhabitants of the northern States.

I am, Mr. President, no friend of slavery. The Searcher of all hearts knows that every pulsation of mine beats high and strong in the cause of civil liberty. Wherever it is safe and practicable, I desire to see every portion of the human family in the enjoyment of it. But I prefer the liberty of my own country to that of any other people, and the liberty of my own race to that of any other race. The liberty of the descendants of Africa in the United States is incompatible with the safety and liberty of the European descendants. There slavery forms an exception—an exception resulting from a stern and inexorable necessity—to the general liberty in the United States. We did not originate, nor are we responsible for this necessity. Their liberty, if it were possible, could only be established by violating the incontestable powers of the States, and subverting the Union, and beneath the ruins of the Union would be buried, sooner or later, the liberty of both races.

But if one dark spot exists on our political horizon, is it not obscured by the bright and effulgent and cheering light that beams all around us? Was ever a people before so blessed as we are, if true to ourselves? Did ever any other nation contain within its bosom so many elements of prosperity, of greatness, and of glory? Our only real danger lies ahead—conspicuous, elevated, and visible. It was clearly discerned at the commencement, and distinctly seen throughout our whole career. Shall we wantonly run upon it, and destroy all the glorious anticipations of the high destiny that awaits us? I beseech the Abolitionists themselves solemnly to pause in their mad and fatal course. Amidst the infinite variety of objects of humanity and benevolence which invite the employment of their energies, let them select some one more harmless, that does not threaten to deluge our country in blood. I call upon that small portion of the clergy which has lent itself to these wild and ruinous schemes, not to forget the holy nature of the divine mission of the founder of our religion, and to profit by his peaceful examples. I entreat that portion of my countrywomen who have given their countenance to abolition to remember that they are ever most loved and honored when moving in their own appropriate and delightful sphere, and to reflect that the ink which they shed in subscribing with their fair hands abolition petitions may prove but the prelude to the shedding of the blood of their brethren. I adjure all the inhabitants of the free States to rebuke and discountenance, by their opinion and their example, measures which must inevitably lead to the most calamitous consequences. And let us all, as countrymen, as friends, and as brothers cherish in un fading memory the motto which bore our ancestors triumphantly through all the trials of the Revolution; as, if adhered to, it will conduct their posterity through all that may, in the dispensations of Providence, be reserved for them.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN BELL,

OF TENNESSEE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

December 26, 1838.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering and referring the President's Message—

Mr. BELL said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The message of the President of the United States must always be an important document—one which would be looked to with interest, not only at home but abroad; a paper which would be examined and carefully weighed, not only with reference to the casual and extraordinary topics which might engage the public mind for the moment, but in reference to subjects less fleeting and temporary—to the doctrines, the principles, and the practices which appeared to be countenanced and propagated, doctrines and practices which were calculated to produce, which were fundamental, which related to the organic construction of our system; and he had risen to make some observations more in reference to these general and prominent topics touched upon in the message, than to the exciting and absorbing sub-Treasury scheme, or the mode of collecting, safe-keeping, and disbursing the public revenue; and, taking the views he did, he should proceed at once to notice some passages in the message which, in his opinion, called for public scrutiny and animadversion.

In treating of our system of Government, and more particularly of the Federal Constitution, the President informs us that—"It has proved amply sufficient for the various emergencies incident to our condition as a nation. A formidable foreign war; agitated collisions between domestic and, in some respects, rival sovereignties; temptations to interfere in the intestine commotions of neighboring countries; the dangerous influences that arise in periods of excessive prosperity; and the anti-republican tendencies of associated wealth; these, with other trials not less formidable, have all been encountered, and thus far successfully resisted."

Among the most prominent dangers to which our form of government is exposed, the President here enumerates "the anti-republican tendencies of associated wealth." I suppose it will be said that he refers to the association of capital accumulated in the State banks; but, in the opinion of the community generally, this language will warrant a more extensive application—an application far more operative, and demanding more serious reflection. But, before we inquire into the true import and probable drift of this address to the American people on the subject of the "anti-republican tendencies of associated wealth," one remark occurs to me as proper to be made on what appears to be an omission in this part of the message. I observe that no notice is taken of the danger to be apprehended from the concentration of power in the hands of one man, or of a few. Whatever may be said of the selfish, exclusive, grasping, monopolizing, and anti-republican tendencies of mere wealth, I will not deny; yet, I will say that all these bad qualities and tendencies may, with as much truth, and far more reason, be affirmed of political power; and it must strike the mind of every watchful observer, that in the enumeration of the many dangers to which our country and its peculiar institutions are exposed—an enumeration made in order to put the people on their guard—the President has omitted to mention the most formidable of all—one which is known to have existed in the experience and progress of every free Government, and in the progress of every civilized society from the beginning of time. I mean concentrated power—associated official power. I mean (to speak practically) the concentration of power in the executive branch of the Government of the United States. It is worthy of serious notice, that in a paper emanating as this does, from the President himself, and which professes to set forth to a free people the most prominent dangers which threaten their liberties, and to awaken their vigilance against those evil tendencies which lurk in the system, the one which has always proved the most fatal—the tendency of power to accumulate in the hands of one man, and the grasping and monopolizing tendency of that power—is altogether omitted. Why is this? Why not admonish the people, when speaking of the tendencies of wealth in banks or elsewhere, that there was another most formidable danger in this and in every other free Government, which united all the evils of mere wealth with the more fearful passion of ambition? I affirm, then, sir, that this enumeration of the perils to which our free institutions are exposed is not perfect.

If this warning given to the people in relation to the "anti-republican tendency of associated wealth" is only intended to be a continuation of the attacks heretofore made with so much acri-money upon the banking institutions of the country, I will not undertake to answer it in my own language, or by any arguments of my own, for I have never felt disposed to become the champion of those institutions; but in the language and by the arguments of a man of far more weight and influence, both from the station which he fills, and the larger share of respect and influence he has always enjoyed with the party in power—a man whose political career was directly connected with the most extraordinary incidents of the late Administration—a man who owes his present elevation to the hearty approval with which his party sustained him in the most questionable act of that Administration—a man whose opinions upon the question now under review were then received as orthodox and incontrovertible. I allude to the Chief Justice of the United States, (Mr. Taney.)

[Mr. B. read from a letter of Mr. Taney, while Secretary of the Treasury, to the Committee of Ways and Means, of the 13th of April, 1834, a few paragraphs strongly commendatory of the State banks, and asserting in very broad terms the indispensable agency in a country like ours of banks and a paper circulation founded on credit.]

But, Mr. Chairman, if I correctly understand the import of the passage now under consideration, it manifests a laxity of principle, a recklessness of consequences, such a spirit of desperation in the choice of means to sustain power as ought to receive the severest reprehension from every well-wisher to our free institutions. This covert denunciation of wealth and of the rich is, without doubt, intended to be understood by those whom it pleases as a proof that the author of it is a friend and champion of the poor as distinguished from the rich. Viewing it in this light, it is a sort of argument—an electioneering cant, which, however shameful and indefensible, may be allowed in the public speeches of ordinary candidates for a seat in the Legislature, or for some office or station in a State, or even for a seat in this Hall of the Representatives of the nation; but in a Chief Magistrate it is wholly unworthy and detestable.

The next passage I shall notice in this extraordinary paper is in these words:

"Each successive change made in our local institutions has contributed to extend the right of suffrage, has increased the direct influence of the mass of the community, given greater freedom to individual exertion, and restricted more and more the powers of Government."

In the remarks I propose to make on the sentiment here expressed, I would not be understood as finding fault with the extension of the right of suffrage. In the State of Tennessee and the southwest generally, the right of suffrage has long existed in the fullest extent; nor am I disposed to say aught against the policy of other States, in this respect; but I have a word or two to say in reference to the conclusion which the President has drawn from this and other changes in our local institutions. He undertakes to announce to the world that the effect of these changes has been to "increase the direct influence of the mass of the community, and to restrict more and more the powers of Government." Now, sir, however true this may be, when affirmed of the influence of the mass of the community, in the several States alluded to, and upon the measures and policy and the restrictions which may have followed upon the powers of the State governments, if it is intended, by inference, to affirm that the direct influence of the mass of the community upon the measures and policy of the National Government has been increased, or that the powers of the General Government have been restricted by any changes which have been made in any quarter, I deny that such is the fact. I make the issue direct. I affirm that whatever improvements may have followed from the changes of any kind in the constitutions of the States; whatever restrictions may have followed upon the powers of the State governments, no such beneficial consequences have been felt in the operations of the Federal Government; though we might have supposed that the benefits of the extension of the right of suffrage, or other change in the local institutions, would have been felt, in some small degree at least, in the action of the General Government.

But, sir, at no anterior period in the history of this country has the influence, direct and indirect, of the mass of the community been so little felt in the conduct of our national affairs, nor have the powers of the Federal Government ever before been strained to so high a point, if we may judge of these powers by the practice of the late and present Administrations. Never before were the mass of the community so powerless. Of late, they have substantially nothing to do, having neither part nor lot in the affairs of the Government or of the country, but to follow blindly, and give their sanction, when called upon for that purpose, to whatever schemes and measures of public policy the heads of the party, some three or four men at most, are pleased to dictate to them. Such is and has been the power of party discipline, such the despotic principle of party association for years, that the mass of the community have rather stood in the relation of subjects to be governed, than the controlling elements of power. How this has been brought about—by what artful means—by what powers of intimidation on the one hand, and of seduction on the other, the mass of the people have had so little actual influence in the affairs of Government of late—I have often described on this floor. I have repeatedly referred to this subject as the origin of all the evils which now afflict the country. I content myself, for the present, by repeating that the mass of the people have for years been degraded to the rank of mere machines in the hands of a few men who have had the talent and address to use them for their own purposes. Never before were a free people under such positive, such despotic control, as the people of the United States have been, by the artful management of a few men, acting in conjunction with the powerful influences of overgrown patronage. I again affirm that at no period since the organization of the Government, in 1789, have its powers been so extensive in practice. Of late, they have undoubtedly been carried far beyond the example of any preceding Administration. Then, sir, I conclude that the President holds out an unfounded assurance to the country. We cannot safely congratulate ourselves that the people have had the sphere of their influence increased, or that the powers of the Government have been restricted.

After enumerating many of the happy results of our republican institutions, the President expresses the following sentiment:

"This review of the results of our institutions for half a century, without exciting a spirit of vain exultation, should serve to impress upon us the great principles from which they sprang—constant and direct supervision by the people over every public measure," &c.

Now, sir, I should be pleased to be informed what is meant by the "constant and direct supervision of the people," which is here enumerated as one of the great principles to which we are indebted for the glorious results of our system. Will some gentleman who is better acquainted with the sentiments of the President upon this subject enlighten me? Will he tell me what is the true import of the language, "the constant and direct supervision by the people?" It is intended by this passage in the message, and the other doctrines which are more or less openly inculcated, to give the high official sanction of the Chief Magistrate of the Union to the new impulse which has recently been given, or sought to be given, to what are called the democratic tendencies of our system? You must be aware, Mr. Chairman, that unusual pains have been taken of late to show that our system needs a radical revision. The people are told that our ancestors, who framed the Constitution in 1789, were a half century in the rear of the improvements of the present age; that they had not the benefit of the new lights which experience has shed upon the subject of government since that time, and which are now in full blaze around us. The science of government, we are told, has made great strides since our Constitution was formed; and, indeed, that instrument is beginning to be looked upon by many rather as a device of bad men, to advance the interests of the few at the expense of the many, and forming an actual obstruction to that full tide of happiness and prosperity which awaits us when the inventions of modern Democracy shall be substituted for it. At all events, it is proclaimed to be the duty of every man who would improve the condition of the human family to strengthen the democratic tendencies of the Constitution, and to disrobe, or rather strip, it of those limitations or restrictions upon the popular will, with which our unimproved ancestors have thought it necessary to encumber it.

Some progress has already been made in implanting this sentiment among the people in some of the States. New party names have been invented for this purpose. New definitions have been given of free Governments. An old-fashioned republican is denounced as little better than an aristocrat. We hear, of late, from the leaders of one of the great parties which divide the country, of little else than the Democracy of the country—the great Democratic founder—the Democracy of numbers! In truth, sir, it cannot be disguised that there are a class of politicians in the country at this moment whose aspirations it does not suit that any restriction, any limitation whatever, shall exist in the practice of the Government upon the will or absolutism of the majority; and, in the estimation of all their followers, our Constitution is defective. It imposes quite too many trammels, in their judgments, upon the beneficent designs of the reformers. Does the President mean to be understood as countenancing the doctrines of these reformers, by pointing to the "constant and direct supervision by the people" as an important principle in a free Government? Sir, I would be the last man in this House to question the true constitutional principle of popular supervision over the measures of the Government. It is to the operation of that principle that we are to look for safety in times which, perhaps, may be worse than the present; and I trust we shall not look to it in vain. But, sir, according to our system, the people do not, and cannot, exercise any direct supervision over any public measure. Their power, their influence, their supervision, can be constitutionally exercised only by petition and remonstrance, and by the utterance of their voice at the ballot-box. And it is that feature in our system that at once distinguishes it in form from a democracy, and secures it from the fatal catastrophe which has always attended democracies, or Governments in which the people exercised a direct supervision over public measures.

But it would be gratifying to know what change in our Constitution is meditated by which the people may be admitted to a "direct supervision" of public measures; or is it intended that the people shall interpose their authority whenever, in their judgment, the constitutional functionaries shall err, or fail in the discharge of their duty, without any amendment of the Constitution? We have very lately had a specimen of this improved system of government announced through the medium of an Executive communication. We have heard the doctrine proclaimed on this floor; we have seen it announced in several of the most influential journals in the country, and, among the rest, the official organ of this Administration, (the Globe,) that the direct interference of the people, or, in other words, the democracy of the country, in the settlement of constitutional and legal questions, is not only allowable, but justifiable! We have heard it proclaimed from all these high and authoritative sources that an excited and agitated assembly of the people may properly rush into a legislative hall, fill all the aisles and other vacant places, and, by their menaces and clamors for the blood of obnoxious individuals, drive the Speaker from his chair, and the members from their seats! In such a proceeding, it is said there is "no positive violence;" and when successful, it is proclaimed a triumph of the democracy—a triumph of the people! Is this the sort of "direct supervision" of the people which has been the source of so many happy and glorious results past; or is it only from such a supervision of the people that the future peace and happiness and prosperity of the country are to spring? Is it already come to this, under the reforming hand of the party in power, that if on an occasion similar to that which occurred in this House only a year ago—I allude to the vote of the House in excluding the members from Mississippi, [Messrs. PRENTISS and WORD,] although clearly chosen by the people of Mississippi, upon the ground of a mere technicality, and thereby depriving an entire State of any representation whatever in this House for several months—I ask again, has it come to this, that if in that case this Hall had been suddenly filled with a heated and turbulent multitude, menacing violence and blood, and calling upon the House to reverse its decision, the proceedings would be sustained and justified as a wholesome and proper supervision of the people? Is this one of the improvements in government which our ancestors were ignorant of when they framed the Constitution?

President's Message—Mr. Bell.

H. or R. RS.

Suppose, sir, that the gentlemen from Mississippi had called their partisans and personal supporters to this Capitol—and no two gentlemen on this floor could have rallied a band of more devoted friends around them—suppose them arrived in the city, and, in their fury, preoccupied this Hall, calling upon the House to revise its sentence, and denouncing vengeance against all who should oppose their wishes: would the friends of the Administration upon this floor, would the leaders of the party anywhere, have declared such an irruption into this House a wholesome interposition of the people? And when we had tamely submitted, reversed our decision, and restored the rejected members to their seats, would they have proclaimed it a triumph of the people? A triumph, indeed, it might be; but it would have been a triumph over the Constitution; and, however palpably erroneous, however shocking to reason and common sense, the decision of the House was in the case alluded to, it may be a subject of just exultation to the Opposition; and it ought to be a subject of serious reflection with every honest man in the whole country that not one of them would for one moment have tolerated the suggestion that the House ought to be awed into submission upon that question by the direct interposition of the people.

In another passage of the message we are assured by the President that,

"To this practical operation of our institutions, [which he had described,] so evident and successful, we owe that increased attachment to them, which is among the most cheering exhibitions of popular sentiment."

I deny, most confidently and emphatically, that we are authorized to boast of this "increased attachment" to our institutions. On the contrary, I affirm that, for years, the attachment of the people to our institutions, and their confidence in their efficacy and durability, have been weakening and diminishing, just in proportion as the principles and practices of the party in power have been more and more developed and brought to light. I affirm that, instead of increased attachment, there is manifestly increased distrust; and thousands of honest and intelligent citizens throughout the land look with apprehension and dread to the future—that future which may come sooner upon us than you or I now dream of. Again, sir, I affirm that, in the entire period since the organization of the Government, there has never been so general a relaxation of all the ties and obligations, legal and political, which bind society together, as prevails at the present moment. At no former period has so general a spirit of opposition to legal restraints or requirements manifested itself throughout the country, when they stand in the way of willful passions or purposes of any kind. Slight regard for the Constitution and laws, commencing with the Government itself and its administrators, has gradually diffused itself over society.

There was a period in British history which presented a striking parallel of the times in this country. Had I been prepared for this debate, I might have presented such a picture, drawn from that period, as would have been recognized at once as the prototype of the state of things in this country at the present moment. It was just a century ago that violence and licentiousness took the place of law and sound public morals in Great Britain, and from causes very like those which exist in this country at this good time. Party spirit was excited to the highest state of violence, consistent with the existence of Government; and the people, generally, in the progress of the conflict, were alternately excited by distrust of the intentions of the Ministry, and a contempt for the authority of the Government. One man, of singular coolness and forbearance in temper; by practicing upon the principle that the mass of every society is moved by the mere love of gain—that there is no honesty in politics—that every man has his price, contrived to sustain himself in power nearly twenty years, in the face of a powerful opposition in both Houses of Parliament, and in the midst of the loudest clamor and discontent among the people. It was generally believed that he had grossly abused the great trust which had been confided to him by his sovereign; that he had distributed and prostituted the immense patronage of the Crown to the purpose of enriching himself and his personal favorites. He interfered directly in the election of members of Parliament, both by his personal influence and by the application of large sums of the public moneys; and he filled that body with placemen and dependants. He practiced so openly upon the spoils system, that he once declared in his place, in the House of Commons, that he would be a pitiful fellow of a minister who would not remove any man from office who opposed his measures. In such a state of things, general distrust and discontent banished all respect and confidence; confusion and disorganization usurped the place of law and order; and the same causes must produce the same results here.

The next passage of the message which I am tempted to notice, is in these words:

"Nearly eight million dollars of Treasury notes are to be paid during the coming year; in addition to the ordinary appropriations for the support of Government. For both these purposes the resources of the Treasury will undoubtedly be sufficient. IF THE CHARGES UPON IT ARE NOT INCREASED BEYOND THE ANNUAL ESTIMATES."

Much is said in the succeeding paragraph of the message of the frauds committed by the public officers upon the public revenue; and many severe remedies are suggested to correct this great public evil. Some remedy is also imperatively demanded by the public interest for the repeated and systematic frauds and impositions practiced upon the public credulity by the highest functionaries of the Government in their communications to this House and to the public, professing to contain their political creed, and to present a candid view of the condition of the finances and other branches of the public service. The people are reluctant to conclude that the very highest and most honored public officers, and those in whom the nation has expressed its confidence, would deceive them; and thus the most shameful official hypocrisy and delinquency are rewarded with renewed confidence, instead of resentment and indignation. I was struck with the remark of a very acute and able member of this House the other day, upon the subject of the relative prospects of the Administration and Opposition. He said the Opposition would probably not succeed, whatever apparent advantages they may have in the contest. If the Opposition, said he, claim any merit as the advocates of economy in the public expenditures, or, as the champions of the policy of limiting Executive power and patronage, they will find that the claim will avail them nothing; for, upon none of these questions, nor upon any other popular doctrine of a similar nature, will the Administration make an issue with them. On the contrary, in the messages, and the communications from the Treasury Department, the members of the Administration will be found to be as much the friends of economy, of reform, and as much opposed to the increase of Executive power and patronage, as any member of the Opposition.

Sir, this is very near the truth, at least. Those under whose auspices the annual expenditures of the Government have been increased, within a term of less than ten years, from thirteen to thirty million dollars, and Executive patronage in a corresponding ratio, can point to public documents emanating from their own hands, in which they have written with as much apparent earnestness, and said as many fine things in favor of economy and every other republican principle and practice, as any of their opponents. This, sir, I contend, is a species of fraud which calls for a remedy. Those who have practiced it should be stripped of the mask under which they have heretofore deceived the people.

In the present message we have an earnest exhortation to Congress to confine the appropriations for the year 1839 within the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury. In the report of the Secretary himself, there is a similar appeal made in behalf of economy and retrenchment. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his last annual report, estimates the appropriations which will be required for the next year (1839) at $21,665,089. What amount will actually be required for the public service, we shall see at the close of the session. But whatever degree of candor may characterize the estimates of the Treasury for the year 1839, cannot excuse or atone for the gross deception practiced by that Department in the annual estimates for the present year (1838) submitted December 3, 1837; and the still more glaring and shameful attempt to mislead the public, by the statement drawn up under the direction of Mr. Woodbury, and presented to the Senate on the 29th of June last, (1838). That statement purports to show the amount of the annual estimates and the annual expenditures, exclusive of the public debt, with the excess of appropriation above the estimates, in each year, from 1823 to 1837, inclusive. The statement was drawn up, no doubt, to answer or parry the arguments of the Opposition to the Administration, drawn from the fact that, in 1836, the annual expenditures of the Government had risen to thirty million and upwards; and in 1837 to upwards of thirty-nine million. Before this statement made its appearance, the partisans and apologists of the Administration affirmed that the expenditures of the Post Office Department, amounting to some four and a half million, were included in the amounts charged to those years; but that was found to be a mistake. But they also said, with more truth, that some five million of moneys received under the treaties of indemnity with France and Naples, and in trust for several Indian tribes, were included in the $39,000,000 charged to the year 1837, which would reduce the actual expenditures of the year 1837 to $34,000,000. But, as this still appeared very large, it was contended that some five or six million of that amount ought not to be charged to the extravagance of the Administration, because that sum was expended in that year in suppressing Indian hostilities! A pretty story, when it is well known, to those who have devoted any attention to the subject, that the Administration is not only justly chargeable with the most unparalleled waste of the public treasure in the late and existing wars with the Indians, but that those wars may be fairly traced and charged to the culpable neglect and bad management of the department of the Government charged with the direction and control of Indian affairs.

Another defense was, that the expenditures attending the removal of the Indians from the east to the west of the Mississippi, amounting to several millions annually, ought to be regarded as extraordinary; and such as would have occurred under any administration. Whoever will look into this subject will be satisfied that the necessary expenses attending the purchase of Indian lands and the removal of the Indians have been increased more than one hundred per cent. by the imbecility and faithlessness of the agents employed in the various branches of that service. But the charge which was most successful in blinding the people, and confounding the less informed, was that all the excess of expenditure under the late and present Administrations, beyond the annual expenditures under Mr. Adams's administration, was to be ascribed to the extravagant and unprincipled course of the Opposition in Congress. The Administration, it was said, had always been in favor of economy; and to prove the assertion true, the statement of Mr. Woodbury, before adverted to, was relied upon. The estimate sent to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury, it was said, were always moderate and economical, and so it would appear from a reference to that statement. For example, the estimates for the year 1837, sent in from the Treasury Department in December, 1836, are ostentatiously displayed in one column of the statement as amounting to no more than $22,651,442, while, in another parallel column, it appears that Congress appropriated $39,164,745; showing an excess of moneys voted by Congress above the estimates of the Treasury for one year, of $17,073,321! It is manifest that the well-informed only would be able to detect the fallacy of this argument, or to expose the hypocrisy of those who advanced it. If it be said that the Secretary might have been honestly mistaken in making an estimate of appropriations for the year 1837, greatly below the actual demands of the service, inasmuch as the expenses incurred in suppressing Indian hostilities, in that year, greatly exceeded the expectations of all parties, still that does not excuse the attempt to impose upon the people by exhibiting the estimates, and contrasting them with the appropriations, as an argument in favor of the greater economy of the Executive administration; and still less does it excuse the attempt to keep up the same delusive appearances in the estimates for the service of the present year (1838) submitted on the 6th of December, 1837. In the report then submitted to Congress, the estimates of appropriations for the service of the year 1838, are stated at $20,523,249 only. Very moderate, indeed, and worthy of all praise, in a republican statesman, considering the actual circumstances of the country at that time. But let us examine for a moment what those circumstances were. There were at that moment between eight and ten thousand troops employed in the prosecution of the Florida war, with no certain prospect of ending the war, at all events before the spring of the next year; and it afterwards appeared, I believe, that at the time those estimates were sent in, the arrears then due in that branch of the public service, and for which there was no appropriation, exceeded $1,000,000; and upwards of $7,000,000 were afterwards actually appropriated for the service of 1838, not one cent of which was included in the estimates of the Treasury!

25TH CONG. 3D SESS.

President's Message.—Mr. Bell.

There were, also, at the period of those estimates, (December, 1837,) five or six Indian treaties already signed under the direction of the President, involving an expenditure of more than $3,000,000; and although they were not then ratified, yet, as their ratification was regarded as a matter of course, the Secretary of the Treasury was without apology for failing to notice in some form the appropriations necessary to carry them into effect. These treaties were afterwards ratified, and $1,200,000 were actually appropriated to be expended in the year 1838, according to their stipulations. But this is not all. At the time the Treasury estimates were sent in, the Secretary could not have been ignorant that the Secretary of War and the President had united in an earnest recommendation to increase the rank and file of the standing Army to fifteen thousand men, and to augment considerably every branch of the military establishment and defenses of the country; and many concurrent circumstances, besides, indicated that this would be done; yet no notice whatever was taken by the Secretary in his estimates of the increased charges upon the Treasury on this account. The Army proper was increased so as to number between twelve and fourteen thousand men, and the other branches of the military establishment were also augmented, to meet the expenses of which in the year 1838, upwards of $700,000 were voted by Congress. Those few items, that I have referred to merely from memory, show an aggregate of $9,000,000 demanded for the service of 1838, all, or the greater part, of which ought to have been, and probably was, foreseen by the Secretary of the Treasury; yet no part of it was included in his estimates. It is by such concealments and artifices as these that the Administration seeks to uphold a character for economy and retrenchment, and to throw upon the Opposition and Congress the charge of extravagance. I conclude my remarks upon this part of the message by repeating my opinion that the public interests demand the application of some remedy for this mischief. Some adequate penalty should be imposed to protect the people against such false pretenses.

I now propose to notice another part of the message, which, from its connection with the subject of greatest interest at the present time, will be regarded as the most interesting and important of the whole.

After adverting to the defalcation of the late collector of the port of New York, (Mr. Swartwout,) and very naturally associating with it the idea of the necessity of a more "secure and safe system for the safe-keeping and disbursement of the public moneys," the President insists "that the application of the public money to private uses should be made a felony, and visited with severe and ignominious punishment." "The Government, it must be admitted," says the President, in the same paragraph, "has been, from its commencement, comparatively fortunate in this respect."

Here, then, is a fair admission, that until recently but a small portion of the public moneys has been embezzled by the officers charged with its collection; yet the method of collecting and safe-keeping heretofore in use is denounced and repudiated; a new system is projected and insisted on; and the further security is suggested of severe and ignominious penalties. The enormous abuses successively brought to light under the Administration continue to be imputed to any but their true cause. The system of collection and disbursement is defective; the method of accounts is defective; the laws are defective! This has been the ready apology of the late and present Administrations for all abuses. There were no serious complaints of abuses or defalcations in the Post Office Department until the party now in power undertook, as they said, to bring about a general reform of the Government; but when a few years of mal-administration had brought about a general derangement and the most corrupt practices in that department, it was immediately proclaimed that the laws regulating the Department were eminently defective; the system of accountability in use, it was said, was a bad one; in fine, that nothing could retrieve its condition but a new organization. The same excuses have repeatedly been urged in defense of the gross abuses which have prevailed in the War Department, in the Departments of Indian Affairs and of the Public Lands. Bad laws and a bad organization are the only causes of abuse ever admitted by the friends of power; and the only remedies proposed or applied are new laws and a new organization. But I now take leave to notify the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] that when he shall introduce his bill to provide the remedies suggested in this message, I shall insist that the rules of this House be strictly enforced, and that his bill shall take rank in the rear of a bill now on the Calendar of the House, entitled "A bill to secure the freedom of elections;" but it might with more propriety be called "A bill to secure in future a skillful and honest administration of public affairs;" a bill, sir, which provides the very best and the only effective remedy in the power of Congress to adopt, for all the abuses in the public service. Lest the provisions of this bill may have been forgotten, I hope the clerk will be allowed to read it.

[The clerk read the bill, which proposes in the preamble to declare removals from office upon political grounds, or for opinion's sake, "a violation of the freedom of elections, an attack upon the public liberties, and a high misdemeanor." The first section provides a penalty of not more than $1,000, removal from office and perpetual disability to hold office, against any officer, agent, or contractor, under the Federal Government, convicted of intermeddling in any manner with elections, State or Federal, except in giving his own vote. The second section provides a penalty of $5,000, removal from office, and perpetual disability, against any officer of the Federal Government, having, under the Constitution and laws, the power to appoint, or nominate and appoint, any officer or agent of the Government, who shall be convicted of promising or bestowing any office or agency, upon any agreement on the part of the appointed to render political or other services in elections or otherwise; and a penalty not exceeding $1,000, dismissal from office, and perpetual disability, against any subordinate officer convicted of receiving office upon such terms. The President and judges of courts are excepted as to the penalty of removal from office.]

The remedies proposed in this message are applicable to evils in subordinate offices, which are but the consequences of greater ones which exist in higher places. I insist, sir, that when we begin again to apply remedies, we shall begin higher up on the calendar; that we shall begin at the head of the list. There exists a canker at the core which must be eradicated before we can expect to heal the eruptions on the surface of affairs. All the remedies devised by the Administration are applicable to others and to subordinates only, while the radical vice is in themselves. It is the spoils principle, it is the principle of corruption itself, which has been adopted by the party in power as the only effective party cement; it is the false, corrupt, and corrupting principle upon which the appointing power has been, and continues to be, exercised under the present proscriptive dynasty; it is the practice of appointing desperate, worthless, and unprincipled men to office—men who, in general, possess no other merit than their partisan services and efficiency in elections. This, then, sir, is the great and fundamental evil. And now, sir, when most of the offices of greatest trust in the country are filled by this class of men—by clamorous and needy favorites—when their abuses, and defalcations have become so monstrous that their own patrons are compelled to acknowledge that nothing but the fear of the penitentiary can restrain them, a vain and idle attempt is made to substitute ignominious pains and penalties for an honest course of Executive appointment and supervision; and a hope equally idle and delusive is thrown out to the public that unprincipled public officers may be made honest men by law. And who are they who are set to watch—whose duty it is to watch defaulting receivers and collectors of the public moneys? Men themselves who acquired and now hold their stations by the successful operation of the same false and corrupt principle of appointment which placed all those who are subordinates to them in office. The one class cannot be supported without the other—all must be sustained or fall together.

But, Mr. Chairman, this is an old and threadbare theme with me. I have employed my time for years in an effort to attract the attention of the public to this subject in vain. I have often repeated all the arguments which have suggested themselves upon this subject on this floor, and I am sorry to say, with small effect. I have ever believed, since I became advised of the extent to which the appointing power continued to be abused, that there could be but one result, under the gross abuse of the appointing power which has prevailed of late. I have never doubted that time would develop an amount of fraud, speculation, and corruption, which would amaze and arouse the people; if the system should not effectually undermine the public morals, and destroy all sense of national pride and honor before their eyes could be opened. Sir, I may claim to have penetrated still further into the probable results of this system. I foretold, upon this floor, that other results besides mere injury to the public service, would necessarily, in due course of time, follow in the train of the spoils system, as established and acted upon in some of the States in the Union, as well as at Washington. I predicted that the time would come when these contests for the spoils, into which all elections would soon resolve themselves, would be decided by the sword. We have recently had a very fair illustration of the working of this system at Harrisburg; and that, sir, is but the beginning—the first-fruits of the system. We shall see the same scene exhibited by-and-by upon a larger theater. When this detestable principle of party aggregation shall extend itself into all, or nearly all, the States of the Union, as it promises soon to do, we shall see our national elections contested and settled by the direct intervention of office-holders and office-seekers, backed by their respective partisans, made furious and desperate by the prospect of losing their share of the public spoils, and resolved to incur every hazard to themselves and the country in asserting their claims.

But having so often urged the abuse of the appointing power as the true cause of the gross abuses known to exist in the public service, I am unwilling that the ground assumed shall rest upon my own assertion, when so many proofs are at hand to confirm what I have said. In the report of the committee of the Senate appointed to investigate the condition of the Post Office Department in 1834, (page 8,) it will appear, by the admission of the head of that Department himself, (Mr. Barry,) that between the 1st of April, 1829, and the 1st of September, 1834, there had been one thousand three hundred and forty removals from office in that Department alone! The committee resolved to inquire into the grounds of so many removals; and, that there might be no want of specification, they took up the case of John Herron, who had been appointed postmaster at Putnam, in Ohio, in the place of Henry Safford, removed.

[Mr. B. here read so much of the report of the committee as relates to the case alluded to, by which it appeared, from the statements furnished by the Post Office Department, that Herron was appointed in July, 1829, and continued in office until November, 1831, when he was dismissed. The amount due from him to the Department, during the time he continued in office, was estimated at $558 64, no part of which had ever been paid, and he had finally absconded. The committee then called upon the Postmaster General for the grounds upon which Safford had been removed and Herron put in his place; but the Postmaster General denied the right of the Senate to go into such an inquiry.]

But the committee of this House appointed in the same year, (1834,) and charged with the same duty, resolved to take up the inquiry into this case, where the Senate committee were stopped in the inquiry. It appears from the report of the minority of the committee of the House (Doc. 103, p. 215,) that the Postmaster General promptly communicated the letters and other papers on file in that Department relating to the removal of Safford and the appointment of Herron; but the majority of the committee, consisting of Mr. Boardsley of New York, Mr. Connor of North Carolina, Mr. Stoddert of Maryland, and Mr. Hawes of Kentucky, passed an order that they should be returned to the Postmaster General before they were copied. In this way it happened that these papers have never been communicated to the public; but the minority of the committee, consisting of Mr. Whittlesey of Ohio, Mr. Everett of Vermont, and Mr. Watmough of Pennsylvania, state the contents of them from memory, they having heard them read in committee; and by that statement it appears that an application was made to remove Safford upon the ground that although he was a professed friend of the Administration, yet he was believed not to be thorough in his feelings. His friends hearing of the attempt to get him removed, represented to the Department that he was a true friend of the Administration. There was no exception taken to his capacity or integrity, yet he was removed, and Herron, whose party fidelity was unquestioned by any one, was appointed in his place. Here is a pretty specimen of this evil, in the bud, which has since expanded into such monstrous shapes of abuse! But there is yet a more important circumstance connected with this inquiry. Besides the strange development, that a Postmaster General should not appear to be conscious of any misconduct in having dismissed an honest and competent public servant from office upon such grounds, the still more astonishing fact appears in the shape of an order adopted by the majority of the committee that they sanction the principle of this removal. The committee declare, in express terms, that they can see "nothing in the letters and petitions transmitted by the Postmaster General, touching the removal of H. Safford as postmaster at Putnam, Ohio, and the appointment of J. Herron as his successor, which, in the slightest degree, impeaches the motives or criminalizes any act of the Postmaster General, or is, in any respect, material to any object of legislation, or of public interest or concern."

Here is the solemn opinion of a majority of the committee of the House, composed of some of the most prominent men of the party in power, pronounced in favor of the principle of removals for opinion's sake; nor did they regard the question as of any public interest or concern! Though the successor, brought into office upon the ground of his superior fidelity to the party, had turned out to be a knave, and had actually run away with every cent of the revenue collected at his office in his pocket, still the public were declared to have no interest in the principle upon which the appointment had been made! This case also presents a good specimen of the refinement upon simple proscription which prevailed with the late Administration, in the footsteps of which the present one treads. It was not sufficient that a man should be a friend of the Administration; if he was suspected of lukewarmness by any man of undoubted standing with the party, it was enough to destroy him. These are the principles upon which the appointing power has been exercised in this country; and this the manner in which the patronage of the Government has been distributed for the last nine years. Is it any wonder that the loss of millions of the public treasure should be the consequence? We have seen, by the order adopted in the committee of the House, how the further progress of the inquiry into the grounds upon which the great number of removals in the Post Office Department was arrested. Further inquiry was, in fact, useless, if the principle assumed by the committee was well founded.

I am not willing to lay aside these valuable reports, without adverting to the facts which were incidentally brought to light before the committee of the Senate, relating to the removal of Wyman, postmaster at Lowell, Massachusetts, and the appointment of Case. It belongs to a class of abuses which are now well known, I suppose, in every part of the Union. I allude to the corruption of the public press, and the direct connection which exists between the Administration papers generally and the Post Office Department. It appears, by the report of this committee, (page 11,) that William Wyman, an honest and competent postmaster, was removed from office, on the recommendation of the "Democratic committee" of Lowell, without any other reason being assigned than that he was not a friend of the Administration, and Eliphalet Case, the editor of the Lowell Mercury, a paper zealously devoted to the Administration, was appointed in his place. It was a condition of this appointment, plainly implied in the arrangement made between the several parties, that Case should continue to edit the Mercury for nothing, he having formerly received $300 per annum for that service; and it was proved that he complied with his bargain. How many hundreds of worthy men have been removed from their employment in this Department, upon pretenses and suggestions equally repugnant to reason and equally corrupt, the people of this country can never be informed; for, while the evidence was in existence, the Postmaster General either refused to allow the papers in his office to be inspected, which, in general, was the only evidence that could be reached, or the party in the majority in Congress refused to investigate. But, sir, the door which might once have been opened upon a mass of evidence and proof is now closed forever! The papers in the office of appointments have been consumed by fire! Still enough remains to stamp with shame and dishonor the character of a party which could sanction a principle so intolerant, so tyrannical, and so utterly subversive of all public virtue.

It is a fact which ought to be more publicly known, that he who is now President of these United States was the first man of any great political distinction in this country who, as a party man, openly and shamelessly proposed that the Post Office Department should be administered upon party principles, and the immense influence of the appointing power connected with that Department should be prostituted to such uses. But this fact will sufficiently appear from the correspondence which took place, in 1822, between Mr. Van Buren and President Monroe, and also with Mr. Meigs, the Postmaster General, upon the subject of the appointment of a postmaster at Albany, in New York. There every observant reader will find the germ of the spoils system. In that correspondence it will appear that the appointment of a political partisan was claimed as a matter of right on the one side, and of duty on the other, (the appointing power,) in order to give to the dominant party in New York the advantages of a political partisan at a point so important as Albany; but the patriotism and independence of Mr. Monroe and Mr. Meigs resisted the application. They refused to act upon any such principles; and when a man was appointed who had the misfortune to be a Federalist in politics, an appeal was taken from the decision of the Postmaster General to the people. A public meeting was held in Albany, vindicating their right to have a Republican appointed to the office in question, and calling upon the President to apply the constitutional remedy in such cases for their relief: and what do you suppose, sir, these Republicans meant by a constitutional remedy in such cases? It was the remedy of removal from office for opinion's sake!

But to return to the message. Why consume our time in debating the remedies proposed by the President? Why pursue, with relentless vengeance, the incumbents of subordinate offices; particularly the miserable speculator who has only made off with a few thousand dollars? Why pursue such small game, when the great delinquents are still allowed to revel in the uninterrupted enjoyment of power, possessing neither the principles nor the capacity to be useful to the public, and daily abusing their trusts, to the infinite prejudice of every public interest? I allude, of course, to the leading executive chiefs, and, in a party point of view, the most influential—the very men who are the original and responsible authors of all the defalcations and abuses committed by the subordinates, to whose zealous and efficient support in the public elections they owe their own elevation; and without which aid they could not remain a single day in office, but for the impediment which the Constitution interposes to prevent their immediate downfall. I repeat, it is small game which we are pursuing, in an economical point of view. I had occasion to speak of the defalcations disclosed in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury made to the House at the last session, and I made an estimate of the gross amount for which Hawkins, Harris, Boyd, Linn, and others, were deficient, and found the aggregate about four hundred thousand dollars. If we set down the defalcations of Swartwout and Price both at $1,500,000, the entire sum of the late defalcations will not exceed two millions—perhaps the ultimate loss will not exceed one million dollars. Now I conjure honorable members to reflect that this sum, though large, is but a fraction of the losses sustained by the people of this country by defalcations of a different kind—by defalcations in capacity, in requisite skill, and, above all, in sound political principles, on the part of the Administration. Let any man attempt to estimate the actual losses in dollars and cents, which this country has sustained by an incompetent, unprincipled, and electioneering Administration, and he will at once see that our business now is with higher game than that upon the track of which we have been put by the President. Without pretending to estimate the indefinite injury, the hundreds of millions in losses, which a few years of great commercial and financial derangement must have inflicted upon a great nation like this, let us take a more practical view of the subject. Let us set down a few of the leading items in the account, which the people may, upon clear and tangible grounds, state against the great national defaulters to whom I have alluded, and who have not been removed or dismissed from office.

First. There was the Black Hawk war—a war which originated in the sheer neglect and culpable negligence of the Administration, and which cost the country $3,000,000.

Second. There was the late Creek war—a war notoriously caused or instigated by the speculators in Indian lands, and which might have been averted, but for the imbecility of some, and the want of principle in others, of the public agents intrusted by the Administration with the execution of the treaty of 1832. I estimate the cost of that war at $1,500,000.

Third. We may safely estimate the extra cost of the Florida war, or the clear excess above what a competent and faithful system of administration would have expended on this war, at $12,000,000. I, sir, predict that the entire cost of this war to the country will not be less than $20,000,000. And when it is borne in mind that this disastrous war would have been prevented by a judicious selection of agents in the management of the Indians, the charge which I make against the Administration of an excess of expenditure upon it will be considered moderate. This, it must be recollected, was purely an Executive war—a war commenced and waged entirely at Executive discretion. Congress was only appealed to, from time to time, to vote the sums of money which were said to be essential to its successful prosecution; and these appeals were often made after the troops were in the field, and no alternative was left but to vote the money. I take this occasion to remark that it was for voting for such appropriations, as these, and occasionally for large sums stipulated in Indian treaties ratified by the Senate, that the Whigs in Congress have been charged by the apologists of the Administration as equally to blame with themselves for the large expenditures incurred under these heads; but with what justice the public will decide.

25th CONG. 13d Sess.

President's Message—Mr. Bell.

H. of Reps.

Fourth. The increased cost of Indian treaties and Indian emigration, in consequence of the unnecessary multiplication of officers and agents employed, the incapacity and dishonesty of many of them, and the general want of skill and fidelity in the superintendency—I estimate the loss under this head at $5,000,000 at least.

Fifth and last. I will mention the item of $1,000,000 which the country has been taxed with to suppress disturbances on the Canada frontier. Every cent of this expenditure, I maintain, would have been saved to the nation if the President, instead of temporizing and waiting to see what public sentiment would be, and suffering the feeble proclamations of the Governors of the States to go forth as a substitute for his own, had, upon the first indication of disturbances in that quarter, issued such a proclamation as he has only done within a few weeks past. But, sir, that did not suit the policy of an electioneering Administration. It was hazardous quite too much to take ground in advance of public opinion throughout the Union; and so the inhabitants on the border, not being advised of the real intentions of the Government, many of them became committed, of course, according to their natural sympathies and feelings, and the national character has consequently suffered with the Treasury. These few items, selected only because they are the largest and most obvious, make, in the aggregate, a loss of upwards of twenty million dollars.

Let us, then, instead of wasting our energies in the pursuit of small defaulters, direct our inquiries and point the indignation of the country against the great official delinquents—against those who, being the real authors of all the abuses which exist in the land, still hold their places, and arrogantly seek to gain credit with the people by proposing remedies for evils of their own creation. This country is peculiarly situated in reference to a weak and unprincipled Administration. In England, a bad Ministry can be brought to the bar of public opinion at once; and upon the heel of any great official delinquency, judgment is pronounced upon them, and they are hurled from power before time shall have softened public indignation, or afforded the offenders the opportunity of diverting public attention to some other subject. Here it is only at stated times, fixed by the Constitution, that a bad Administration can be brought to account, or be removed from their places; and they may go on for years in a constant course of administrative abuse and imbecility; they may commit the grossest infractions of the Constitution itself; they may prostitute the patronage of the Government to the vilest and most selfish purposes, and, after all, escape the sentence of an injured people. Ample time is afforded to enable them to court and flatter when they find they have given offense, to get up some new subject of excitement, and turn away the stroke of popular wrath before it is allowed by the Constitution to fall upon the culprits. I therefore admonish the Opposition in this House not to be too sanguine of the result of recent developments, whatever impression they may make for the present. It is yet two years before the people can decide finally upon them; and the puny defaulters, whom it is proposed to pursue and hunt to destruction, will soon be forgiven. They will, at best, only become the scapegoats of their superiors in station. It is against the principles and practices of the Executive chief himself that opposition can be made effective. It is by carrying the war into the heart of power, and exposing the defects and corruptions which exist there—it is by administering a corrective to the original fountain of evil alone that we can expect to bring about real reform, and confer a lasting benefit upon the country.

The next clause of the message which struck me as deserving notice is in these words:

"But the appointing power cannot always be well advised in its selections; and the experience of every country has shown that public officers cannot always be proof against temptation."

This must be regarded as a singular and precious admission, coming as it does from the appointed successor of General Jackson. What! the Executive not infallible! And is it admitted at last that there are abuses in some branches of the public service? Truly, public officers are not always proof against temptation, nor can the Executive be always well advised in its selections. But how does it happen that the late and present Administrations have been more unfortunate in this respect than all those which went before them? That is the question. How does it happen that when the Executive has been well advised—how does it happen that when it has been advised of former defalcation and delinquency, it has formed no objection in making its selections, as in the case of Linn, as I understand that case, and as was certainly the case of a late district attorney in Alabama? Ill does it become such an Executive to complain that it cannot always be well advised. How has it happened that the appointees of the late and present Administrations have so generally given way when exposed to temptation? I answer, because both the advice and the selections were based upon false and corrupt principles and maxims. Partisan service and party fidelity have been the only tests of fitness for office; and when the Executive was well advised upon these points, it was all that was required.

In the same paragraph every well-informed reader will be astonished to find a true constitutional principle connected with such a subject recognized by such authority, and an exhortation to Congress to enforce it:

"Congress cannot be too jealous of those who are intrusted with the public money; and I shall at all times be disposed to encourage a watchful discharge of this duty."

"If a more direct cooperation on the part of Congress in the supervision of the conduct of the officers intrusted with the custody and application of the public money is deemed advisable, it will give me pleasure to assist in the establishment of any judicious and constitutional plan by which that object may be accomplished."

Who would have believed that we should have had so decided and unequivocal a recantation of the doctrines applicable to this subject avowed and so successfully maintained under the late Administration, and that, too, by a man pledged to walk in the footsteps of the late Executive chief? That Congress cannot be too jealous of those who have the custody of the public money, is frankly admitted; and the President actually tells us that he will encourage the exercise of that duty! But he earnestly recommends a direct cooperation of Congress in the supervision of the conduct of public officers! This must appear incredible to those who have been conversant with the doctrines of the party in power for several years past—but nevertheless it is true. Congress is actually invoked to cooperate with the President in the business of superintending the conduct of his subordinate officers! This amounts almost to revolution. Still all is not yet told. The President further submits to our consideration—

"Whether a committee of Congress might not be profitably employed in inspecting, at such intervals as might be deemed proper, the affairs and accounts of officers intrusted with the custody of the public moneys." * * * "They might report to the Executive such defalcations as were found to exist, with a view to a prompt removal from office unless the default was satisfactorily accounted for."

The great Democratic party must certainly be confounded by this last proposition; or is this message intended to be a new confession of political faith for the whole party? Congress is unequivocally invited to institute investigations into the conduct of executive officers, and not one word is said of the necessity of specifications, or of impeachments, as conditions precedent! The doctrines and recommendations of this part of the message appear to me to be so entirely repugnant in every particular to the opinions and sentiments of the late President, that I am tempted to go back to the messages and other state papers emanating from the late Administration, and to trace the contrast, that we may see what the creed of the dominant party is to be for the future.

From the grant, in general terms, of "the Executive power" to the President, by the Constitution, and the assignment to him, in the same general terms, of the duty of taking "care that the laws be faithfully executed," and the terms of his oath of office, by which he is required to "preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution," a degree of power was deduced and arrogated to the Executive under the late Administration, which was truly appalling, and would, if sustained by the country, inevitably lead to despotic power. From the grant of the "Executive power," the late President claimed the exclusive direction and control of everything in the affairs of Government in its nature executive and not legislative. It being made his duty to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed, and to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution," it followed that this duty devolved upon him exclusively, and that any interference on the part of Congress, with a view to the same object, was gratuitous and unconstitutional, except in the discharge of the duties expressly assigned to it in the Constitution. He also derived from the same source the idea of his exclusive responsibility for the faithful execution of the laws, and the preservation, protection, and defense of the Constitution; and, building upon this foundation, he claimed, first, the right, in all cases, to give such construction to the Constitution and laws as he thought proper; for, it was contended it would be highly unreasonable and absurd to make any man, or any department of the Government, responsible for the protection and defense of the Constitution, and the faithful execution of the laws, according to the construction of any other department or any other tribunal whatever. Secondly, he maintained that every officer under the Government, except the judges of the courts, were only instruments in his hands, created for no other purpose but to enable him to execute these solemn constitutional duties. From hence, also, was deduced the doctrine that the supervision of the conduct of all public officers was the sole right and duty of the Executive. From hence, also, the deduction was natural and easy, that the President ought to be allowed not only to select all the instruments to be used by him in the execution of the laws, and for the preservation of the Constitution in the manner provided in the Constitution, but that he ought to have the further power, not given in the Constitution, of setting aside those instruments at his discretion.

If these doctrines and assumptions of Executive duty and authority do not present a perfect scheme of despotic power—if they do not amount to a clear and substantial concentration of all power in the hands of one man—I have no conception of what more would be requisite for such a consummation. If any one of these powers can be maintained in the extent contended for, then the late President was well warranted in maintaining that Congress could pass no law, however ingeniously devised—adopt no form or mode for the deposit, safe-keeping, or disbursement of the public moneys, which could deprive him of the actual custody and disposition of them. He had a perfect right to consider not only the Secretary of the Treasury, but the Bank of the United States also, as his mere instrument, contrived, with a view to enable him to discharge his appropriate duty of keeping the public moneys safely, and paying them out for the support of Government, according to his own construction of his duty and power in this as in every other branch of Executive administration. He had a right to dispense with either, or both, as he thought proper. According to the same theory of Executive powers and duties, the attempt of Congress to investigate the condition of the Executive Departments, or into the conduct of public officers, at a late session, was an impertinent intrusion into matters that concerned others; an attempt, in fact, at usurpation on the part of Congress, the supervision of the conduct of public officers being an act in its nature executive, and the President being also exclusively responsible for the conduct of all the departments, and all public officers.

The tremendous power of removal, claimed without any other responsibility than that which attaches in making the original appointment, under the power and duty of seeing that the laws be faithfully executed, and that the Constitution be preserved, is also well founded, according to these views of the extent of Executive power. And, sir, it will be found that all these extravagant notions of Executive power were sustained by the majority in this House during the late Administration. The Postmaster General (Mr. Kendall) took ground boldly in his letter to the investigating committee of this House, in 1836, refusing to communicate any information as to the motives or reasons upon which he had removed one postmaster and appointed another in his place, alleging that he considered it his duty to "regard the constitutional limitations of power, and to give the information required would tend to subvert them;" and this doctrine was acquiesced in by the House. I have already referred to the opinion of another committee, which was acquiesced in by the House, that it is no misdemeanor in the Executive, and a matter of no public interest or concern whatever, that a public officer should be removed on account of his politics. Thus, sir, was a system of tyranny lately upheld and established upon alleged constitutional grounds, which possessed the merit, at least, of consistency in all its assumptions of power. It was upon the ground of the exclusive responsibility of the Executive for the conduct of all his public officers, and his absolute power over them, and because it was highly convenient at the same time, that, when any one under the late Administration ventured to find fault with any subordinate officer of the Government, the answer in this House invariably was: why do you not attack the President himself? He is responsible for the faithful execution of the laws. Why do you not have the manliness to attack him directly, who is an antagonist worthy of you? Why do you seek to vent your hostility to General Jackson in attacks upon the officers appointed by him, and for whose good conduct he is bound to answer?

President's Message—Mr. Bell.

But, sir, what do we find to be the duties of the present Chief Magistrate upon these fundamental doctrines? It is true, sir, he is silent upon some of them; but we may justly congratulate ourselves and the country that the proper constitutional rights and powers of Congress over the public treasure have been fully recognized in principle, whether the President intended to go that length or not. It is of no use now to inquire under what circumstances this recognition has been made. The power of Congress to inquire into and supervise the conduct of all public officers we also regard as yielded without limitation. But, above all, we have reason to rejoice that the foundation upon which that most odious, mischievous, and despotic of all powers, the unlimited power of removal, has been maintained, is removed. I am far from thinking that the President would put this construction upon his own message; but such will be the force of the principles he does admit. The doctrine of exclusive duty and responsibility in taking care that the laws be faithfully executed, and that the Constitution be preserved, is expressly abandoned. It is admitted to be both the right and the duty of Congress to interfere, both by legal enactments and by direct supervision of the conduct of public officers. Again, it is admitted that Executive supervision is incompetent to the task of seeing that the laws be faithfully executed without the aid of Congress! In truth, the Executive power, in the hands of the present incumbents, is proclaimed by the President himself, in the message before us, to be a failure! He is not only willing to divide the responsibility of the Executive department with Congress, but he admits that, without the cooperation of Congress in the discharge of Executive duties, the public service must suffer. There is, therefore, no longer any plausible ground remaining upon which to rest the unlimited power of removal.

But, Mr. Chairman, while I applaud the candor of the President in making the important admissions to which I have alluded, I cannot agree that his proposition of a congressional committee upon the terms he suggests is entitled to be treated with equal respect. It looks as though he wished to stipulate an equivalent for the concessions he has made. When we come to analyze the character and tendency of the proposition, nothing could be more insulting to Congress. In the first place, it appears to come in the shape of a boon—an act of grace and favor by the President. Congress may or will hereafter be permitted by the Executive to institute committees of inquiry to a limited extent! Heretofore, it is true that this power in Congress has been actually denied; but still the country did not acquiesce in the prohibition, and the President will not acquire any credit for conceding to Congress a privilege which was always its right, primarily and fundamentally. But this is not the most objectionable feature in the proposition. If I understand the nature of the duties the committee of Congress proposed by the President would have to perform, they would be the mere scavengers of the President, compelled to grope their way into the private recesses, the inner closets of suspected public officers—pursuing their victims through all manner of tainted and infected places, often bound to disregard every feeling and sympathy that is honorable to our nature, dragging to light the concealed and venal weaknesses and aberrations of men standing high in the estimation of society, and who, perhaps, are still more honest than their neighbors who have never passed through such an ordeal; and to what end or purpose, at last, will Congress have descended to take upon itself as one of its ordinary duties a service so revolting? Can they give effect to their investigation? No; they cannot remove a single officer. Our committees will only act in the capacity of informers and catchpoles for the Executive; and when we shall have presented a wretched delinquent to the notice of the President, he may or may not punish him, or remove him from office, at his discretion.

But, besides the degradation, there are two capital objections to this plan of a congressional committee, founded on higher principles. First, the entire responsibility of seeing that the public moneys are in safe hands, and that the public officers generally are honest and capable, will be shifted from the President, and thrown upon Congress. Who, after such a system of congressional supervision of all public officers shall go into operation, would ever dream of making the President responsible for any defalcation in subordinate officers? It would be said at once, in answer to any attack upon the Executive, that it was the business of Congress to have been more diligent in their inquiries into the conduct of the defaulting officer. Secondly, nothing could add more to the influence of the Executive than a plan which proposes to leave him in the full possession, not only of the appointing power, as heretofore exercised, but of the power of discretionary removal; and, at the same time, relieves him from the burden and odium of official scrutiny into the conduct of political and personal favorites, and of removing them upon his own suggestion. He would thus be left in the full possession of all that is beneficent and desirable, connected with the appointing power and the distribution of Executive patronage, and relieved of all that is ungracious. When he would be called upon to remove an old friend and partisan from office for good cause, the report of the committee would shield him from any unpleasant responsibility of a personal nature. Another objection to this plan would be, that Congress, from its composition and constitution, would be incompetent to examine and supervise the conduct of public officers, as a regular and reliable means of securing a faithful discharge of official duty. The Executive alone is competent to that duty in general; and if Congress should undertake it, the consequence would be greater abuses in the public service than ever. In my opinion, therefore, when either House of Congress shall appoint an investigating committee, it will become their character and dignity to act independently of Executive recommendation or pleasure, and, standing upon the high ground of constitutional duty and privilege, institute inquiries at their own discretion, whenever the public interest shall appear to demand them.

There is but one other portion of the message upon which I desire to make a few remarks. In the argument submitted by the President in behalf of his favorite sub-Treasury scheme, after referring, in exaggerated terms, to the disasters in trade, the reckless speculations, and other evils incident to imprudent expansions of bank credit, and then adverting to the strong interest which existed while the banks were the fiscal agents of the Government, that money should be accumulated in their hands, he makes the following reflections:

"It is thus that a concentrated money-power is tempted to become an active agent in political affairs, and all past experience has shown on which side it will be arrayed. We deceive ourselves if we suppose that it will ever be found asserting and supporting the rights of the community, at large, in opposition to the claims of the few."
 "Nor is it the motive of combinations for the acquisition of legislative influence to confine their interference to the single object for which they were originally formed."
 "The influence in the direction of public affairs of the community at large is, therefore, in no slight danger of being sensibly, and injuriously affected by giving to a comparatively small, but very efficient class, a distinct and exclusive personal interest in so important a feature of the legislation of Congress as that which relates to the custody of public moneys."
 "Laws acting on private interests should be confined within the narrowest limits; when not thus instituted, they lead to combinations of powerful associations, foster an influence necessarily selfish, and turn the fair course of legislation to sinister ends."

I am persuaded, Mr. Chairman; that, if the President had not been infatuated, absolutely blinded, by the strong interest he feels in carrying his sub-Treasury scheme, he would never have presented to the public an argument which, when it shall be considered in connection with the true state of the question, will appear the very strongest that the opponents of that most mischievous measure could desire. Who is it that tells the people of the danger of a concentrated money power? The man who, directly or indirectly, controls an annual distribution of $30,000,000! the very man under whose direct and absolute control it is proposed to place whatever surplus money may be in the Treasury at any time, thus adding to his money power, already too great for the safety of our institutions; for who now does not understand that, by the established doctrines of the day, no officer can be authorized by law, charged with the custody of the public money, who will not be subject to the absolute control and direction of the President? No officer can be appointed, according to this doctrine, who will not always feel that he holds his office at Executive discretion; nor is there any power in Congress, according to this doctrine, to protect such officer against the arbitrary and corrupt interference of the Executive. Until the power of removal is regulated by law, this must be the necessary result of this scheme; and we find in the bills which have heretofore been presented, no provision against the uncontrolled exercise of that power over the keepers of the public money. The supervision by a committee of Congress proposed by the President does not imply any disposition on his part to waive the vast power claimed under the late Administration, of assuming the custody and control of the public moneys whenever he shall think it expedient, by the exercise of the power of removal.

But the mere custody and control of the public moneys will add but an inconsiderable degree of influence and power to the Executive in the comparison, when we reflect upon the far greater source of power which this famous sub-Treasury scheme proposes to vest in the President. It is expressly avowed in a subsequent part of the message that the plan of the sub-Treasury which he has in view, will not preclude the Government from employing the State banks, "like other State institutions." "They may be used or not in conducting the affairs of the Government," as public policy or convenience may require. Thus the monstrous proposition is entertained and attempted to be carried through Congress, by which the Administration will have eight hundred banks once more invited and tempted to vie with each other in subserviency to power—in such a course of conduct as will conciliate the Executive, and induce it to vouchsafe a portion of the public moneys to their keeping and use as heretofore. But it is not by the principle of favor or hope alone that it is proposed to subject all the banks and the whole banking system to the influence and control of the Administration. Fear and the principle of self-preservation, in general much more powerful influences, are also intended to be brought into active use, if need be. It can be demonstrated that if the sub-Treasury system is established with the principles which prevail in this Administration, no bank of the eight hundred now in operation in the United States can, with safety to itself, provoke the hostility of the Administration; or ever fail to second its policy and support its interests; and thus, sir, the entire money power of the country, public Treasury, banks, and all, will be resolved into an increase of Executive patronage. If you ask me how this subjection of the banks to the Administration can be brought about, I answer in a manner at once simple and effective. The Administration will only have to select some one or more confidential and trust-worthy partisans, who they shall already have appointed to the chief places of trust in the sub-Treasury scheme; and intimate to him that such a bank requires to be dealt with, and in thirty or sixty days at furthest, its work is done—it will be discredited, or compelled to wind up its affairs. A fund of fifty or a hundred thousand dollars would be sufficient in most cases; in some others a greater; and in some, perhaps, the temporary use of half a million would be required to effect the destruction of the obnoxious institution.

25th CONGRESS, 3D SESS.

Expenses of Government—Mr. Bell.

Ho. of Reps.

How perfectly simple and easy the process of sending a secret agent into any of the States of the West, for example, with some few hundred thousands of the public money, or with authority to draw on some eastern bank, employed to disguise the source of the attack; no difficulty will exist in exchanging such funds at any time for the local currency. That effected, it would only remain to convert the notes of the several banks in a State, thus picked up, into the notes of the one marked out for destruction; then present the notes thus collected for payment; and if one blow thus suddenly dealt should not suffice, repeat it until it could be borne no longer. He that supposes such a scheme of influence and intimidation in regard to the State banks wholly improbable, from the atrocity of the proceedings necessary to accomplish it, knows nothing of this Administration, its policy, its principles, or its practices. All this may be done in a manner so stealthy, that no trace of Government agency can be found, even by the proposed congressional committee, in the whole proceeding. The Globe may safely assure its readers that the Administration are wholly guiltless; but the sharp-sightedness of every bank in the Union will see whence the blow came, and they would govern themselves accordingly. Now, let an honest people look into this subject, and inquire in what quarter they are to apprehend the existence of a "concentrated money power;" in whose hands it will be "tempted to become an active agent in political affairs." Will the interest of the "community at large" or "the claims of the few," be most apt to prevail in such hands? Who are they who would be most apt to form "powerful associations" to "foster an influence necessarily selfish, and turn the fair course of legislation to sinister ends?" Again, who are they, as a class, whose private interests are to be most promoted by this measure? Who are the "few" whose interests are most likely to be supported at the expense of the "community at large?" I answer all these questions confidently, and I trust satisfactorily, by pointing to the possessors of official station and power—the office-holders—those whose salaries, whose influence and consideration in society depend upon remaining in office. This is the tribe most concerned in the establishment of the sub-Treasury.

EXPENSES OF GOVERNMENT.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN BELL,

OF TENNESSEE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 27, 1839,

On the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill.

Mr. BELL said he had intended, if the public business had permitted, to submit his views upon several important subjects connected with the Executive administration of the Government before the bill passed from the committee into the House; but he had become satisfied that it was his duty to forbear, whatever reasons of a personal nature might urge him to do so. If any member of the House owed it to himself to vindicate his course against attacks which had in a variety of ways been made upon it in that House, he might claim the indulgence of the House for that purpose. The views he had submitted on the message at an early day of the session, had not only been replied to with great freedom and latitude of remark; but with much unfairness and acrimony. Still he had thought it of more consequence that certain bills upon the Speaker's table, and other measures should be taken up and acted upon, than that he should occupy the time of the House in replying to gentlemen who had spoken against and at him in the several discussions which had intervened since December.

Mr. B. said that he would now ask the indulgence of the House for a very short time. He had both a general and a special object in view in rising to say a few words; but as it might not be in order to present the views he desired upon the particular amendment under consideration, he would move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

After the question was stated from the Chair upon this motion,

Mr. BELL resumed. He said the particular object he had in view was to correct, so far as regarded himself, an impression which appeared to prevail relative to the vote of the House upon the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MALLORY,] directing the Secretary of the Navy to lay before the next Congress a plan for the reorganization of the Navy Department. Many persons, both in and out of the House, had taken up the impression that all those who voted for the resolution had adopted the argument and concurred in the statements made in favor of the motion to strike out the appropriation to pay the salary of the Commissioners of the Navy Board; and consequently were prepared to disown the board for the future. For one, I beg leave to disclaim the intention imputed to me in this respect. However plausible the inference, it is not well founded in regard to myself, and, I believe, with regard to many others. I desire to state that I was by no means satisfied, from anything urged in the discussion, that the present organization of the Navy Department is defective, or that the present condition of that branch of the public service is justly attributable to the existence of the Navy Board; but it was a sufficient reason with me to support the proposition for a report from the Secretary of the Navy upon the proper organization of that Department, that many gentlemen, some of whose opinions are entitled to much respect, stated their strong conviction that the present organization was radically defective. I was willing to hear what the Secretary had to say upon the subject; and what he would consider an improvement in this branch of the public service. I was then, as I hope I shall always be, prepared to be guided by sufficient facts and reasons, and to sustain whatever plan may appear, upon full examination, to be for the good of the service. But there was a part of the reasoning employed by gentlemen in support of the motion to strike out, which I intended to disclaim at the time, had not the debate terminated abruptly by the withdrawal of the motion.

One of the principal arguments advanced by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CARY,] who made the motion, and by others, was, that the Navy Board, by being composed of more than one member, admitted of no adequate responsibility; there was no head; there was no individual accountability; and it was to this cause that were to be referred all the miscarriages and gross blunders which had marked the administration of that Department. To this cause was attributed, in the argument, the shameful mismanagement of the exploring expedition, as well as every other abuse admitted to exist in that branch of the service. I apprehend these views are founded upon a total misconception of the law and of the powers vested in the Navy Board. If I am not grossly mistaken, the Commissioners of the Navy Board have no uncontrollable or discretionary powers, but are in all their leading duties subject to the authority and control of others. When it is said that there is no responsible head, that there is no individual responsibility, and that all the abuses in this Department are to be ascribed to this board, I ask honorable gentlemen to inform the House what disposition they have made of the Secretary of the Navy? What are his powers? what his duties and responsibility? Is he not a unit? Is he not that very head which they so much desire? And if he is not, what else is he? And again: what has become of the President of the United States, the executive head of the Government—he upon whom, in the language, and according to the doctrines of the day, rests the entire and exclusive responsibility of the whole executive administration? I contend that there is, first, the Secretary of the Navy, who is the head of the Navy Department, and who is responsible to this House and to the country for the proper and faithful administration of that Department; that he has, by law, the control of the Navy Board; and that he is, and ought to be, responsible for its conduct. I assert, in the second place, that the President himself is responsible for the conduct of the Secretary of the Navy, and for the proceedings of the Navy Board also. There is, then, no deficiency in the legal and constitutional provisions to secure a proper individual responsibility. The want of this responsibility is certainly not the source of the evil which all admit exists. What is the most probable source of the evil, I will attempt to point out before I sit down.

It is a remarkable circumstance that not one of the several gentlemen who pressed the necessity of dispensing with the Navy Board, and dwelt with so much earnestness upon the wretched condition of the Navy, made the slightest reference to the possible imbecility and incapacity of those gentlemen who have for years presided over that department. No exception whatever has been taken to the qualifications or competency of any of the late Secretaries. But the facts stated by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CARY,] coming from the source they do, are entitled to the particular attention of the House and the country. No one, no matter to what political party he may belong, will charge that gentleman with a design to do injustice to the existing Administration, or to the party which has been in power during the last ten years. No one will question either his orthodoxy or the truth of any statement he makes which is in any way unfavorable to the interests of his political friends. I am glad I can take my facts from a source so unquestionable. If I had ventured to make the statements he has furnished us with, they would have been denied, and denounced by half the country as the offspring of disappointed ambition and party rancor. That gentleman told us that, after the expenditure of millions upon millions upon the Navy, it was still in no better condition than it was at the close of the late war! Is this true, sir? For one, I do not gainsay or doubt the truth of the statement. The gentleman might, also, with the same propriety and truth, have stated that, although the late and the present Administrations owed their existence to the determination of the people to provide a more faithful and effective Administration, and one which would supply the defects and correct the abuses which their predecessors, it was alleged, had permitted to prevail in every branch of the public service, yet, after an experiment of ten years, and an increased expenditure upon the Navy, it was, in the year 1839, in no better plight, scarcely in any one respect, than it was in the year 1829.

The gentleman from Michigan made another statement, for which I am obliged to him, for it referred to a period and a crisis in our affairs which was, at the time, held up as of the utmost interest and delicacy. I allude to the period of 1835-36, when it was supposed by many that we were upon the eve of a war with France. The course of some of my political friends, together with my own at that period, was violently assailed by our opponents. The gentleman from Michigan has confirmed by his statement all that I either said or did or thought in reference to the conduct, or rather to the gross and culpable negligence, of the Executive, in all that concerned the public defenses, and especially that most important of all—the Navy, at that period. The gentleman from Michigan now admits, that when it appeared probable that we might be suddenly involved in a war with France, and, he might have added, when a war with that Power was provoked and even desired by many influential though reckless partisans of the Administration, the Commissioners of the Navy Board were called upon to state the actual strength and condition of the Navy, and what number of vessels could be sent to sea in the event of immediate war, and the reply was, that no more than one frigate and two smaller vessels were then fit for immediate service, nor could any considerable addition be made to them within the year! I may now state that I was informed by a gentleman of skill and science in the profession of arms, at the period alluded to, that a single French frigate, skillfully managed, could have burned or laid under contribution any of our richest or most populous sea-port towns. The gentleman from Michigan might also have informed us, had his attention been directed to that part of the public defenses, that there was scarcely a gun mounted in any one of the fortifications along our extensive seacoast at the period in question; not even upon those which were intended to protect our naval stations!

We are now, sir, supposed by many to be upon the eve of a war with another great nation. I hope, sir, it will be found, upon inquiry, that our rulers, profiting by the experience of the defenseless condition in which the country was found at the period alluded to, have diligently and successfully applied themselves to supply the former deficiencies. I hope it will be found that the forts designed for the protection of the principal towns upon the Atlantic, and upon which so many millions of the public treasure have been expended, have been supplied with some considerable portion of the requisite armament; and that a large proportion of our ships-of-war may be got ready for service in a reasonable time; but that this arm of the national defense will be found to fall far below the just expectations of the public, the members of this House are now well advised. I trust I am not guilty of any indiscretion in speaking of the dilapidated condition of the public defenses just now. All that I know upon this subject, and all that I now state respecting it, all the world may know, and all that are concerned to know their condition doubtless do know quite as much as myself. If we are to have a war, Mr. Speaker—if we must have a war to maintain the honor of the country and the integrity of our territory, for one, however much I deprecate such an event at this time, I do not fear the issue of it. Whatever may be the defenseless condition of our interior frontier; however unprotected the most important points upon our Atlantic coast may be; whatever may be the disordered condition of our finances; however weak and incompetent those public servants may be who are constitutionally assigned to the chief direction of public affairs for the present; and I will add, whatever disasters may and probably would befall our arms by sea and by land during the first years of the war, yet the spirit and the resources still abound in the country to surmount all these adverse circumstances in our condition, and to bring the war to a successful and glorious termination. But this confidence shall not restrain me, nor should it restrain any portion of the country, from holding those to a just accountability who have exposed it to temporary disaster and defeat.

As to the conduct of the President since the recent disturbance upon the northeastern boundary, and the general tenor of the message of yesterday, I am free to say that I find nothing to disapprove in them; but I cannot concur with the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. THOMPSON] in the unqualified approval which he gave to the entire course and conduct of the Administration in the management of this delicate and important subject. While I approve heartily the recent course of the President, I can see just cause of censure in his past conduct. I remember, sir, when the bill for the increase of the Army was under consideration near the close of the last session of Congress—a bill which I opposed as ill digested—and when I urged that the public interest would be promoted by the postponement of the subject until the present session, it was strongly urged on the other side, by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. EVANS], and others from that section of the country, that the passage of the bill at that time was demanded by the most powerful considerations, growing out of the excited state of the population on the northern frontier, and particularly on the ground of the circumstances which constantly threatened the peace of the country on the northeastern boundary. It was earnestly pressed upon the House that the few regular troops stationed upon that frontier were altogether insufficient to suppress the disorderly, and to prevent the occurrence of hostile collisions between the inhabitants of the two countries, which might involve us in a war when we least suspected it; and when we might be wholly unprepared for it. The very crisis which was then predicted as the probable consequence of the continued neglect of the Government to provide an adequate military force upon that boundary, is now actually precipitated upon us by the recent conduct of the Governor of Maine. I have a strong impression that it was urged, in debate upon the Army bill, that one of the new regiments proposed to be raised was intended to be employed on the Maine frontier. I am very certain that such an idea prevailed in the House, and contributed in no small degree to pass the bill; and I call upon the gentleman from Maine [Mr. EVANS] to state in his place if he did not urge the passage of the Army bill at the last session on the ground I have just stated?

Mr. EVANS said he did not remember that he had stated in debate his expectation that a regiment would be added to the small military force then stationed near the disputed boundary, but he did take great interest in the passage of the Army bill upon that ground; and he did so, because he understood from the Secretary of War that it was his intention, if that bill passed, to station a regiment there, in which he (Mr. E.) had been disappointed.

Mr. BELL. I was not mistaken as to the substance of what was stated in the debate on the Army bill; and upon these facts, I submit to this House, and to the public, whether the Administration has any right to claim an exemption from all censure in the past management of this business. The danger is now imminent that we shall be involved in an immediate war with a nation which, of all others, we have the least will and the greatest power to do us mischief when once the die shall be cast, and a war shall be actually kindled up between the two countries; and this danger is the result of the failure of the President to provide an adequate military force upon the exposed frontier. This neglect would be more excusable if the country was, in any respect, prepared for war; but when its finances and every branch of the public service are in the utmost disorder, such negligence becomes of serious consequence to the country, and justly merits public censure. Even now, sir, if the executive branch of the Government commanded that respect and obedience which are constitutionally due to its authority and influence, a war need not, and would not be the consequence of the recent disturbance on the Maine boundary; but what ground of confidence can we have that the authority of the President will be duly exercised, when we reflect upon the course of the Administration in similar exigencies for several years past? The same imbecility, the same absence of the requisite and ministrative skill and energy which have allowed the public defenses to lie neglected, the public finances to be thrown into disorder, and every branch of the public service to become paralyzed by abuse, are well calculated to cut off all hope of a due and vigorous exercise of authority in the present emergency. This reflection brings me to the consideration of a point I most desired to bring to the notice of the House when I rose; that is, the real source of these evils.

I had intended, Mr. Speaker, to move the committee to strike from the bill the salary of the chargé d'affaires at Naples, Mr. Throop, and to make that motion the occasion of expressing some general views connected with the abuse of the appointing power. I mean no disrespect or disparagement to the Court of Naples by making an example of our representative at that Court. I had selected him, not as the most prominent object of attack which the list of our public officers affords, but as the most proper, under all the circumstances, for my purpose. If the practice prevailed here which is often exercised, with good effect, in the House of Commons of Great Britain, after the proceedings of yesterday, [the message on the recent disturbances on the Maine boundary was read and discussed on that day,] the first motion made in the House this morning would have been for an address to the President upon the expediency of forming a more efficient Administration. Certainly, in the present crisis, no motion is called for by so many important considerations; but it seems that a practice of advising the President in the choice of his ministers has never been thought safe or expedient. The Executive is supposed to have an existence so separate and independent of this House, that any attempt to control him in the exercise of his constitutional powers is thought to be of dangerous example. But is not this a defect in our practice, or in our system of Government? Ought there not to be a more direct sympathy and co-operation between the two departments of the Government, in order to effect the very objects of the institution of both? They are necessary constituents of the same Government—parts of the same unit. There must be harmony—a general correspondence of views in the policy and designs of both, or they can never act with the best effect for the country. The President must, for many and most important purposes, be regarded as the head of the Government; he is in for four years; we cannot remove him, however defective in skill and ability, except by impeachment—a mode of redress against a President which is now never thought of, and might as well be stricken from the Constitution.

It would then seem to be necessary that we should resort to some other remedy within our reach—some substitute for the power of removal—some mode, at least, of making known to the President the sentiments of the country and the House itself, in a form that could not be altogether disregarded. Some such mode of redress is imperiously demanded by the circumstances of the country at this moment. Must we continue patiently and quietly to behold the most important interests of the country sacrificed, the whole power of the Government falling into contempt and disuse, at the very moment when its controlling authority and influence are most required by the state of our affairs? I ask the House to consider how long this state of things shall be allowed to continue before it may become expedient to deny appropriations for the payment of salaries to ministers notoriously and grossly deficient in the qualifications essential to the performance of the duties of their stations. I have made no motion, nor had I intended to make a motion of that nature, with a view to press it to a decision, because I did not suppose that public sentiment or the sentiment of this House was ripe for such a proceeding. I selected an inferior officer as the subject of a motion upon which I might express these sentiments; and I did not wish to discriminate between the higher functionaries, though it is well known that many in that rank might have been selected as fit subjects of such a motion without any injustice to their characters.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is evidently, from some cause, an increasing debility in the Executive, which embarrasses and paralyzes him in the exercise of his constitutional duties, if he possessed the disposition to perform them with proper energy. There may be, there is such a thing, both in theory and in fact, as a Government possessing all the power and influence requisite to perpetuate itself, and all the abuses engendered by it, for a series of years, and yet incapable of performing any one of the great and beneficent ends of its establishment; a Government strong only in upholding itself, and weak and contemptible when its authority is invoked to control those ebullitions of passion and irregular movements which often infect whole communities, and which, if not restrained, lead to disorganization or to revolution. Such a Government will in the end cease to command the respect of any portion of the people, and consequently will be quietly dissolved, or give place to despotic rule. I do not mean to state that the powers of the Federal Government ought to be enlarged, or that any amendment of the Constitution is required to make the Government more efficient. The clear powers given by the Constitution are wise and ample, they only require to be employed and executed with due energy when the occasion for their exercise arises. But, sir, will any man undertake to maintain that the civil authority and influence of the Federal Government is felt or duly respected upon any of your exposed and excited frontiers? You have in fact no Government, no law, in those very emergencies where Government and law are most required!

What has been the history of the country in this respect for several years past? What is its actual condition now? A general spirit of disorder and insubordination has notoriously prevailed for years, in consequence, in part, no doubt, of the general diffusion of the feeling which dictated the sentiment embraced in the celebrated saying, "I take the responsibility." The moral power of Government and of law has ceased to have the slightest effect; and the wishes or recommendations of the Chief Magistrate of the country have no weight where they do not happen to accord with the passions and interests of those to whom they are addressed. Witness the actual preparation for war between the State of Ohio and the Territory of Michigan, a few years ago. There was an instance in which the President had only to speak his fiat, and all would have been peace and order instead of those hostile movements on both sides which were, under the circumstances, a great disparagement to our system. I repeat, that the President had only to command his own ministerial functionaries, and the country would have been spared the mortification of such occurrences; for the Executive functionaries of Michigan were but the ministers at will of the President, and the entire government of Michigan was then but an emanation of Federal power; yet the President, prompted by those interests and feelings of mere party which are rapidly supplanting every higher motive of action in the public councils, dispatched a special mission, an embassy, to negotiate with those whom he had the authority to command; those whom his own adherents admit and assert he had a right to remove from their stations for a mere difference in political principle!

We had disturbances, also, upon the Mexican frontier, before the revolution in Texas was complete; then came the disorderly movements upon the Canadian border; but in neither case were the laws at all respected, or the authority of the civil magistrate either seen or felt. Not only the public faith and honor were openly infringed and violated, but the peace of the country was absolutely endangered by the absence of all restraint on the part of the Government. It is true that, after the excitement on the Canada boundary seemed to threaten an immediate rupture between the United States and Great Britain, and after the Governors of the adjoining States had been prevailed upon to issue their feeble proclamations in vain, the President did come forth with a proclamation, which conveyed the first authentic intelligence to our citizens that the Administration at Washington did not intend to connive at their irregularities in giving aid to the insurgents in Canada contrary to the obligations of existing treaties and the law of nations. From the same time-serving and electioneering timidity, on the part of the Executive branch of the Government, we are every day exposed to the danger of being involved in war with the numerous and powerful tribes of Indians on our western frontier. To show in what little respect and consideration the authority of the Government is held on the frontier, I ask the attention of the House to an extract, which I propose to read, from a recent message of the Governor of Wisconsin to the Territorial Legislature:

"I would suggest the propriety of memorializing the War Department, requesting that a thousand stand of arms, one half rifles and the other muskets, with fixed ammunition prepared for them, should be forwarded to Fort Crawford as early in the season as the navigation of the Mississippi will permit; the arms to be subject to my orders in case of emergency.

"These precautionary measures I deem of the first importance to assure the removal of Winnebago Indians early in the spring, to prevent intrusions on the property of the frontier settlers, and to preserve peace with the Indians on our borders; and unless the Government takes the proper steps to effect their removal early in the spring, I will assume the responsibility of raising a mounted volunteer corps of riflemen (and head them in person) sufficient to effect their removal from this Territory," &c.

No doubt the object the Governor has in view, in taking this course, is praiseworthy; his motive is doubtless good, and the expediency of removing the Winnebagoes may be unquestionable; but I refer to the message to show with how little ceremony the authority and influence of the Federal Government is set aside by its subordinate functionaries. Here, sir, it is manifest that the country is in danger of having a war kindled upon its northwestern border, in which, besides the sacrifice of lives, the blood and carnage necessarily incident to a contest with the fierce tribes of that region, millions of the public treasure must be expended, and all in consequence of the general prevalence of the opinion that public officers as well as private citizens are justifiable in assuming "the responsibility" with or without proper authority, whenever great interests and great risk to the actors are involved in the issue. We shall see how this business will terminate, whether the President of the United States or the Governor of Wisconsin will bear sway.

But there is another evil consequence growing out of the conduct and policy of the Government in this respect which I wish to bring to the notice of the House. I speak of an Administration of the Government which acts with so much promptitude and energy in everything that relates to the acquisition and distribution of patronage, or when these high and commanding qualities are called for in the removal of a public officer whose political principles are suspected, but is yet so feeble and powerless in whatever concerns the public peace and prosperity. When any disturbance arises upon the frontier, or any exertion of superior skill and talent is required in the emigration of an Indian tribe, the civil magistrate and superintendent—the appropriate lieutenants of a Government of law—the law itself, and all the moral influences of established Government, are no longer felt or relied upon. The public, in all such cases, have their fears and apprehensions quieted by seeing it announced that some military chief of discretion and weight of character is charged with the duty of pacification and conciliation. Our commanding generals, in some cases regimental officers, become the only efficient agents in the execution of the laws. The civil magistrates, the civil administration, are actually in contempt in every quarter where they should be most felt and respected; and the bayonet threatens everywhere to become the arbiter, when the personal influence and harangues of commanding colonels and generals shall fail to enforce obedience and acquiescence. The truth is, sir, that, without perceiving it, we are rapidly approximating a crisis, which will have a strong tendency to settle forever the problem of free Government. Can a popular representative system be maintained? Is a due degree of efficiency and energy in such a Government compatible with the constant dependence of the Administration upon popular influence and support?

How it has happened that so much debility should be manifest in the exercise of constitutional authority and influence by the Federal Government at this period, and how this state of things should succeed, or rather accompany, the highest, most arbitrary, and unquestionable exercise of power by the Executive, in matters connected with the public treasure and public patronage, ever successfully dared by a President of the United States, should excite inquiry in the mind of every patriot in the land. Such a combination of debility and energy is not the result of accidental circumstances; nor is it a result without a cause. There is, there must be, some existing and operative cause at the foundation of all this—one which is either new in the operation of our system, or which is only now fully developed.

There is, Mr. Speaker, a cause existing, and flagrant in its operation, fully adequate, in my judgment, to produce such a result—fully adequate to generate the whole amount of evil which now afflicts the country. The President, the head of the executive branch of the Government, is elected by a compact between men who are associated upon principles which have no manner of reference to any particular political system—no one set of political principles more than another; and hence they are men who are more apt to be totally indifferent to the public welfare, or the stability of our form of Government, than other portions of the community. The political agitators and leaders throughout the States combine to make a President upon the principle of mutual favor, patronage and support. They give their influence, and entrap the people into his support, by ascribing just such principles and intentions to him, from time to time, as suit the exigencies of the case, and he, on his part, is to provide for all his active followers.

To consider the public offices, and all the favors of the Government, as public spoil, to be thus distributed, was first a stipulation in the compact between the parties, and thence, of necessity, it became an article in their political creed; proscription is only the necessary counterpart of this stipulation, and is not practiced, in general, from any bad feeling towards the proscribed. The obligation on the part of the President to provide for his active supporters is binding equally upon his honor as upon his interests and prospects. If he should fail to perform his part of the contract in this respect, he would, for that cause, be instantly deserted: the obligation, like the oath of allegiance, is mutual—each party is bound to give protection and support to the other. When all the most important official stations are filled upon such principles—when every branch of the civil administration of the Government is committed to the management of men thus selected, what ground of hope does or can exist, of a better state of things than now unhappily prevails? Is it not clear that no one of these clamorous or efficient partisans will or can ever forget that the President is the work of his own creation? Or can the President himself safely forget that he owes his station to the services of the men, good or bad, who now fill the public offices? And is it not equally clear that a President elected upon such principles can never safely venture to turn one of his followers out of office, except for some breach of trust or other misdemeanor too gross to be disguised or concealed from the public? Mere negligence, however gross, or imbecility in office, can never be a cause of removal. If a removal for any other cause than I have supposed is ever made by such a President, it will be of some poor fellow who has lost his power to be serviceable to the party, and who will then be told that he is to go out upon the principle of rotation in office, in order to let in some follower who has not received his promised reward. Under the administration of a President elected upon the principles I have stated, the power of appointment and removal can only be exercised to advance party objects and individual aggrandizement, such is the inevitable result of the nature and object of the compact upon which he was elevated to power.

I had selected the case of the charge d'affaires at the Court of Naples, as a striking illustration of these views. Mr. Throop, a devoted partisan of the President, filled the station of naval officer of the port of New York from 1829 to March, 1838, a place of considerable profit and high responsibility. It appears from the information which has been laid on our tables, and by the conclusive argument of my friend from Ohio, [Mr. Bond,] that the defalcation of the late collector of New York could not have occurred but by his connivance, or a total neglect of the duties of his office. Next to the collector himself, this man, then, stands before the public as the most culpable of all the subordinate officers of the Government; yet, it seems, he had interest enough at court to escape the storm which he must have known would soon break over his head in America, by getting a high official station abroad. He was either privy to the defalcation of the late collector, or he must be regarded as one of the most lucky men of the age, to get so well-timed a transfer from New York to Naples. There, it appears, he is deemed worthy to remain, after all the late disclosures of his misconduct. He is an existing and striking example of the way in which the spoils system operates. A faithless, or, at all events, a most worthless and negligent public servant, originally appointed to a responsible and profitable station, without any particular merit or qualification, after being the culpable cause of the loss of more than a million dollars to the public Treasury, is promoted to a still more desirable station, and is thought to be a fit and worthy representative of the character and principles of this Government at a foreign Court. I do not recognize the principle of rotation even in this promotion. It is singular that two such important offices in succession should be conferred upon a man of no higher merit, even in a party point of view; but what his services may have been in that respect, we do not know. It would be an instructive labor if any one were to inquire, and inform the public of the whole number of officers who are retained in office for the same reasons that Mr. Throop is now enjoying one—to the utter neglect and contempt of the character and interest of the country.

The evil of this system of appointment and removal has been increasing since the year 1829. It has been signally exemplified in each great branch of the public service in the mean time; each has successively, or rather contemporaneously, fallen into disorder and dilapidation; yet the public (such has been the extraordinary fermentation of party feeling and prejudice) do not appear to be conscious of the cause of the public mischief. The abuses and corruptions of the Post Office Department first attracted the public notice, but not until after they became so enormous that concealment from the most simple and ignorant was no longer possible, but the authors of the mischief had the address to make the public believe that all the abuses which had recently come to light in that Department were the result of bad laws and a defective organization! Some new laws were passed, and a man of great industry and considerable business qualifications succeeded to the head of that Department, but a man, at the same time, notorious as a bitter and virulent partisan; and it yet remains to be seen whether the public will have any reason to rejoice in the change. I pass over the gross abuses in the Indian service and in the management of the public lands as too notorious and flagrant to require further reference to them in order to impress them upon the minds of those who are not blinded by their interests or party attachments. For a like reason I pass over the successive blunders, impostures, and frauds, exhibited in the management of the Treasury Department—the almost irretrievable and sunken condition of the finances, and the miserable devices which have been adopted to screen the true condition of the Treasury from public observation. These things are now becoming so familiar that they cease to be the subject of more than ordinary notice and concern, much less of surprise. It must not be forgotten, however, that in all these various branches of the public service, not excepting the Treasury itself, whatever abuses have been disclosed, the invariable pretext set up by those who have the management of them is, bad laws and a defective organization!

But the prostrate and imbecile condition of the Army was no longer and better concealed. The causes which led to its prostration and utter inefficiency are still but little known in the country, nor have I time now to attempt to notice them in detail. The public has been informed of the actual state of this branch of the service at an expense of $20,000,000! The Florida war revealed not only to ourselves, but to the whole world, the decayed and wretched condition of the military establishment of the United States. But what ought to excite the surprise and indignation of the whole country, the authors of the mischief in this, as in other cases, had the hardihood last year to come forward and charge the whole default to bad laws and a defective organization! We have heard only a few days ago from the supporters of the Administration, whose opinions and statements will not be questioned, that the Navy is in no better condition than the other departments of the public service, and that, after the annual expenditure of millions, it is not at all improved.

Now, sir, after this enumeration, I ask honorable gentlemen to inform me what remains of the Government, or of the public service, which can be said to be in a prosperous condition, or which is well administered? Every important department of the public service has been admitted by the supporters of the Administration to be, or to have been, deranged and to abound in abuses, yet the sole cause assigned for these universal disorders, all these abuses, is bad laws and a defective organization! It would seem to me, sir, that, by this time, all mankind ought to see that the defect is neither in the laws nor in the particular organization which does or has prevailed in these various departments of the public service, but in the administrators. But while the people continue to be deluded with the story that the public service and the public interest of every description are a continual prey to bad laws and a bad organization of the several Departments, is it not to be feared that they will soon be led to inquire whether there must not be something radically wrong and defective in the form and organization of that system of Government which permits so many bad laws, and adopts so many defective plans for conducting the public business? Rely upon it, sir, this is the point to which we are hastening. If the party in power shall continue to act upon the system of fraud and plunder—if the spoils of office shall continue to be the watchword of their partisans everywhere, as heretofore, the public service must continue to suffer—the public interest must continue to be sacrificed, and, in a few years, the question will be directly presented, whether our system of Government must not undergo a radical change. Instead of new laws and a new organization for the regulation of the public business in the various departments of the public service, the cry will be for a new and reformed system of Government—a new Constitution, or none at all, and let the people be, as they should be at all times, and under all circumstances, sovereign, and the judges and dictators of what should be done in every emergency without the trammels of constitutional limitations and restrictions on their will—the cunning inventions of the aristocracy to secure their separate advantages and privileges! I repeat, sir, that “to this complexion we must come at last,” if the present state of things continues many years longer. There are men desperate and reckless enough to bring the public mind to this issue, before they will consent to abandon power, or resign their present prospects. A mercenary, a feeble, an inefficient and corrupt Administration can and will do more to bring our system of Government into disrepute with the people than all other causes put together. Such a cause of disparagement now exists, and new and strange fancies and apprehensions begin to intrude themselves into men’s minds, but they are not now conscious to what results they may yet lead them.

The power which the Constitution and laws provide to secure a faithful and efficient administration of the various departments of the public service is now rendered powerless, except for evil. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Crary] plainly tells us, and with the approbation of his party, that the power of removal for opinion’s sake ought to be more rigidly and extensively exercised than it is, not for the purpose of securing a more faithful and able performance of official duty—no, not one word on that point—but to secure the ascendancy of particular and favorite political principles against certain adversary principles, which, he says, are always at work to undermine the better sort. The Democratic principles of government, in the judgment of the friends of Democracy throughout the country, are now, it is said, and always will be, in danger from the machinations of the aristocracy of the country, and the “anti-republican tendencies of associated wealth;” and it is only by the proper exercise of the power of appointment and removal that the equal rights of the people can be maintained. This is the substance of the argument. Every department of the public service, every department of private industry, every resource of comfort and happiness, all had better perish; public and domestic peace and order had better be overthrown, the laws themselves rendered abortive, the public Treasury and the public domain plundered, the national honor and the integrity of the national territory violated, than any defeat to Democratic principles should be risked by the adoption of any other system of administration in regard to the distribution of the public patronage, and the exercise of the appointing power. If, sir, it is true that this perpetual war is waged in this country between adverse political ends and principles—if it be true that there is any class among the citizens of this great Republic which seeks either systematically, as is alleged, or is prepared to avail themselves of any fortunate emergency in the public affairs, to defeat and overthrow any one of the democratic or popular features in the established form of government, there would be some weight in the arguments of these advocates of the present odious system of administration. If there is, in truth, any one class, capitalists or others, who seek any undue or unequal benefits from the operation of our chosen form of government, there would be some weight in the argument of those who maintain and justify the spoils principle, of which proscription, as I have already said, is but the counterpart. We ought to suffer great public and private loss and inconvenience; mere property ought to be as nothing in the balance against high principles, against the great and cardinal principles of equal laws and equal benefits among the members of the same political community; but the preliminary fact ought surely to be established upon clear and satisfactory grounds, before so much public and private suffering is inflicted.

Is there, in truth and in fact, any such war as is alleged now waged between any two classes of our citizens? Is there any such “elemental war” as the partisans of power pretend? Is not the existence of such a contest between antagonist principles assumed as a mask—as the most effective disguise under which the artful managers and caterers for power seek to secure their own personal advancement, and to make spoil of the public property and interests? I conclude by expressing the hope that the people of this country may, before the catastrophe to which we are hastening, awake to the knowledge of the truth, and be enabled to decide for themselves between what is real and what is only feigned.

THE ADMINISTRATION.

SPEECH OF HON. C. H. WILLIAMS,

OF TENNESSEE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 22, 1839,

On the General Appropriation Bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I feel it to be a duty that I owe to my constituents and to the station I occupy, to give to this House, and through this House to the country, my views upon several important political topics of the day. If an attempt on my part to arraign this Administration at the bar of public opinion, for its sins of commission and omission, shall subject me to the charge made by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BRYN] against other members, that of President-making, or should it subject me to the indignant scowl of the gentleman, I have only to say be it so; for, if a custom that has been universally indulged in since the organization of this Government, that of according to each member the privilege (when in Committee of the Whole on appropriation bills) of giving to the country, and especially his constituents, his views generally on the state of public affairs, is to be denounced, I, for one, sir, shall consider that we have fallen upon evil times. Although I consider it my duty to address the House, still I am not like the gentleman from North Carolina, who seemed to consider it due to history and posterity that he should make his effort. I might, by possibility, be so unfortunate in the selection of my materials, and so unhappy in my mode of expressing myself, that, peradventure, my effort might perish on the wayside, and fail in adorning the page of history, and consequently not reach posterity.

I do not promise this House any great degree of order or system in my address, nor will I violate the time-honored custom of the House, by confining myself to the immediate question under consideration. I only promise an honest effort upon my part to pour hot shot into the hull and rigging of this Administration; and if I fail, surrounded as I am with rich and ample materials, it must be for the want of ability on my part to perform the task. I design, also, to pay a passing notice to the speech of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. BYNUM.] I will not attempt to follow him through his winding, desultory argument. You are perfectly aware of the fact, Mr. Chairman, that some speeches are put together in such a manner, that if you attempt to analyze them, in order to find their point, so as to enable you to answer them; you are most woefully deceived. Fearing that I might meet with that difficulty in this instance, I shall only notice a few select expressions of that gentleman.

I concur most heartily with him, "that there is a party in this House attempting to to blacken and pie-ball another great party." If I was called upon for my proof, I should avail myself of the various speeches I have heard delivered by that gentleman since I have had the honor of a seat upon this floor, and especially his revised and enlarged edition of the day before yesterday's date. I also most heartily agree with the gentleman that, so far as mere promises are concerned, the Administration party occupy high ground as Democrats; but when you attempt to apply the test of acts to their claims, you will find a "beggary account of empty boxes." Modern Democracy has been brought down to such a nice point that you may confine it in a nutshell, (if I may be permitted to use a favorite expression of the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. HAYNES.) All its doctrines and all their bearings are embraced in one short paragraph: "He who knows his master's will and does not obey it, shall receive thirty-nine stripes." As I do not wish to deal in round assertion, I will endeavor to prove the truth of what I have said. Look, if you please, at the situation of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. RIVES.] We all know that only a short time since he was hugged to the bosom of this Administration with fond delight, but now how altered the case! Has he changed his political opinions? No, sir; he entertains the same opinions now upon the great questions of credit and currency that he did when he was so fondly petted by the party; and what is more, they were once the opinions of the Administration themselves; but now a "change has come over the spirit of their dream"—they have changed, but he adheres to his former position. He has not wheeled to the right-about at the bidding of the President, and for this he is hunted down and proscribed by the Administration organ and its kindred prints, with a fiend-like malignity of purpose worthy only of the regions of the damned.

I have said that this Administration occupies high ground as Democrats, so far as mere promises are concerned. I will now try and prove the assertion; and as the gentleman from North Carolina seems not to be fond of light reading, I will, in imitation of his example, deal in facts. Who is there, Mr. Chairman, that does not recollect that the year 1828 was particularly distinguished in the political annals of our country as the year of promise? It was then that the party now in power came in sight of the holy land; it was then that they pledged themselves to the American people that if they would permit them to enter this land flowing with milk and honey, they would usher in a glorious millennium; that the cry and watchword of the Administration should be, "Reform! Reform! Reform!" In short, that a pure fountain of water should gush through the Augean stable, purify and cleanse all that was corrupt in the executive branch of the Government. Who is there that does not also recollect that the year 1828 was particularly distinguished by the organization of two celebrated reform committees, the one in this House composed of a majority of Opposition members to the then Administration, with General James Hamilton, of South Carolina, as its chairman, while the committee of the Senate had for its chairman the Senator from Missouri, Thomas H. Benton? The Executive Departments were thrown open to their scrutiny. No special pleas were urged, no specifications were demanded, nor was this attempt at investigation pronounced to be "worse than a Spanish inquisition." No, sir; special pleas, specifications, and denunciations, were reserved for the age of reform and Democracy.

The House committee, after a thorough investigation, made an elaborate report, and gave it as their deliberate opinion that there was corruption and extravagance in the management of the different Departments, and declared that the only reason why the committee were unable to propose a remedy for the correction of the abuse was, that it could alone be remedied by a hearty concurrence on the part of the Executive and the heads of Departments, clearly permitting the inference to be drawn that the President and Secretaries of the Departments were opposed to an economical administration of the Government. I have taken the trouble to make out an account current for the years 1828 and 1837, nine years after the reformers had had full and peaceable possession. The account I have made out is taken from the book of receipts and expenditures, annually published and laid upon each member's table; and I find that the whole expense of the different Departments, including every item of expense, amounted, in 1828, to $481,748. I also find that the expense of the same Departments, for the year 1837, amounted to $958,523, leaving a balance due against the reform Administration of $476,775. This, sir, is a reform with a vengeance. The House committee, also, after sifting with great care the State Department, reported to the House and the world the astonishing fact that, comparing the last three years of Mr. Monroe's administration and the first three years of Mr. Adams's administration, $60,000 more had been expended for the State Department under Mr. Adams than there had been under Mr. Monroe. This was enough. The trump of alarm was sounded, and the cry of "corruption" and "extravagance" rang through the land, in all its modes and variations. I have also made out an account current as to that particular Department for the years 1827 and 1837. During the year 1827, the entire expense of that Department was $287,463; for the year 1837, it was $631,997, which exhibits a balance against the reformers of $344,534. I wish it to be particularly remembered that the usual defense relied upon by the party, to wit, that the extravagance is chargeable to the votes of the Opposition, will not apply to the examples that I have chosen in order to expose and contrast the promises with the acts of this Administration; not one dollar was appropriated by Congress but what was asked for and demanded by the officers of the different Departments.

Mr. Chairman, I do not wish the committee should misunderstand me. I have not stated, nor will I do so, that there was extravagance and corruption in the management of the Departments for the year 1837. I have not the materials before me to enable me to arrive at any such conclusions; nor am I sufficiently acquainted with the routine of business to decide that question. I am inclined to the opinion, though, that, with proper management, the business of the Departments could be as well done as it is with less expense. But I shall take warning by the rock on which the reform committees of 1828 split, and not make charges that I do not know to be true. It is evident, from the facts now adduced, either that those reform committees of 1828 made the charge of extravagance and corruption on very slight evidence of their existence, or that they willfully slandered those in power; or that, since they have come into power, they have forgotten their pledges of retrenchment, and acted more corruptly and extravagantly than those whom they denounced. One of the three things is inevitable. I have been particular in selecting such examples, that there should be no dispute about where and on whom the responsibility attached, for I had no wish to go into a general discussion upon the question of the expenses of the Government; my only object was to show that profession was one thing and performance another, and I think I have done that satisfactorily and unanswerably.

Mr. Chairman, the principal object I had in view in addressing the committee, was to prove that there is more danger to be apprehended to the liberties of my country from Executive power and influence in this House, than from "the anti-republican tendencies of associated wealth." If you will only take a calm and dispassionate view of all the circumstances that have given birth to the thrice-recommended and thrice-rejected sub-Treasury bill, you will be bound to view it as an illegitimate banding of a party, who, after having run roughshod over the best paper currency the world ever saw, are now seeking an "inglorious" retreat, by denying that they have the power constitutionally to do that which they have been doing in the open face of day, and boasting of their "better-currency" deeds for the last seven years. For my own part, sir, whenever I permit myself to take that view of the subject, I feel armed and fortified in the position I have assumed, that there is more danger from the Executive branch of this Government than there is to be apprehended from the anti-republican tendencies of associated wealth.

What are the particular circumstances that have led to the introduction of this ill-shaped Executive measure? Ten years ago it was the will of the American people to elevate to the presidential chair General Andrew Jackson, a distinguished military officer. When he entered upon the duties of his station, his country was in a prosperous and happy condition. She was blessed with a circulating medium that passed at par with gold and silver in every part and portion of this extensive Republic; nay, in China itself. We were also blessed with a cheap foreign and domestic exchange. Add, if you please, the fact that the people had just ejected an Administration for its alleged extravagances. Although the annual expenses of the Government, ordinary and extraordinary, only amounted to the average sum of $12,500,000, still the charge went forth, and was believed; and, unfortunately for my country, it was also believed that there was an attempt on the part of the President to wield the patronage of his office for other purposes than a pure administration of the Government. The indignation of the country was aroused; the people were anxious to lessen the patronage of the President by the passage of restrictive laws, and a return to the good old days of economy. So apparent was this sentiment, that the President elect, in his inaugural address, felt bound to indulge in the following emphatic language:

"The recent demonstration of public sentiment inscribed on the list of Executive duties, in characters too legible to be overlooked, the task of reform, which will require particularly the correction of those abuses that have brought the patronage of the Federal Government into conflict with the freedom of elections, and the counteraction of those causes which have disturbed the rightful course of appointment, and have placed or continued power in unfaitful or incompetent hands."

During my proposed remarks, I shall be enabled to prove as plain as the noonday's sun, that every principle embraced in the extract I have read was totally disregarded by the party, and the acknowledged wish of the people trampled under foot. President Jackson, in his first message, calls the attention of Congress and the country to the condition of the currency, and declares that it was admitted by all that the United States Bank had failed in giving to the country a sound and a uniform currency. I shall not attribute to this distinguished individual improper or unworthy motives in the presentation of this question to the people. It is enough for my purpose simply to state facts. It is wholly immaterial, in order to arrive at truth in the investigation of this subject, whether you attribute to him improper motives, or the most high and lofty patriotism, for men who are in the possession of both honesty and patriotism often err; and when the individual's brow is encircled with the halo of glory, it gives currency and importance to the error; nay, sir, it is a passport to errors of every kind and degree. In a case of that kind we judge the man, and not the measure. You know, sir, full well, that General Jackson's popularity, power and influence were such, only a few short years ago, that he could wheel this House to the right or left with the same ease that I can turn that door upon its hinge. It is not my wish to indulge in improper or unbecoming language, and especially towards that distinguished individual; for, however widely I may have differed from him, and however conscious I may be that the measures of his administration were unfortunate for his country, still his name is associated with his country's glory; and God forbid that I should ever attempt to rob him of any portion of his well-earned reputation. Often has he been styled the Old Roman, upon this floor and elsewhere. I, before my God and my country, believed that if his political advisers and leading friends had possessed any portion of his Roman firmness, the condition of my country would have been far different from what it is. It is to the base truckling, the time-serving sycophancy of his friends, that I ascribe his bold and onward course in error; no matter what he did, no matter what he said, it was pronounced the best act of his life, and shouts of applause went forth from this hall, which were blindly echoed from one end of the country to the other by the party presses of the day. Yes, sir, the representatives of freemen, according to their own showing, would rally around him, and pat him upon the back, and say, "Go it, my old hero, right or wrong." If the representatives of the American people had acted as became the representatives of freemen, and, instead of shouting hosannas to everything he did, had said to him, "Sir, we respect and honor you, but we differ with you as to this or that measure, and we cannot go with you," General Jackson would not have been deceived. The great misfortune of his administration, in my opinion, was this: he mistook the selfish and interested support that was given to his measures as the result of honest conviction on the part of his friends as to the correctness of those measures, when, in fact, their support sprang from the dread of his overtopping popularity. Then, sir, how easy was it for him to be deceived. Honest himself, thought others to be equally so. Fatal, fatal, error! It has overspread his country with calamity; and but for the fact that an impartial historian will expose to merited scorn the time-serving sycophants with which he was surrounded, the name of Andrew Jackson would have been handed down to posterity in a very unfavorable light. How pleasing must be the reflection to each lover of his country, that there are materials enough left to secure to General Andrew Jackson the proud and elevated station upon the page of history that his name is so justly entitled to occupy, while the names of his deceivers and flatterers will be consigned to that infamy which they so richly deserve.

Mr. Chairman, it is time I should return to the thread of my story. General Andrew Jackson, in an evil hour, determined to give the country a better currency. If, in the course of my remarks I shall be able to prove, from unquestionable documents, that the promise to better the currency, the promise to destroy monopolies, the promise to retrench expenditures of the Government, the promise to curtail presidential patronage, all signally failed, or were totally disregarded; and that in the midst of the consternation and alarm which attended the blow-up of these fond and favorite schemes, the occupant of the White House was revolutionized in twelve days, called Congress together, and recommended the sub-Treasury as the last and only anchor upon which to rest a hope that the sinking fortunes of the Administration might be rescued, will I not have proven that this sub-Treasury scheme is the result of one of those political revulsions that, in the history of human affairs, occasionally overtake a party in their mad and daring career, and that it is not the cool, mature, and well-digested plan of statesmen? May I not, then, turn round and appeal to my countrymen, and ask them, with some point and meaning, whether they are willing to receive at the hands of the miserable stock-jobbers in politics this sub-Treasury scheme upon trust? I will now produce my proof, and, in confirmation of what I have said, I will read various passages from President Jackson's different messages, beginning with his first and ending with his farewell address:

"The charter of the Bank of the United States expires in 1836, and its stockholders will most probably apply for a renewal of their privileges. In order to avoid the evils resulting from precipitancy in a measure involving such important principles and such deep pecuniary interests, I feel that I cannot, in justice to the parties interested, too soon present it to the deliberate consideration of the Legislature and the people. Both the constitutionality and the expediency of the law creating this bank are well questioned by a large portion of our fellow-citizens, and it must be admitted by all that it has failed in the great end of establishing a uniform and sound currency."

Does not this passage most clearly prove that the declaration of war against the United States Bank was made for the sole purpose of bettering the condition of the currency?

Again, the President, in his second message, says:

"The importance of the principles involved in the inquiry, whether it will be proper to recharter the Bank of the United States, requires that I should again call the attention of Congress to the subject. Nothing has occurred to lessen in any degree the dangers which many of our citizens apprehend from that institution as at present organized. In the spirit of improvement and compromise which distinguishes our country and its institutions, it becomes us to inquire whether it be not possible to secure the advantages afforded by the present bank through the agency of a Bank of the United States, so modified in its principles and structure as to obviate constitutional and other objections. It is thought practicable to organize such a bank, with the necessary officers, as a branch of the Treasury Department, based on the public and individual deposits, without power to make loans or purchase property."

Here is an acknowledgment of the importance of a United States Bank, and a governmental one recommended, by the very individual who reorganized and disciplined the modern Democrats of the day. Where slept their Democracy then? It was surrendered at discretion. Let me read to the House a portion of Mr. McDuffie's celebrated report, that "expunged," even from the mind of the President himself, for a time at least, if not forever, his Treasury bantling. So convincing, so overwhelming was this report, that not even one partisan newspaper editor was found unblushing enough to defend the President's plan of a bank.

"The mind almost instinctively shrinks from the contemplation of an idea so ominous to the purity of the Government and the liberties of the people. No Government of which the committee have any knowledge, except, perhaps, the despotism of Russia, was ever invested with a patronage at once so prodigious in its influence and so dangerous in its character. In the most desperate financial extremities, no other European Government has ever ventured upon an experiment so perilous. If the whole patronage of the English monarchy were concentrated in the hands of the American Executive, it may be well doubted whether the public liberty would be so much endangered by it as it would be by this vast pecuniary machine, which would place in the hands of every Administration $50,000,000 as a fund to reward political partisans. Are there not those who sincerely and honestly believe that public offices are legitimate objects of political warfare, and the rightful reward of the victorious party, as disinterested and as patriotic as the great body of every political party is admitted to be? The fact is no less true than it is lamentable, that the most devoted and active partisans are very often mere soldiers of fortune, who watch the political signs and enlist at the eleventh hour under the banners of the party most likely to be successful."

Comment on such an extract as this is useless, and I will pass on to the President's third message:

"Entertaining the opinions heretofore expressed in relation to the United States Bank as at present organized, I felt it my duty, in my former messages, frankly to disclose them, in order that the attention of the Legislature and the people should be seasonably directed to that important subject, and that it might be considered and finally disposed of in a manner best calculated to promote the ends of the Constitution, and subserve the public interests. Having thus conscientiously discharged a constitutional duty, I deem it proper on this occasion, without a more particular reference to the views of the subject then expressed, to leave it for the present to the investigation of an enlightened people and their representatives."

Well, Mr. Chairman, let us see what the enlightened people's representatives, to whom the matter was referred, did upon the subject. During the same session of Congress at which this message was communicated, the enlightened people's representatives rechartered the Bank of the United States. The President, although he had left it with the representatives, vetoed the bill. The same enlightened people's representatives, at the same session, passed the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Government deposits may, in the opinion of this House, be safely continued in the Bank of the United States;"

forty-six members voting against, and one hundred and nine voting for the resolution. Still, on the 18th day of September following, General Jackson "takes the responsibility," and removes the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, and places them in State banks! The same Congress, assembled in December afterwards, ratified and approved of the acts of the President! Had I not, then, some authority for the assertion that General Jackson could wheel this House to the right or left with the same ease that you could turn that door upon its hinges?

The war of extermination was now at its highest pitch. The political existence of the Administration seemed to be shivering in the wind; all was doubt and uncertainty. The people at last sustained the Administration, relying upon the promises of the party that they would give them a better currency, and manage the fiscal operations of the Government better through the agency of the State banks than had been done by the United States Bank. In the sixth annual message we find the following triumphant announcement:

"Happily, it is already illustrated that the agency of such an institution is not necessary to the fiscal operations of the Government. The State banks are found fully adequate to the performance of all the services which were required of the Bank of the United States, quite as promptly and with the same cheapness. They have maintained themselves, and discharged all these duties, while the Bank of the United States was still powerful, and in the field as an open enemy."

Then, sir, are you surprised that the people supported the State bank system under such a shower of promises, and the announcement of such happy success? It is true, it all turned out to be a mistake. Still it was, for a time, believed; General Jackson, in his seventh annual message, for the first time denounces monopolies as a system at war with the genius of all our institutions. There is connected with this part of his message a remarkable fact, which I wish to state, and permit every man to draw his own conclusions. It was announced in Niles's Register, November 7, that the State of Pennsylvania would charter the United States Bank. The message, in which banks and monopolies are denounced, is dated the 3d day of December following. To say the least of it, is it not strange that the idea of monopolies being dangerous to liberty did not occur to the mind of the President until that late period? and that, too, not until there were premonitory symptoms that the monster with whom he had been waging a seven years' war was about to live in a new shape? Where slept the zealous and watchful guardians of liberty, when other State banks were springing up around them like mushrooms, the growth of a night, until their numbers had increased from little over three hundred to over seven hundred? While this gallant band of Democrats, Don Quixote like, was charging home upon the monster with only a capital of thirty-five millions, little monsters to the number of four hundred, with a capital of two hundred and fifty or three hundred millions, made their appearance, which produced a bloated and unhealthy prosperity, (as pointed out by the Opposition before it happened.) Still it was seized upon and proudly pointed to as evidence of their wise administration. But I will proceed with my extracts. General Jackson, in his farewell address, again warns the country against monopolies, and seems to lay the flattering unction to his soul that his humble efforts had done much towards putting them down, while, in fact, their number had more than doubled. He there uses the following remarkable language:

"My humble efforts have not been spared during my administration of the Government to restore the constitutional currency of gold and silver, and something, I trust, has been done towards the accomplishment of this most desirable object."

The future historian will be at a loss for the evidence on which he founded this assertion. How it is possible he could have conceived such an idea is unaccountably strange. The fact is, the gold and silver that had been imported had found its way to the vaults of the different State banks, and, instead of gold and silver, we had its representative, in the shape of State bank bills. Then, it is evident, the result of his efforts was to substitute State banks and a local currency for a United States Bank and a general currency, with this difference, that there was in circulation double the amount of paper money when he wrote his farewell address than there was when he entered upon the duties of his administration. In addition to that, it must be apparent to all who understand the component parts of our Government, that the only way gold and silver can become the circulating medium is, by amending the Constitution of the United States, and taking away the power from the States to charter banks. There never having been any such attempt, I view all other attempts as mere humbuggery, designed to gull the country.

25TH CONG.—3D SESS.

The Administration—Mr. Williams.

Ho. of Reps.

Mr. Chairman, let us now, for a few moments, examine the opinions of Mr. Taney, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. Polk,] and see if they thought banks were monopolies, calculated to destroy the liberties of the country. The following is an extract from Mr. Taney's report of 1834-35, indorsed by Mr. Polk, chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means:

"It will be seen from this statement that it is no part of the proposed plan to dispense with the State banks. It obviously is not in the power of Congress (if it desired to do so) to take any measure for that purpose without an amendment of the Constitution, and the States would not, and ought not to surrender the power of chartering banking companies. The State banks are now so numerous and are so intimately connected with our habits and pursuits, that it is impossible to suppose that the system can ever be entirely abandoned, nor is it desirable that it should be. They are often abused, like other human institutions, yet their advantages are many, and, under proper regulations, and with the metallic basis now proposed for their paper issues, they will be found of much public advantage. If there were no State banks, the profitable business of banking and exchange would be monopolized by the great capitalists."

Again, he says:

"They are convenient and useful for the purposes of commerce. This cannot be obtained without the aid of paper circulation founded on credit."

This does not look as if banks were considered dangerous at one stage of the political game that has been played off upon the American people. I will pass on to Mr. Speaker Polk's testimony. The following extracts are taken from his speech delivered in the House of Representatives during the session of 1834-35:

"Through the agency of State banks, the fiscal operations of Government have, during the past year, been eminently successful."

Again, he says:

"It is now no longer a question of doubt whether they [State banks] can, with facility and promptness, transfer the public funds to the most distant parts for disbursement, and perform all other duties which, as fiscal agents, they may be required to perform."

Alas, how changed are the views of this gentleman and the party to which he belongs! It is now all wrong; they have not the constitutional power to take paper money in payment of the public dues, or to make banks the fiscal agents of the Government; thereby virtually declaring that they, through ignorance or corruption, I care not which, have been exercising a power not delegated by the Constitution. Consistency, thou art a jewel! The same party now turn up the whites of their eyes with holy horror at the idea of the dear, dear people's money being used by banks, notwithstanding it is notorious that they encouraged, extended, and enlarged the practice of discounting freely upon the public deposits. In fact, the Secretary of the Treasury ordered the deposit banks to discount to the merchants freely. Now it is a sin of the most damning nature. Yes, sir, banks are pronounced to be the enemy of the laboring classes; attempts are being made to set up one portion of the community against another, by drawing distinctions in society, and by inflated appeals to the vulgar passions and prejudices of our nature.

Sir, never, never do I witness an appeal of the kind, come from what quarter it may, but it secures to the utterer my supreme and ineffable contempt. My mind is instantly carried to other countries and other scenes; there is presented to my view revolutionary France, and I behold a Marat, a Danton, and a Robespierre, weltering in human gore, riding over the prostrate religion of their country and all of its hallowed institutions, yet all the time shouting hosannas to the people, and boasting that the mind of man was on its onward march to freedom, and that the spirit of the age was bursting asunder the bonds of priestcraft, and that they were erecting upon the throne of reason the only true religion; until, finally, they fell victims to their own damning doctrines, and left their country and their country's liberty an easy conquest to the military genius of a Bonaparte. Compare the equalizing and mobocratic doctrines of the day with the doctrines just alluded to, and you will be astonished to find how well they agree. What do we hear now? That banks are behind the spirit of the age; that the mind of man is on its onward march to freedom; and that we are about to burst from around us bank shackles, and, in the language of another,

"walk forth redeemed, regenerated, and disenthralled, through the irresistible genius" of the free banking age. Sir, such sentiments as these produce a dread upon my mind that possibly the day is not far distant when similar blood-stained scenes may be enacted over in this yet free country, and all in the name of the much-abused words of "liberty" and "democracy." I, for one, look upon the banking system (well regulated) as a blessing given to us, founded upon the past experience of mankind; as a system more secure and safe than private banking companies, and as a shield and protector to those who have but little means against those who have an abundance of means. But all must now be abandoned for the sub-Treasury scheme, even at the expense of a political Somerset. What is this much-talked-of sub-Treasury bill? It is simply to substitute individuals in the place of banks as the fiscal agents of the Government. I propose to adopt as my own Mr. Polk's speech, delivered at the session of 1834-35, against this change. It is an excellent argument; I cannot better it; but let it speak for itself:

"That amendment provides that the collectors of the public revenue shall be the agents of the Treasurer to keep and disburse the same, and that they shall receive an annual compensation for their services. The Secretary in his report has not overlooked the description of personal agency here proposed, but has submitted his views to Congress in relation to it. He states that 'this kind of personal agency is, in his opinion, to be avoided in all practicable and safe cases under our present system of selected banks, because it would render the system less convenient, less secure, and more complex, if not more expensive. Unless the States and the United States should both deem it proper, gradually, and in the end entirely, to dispense with the paper system, and which result is not anticipated, the Government cannot escape occasional losses from that quarter, and can never hope to escape all losses from banks as fiscal agents, except by the employment in their place of other and individual agents who will probably be found less responsible, safe, convenient, or economical.' A corporation may be safer than any individual agent, however responsible he may be, because it consists of an association of individuals who have thrown together their aggregate wealth, and who are bound in their corporate character to the extent of their whole capital stock for the deposit. In addition to this, the Secretary of the Treasury may require as heavy collateral security in addition to their capital stock paid in, from such a corporation, as he could from an individual collector or receiver, which makes the Government deposits enter in the hands of a bank than it could be with an individual. It may be well questioned whether the heaviest security which the most wealthy individual could give, could make the public deposits safe at the point of large collection. In the city of New York half the revenue is collected. Several millions of the public money may be in the hands of a receiver at one time, and, if he be corrupt, or shall engage in speculation or trade, and meet with a reverse of fortune, the loss sustained by the Government would be inevitable. With ample security, as it was supposed, the Government lost a million or more in the tea cases a few years ago. The losses in three cases alone, as stated in 1827 and 1828, when it was supposed ample care had been taken to secure the debt, amounted to near two millions. As, then, between the responsibility of a public receiver and bank corporations, as banks do exist, and are likely to exist under State authority, the latter, upon the ground of safety to the public, are to be preferred. Banks, when they are safe, recommend themselves to the service of the Treasury for other reasons. The increased facility they possess over individual collectors or receivers in making transfers of public money to distant points for disbursement without charge to the public. Indeed, this is a service which individuals, to the extent of our revenue, could not perform."

"It may happen, in the fluctuation of the amount of revenue and expenditures, that there will be at some times a surplus in the Treasury, which, though it may be temporary, if it be withdrawn from circulation, and placed in the strong box of a receiver, the amount of circulation will be injuriously disturbed by hoarding the deposit, by which the value of every article of merchandise and property would be affected. So that, inasmuch as we cannot anticipate or estimate what the exact amount of revenue or expenditure may be from year to year, there may occur an excess in the Treasury not immediately called for to be disbursed, which it would be very inconvenient to abstract from trade and circulation. Whilst the deposit is in bank, the bank may use it, keeping it itself ready, at the same time, to pay when demanded, and it is not withdrawn from general circulation, as so much money hoarded, and drawn from the use of the community. If in the hands of a receiver, they may either hoard it by keeping it locked up in a strong box, or use it, at their own risk, in private speculation or trade, or they must, for their own security, and on their own responsibility, place it at last on deposit in the banks for safe-keeping until they are called upon by the Government for it. This temporary use of the money on deposit in banks constitutes the only compensation which the bank receives for the risk of keeping it, and for the services it performs. If receivers be employed, they can perform no other service than to keep the money, and must be paid a compensation from the Treasury."

Mr. Chairman, to my mind this is a very conclusive argument. The gentleman must surely have had, at the time of its delivery, misgivings as to Swartwout's and Price's recent failure; at all events, it was pointed out in his remarks with amazing accuracy. Sir, it must be admitted by all that this new scheme of finance will increase the Executive patronage. Still it is asked for in the name of liberty and Democracy; and the party that oppose it are dubbed "Federalists." The object of the framers of the Constitution had been to create between the various portions of our political system a just balance of power, and for this purpose they had placed the Executive as a balance-wheel to regulate the movements of all the rest of the machine; but it was obvious that, if too much power was thrown upon the balance-wheel, it must accelerate the motion of the other parts in an undue and destructive degree. Yet the modern Democrats are clamorous for this increase of power.

Mr. Chairman, independent of that view of the subject, I wish to ask the committee a plain common-sense question, which goes to the vitals of this sub-Treasury project. In the transaction of men's daily business, do they deposit their money in iron safes, or do they deposit it in banks? If every business man in the country prefers banks as the safest and the best, why should not the same reason apply to the money of the Government? Is the interest of the Government different from that of individuals, when the question of safety is the only one involved in the transaction? There can be no reason for applying a different rule. All the Government and all the individuals want to arrive at, is the safe-keeping of their money. It is the duty of the General Government to accommodate its action to the action of the different State governments. The States use banks as fiscal agents, and receive bank paper in payment of public dues. If the General Government should be so conducted as to move on regardless of the action of the States, the inevitable result must be a jarring in the machine, and, if it continues, it must end in general confusion and anarchy. I had marked in my notes Senate document No. 88, and had noted several portions of it to be read, but I will not detain the committee. It is the celebrated reform and retrenchment report of the Senate of the United States, made in 1828. I will read but one of the extracts. The writer, after having portrayed in vivid colors the dangers to be apprehended from Executive patronage, continues by remarking:

"That the whole of this great power will center in the President. The King of England is the fountain of honor; the President of the United States the source of patronage. He presides over the entire system of jobs and contracts. He has power over the support of the individuals who administer the system; he makes and unmakes them; he chooses from the circle of his friends and supporters, and may dismiss them; and, upon all the principles of human action, will dismiss them as often as they disappoint his expectations. His spirit will animate their actions in all the elections to State and Federal offices. Again: we must then look forward to the time when the public revenue will be doubled, when the civil and military officers will be quadrupled, when its influence over individuals will be multiplied to an indefinite extent, when the nomination of the President can carry any man through the Senate, and his recommendation can carry any measure through the two Houses of Congress; when the principle of public action will be, open and avowed: the President wants my vote, and I want his patronage. I will vote as he wishes, and he will give me the office I wish for. What will this be but the government of one man? And what is the government of one man but a monarchy? Names are nothing."

Mr. Chairman, when I read this report, I am bound to believe that Thomas H. Benton was permitted to lift up the curtain of time, and view with his naked eye the transactions of the present day. How completely is the presidential question swallowing up everything else! In my own State a candidate for Governor has made a tour of the State, addressing the people. He scarcely condescended to notice State policy. He seemed to act from the belief that if he could prove Henry Clay to be the biggest scoundrel on earth, and that a United States Bank was the greatest monster on earth, it would follow as a matter of course that Martin Van Buren was a clever fellow, the sub-Treasury bill a harmless little animal, and of course that he would make a good Governor. These certainly were jumping conclusions. Nevertheless, it seemed to be the opinion of the gentleman that it was the only process necessary to accomplish his gubernatorial purpose. What have become of the pledges made to curtail this patronage by the party? I aver that there has not been even an attempt on their part to fulfill them. The Administration came into power under solemn pledges to do so, and to prevent office-holders from meddling in the freedom of elections, and to place in office only competent men. Yet how often have these pledges been violated? It had been rumored through the House at the last session of Congress, I will not say with what truth, that a certain distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Muhlenberg) had been appointed Minister to Austria chiefly because he was able to speak Dutch. His rival, who held an inferior station under the General Government, became displeased; rumor said he was about to resign his office and retire displeased, if not an opponent of the Administration. What did the country see next? He was speedily appointed collector at the port of Philadelphia, and in quick time this gentleman's name was paraded at the head of a list of office-holders, calling on the people of that State to rally around the President, and support the sub-Treasury bill. Then, sir, have I not spoken truth, when I aver that the pledges and promises of the party have been most shamefully violated? They pledged themselves against all interference with the freedom of elections; yet what has been heard this very day in the other end of the Capitol? There the Administration Senators were openly advocating and defending the right of Federal office-holders to interfere in the State elections! Surely they are the very last men on the face of the earth who should avow such an opinion; for the reverse of that opinion was the very key which opened the door of power for their party. It was their perpetual theme. Yet now they are unblushingly sustaining the direct reverse of all they had been singing in the people's ears for years together! I glory in the thought that, humble as I am, even in the midst of General Jackson's bright and palmy days, I denounced the precedents as wrong and dangerous to the future prosperity of my country.

Public Defaulters—Mr. Underwood.

The party promised the nation reform; where is it? They promised economy, and yet themselves have spent more money, three times over, than the Administration they cried down for its extravagance. They turned out thousands to make room for their own partisans; and what do these new office-holders turn out to be? Let the quarterly, monthly, almost daily return of new defaulters answer. When the Opposition asked for a committee to inquire into some of the gravest of these defalcations, they were met by every effort to evade scrutiny or make it ineffectual. The Secretary of the Treasury was defended upon this floor, (with all the lawyer-like tact and ability that distinguishes an able counsel, while defending a criminal at the bar of his country,) though obviously guilty of direct connivance at fraud, or the most obvious neglect of duty.

I will point out the means which were resorted to in order to render the sub-Treasury bill palatable to the people. They well knew that that scheme of finance never would go down with the country unless under a state of great excitement; hence, the party are anxious to draw off the public mind, and get it occupied with anything but this; they are trying to make an issue about the tariff, about internal improvements, about abolition; but all these questions have nothing to do with the matter. Who is seeking to disturb the tariff? Who has ever proposed any direct action of Congress for the abolition of slavery in the States? Nobody. The most extravagant appeals are made, but all on collateral issues. They are trying to make the people believe that all the old party distinctions are to be revived. I would be glad to have any gentleman point out to me, as existing now, one single thing that went to mark the line of demarcation between Federalists and Democrats in 1793. There is not one left, not one. There are many great systems of policy, which, under one set of circumstances, would be good and wise, and under different circumstances might be just the reverse. The history of the tariff and internal improvements by the General Government may be cited as instances in proof of this idea. Still, sir, demagogues are found traveling over the country, denouncing one man, and praising another, when both have given their support to the same objectionable measures, (I mean Henry Clay and Martin Van Buren,) and both with the change of circumstances that surrounds the tariff and internal improvements, have abandoned those systems. Is it not the duty of every American statesman to declare that the real question now at issue in this country is the question between a sub-Treasury and a Bank of the United States? Is it a worthy course to attempt to deceive and delude men not familiar with these subjects? I would be the last man that would support an individual for the Presidency who would revive doctrines which he has ever repudiated.

I have detained the committee far too long a time, and will bring my remarks to a close, with a word or two upon the question of banks and currency. I am satisfied that the country has yet to pass through another "experiment;" seeming prosperity will again surround us, and then reverses and bankruptcies will ensue. There is something to my mind so licentious in the idea of a free banking law; it is so novel, so absurd, to think of banking, not only upon all the gold and silver, but upon real estate, that I am astonished that the system should find an advocate on earth; still, I greatly fear that it is to become the popular doctrine of the day; if so, the advocates of a United States Bank must again wait the result of this new experiment. It is the duty of the Government to regulate the currency, as much so as it is the duty of the General Government to regulate weights and measures. We have a Government within a Government, requiring the action of separate Legislatures, and it is impossible to have a uniform and sound currency without the action of the General Government. True, Martin Van Buren, in his message at the extra session, labored to prove that England suffered by the late revulsion as much as the United States. It was a hasty remark. In England, they had overtraded, and were embarrassed; the circulating medium passed at par, coextensive with the Government; exchanges, domestic and foreign, were cheap. Then, sir, indebtedness alone was all they complained of. In America we had, added to our indebtedness, a currency deranged, and at a ruinous discount; domestic and foreign exchange extravagantly high. The difference is very striking. My constituents ask at the hands of the Government a policy that will guard against a similar misfortune. Every schoolboy knows that overtrading, and, consequently, revulsions, will take place occasionally in any country, no matter whether the currency is gold and silver or paper; and all the country asks is, that when overtaken with adversity the jarring action of the States and Federal Government shall not add to their misfortunes an unsound and depreciated currency. Give them a currency that is uniform in value, and they will not be found knocking at the door of Congress for relief, nor will your President have it in his power to say to them that they are in the habit of looking to the Government for too much. The Americans are brave, intelligent, and enterprising; and let your Government pursue a steady and fixed policy, and not be changing with each popular breeze that may sweep over the land, and they will be found buffeting the waves of life's tempestuous sea without a murmur.

Mr. Chairman, I have done; and I offer as an apology to the committee for the length of time I have detained them, the fact that I speak but seldom.

PUBLIC DEFAULTERS.

SPEECH OF HON. J. UNDERWOOD,
OF KENTUCKY,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
January 16, 1839.

On the motion for an inquiry into the late defalcations of public officers.

Mr. UNDERWOOD said that he rose to state some facts to the House in relation to the defalcation of General Gratiot, which he considered very important, connected with the subject under consideration. The facts would place the conduct of the Administration, upon one point, beyond all cavil and dispute. The facts would prove that General Gratiot was retained in office for years after he was a known defaulter, and treated as such by the stoppage of his pay. The evidence was conclusive, and fully established a remarkable lenity, if not a criminal connivance, on the part of the Administration.

It is true that General Gratiot claims a right to retain the money to satisfy demands which he has against the Government; and the foundation of this claim is stated in the communication made by General Gratiot, and ordered to be printed with the papers from the Department. But, whether General Gratiot's view be right or wrong, and whether the claim set up by him is or is not allowed by the judicial tribunal which shall ultimately decide the question, can have no effect whatever in judging of the propriety of the conduct of the Administration in retaining him in office. He was considered, treated, and finally dismissed, as a defaulter. It is the principle of the Administration—the principle by which the "party" is governed—that concerns the people at large, much more than the nature of General Gratiot's defense, or the motives by which he has been actuated in using the public money.

As the report from the Secretary of War was in response to a resolution adopted by the House at my instance, I thought I might follow the document to the printer's office, and there examine it before it was printed. I did so. It appears from the document that, on the settlement of General Gratiot's accounts, there was a balance struck against him on the 24th of March, 1831, amounting to $8,958 91. In this settlement the accounting officers did not allow all the sums claimed by General Gratiot as credits. If his principles for settling the account had been adopted, he would, at that time, have been indebted $2,508 52 only. The large balance, to wit, $8,958 91, was reported to the Second Comptroller of the Treasury as being due by General Gratiot on the 31st of August, 1831, for the purpose of having his pay stopped; and again reported on the 11th of August, 1832. In September, 1831, the acting Secretary of War, Mr. McLane, suspended the stoppage of pay. I had not time to peruse all the correspondence, and cannot, therefore, say whether any reason has been assigned, or is to be found among the papers, for the step taken by the Secretary in suspending the stoppage of pay. Nor did I discover any renewal of the order stopping pay until 1836. Nor did I find any reason assigned why the act of the 25th of January, 1823, requiring the stoppage of the pay of defaulting officers of Government was not enforced and applied to General Gratiot, for the time running between the 11th of August, 1832, and the year 1836, when the order stopping his pay was renewed, and continued in force until his dismissal in December last.

In April, 1833, General Gratiot presented a new account, in which he abandoned his claim for a per diem allowance for superintending certain public works, and which he relied on in 1831, and claimed as compensation for his extra services one per cent. on the amount of public money disbursed by him. The claim of one per cent. on his disbursements was rejected by the accounting officers. It thus appears that he was unable to liquidate the balance found against him in 1831 by shifting his position and assuming new ground.

Notwithstanding the difference which had taken place between General Gratiot and the accounting officers of the Treasury Department in regard to the settlement of his accounts, and although he was a reported defaulter in 1831 for more than eight thousand dollars, fifty thousand dollars were placed to his credit in the year 1835, in one of the New York banks. Soon thereafter he returned $15,000 of the money to the Treasury, and the balance, $35,000, in addition to the $8,958 91, he still retains. I have thus given the House a brief statement of the important facts of the case, as I collected them from a hasty examination of the papers. What will the American people think of them? What can they think of those at the head of the executive Government, who detect a defaulter, then stop his pay, then suspend the stoppage, then put into his hands more money to augment the defalcation, then stop his pay again, keep him in office from 1836 to 1838, applying the emoluments of his office to the discharge of the defalcation, and then dismiss him from service! And yet, sir, all these things have been done under the auspices of Andrew Jackson and Martin Van Buren! Were they ignorant of General Gratiot's defalcation? Did the Secretary of War and the accounting officers of the Treasury keep them in ignorance of the facts during a period of more than seven years? If that be the excuse, what becomes of that Executive vigilance so much lauded during Jackson's administration, and which, it was said, carried him into all the Departments, inspecting everything minutely, and correcting all abuses, and which enabled him to certify to the American people that all was well? Sir, it was never anything but a hollow pretension circulated to deceive the people. Can you find cases like this under the administration of Washington, or the five succeeding Presidents? We have been told by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. THOMAS] that defalcations have happened under all Administrations, and may be expected to happen again; that no President can prevent it. And the gentleman from New York [Mr. TAYLOR] has busied himself making calculations to prove that, if you regard the amount lost by defalcations, the administration of Jackson will occupy a very favorable position when compared with that of any other President. These statements may be all true; but, if they are, what do they amount to in this discussion? Nothing at all, except to draw off the minds of the people from the real issue between the great parties in this country. The question is not whether defaulters can be found under all Administrations, and how much money the people have lost by them under the different Administrations. No, sir; such matters are artfully suggested to decoy us—to lead us off from the ground where the game lurks. The real issue—the only point in controversy—involves the principles of the present and late Administrations in reference to defaulters and their treatment. Do those in power set their faces against defalcations with a withering sternness and justice calculated to make the guilty tremble? or do they coax and soothe the wink at the defaulter while they see him pocket the people's money? That is the question.

Sir, let gentlemen go back to the days of Washington, and find an instance where a man has been kept in office seven years after he was found to be a defaulter upon the settlement of his accounts; let a case be found where large sums have been advanced to an ascertained defaulter, and no suit brought to recover the public moneys; and when such a case is brought forward, then I will go into comparisons—then I will contrast the purity of Washington's administration with the semblance of Jackson's, and not till then.

It is remarkable, and it will so be put down in history, that the distinguishing characteristic of Jackson's administration consists in fair promises, in patriotic professions, by which the people were deceived, and which were utterly disregarded after they were made. At the commencement of his official career, the doctrine promulgated as orthodox led us to believe that every one who touched the public money, or used it contrary to law, should be severely punished. You remember the case of Tobias Watkins. He was disgraced, removed from office, indicted, convicted, incarcerated, and his family left to shift for themselves or starve. How many years he lay in jail I have forgotten. His offense was, appropriating to his own use a few thousand dollars of the public money. Not more than three or four thousand, if I remember rightly. Here was an example set. How has the precedent been followed? What officer since the days of Watkins, who has appropriated the public money to his own use, has been indicted for malversation and swindling? Who among the numerous defaulting receivers has been called to the bar of justice, to answer as a criminal? Watkins, who only got two or three thousand, is punished; but those who get fifty or a hundred thousand go scot-free. Ay, sir, they not only go unpunished, but they are recommended by Government agents as proper persons to be continued in office, in consequence of a certain looseness in public morals, which renders it impracticable to find a successor who would not do the same thing; and, therefore, we are told it is better to continue the incumbent, who had already taken as much public moneys as he could conveniently use, than to induct an empty, hungry, ungorged successor, greedy for more "spoils." Sir, the letter and recommendation of Mr. Garretts will long be remembered by the American people.

The conduct of the late and present Administrations in respect to Watkins, and the host of defaulters who have subsequently disgraced the country, reminds me of an occurrence in the far West. I will tell the story, but conceal the names of the parties. Pity shields them from presentation to public scorn. An old man; who was perpetually extolling his own virtues and decrying those of other people, and who was above all "concealment," according to his repeated avowals, was passing, on his way home, after running down the noblest buck in the forest, by a little cornfield of a neighbor, remotely situated from the dwelling-house. His son and his dogs were along, much fatigued by the recent chase. The old man discovered in the field a single hog—a runt—engaged in breaking down the stalks and eating the corn. He immediately swore "by the Eternal" that he never could witness such a sight without feeling the strongest indignation against the guilty brute, and he instantly ordered his son to set the dogs on, declaring at the moment that, if they tore him to pieces, it would be a good thing, inasmuch as by such means the neighborhood might get clear of a bad breed of hogs. The boy obeyed, and the dogs reluctantly engaged in the less noble work; and, being the more furious and savage in consequence of fatigue, mangled the animal until his life was in danger. The youth, not wholly destitute of compassion even towards a hog, at length seized and threw him over the fence, and called off the dogs. The old man said it was useless to go round the fence to stop the holes, as he was certain the lesson would effectually teach the hog never to enter there again. So they went on home without repairing the fence, taking care, however, to pass by the owner of the field, to let him know how kind and neighborly they had been in turning the hog out.

Not long afterwards the old man, his son and the dogs, were going by the same field, and in it, instead of one, they discovered a large gang of hogs, of all sizes, variously engaged. Some were breaking down the stalks and cracking the corn with voracious appetites; some, apparently surfeited, were moping at the heels of those stimulated by hunger; and a goodly number had husks and fodder in their mouths; some frisking, and others deliberately marching to the panels of the fence, there to make themselves pleasant beds with the "spoils." As the old man saw what was going on at a distance, he said to his son, "Now, my boy, our dogs shall have sport." Indeed, the prospect of a general uproar, some fighting, and the comminglement of shouting, yelping, and squalling, in a neighbor's cornfield, was a scene by no means disagreeable to the old man's taste. He therefore mounted the fence with alacrity, intending to post himself and witness the feats of his son and the dogs, while "sitting on a rail." But he no sooner straddled the rider,* than his aspect suddenly changed. He turned to his son, climbing up behind him, and said: "Why these are my hogs!" The boy gazed in silence a moment, and then, with an arch look, replied: "As I live it is true! but I reckon, though, I must dog them a little." The old man took a "sober second thought," and, after a minute's gaze, he said: "Perhaps, my son, it would have been better for the owner of the corn if we had stopped the holes the other day. We broke down a good deal of corn, and did mischief in getting out a single runt with dogs, and we shall not leave a stalk standing if we serve all my gang in that way. I know, too, your mammy will not like it; for I have often heard her say she could not bear to make souse out of hogs' ears that had been torn by dogs. I will, therefore, take the dogs off, and leave you to tole or drive the hogs out as peaceably as you can." The boy ventured to ask, "What will the owner of the corn think if he finds out that we do not treat our hogs like those of other people?" The old man put his fore finger upon his lip, gave his son a significant look, and departed with the dogs in silence. But, unfortunately for his reputation, he had not more than got out of sight of the field, when he met the owner on his way to it. Their conversation was very brief, as the old man said he was in a hurry. His son was found in the field, toiling and coaxing the hogs to a gap. The circumstances were so plain that the owner of the corn ever after told the story I have related, and no one doubted its truth.

You now propose to raise a committee to inquire into the depredations upon the Treasury, and your resolutions direct the committee to inquire into the "causes" of the late defalcations. Why, sir, it seems to me there is no difficulty in assigning the immediate "causes" of these peculations. Your officers are not trustworthy; they cannot resist temptation; they are dishonest. These are the immediate causes of defalcations. I admit, where an officer has a claim against the Government, which in his conscience he believes to be just and legal, and retains as much money as will pay himself, and no more, there may be extenuating circumstances which will excuse him from the imputation of base motives; but I reject the idea totally that an officer should be permitted to redress himself by appropriating to his own use the public money in his hands, upon the pretext that the Government is indebted to him. The system which allows officers to raise accounts against the Government for extra services is wrong. We should have the nature of the service and the compensation so well defined by law that there could be no dispute in settling accounts. But, sir, the largest class of defaulters have no pretext of indebtedness to them by the Government, behind which to escape from public odium. They have used the public money knowingly, willfully, and wickedly. There is no palliating circumstance. The cause of their conduct is to be found in their destitution of moral principle; they are atheists of the French school; their god is the world; their heaven is the gratification of their senses. They fear no punishment, and they march to their object by plundering the public. The evil lies in appointing such officers. Can it be that the nation is so corrupt we cannot find honest men to receive and disburse the public money? I do not believe we have reached that point of degradation yet; but we shall come to it, unless the unprincipled career of political jugglers can be arrested. Sir, the Executive, for the last ten years, has selected for office brawling politicians, overlooking business talents and habits. Capacity for, and devotion to, and success in, the mechanical, agricultural, or commercial pursuits, or the professions of physic or law, have been no recommendation in behalf of an individual seeking public employment. On the contrary, the very fact that the individual prospered in his avocation, whatever it might be, seemed to constitute a barrier to political preferment and promotion in the estimation of the Executive. Such persons have been overlooked, and offices conferred on those who have, by their conduct, by their failures, manifested a want of capacity or energy in their business.

Thus it has been that the Executive department, in its appointments to office, has violated the plainest dictates of common sense and common prudence. The man who has failed in every other business he engaged in, as the last resort, tries the trade of politics. He manufactures and circulates falsehoods; he assails the reputation of all those who stand in his way; he extols and flatters all those from whom he expects aid; and he unites with others alike destitute of principle to advance to the Presidency a man who will dispense rewards to his supporters—who will use the patronage incident to his exalted station for the benefit of a party. These are the men who live by the trade of politics. Their object and their aim is self-aggrandizement. They go for the "spoils" of office. They have no idea of that lofty gratification, that tranquil delight, which flows to a great mind and a liberal heart as the most precious reward of the proper discharge of official duties. They have no idea of those enjoyments of the true patriot resulting from official benefactions to his fellow-citizens, and which, with him, are the chief considerations imparting value to office. The Father of his Country knew the value of office and station in these respects. The modern office-holder tests its value by dollars and cents. And think you, sir, when, by combinations, and all sorts of deceptions, tricks, and artifices, power is obtained, those who get the power intend to relinquish the dollars and cents—to give up the end and aim of all their struggles? No, sir, they will do no such thing. Those who fight for "spoils," if victory is theirs, will not be restrained by the commander-in-chief after the battle is over. He is compelled by his position, as the commander of such soldiers, to yield to their wishes. They will exact a compliance on his part with the conditions of their enlistment, and would decapitate their general sooner than be restrained in the work of plunder. It is not at all surprising, when a man obtains office by such means, and with such motives, that he should forget the Divine injunction, "Servants be content with your lawful wages."

Public Defaulters—Mr. Underwood.

The remote causes of the deplorable defalcations which exist are to be found in the system introduced in the beginning of the last Administration, of removing officers for opinions honestly entertained, and appointing others in their places whose subserviency to the will of the President, and devotion to the interests of party, constituted their principal recommendation. Since the introduction of this system, party contests have thrown their blighting influences over us, embittering the feelings of society, and threatening destruction to our republican institutions. With the servile and selfish horde who follow after the loaves and fishes, the only question is, how can we elect our man to the Presidency? Success secures to the fortunate party food, raiment, and shelter, and leaves to the disappointed poverty and suffering. These conflicts of party have mingled themselves with all the operations of our Governments, both State and national, prostrating in their tornado violence the principles of law and Constitution, until the prospect before us is one of desolation. It has already come to this, that a constable cannot be chosen by a county court without first knowing who he voted for, or intends to vote for, as President. Members of Congress are elected because they are favorable or opposed to this or that candidate for the Presidency; and when they take their seats on this floor, should their political chief occupy the Executive mansion, the creed of party requires them to follow his dictation, right or wrong; and generally, if not invariably, they do it. Thus it is that the will of the President is paramount to the will of the people, and the representative forgets his constituents, and surrenders himself to Executive control. Presidential electioneering connects itself in an alarming manner with the deliberations and acts of Congress. The public lands and the public money are disposed of, not with a view to produce the greatest possible good to the greatest number, but with a view to sustain the members of a party, and to perpetuate power in the same or kindred hands.

Thus, sir, you bid for the votes of the new States, and pay with the public lands; and you grant millions to remove an oyster shoal or a sand-bar at the mouth of a creek emptying into the sea or lakes, and refuse to appropriate a dollar to improve the rivers of the interior, unless they are of such magnitude as to interest two or more States. Do not suppose I am again about to contrast Green river with New river, "the North Carolina Spring branch," as I said on another occasion; nor shall I detain you by drawing a parallel between the Cumberland road and the roads leading through Kentucky. I have done this heretofore, for the purpose of placing before my constituents the glaring injustice of your legislation. It is with heartfelt exultation that I inform this House that there is now nearly one hundred miles of the finest navigation in the world ready for use on Green river; and in twelve months from this time there will be double that number. It is all the work of Kentucky; and, sir, we are going ahead with our roads in the same manner, relying upon the State, without coming here to beg favors. But, sir, I glance at these things for the purpose of asking whether any man supposes these palpable inequalities could exist for a moment but to subserve political purposes, and to advance the interests of particular individuals, instead of the general welfare. With an empty Treasury you vote, hundreds of thousands to the Cumberland road; you go in debt to keep that work in progress, and you attempt to reconcile the nation to your conduct by two flimsy pretexts: one, the idea of indemnity for the expenditure out of the two per cent. fund; the other, the idea that the public faith is pledged to finish the work. These ideas, without a shadow of foundation for either of them, are played off upon a confiding and deceived people to reconcile them to the grossest partiality.

I have a remedy, and I shall prescribe before I take my seat. I have been greatly amused in the course of this discussion, and, as a prelude to stating my own, I propose to notice briefly the remedies proposed by others.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Wise] recommends a "general turn-out" of the official corps. That many ought to be "turned out" of office I do not doubt. But were all that accomplished, it would avail nothing unless a better set can be found to fill their places. I remember the fable of the fox and the flies. I do not want a new swarm to suck the remaining blood of an exhausted people. I desire those who come hereafter may bring healing in their wings, and not the appetites and probosces of gallinippers.* If it be no more than a partisan war between ins and outs that now agitates the nation, I predict that no good will result from its termination in favor of either party. I have but little confidence in those of any party who make politics a trade to live by. With such, money is the main object; and when they obtain power they are very apt to use it for purposes of legal, if not criminal, plunder. I mean, by the term "legal plunder," that they will, by immoral, partial, and even vile legislation, promote private and sectional interests at the expense and to the detriment of the people at large; that they will legalize iniquity. [A member was heard to say, "the Whigs would not do so."] I hope and believe they will not; but the "turn-out" remedy, even if it should succeed in a great degree, will not effectually eradicate the disease. It will do no good to turn the hogs out unless you stop the holes. My remedy is to repair the fence.

But, sir, I have another and a strong objection to the "general turn-out" remedy. Such a course would be to follow the deleterious example set by our political adversaries. It would be to punish for opinion's sake, and to rivet upon the American people the odious practice of making the offices of Government nothing more nor less than stakes put up to be played for by political gamblers. Sir, there is great danger, from the temper of the times, that such will be the future practice of all parties in this country. I will read you, by way of sample, what the friends of the recently elected Democratic Governor of Maryland dictate to him. The paper called the Washington County Democrat says:

"There has been a great deal of speculation as to the course likely to be pursued by Mr. Grason relative to the public offices of this State—whether he will appoint his friends or his enemies to the offices under his control, &c. If we know anything of Mr. Grason's character, and if he knows the obligations imposed upon him, every Whig officer of the State (with few exceptions) will be removed. Such a course Mr. Grason owes to his friends, and to his party, and such a course we have no doubt he will pursue."

The Baltimore Republican gives its dictum in staring capitals thus: "WE SAY, DISMISS THEM TO A MAN." Not even an exception is to be tolerated. Thus, sir, it has become "Democratic" in these days to exact that a "Democratic" Governor shall play the tyrant, to discharge the debts he "owes to his friends," by removing from office all political opponents, no matter how great may be their qualifications in point of fidelity, integrity, industry and talent! When this shall become the settled practice of the national and State Governments (of which there is imminent danger) upon the election of a new Executive, then, truly, "the post of honor will be the private station." Then men of high moral and intellectual worth, engaged in the various avocations of life, and the humble and honest, yet less gifted, but equally meritorious citizens, who earn a support for his beloved family by the sweat of his face, will stand aloof from political corruption and official plunder, until they become intolerable; and when that period arrives, they will stand by their arms.

But, sir, can we get a better set to fill the vacant places upon a "general turn-out?" It will be very difficult to do, if the ideas of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Pickens] be correct. He seems to think that the accumulation and appropriation of immense sums of money by this Government is the true cause of the recent defalcations, and his remedy, therefore, is to dry up the sources of revenue. He supposes that human nature cannot withstand the temptation which immense piles of burnished gold present, and therefore concludes that our condition will not change for the better until the legislation of Congress takes a new direction. He thinks corpulency is the disease, and that depletion and starvation constitute the proper remedy. I admit, sir, that a knave or a thief, before perpetrating a crime, usually considers the chances of escape and detection; and hence, if he were about to steal a turn of corn, he would prefer going to the crib and shelling out for himself, rather than take the full bag already prepared for the mill. The owner might not miss the two bushels and a half taken out of the heap. He would at once discover he had been robbed if the full bag disappears, and hot pursuit might ensue. But this reasoning is not at all applicable to filching money from the Treasury. Whether there be overflowing millions, or whether it be reduced to the last turn, the amount is, or ought to be, accurately measured up; and, if a cent is subtracted, you ascertain the loss with mathematical accuracy. The depredator meets with no encouragement, therefore, in the reflection that he may escape detection by stealing a large pile or heap. Is the temptation increased in proportion to the magnitude of the treasure? I think not. There are stories extant of generous robbers, who plunder the rich to give to the poor; but I apprehend we cannot with truth attribute any palliating sentiment of that sort to our official defaulters, in extenuation of their conduct. No, sir. The Holy Book says:

"There is a generation whose teeth are as swords, and their jaw-teeth as knives, to devour the poor from off the earth, and the needy from among men."

Doubtless the text was prophetically uttered in reference to the sub-Treasury defaulters of this country at the present day. They have no sentiment that does not concentrate in self. They do not steal in consequence of the magnitude of the treasure, or the ability of the Government to sustain the loss. No, sir. Unrestrained by moral principles, they are under the dominion of vicious propensities, and care not into what crime they steep their hands, provided it can be done with impunity. Their motives of action are to be found in their own inbred corruptions, and not in temptations from without. The fault lies in placing such men in situations where they can act out their principles. Office has not made them rogues; but office has furnished opportunities for them to manifest what they always were. The public money can never be safe in the hands of such men, and the remedy is to find men of different characters. And, sir, they can be found, provided you will hunt for them in those walks of life where the noisy, lying, sycophantic, calumniating partisan—the vile tool of party—is never a well-composed guest. I claim no preeminence for my constituents over those of any other member, but I will venture to assert that I could select in my own district men enough, who could and would receive, keep, and disburse every dollar of our vast revenue, without fraudulently misapplying one cent. I would take those who succeeded in their business as farmers, mechanics, merchants, and professional men, and not those who made politics a trade as their dernier resort. I would pass by those who believe the chief good consists in the possession of iron chests crammed with yellow coins stamped with the likeness of some royal fool, and select those content with the comforts of life, earned by their own industry, and who would not exchange the convictions of their accountability to God, and their faith of immortality, for all the gold and diamonds of earth. There are men who discharge public trusts under a sense of obligation to a higher power than the tribunals of this world; and such men cannot be influenced by the temptations which the gentleman from South Carolina supposes must overcome poor human nature. Sir, I do not like the gentleman's remedy! I do not like the idea of putting an end to thievery by keeping nothing on hand to tempt a thief. I do not take consolation for poverty in the reflection that I can defy the robber.

The gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] and a very talented and esteemed Representative of Kentucky in the other branch of Congress, have suggested and pressed bills to prevent Federal officers from interfering with the freedom of elections, as the panacea suited to the political diseases of the present time. I will go with them as far as the Constitution will allow in restraining the corrupt and corrupting practices of these intermeddlers with the rights of suffrage. But I apprehend that the danger is far greater from intermeddlers who wish to obtain, than those who already have office. The officer only fights to defend his citadel, to retain his station, to repel assaults; whereas the seeker must undermine and blow up the incumbent, to dislodge him, and make a vacancy for himself to occupy. As the incumbent is intrenched behind official walls, he feels more secure, and the known fact that his position gives him the advantage in the contest renders the assailant the more reckless in the use of weapons. He uses poisoned arrows, in violation of all the rules of honorable warfare. He becomes a brute and a savage, and pursues his victim without principle or mercy. Now, sir, the sin of the last ten years has been, that an aspirant for office has been esteemed meritorious and talented just in proportion to the success which attended his efforts in raising a Swiss corps to storm the battery, to fight for their leader, right or wrong. Instead of denouncing the wretch who filled his ranks with recruits by deceptions, tricks and false promises, and who seduced his adversary's sentinels and caused them to desert by bribery, the policy was and is to reward such a man, to give him a bountiful share of the good things dispensed by Executive patronage, and to displace friends as well as foes to make room for a powerful demagogue. Thus it is that the essence of merit, in the estimation of the present dominant party, consists in the ability to control the largest number of votes. The corrupt means by which it is done constitute no objection to the claim for official promotion. It is no wonder that office thus acquired should be used for selfish and corrupt purposes. Indeed, in the nature of things, it cannot be otherwise. The seed and the ground in which it is sown are cursed with corruption, and how can the fruit be pure?

Sir, the remedy of my friends who would punish Federal officers for intermeddling with elections will hardly mitigate, much less cure, the disease. Why, sir, the party in power preach the doctrine of rotation in office. I know they practice upon it by occasionally rolling the incumbent from one fat office to a fatter, and then to the fattest; and I know, too, when party policy requires, they seem in good faith to respect the principle of rotation. Thus, sir, out of thirty good and true Democratic Representatives from the State of New York in the Twenty-Fourth Congress, only three of them were returned to serve in the Twenty-Fifth Congress, and two out of these three came from the city of New York. The "party" lost no strength by the changes made in reference to the Twenty-Fourth and Twenty-Fifth Congresses. The people of that great State have made many changes in regard to the Twenty-Sixth Congress, founded upon the condemnation of the creed of the "party." A revolution in public sentiment has changed the delegation of the State, and not the principle of rotation in its party sense. Sir, there never was a more cunningly-devised ad captandum scheme to cheat and deceive the people than this same doctrine of rotation in office. How does it work in reference to Representatives on this floor? According to the example of New York, just referred to in relation to her delegation in the Twenty-Fourth and Twenty-Fifth Congresses, a new set of men are introduced, comparatively ignorant of the rules of this body, unacquainted with its members, and not so well informed as those of more experience in respect to the affairs of the Government in all its relations. Under such disadvantages, a new delegation, elected upon party grounds, cannot be otherwise than instruments in executive hands, and they follow their leader in Indian file, and make but one track in their march. Sir, it is a doctrine favorable to executive supremacy. Does a sensible man hold to the doctrine of rotation with his blacksmith or his shoemaker? No, sir. He will not change a long-trying and faithful workman, who keeps honest accounts, for a stranger. And yet, by the time a member of Congress learns how to discharge his duty independently and beneficially to the country, he must give place to a new-comer, according to the doctrine of rotation. It is a doctrine which prevents a member from becoming independent of the Executive. It extinguishes the light of experience, and leaves the country to pursue its destiny in the dark, or to follow the meteor glory of a military chieftain, or the ignis fatuus—the jack-o'-lantern—of a boggy magician.

Sir, I do not make these remarks out of the least disrespect to the New York delegation now here, to whom I am politically opposed. Far from it. I admit they would probably have been applicable to myself in their full force if Mr. Clay had been President when I first came into Congress. Unexperienced in legislation here as I then was, I might have surrendered my own to follow the thoughts and suggestions of his administration. I mean no personal disrespect to any one. I am warring against a system, the tendencies of which are to erect a despotism. Give me responsibility in office; give me every facility to punish aggressions and chastise derelictions of duty; let the people have the power to hurl a stupid or corrupt public servant from his station, and to consign him to a long disgrace; but let them, if they choose, say "Well done, thou good and faithful servant," and keep him upon the watchtower, without being cashiered or dismissed by the party principle of rotation. Under this party doctrine of rotation, how easy a matter would it be to evade any law restraining Federal officers from interfering with elections! A is a receiver or collector, in office. Well, sir, he will nibble his cheese as mute as a mouse two or four years, while his friend B agitates every element in getting voters to the polls. If A should submit to a contribution of ten or fifteen per cent. of his salary during the time, to help B to raise the wind, and both should keep that matter a secret, the public would never be the wiser. Rumor is a truthless hussy, indeed, if such contributions have not already been made in some places. But be that as it may, suppose A does not say a word about elections while in office; suppose he only votes punctually, and B makes all the noise when he is nothing more than a plain citizen; suppose, after the election is over, the principle of rotation is enforced, and A should give up the office and take the field as an electioneer for the next four years, and B should step into the office and there remain as quiet and peaceable as a lamb; suppose such a game to be played, and what will a law avail providing punishments to deter Federal officers from intermeddling with elections? I will not stop to answer the question, but hasten to other matters.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. TAYLOR] thinks that an "Independent Treasury" is the remedy. Well, sir, I, too, have faith in an "Independent Treasury." But I apprehend the gentleman uses the term to convey one idea, while I use it to convey a very different one. He means by it the exploded sub-Treasury system—the receivers general, their cashiers, clerks, iron chests, &c., all dependant upon the will and pleasure of the President. He calls a plan devised and recommended for its subserviency to the Executive an "Independent Treasury." If he uses the term to indicate fiscal machinery above the people and their Representatives, and which will act "independent" of them, then, sir, he makes a proper use of the term. In that sense an "Independent Treasury" constructed by Locofocoism means an Executive engine with which party work is to be performed. Now, sir, the "Independent Treasury" which I shall favor is one over which the Executive shall have no control. I call it "independent," because it is to be free from the dominion of the Executive, and unfettered by the chains of party—because it is to be an instrument in the hands of the people, through their Representatives, with which to perform all the fiscal operations of the Government, in conformity to well-defined legal principles, and not a power in the hands of a despot, with which to prostrate the very temple of liberty. The gentleman from New York said that the Whigs were for leaving things in the worst possible condition, and that they would not propose a remedy for existing evils. His very charge against the Whigs is an admission that his own party, holding the reins of Government in their hands for the last ten years, have driven the car of State into a quagmire, where the trembling earth threatens to give way, and let drivers, team, and all, sink, through slime and mud, into the abyss of destruction. Well, sir, as the gentleman seems to call for a remedy from the Whigs, he shall have mine, at least, although he may not yet be sick enough of past follies to adopt it.

But, before prescribing, I desire to say to the gentleman, that I deem it altogether unnecessary to inquire into the correctness of his calculations designed to prove that the administration of General Jackson will bear a very favorable comparison with the preceding Administrations in regard to the sums lost by defaulters. The test of merit is not the amount lost during this or that Administration, but it turns on the character of the persons selected to fill office by the President. Let the gentleman look to the character of the appointees—the official corps of General Jackson—and then estimate the amount they have pilfered, not only during his administration, but down to the latest period they were permitted to remain in service, and I believe he will find that the public loss from officers appointed by him has been double, yea, sir, quadruple the amount lost by the appointees of any other President. That is the true test, and it has been evaded in the whole of this debate. But, sir, the whole defense made by the gentleman from New York, and others, based upon the ground that defalcations have existed under every Administration, is unworthy of the subject. Can a thief justify himself upon the ground "that others steal as well as he?" If I charge you, sir, with having highwaymen for associates, do you vindicate yourself by retorting that my companions are robbers? I have heard that such a course is the usual mode of settling matters in a fish-market. I should expect to witness it in Billingsgate, but I am astonished to hear anything like it in an American Congress.

I would, moreover, suggest to the gentleman from New York that, even according to his own mode of ascertaining the merit and demerit of the several Administrations, he has omitted to take into consideration the defalcations in the Post Office Department. I have seen no document which gives the necessary information on that subject; and I believe there are numerous cases of defalcations where the Government has sustained no loss, because the sureties of the defaulter have paid up the money. I should like to see a report from the Department showing the number and amounts of those cases. The first "reform" in my district, after General Jackson was elected, consisted in the removal of a faithful postmaster, and appointing one who soon used the public money: his sureties paid it. I have made a fruitless search to find some redress for them during this session.

But to proceed with my remedy: the root of the evil may be found in the combinations of bad men for the purpose of securing the emoluments of office to themselves by party discipline. The great means to secure the end is the election of a party President. My remedy consists in erecting new constitutional barriers: it is, to drive the hogs out, and mend the fence.

In the first place, I would render the President ineligible to a second term; I would do this to prevent him, while in office, from using his powers and patronage with a view to his reelection.

25TH CONG....3D SESS.

Public Defaulters—Mr. Underwood.

HO. OF REPS.

I would next render members of Congress ineligible to any office which the President can confer, during the term for which they were elected, and for two years after its expiration. My object in this is to render members of Congress independent of Executive influence. To prevent subservience on the part of the member with a view to procure Executive favors, it should be impossible for him to receive the reward. Under such a regulation, he would look exclusively to his constituents in discharging his duties.

I would allow a majority of the members elected to the Senate and House of Representatives to enact laws, notwithstanding the President's veto, instead of requiring two thirds of a quorum. I would amend the Constitution in this respect, with a view to make the President a follower of public sentiment, as expressed by the Representatives of the people, instead of its dictator.

I would break up the whole machinery of caucuses and conventions in the nomination of candidates for the Presidency, by devolving the duty of nominating on the Legislatures of the States; and I would give a direct vote to every free white male citizen of full age, without employing a college of electors. Any candidate having a majority of all the voters should be declared duly elected; if no one had such majority, then Congress should elect, each member having one vote. This change would be more democratic, (I use the term in its true and former sense, and not in its modernized meaning, when it conveys the idea of sacrificing Constitution and law at the shrine of an elective despotism,) and render those combinations impossible by which political jugglers so manage as to secure to themselves the "spoils of victory."

I would partition the Executive power into several independent departments, instead of concentrating it in the hands of a single man. There is too much power lodged by the present Constitution, and the construction it has received in the hands of the President. He is too strong for the other departments. He can trample on Constitution and law with impunity. He is so powerful that liberty is in danger. There is no remedy, in my opinion, but to divide his powers, and to confide distinct portions to separate independent executive departments. With this view, I would have the Secretary of the Treasury annually elected by the House of Representatives, and responsible to it alone; except that I would allow the President to arrest him for official misconduct, and suspend his action until reelected, or another was chosen. I would give to the Secretary thus elected the nomination and appointment, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, of every officer whose duty mainly consisted in collecting, receiving, or disbursing the public revenue, and I would place the same barrier of ineligibility in the way of members of Congress, to prevent their obtaining office from the Secretary, which I have already mentioned in regard to the President.

I would render the Post Office Department, with its twelve thousand five hundred postmasters, independent of the President. I would organize this Department as that of the Treasury, in the manner already suggested.

I regard this division of the Executive power into independent Departments as an essential ingredient in any plan to reform the abuses of the times. Sir, the idea of partitioning power, and confiding distinct portions to separate bodies of magistracy, is the very groundwork of American freedom. The accumulation of all power, legislative, judicial, and executive, into the hands of one man, is Mr. Jefferson's definition of despotism. That is precisely the crisis in the state of public affairs at present. With what the Constitution grants, with what erroneous constructions have conceded, with those added which have been arbitrarily grasped, the President is already an elective monarch. He has a hundred times more to do and to look after, in the various operations of our vast governmental machine, than it is possible for one man to attend to. His supervision is so general that it is almost worthless. The consequence is, that he necessarily confides to others; and, in doing it, he selects the flattering, unprin-ciple sycophant, ever ready to burn incense on the altar of power, and to sacrifice the interests of the people for their own aggrandizement. To secure a more beneficial and faithful superintendence, and, above all, to prevent the concentration of patronage to a focus, to a single point, around which all the insects and beasts of party swarm and congregate, nothing can be effectual short of the partition proposed. It is better to have several fires diffusing a genial warmth in different circles, than to have but one of intense and scorching heat, which endangers, if it does not consume, everything which falls under its influence. If a partition of Executive power takes place, and independent departments should be established as proposed, you still leave the President at the head of the Army and the Navy. He is still at the head of the diplomatic corps, and conducts our intercourse with the other nations of the earth. These and his other untouched duties would leave him employment and patronage enough to engage all his faculties.

The idea of partition which I am now insisting on is already the basis of our institution. We divide power into State and national. We have a State executive and a national Executive, performing different functions in fulfilling different executive powers; and why not, in the same Government, have different executives, performing different functions in the execution of different powers? By the constitution of nearly, if not all the States in this Union, the sword and the purse are separated a vinculo matrimonii, (effectually divorced.) Why not imitate the States, and elect the Secretary of the Treasury, and make him independent of the President? The States and this Government cut up judicial power into civil and criminal courts, and render the one independent of the other. Why may not the same thing be done in regard to Executive powers? Sir, the great principle in the whole of it is the division of labor. It is the principle of civilization itself; and it is impossible, in the nature of things, that it should do otherwise than produce the most beneficial results. It is about as unwise to place a vast mass of Executive duties in the hands of one man as it is to require an individual to tan his own leather, make his own shoes, weave his own cloth, make his own clothes, catch the fur, and make his own hat. Why, sir, the man who should pretend to follow the trades of tanner, shoemaker, weaver, tailor, hunter, and hatter, and be master of each, would incur the ridicule of everybody. I firmly believe, sir, that if the science of government is improved, and carried to the greatest perfection, it will be done, it can only be done, by classifying and dividing its powers still further, and confiding each subdivision to an appropriate and different set of magistrates. The same intellect is no more capable of performing mental labor of every sort, and attaining preëminence in every department of science, than is the same body capable of performing labor with equal perfection in every art. By devoting our faculties exclusively to one or a few things, we may excel, and become public benefactors in a particular business. By dividing and distracting our attention between many things, we do nothing well, and most frequently do all we attempt very badly. It is the decree of the Almighty that things are so. It is His ordinance, written on the face of human affairs, as a perpetual rebuke to the overreaching vanity of man. It is the height of human folly to disregard this unchangeable law of God. And yet, sir, men may be found who are greatly incensed, unless you admit that they can physic you at night, attend to your law suit in the day, and preach on Sunday, better than Æsculapius, my Lord Coke, and the Apostle Paul!

There is but one idea more which I wish to suggest, and then I shall have presented the chief ingredients of my remedy. It is this: I would correct the erroneous construction of the Constitution by an amendment, declaring that the President might arrest, but should not dismiss or remove, an officer, until he should be found guilty of misfeasance or malfeasance in office, or culpable omissions in the performance of his duties, by the tribunal established by law for trying the charges against him. My object in doing this would be to impart an independent feeling to the subordinate executive officers, and to rid them of that tame servility to superiors which exists under the present system. I desire to see them strictly responsible to the law, and not to the caprice or prejudice of those in higher stations. I wish, also, to deprive the President of the power to punish political opponents, and to reward his partisans, by taking office from one without fault, and giving it to another without merit. I wish to unlock the mouths of subordinates. Does any man believe that Ogden and Phillips could or would have looked upon the infamous conduct of Swartwout, with a full knowledge of it during five or six years, and not open their mouths to inform the President or the public, if a system of terror and corruption had not been established under that power which allows the President to make arbitrary removals and appointments! Sir, they were afraid to speak when Swartwout began to plunder, because at first he took small sums, which he could have replaced, and then denied their charges, which no one would have believed; and they would have been dismissed to starvation and ignominy, as slanderers of their noble, pure, and talented superior. They did not speak when they saw Swartwout taking hundreds of thousands, because they had remained silent when they knew he was pilfering, and could not assign any reason for changing their course at a later period, which would not prove a shameful connivance and want of principle on their part in allowing him to go on unexposed for so long a time. The law does not allow the slave to give evidence against his master. The consequence of that principle is, that the slave will see his master commit murder, and not open his mouth. The principle is the same in kind, if not in degree, which silences the subordinate under the system of removals and appointments, or punishments and rewards, introduced into this Government by Andrew Jackson! The system must be broken up, sir. It is incompatible with public liberty and safety.

The silence of these men, Ogden and Phillips, is a striking illustration of the worthlessness of the sub-Treasury scheme, so often pressed by the Administration and its friends. You will have two or three keys, each kept by a separate officer, and each key must be used before getting into the strong box where the treasure is kept; and thus, if you can stumble upon one honest man, you will save the treasure. Good—admitted. But my objection is, that your system of rewards and punishments, your electioneering schemes, your pursuit of the "spoils," is demoralizing and corrupting; and that, until these are reformed, it is useless to talk about locks and keys and strong boxes, and separate officers to watch one another. The cream will be no safer by appointing two or three instead of one cat to watch it.

I have thus briefly presented my remedy for prevailing evils. I have had it before this House, in the shape of resolutions to amend the Constitution for years, but have had no opportunity to discuss it. I have now only glanced at the reasons in its favor. The known political character of the House, and the certain rejection of the "reform" I propose, have reconciled me in some measure to the neglect, or rather the past omission to consider and discuss the subject. But I trust, sir, there is a day coming, and that it is not far distant, when my propositions will receive the deliberate attention of Congress and of the nation. I look to the success of the Whig cause as essential to secure the desired, the real "reform." I hope and believe, if the Whigs ever come into power, they will apply the proper remedy to the diseases which afflict us. If I could foresee events, and in my vision of the future behold the Whigs seated in power, and then witness a faithless non-compliance with their pledges and promises to the country, as faithless as that of the last Administration, I should mourn over their coming disgrace, and repent of my efforts, humble as they are, to elevate men who, like their predecessors, forget their professions as soon as they get power. If we are destined to see one party succeed another, and crying abuses remain unredressed, the people will lose all confidence in the character of public men, if they do not despair of the institutions of the country.

25TH CONG., 3D SESS.

Public Defaulters—Mr. Prentiss.

Ho. of Reps.

In the course of this debate, we have been told by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BOON] that the denunciations of the Whigs, their cries of "corruption," "corruption," remind him of the shepherd boy in the fable, who deceived by exclaiming "wolf," "wolf," until no one paid the least attention to the sound. If I remember the fable aright, the sheep were devoured at last by neglecting the warning. With a proper application of the moral of the whole story, the people should at least learn caution, and look to their affairs, even if the sentinel should sometimes give a false alarm. The gentleman says the people will not and do not believe the cry, and he exults in their unbelief. We are taught in sacred places that a want of faith is a damning sin. I call upon the people to examine the evidences, to look into the facts upon which we raise the cry of political corruption. Let them do that, and, if they will, I am greatly mistaken if they do not perceive, not one wolf coming, but an army of wolves already devouring their substance. If the people ought to have faith, and have it not, they must take the consequence of their unbelief; they must perish—there is no salvation for them.

I know, sir, it is very difficult to secure the considerate attention of a man, or to reason with him, when you wish to eradicate his errors and prejudices. He arms himself against your first approaches, and he sets up his passions as an impenetrable wall of protection. He hates you. He will not sacrifice his vanity, his consistency, his infallibility, his self-love, so far as to be convinced by you. Convert a political zealot! Why, sir, the thing is next to an impossibility. I would almost as soon undertake to convince a Mormon that their new revelation from Heaven was nothing but the trick of an artful knave, or to save the victim of superstition and idolatry from self-immolation under the car of Juggernaut, or to arrest the crusades set on foot by Peter the Hermit. Reason cannot stand up against a hurricane of passion. I have no hope of converting the gentleman from Indiana. He is seared by unbelief. He is like the last man who perished in the flood; who, standing tiptoe upon the mountain top, with the water up to his chin, addressed Noah, as the ark floated by, "Ride on, my old boy, I don't believe there will be much of a storm after all." I know, sir, that a man's time and breath are wasted in attempts to reason coolly with heated zealots about anything. And in the days that are gone, when fifes and drums and the firing of cannon on the 8th of January were resorted to as appropriate means to excite the passions, and to suppress the suggestions of the understanding, it was in vain to talk about trampling constitutions and jaws under foot. Hundreds and thousands would not listen. But those days have passed by, and I trust we shall never see their like again. We never shall, if history makes the proper impressions by her teaching. The last 8th of January passed away as silently as the falling meteor. I rejoice in the victory of that day as much as any man, but I have lamented in bitterness that its glory has been prostituted to create a huzzza sentiment, justifying the General in setting the Constitution and laws of his country at defiance. Since General Jackson was first elected, the boys of eleven and twelve years have grown up to be voters. They will reason in looking upon past transactions which occurred when they were too young to have their prejudices and passions enlisted by being actors and voters. And notwithstanding the asseverations of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BOON,] there have been some converts—some who admit they once were blind, but now know they see. The signs of the times, taken altogether, are encouraging. The Madisonian declares for the election of a Secretary of the Treasury by Congress. Other papers will follow that lead. A committee, during the last session, reported unanimously in favor of rendering members of Congress ineligible to Executive appointments, and incapacitating them to receive office from the President for a limited time after the termination of their membership. There is a moving of the waters which I trust will heal the nation.

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. THOMAS] has taken occasion, in the course of this debate, to complain of (as he has been pleased to term it) the "cruel and outrageous" course pursued on this floor towards the Administration and its friends, in the cry of "corruption!" "corruption!" Sir, I am glad to hear the gentleman complain. There is hope of reformation where there is sensibility left. I only regret that, while he was rebuking us, he did not remember the course of his own associates, and bring them in to share in the benefits of his lecture. Has he forgotten the charges made against the purest and best patriots of the land—that they were the bribed tools of the Bank of the United States, laboring for corrupt wages? Does he not read the daily outpourings of the official organ, whose chief means of defending its cause consists in a fathomless reservoir of fetid water, and unprincipled efforts to sprinkle it in the path of truth and patriotism, in the hope that their votaries may be induced to veer about in order to avoid the stench? Let the gentleman first pluck the beam out of his friends' eyes before railing at the mote in the eyes of those who may not listen so kindly to his advice. I deprecate as much as any one the party denunciations and political slanders of the times. I have always set my face against them; but no one should be deterred from speaking what he believes to be the truth from the fear of being gazetted, or of having his motives assailed by those who wish to rise by prostrating others. I should rejoice to see the disgraceful war of vituperation come to an end. The gentleman and the Administration he sustains may do much to bring about that result, by cleansing the official organ; and I should be glad if their first efforts would take that direction. One of the reforms I desire to make is, to sever the connection between the patronage of the Government and the party press. It is a part of my remedy; and it would be very efficacious in many respects, which want of time prevents me from detailing now.

I had prepared myself to submit some remarks on the subject of the sub-Treasury, the banks, and the currency, in reply to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TAYLOR;] but I have already detained you so long that I am unwilling to go into these questions now, and shall therefore defer what I have to say in regard to them until another time.

PUBLIC DEFAULTERS.

SPEECH OF HON. S. S. PRENTISS, OF MISSISSIPPI,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
December 28, 1833.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the President's Message—

Mr. PRENTISS, of Mississippi, said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I had intended, upon a former occasion, to have expressed my views upon some of the topics embraced in the President's message, more especially the subject of the recent defalcations. I am, however, so unfortunate as to be viewed by the official eye of this House through an inverted telescope, and it is not often that I can obtain the floor. With much pleasure, therefore, I avail myself of the opportunity at present afforded me. That portion of the message to which I shall principally turn my attention, to wit, the defalcations of the public officers, has been already ably considered by my friend from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] as well as by the distinguished member from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL.] But it is a subject which cannot be too often or too thoroughly discussed. Its examination will, I am confident, eviscerate more of the principles upon which this Government has for some years been administered, and furnish us more valuable lessons for future guidance than any other matter that can occupy our deliberations. I am sorry to observe a rapidly increasing hostility upon this floor to the discussion of great political principles. One would suppose, in listening to some gentlemen, that Congress was constituted, like a county court, for the trial of petty individual claims, instead of being the great political tribunal of the nation, whose province and duty it is not only to notice all important events in the action of the Government, but to investigate the causes from which they have resulted.

Defalcations of the most alarming character, and for an immense amount, carried on and concealed for a series of years by the collector of the principal commercial city of the Union, have been recently developed. The President has seen fit to call our particular attention to this case, and to make, in connection therewith, divers suggestions as to the best mode of preventing similar occurrences hereafter.

"It seems proper [says the President] that, by an early enactment similar to that of other countries, the application of public money by an officer of the Government to private uses, should be made a felony, and visited with severe and ignominious punishment."

He further recommends that a committee of Congress be appointed to watch the officers who have the custody of the public moneys, and that they should "report to the Executive such defalcations as were found to exist, with a view to a prompt removal from office, unless the default was satisfactorily accounted for."

The Secretary of the Treasury has also given us a report upon this same subject, in which he expresses his astonishment that such an occurrence should have happened without his knowledge; exhibits, like the President, a most holy horror at the enormity of the offense, and recommends the appointment of an additional tribe of officers to watch over those already in power, as the best mode of avoiding similar mishaps in future.

To listen to the well assumed astonishment of the President and Secretary at the discovery of Swartwout's peculations, one would readily suppose that defalcation, under the present Administration, like parricide among the ancients, had heretofore been a crime unknown, and consequently unprovided for by justice. Harken to the philosophical musings of the President on this point:

"The Government, it must be admitted, has been from its commencement comparatively fortunate in this respect. But the appointing power cannot always be well advised in its selections, and the experience of every country has shown that public officers are not at all times proof against temptation."

Wonderful sagacity! Unparalleled discovery! Who will now deny the title of "magician" to the man who has developed the astounding fact "that public officers are not at all times proof against temptation?"

The embezzlements of Swartwout have caused this truth to flash upon the sagacious mind of the Chief Magistrate, and with philanthropic eagerness he recommends that we put a stop to this new sort of wickedness by making it a penitentiary offense.

Mr. CHAIRMAN, if I should tell you that all this is sheer hypocrisy—gross and miserable pretense—a tub thrown out to amuse the popular whale, and divert his attention from the miserable and leaky canoe which bears the fortunes of this Administration; if I should tell you that, during the last five or six years, a hundred cases of defalcation have occurred, more outrageous in principle, more profligate in character, than the one we are recommended to investigate; that the President has continued defaulters in office, knowing of their violations of duty, knowing of their appropriation of the public moneys to private uses; that the Secretary of the Treasury has, during that whole period, habitually connived at these defalcations, and extended over them the mantle of his protection; if I should tell you that these defalcations constitute a portion of the "spoils system"—that system which has been to this Administration what his flowing locks were to Samson—the secret of its strength; if I should tell you all this, I should tell you no more than I conscientiously believe; no more than I shall attempt to prove before this House and the country. These defalcations I shall trace to their origin, and not stop to inquire so much into their amounts, as into the causes which have led to them. It is not the question, where is the money? but where is the guilt? that I wish to investigate. The recent developments to which our attention is invited are but some of the bubbles that are every day breaking upon the surface of the still and mantling pool. I shall not stop to measure their relative size or color, but will, unpleasant as the task may be, dredge for the corrupt cause which lies at the bottom. These cases are but the wind-falls from that tree of Sodom—Executive patronage. Heretofore, the Representatives of the people have in vain urged an examination into the character of its fruit; but it has been guarded with more vigilance than were the golden apples of the Hesperides. Now our attention is solicited to it by the President. Is he in earnest? Let him but give us a chance to shake this tree, and he will find its rotten pippins falling from every limb and branch.

But our attention is called, particularly, to the case of Swartwout. The Administration has delivered him over to our tender mercies; they have dropped him, as the bear, when hotly pursued, drops one of her cubs, for the purpose of distracting the attention of the hunter, and so escaping with the rest of her young. I, for one, shall not be thus diverted from my purpose, but will follow the dam to her den, and there, if possible, crush at once her whole breed.

Swartwout has been found out. This is the unpardonable sin with the present party in power. Their morality is the Spartan morality; not the theft, but the discovery, constitutes the crime. Sir, if every office-holder's mantle was thrown aside, how many, think you, would be found without a stolen fox fastened to the girdle?

Mr. Chairman, I have no confidence that the President has recommended this investigation in good faith, or that his partisans here intend to permit it. They dare not do it. They are not yet sufficiently maddened, scorpion like, to dart the sting into their own desperate brain. No, sir, it is a mere ruse. Regardless of the maxim that "there is honor among thieves," the rest of the office-holders are very willing to turn State's evidence against Swartwout, to gain immunity for themselves, and favor with the Commonwealth. Let the Administration give us a fair committee, favorable to investigation, not packed by the Speaker; throw open to us the doors of your departments; those whitened sepulchres, within whose secret vaults corruption has so long rioted and revelled; let your insolent subalterns be taught that they owe some allegiance to the laws; compel them to submit their official conduct to a rigid examination by this House; then, and not till then, will I believe them in earnest; then, and not till then, shall I expect any good to come of investigation. But, sir, though little is to be expected from the action of this House, I anticipate much good from the discussion. This Hall is the ear of the nation; what is said here touches the auditory nerve of the whole country. Before this mighty audience do I impeach both the President and the Secretary—not before the Senate—no, sir; but before the people—before fifteen millions of freemen.

I charge them with knowingly appointing and continuing in office public defaulters—men who had appropriated the public moneys to private use; who had committed, in office, acts of as great moral turpitude, and deserving of as much odium, as attaches to the case of Swartwout; acts which the President now professes to think are deserving of the penitentiary. I charge the Secretary, directly, with having caused, by negligence, and knowing, wilful connivance, some of the most important defalcations which have occurred. I charge him specifically with having, in one case, literally watched a defalcation through a period of more than two years, and seen it gradually swell, during that time to upwards of one hundred thousand dollars! I charge him with having permitted, in numberless instances, the repeated and continued neglect and violation of what he himself asserts to be the paramount duty, without removing from office, or even reprimanding the delinquents. I charge him with having, in his official capacity, received, and favorably considered, correspondence degrading to his high office, insulting to him as an honest man, and of a corrupt and profligate character.

Sir, the Secretary can only escape by the plea of "non compos mentis." Out of his own mouth I will convict him; I will but let loose upon him the documents he himself has furnished, and, like the hapless Acteon, he will be torn to pieces by his own hounds!

Mr. Chairman, the cases which I am about to examine, in support of my positions, have been selected at random from the reports of the Secretary himself, and I present them merely as specimens; scores of the same sort—the phosphorescent glimmerings of corruption—break through the darkness, and illuminate the path of the Secretary, from the very moment he came into office. Should I treat of them all, the 4th of March would find me here, and the chronicles of the defaulters still unfinished.

The first case to which I will call attention is that of Colonel John Spencer, receiver of public moneys at Fort Wayne, Indiana, and which commenced in 1836. The report of the whole case is found in Document No. 142, of the second session of the Twenty-Fourth Congress. I shall extract such portions as are in point.

Under date of the 25th of April, 1836, the Secretary writes to Colonel Spencer, among other things, as follows:

"As these statements for January and February last have not been received at the Department, I must claim your attention to the omission, and insist on their transmission, in future, immediately after the close of each month. At the same time, I would also claim your strict attention to the regulations of the Department in respect to the periodical deposits of the public money, and to the duty of transmitting the usual evidences of such deposits to the Secretary of the Treasury, as the instructions require."

Immediately afterwards, the Secretary writes again to the following effect:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, May 23, 1836.

Sir: Since the date of my letter to you of the 25th ultimo, your returns for the month of April have been received, from which I perceive that the public moneys in your hands on the 30th ultimo amounted to the sum of $247,251 64, which amount is the accumulated receipts of your office since the 1st of January last. You cannot but be aware that the retention of the public moneys in your hands, beyond the period of one month, unless the receipts of such month be less than $10,000, is a violation of your instructions. The object of this letter is, 1. To require that the whole balance on hand at the time of the receipt of this letter shall be immediately deposited, and a certificate of such deposit transmitted to the Department without delay. 2. To inform you that the Department cannot overlook the omission to do so, or your future neglect to deposit monthly, and to transmit your monthly returns, accompanied by the evidence of your deposit, in time to be received at this office within the month next preceding that for which the return is rendered. 3. That any neglect or inattention to these requirements, unless satisfactorily accounted for, will require of me, from a sense of official duty, that you be reported to the President, with a recommendation that you be removed from office.

I am, very respectfully, &c.,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Colonel SPENCER.

On the 8th of July, the Secretary directed that Mr. West (who, it seems, was a sort of rotary portion of the Department, called an examiner) should proceed in person "to make special inquiry into the matter, and report to the Department the result."

Accordingly, Mr. West proceeded to Fort Wayne to examine into the delinquency of the receiver; and having accomplished his task, made a report to the Department. From this report it appears that he met Colonel Spencer, who was on his way to Richmond to raise money to make up his deficit to the Government. The following is an extract from the report in relation to a charge of "shaving" upon the public moneys:

"Upon the subject of using the money of the United States, I beg leave to state that I find it universally stated and believed, and it is conceded to as a fact by the clerks in the receiver's office, that both he and his relative Dawson have been much in the habit, in the office, of shaving money; that is, exchanging the money which could not be received for public lands; the rate of exchange or discount varying from three to five per cent. I find in the case of Isaiah Wells, of Marion county, Ohio, that, so recently as the 6th instant, he paid into the hands of the receiver, in his office, eight dollars for exchanging $240 of Ohio bank notes of five dollars each. To what extent this 'shaving' business has been carried on in the office, of course I do not know, but I am satisfied it has been to a very considerable extent, and that the Government money paid in by one person has been handed out by the receiver in exchange for uncurrent (or not land office) money—he receiving, for his own private use, the discount as agreed upon; and that the same Government money again is passed into the land office to be again used for the like purpose, in pay for the public lands."

"That the receiver has taken in bank notes of five dollars, contrary to orders, the schedule prepared at his office, herewith inclosed, will prove; that he received a bonus for taking the same is, I think, almost beyond a doubt."

In a postscript to his report, he says:

"Mr. Spencer has just come in, having been so far as Richmond, where, by obtaining a discount upon some drafts due in September, originally taken here for land, he was enabled to swell his deposit there to $52,831 34; which, together with the money taken with him from here, the silver in the bank here, and some other money, enabled him to deposit," &c.

The following is the supplemental report of Mr. West:

MIAMI COUNTY, INDIANA, August 23, 1836.

Sir: I hasten to correct an oversight in my statement of Mr. Spencer's account, in the postscript of my letter from Fort Wayne. I wrote the postscript just upon the point of starting; and Mr. Spencer being present, requesting me to give the assurance of his good intention for the future, must be my excuse for the oversight.

It consists in passing either the whole amount of his deposit at Indianapolis, in which is included a certificate of deposit of $25,000 of silver at Fort Wayne, or, as the gold was left in the bank at Fort Wayne as collateral, to make up a deficiency of $2,000 silver, I should not have passed all the gold to his credit.

His account, as corrected, should stand thus:

THE RECEIVER—Dr.

June 30. To balance.....	$100,599 32
Received in July ($355,897 75),.....	356,155 95
Received in August, up to 11, at 3 p. m. ....	29,774 64
	<hr/> $486,529 91

CONTRA—Cr.

June 30. To cash deposited at Indianapolis.....	$445,906 00
Gold in bank at Fort Wayne, $5,332 37,
—less $2,000, its liability for the deficiency of silver of $2,000.....	3,332 37
Bank notes, &c., in office.....	17,350 50
Gold in office.....	357 90
Silver in office.....	1,874 00
Scrip.....	2,435 00
Forfeited land stock.....	75 20
Balance due United States.....	5,206 84
	<hr/> $486,529 91

It is also proper for me to state that I am quite satisfied Mr. Spencer, by his visit to Richmond, was enabled to increase his available fund there $94,054 92, (he having drawn in favor of the Indianapolis branch for that much more,) by obtaining a discount there; and upon drafts received by him at Fort Wayne for public lands, before the 1st of June last, which drafts were not due till September; and of course, in order to reduce the same now to cash, he made a deduction. Whether the deduction for the yet remaining time was equal to what was allowed him in May last, of course I do not know; but the difference of time would seem to place it beyond a doubt that it was much less.

The latter view, in part, applies to the discount upon uncurrent (or not land office) paper, which he deposited at Indianapolis; a certificate of the loss upon which I inclosed at his request.

Very, &c.,

NATHANIEL WEST.

To ETHAN A. BROWN, Esq.

By this document it appears that the receiver had turned his office into a "shaving shop" for himself and his friends. It further appears that he had not merely failed to deposit the public moneys according to law, but had used them; for when he came to make a settlement with Mr. West, after having scraped together all the means within his reach; after selling drafts, obtaining a private discount at Richmond, bringing forward all the public money in his hands, and, in the language of Mr. West, "some other money," still he falls short $5,206 84, which he does not profess to account for in any way. In other words, by this report Colonel Spencer stood before the Secretary and President an acknowledged, confessed, and convicted peculator and embezzler of public moneys to the amount of $5,206 84, without a shadow of excuse or defense.

And what think you was done with this defaulter by the moral, upright, sin-hating Secretary? And what has been done by the President, who thinks this offense ought to be made felony, and punished with the penitentiary? Before I answer this question, I will read you a letter from a then Senator of the United States, which will perhaps throw some light upon this subject. It will be perceived this letter was written during the examination of the office by Mr. West, and was doubtless intended to obviate the effect of the report:

MADISON, August 31, 1836.

Sir: I am informed that some things are stated recently to the prejudice of Colonel John Spencer, receiver at Fort Wayne, and I am requested to write you. In doing so, I can only say that I have been gratified in learning that his deposits have been made to your satisfaction; and, if so, I hope that minor matters, if mere irregularities, will be overlooked. He is reputed to be an honest and honorable man, and I do not believe that he has intentionally either done wrong or violated his instructions. It would so often produce excitement if he were removed, for he has many warm and influential friends, both in Fort Wayne and in Dearborn county, from which he removed to his present residence. Better let it be.

With much respect,

WM. HENDRICKS.

Hon. LEVI WOODBURY, Secretary of the Treasury.

"With much respect;" ha! I doubt it. The honorable Senator could not have had much respect for the honorable Secretary, or he would never have dared to write him such a letter. Those two last sentences, like a lady's postscript, contain the whole substance: "it would produce excitement," "forsooth, to remove the defaulter;" "he has influential friends;" "better let it be." Sir, in these few words you may behold the morality, the policy, and the strength of the party in power. Like the flash language of the London swells, they open, to those who understand the true meaning, the whole secret of political roguery. Being interpreted, the honorable Mr. Hendrick's letter would read: "Dear Levi: I am told Colonel Spencer is a defaulter, and you are going to turn him out. Levi, you're a fool; you must do no such thing; it would injure the party to turn him out; he's a strong politician, and has got a great deal of influence; he isn't cheating us; it's only the people. If you know which side your bread is buttered, keep him in office."

And what says honest Levi to all this? Listen; here is his answer:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, September 7, 1836.

SIR: Your letter of the 31st ultimo is received, and I am happy to inform you that Mr. Spencer's explanations have been such that he will probably continue in office.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. WILLIAM HENDRICKS, Madison, Indiana.

Which, being interpreted, reads: "Dear Billy: who's a fool? I never intended to turn him out; I only talked about it to gull the people, and make them think I was honest. He shall be retained." Ay, and he was retained, and soon rendered good service to his master as well approved the sagacity which refused to part with him.

He has been continued in office by Mr. Van Buren, and is now receiver at Fort Wayne. There is one more circumstance developed by this document, to which I invite attention. The Secretary, in his letter of the 23d of May to Colonel Spencer, tells him, "that any neglect or inattention to these requirements, [that is, to deposit monthly the money on hand, and make monthly returns thereof,] unless satisfactorily accounted for, will require of me, from a sense of official duty, that you be reported to the President, with a recommendation that you be removed from office."

Now, in connection with this extract, read the following letter from Colonel Spencer, written just upon the eve of the presidential election, and about six weeks after the correspondence between Hendricks and the Secretary:

RECEIVER'S OFFICE, FORT WAYNE,
October 27, 1836.

SIR: This is to inform you that I have forwarded to the deposit bank $104,000, in silver, there to remain until I arrive with the gold and paper money.

My Democratic friends think that I ought not to leave until after we hold our election for President, on the 7th November, which I have concluded to await, and shall leave on that evening, or the next morning, to deposit, with all the funds on hand up to that time. I shall write you again before I leave. The sales are rapid; mostly paid in gold and silver. My quarterly report will be forwarded by next mail, for last quarter, which ought to have been done sooner, only for the want of help in the office. Hereafter I think I can get my reports off without much delay, after the close of the month and quarter.

I am yours, respectfully,

JOHN SPENCER, Receiver.

Hon. LEVI WOODBURY, Secretary of the Treasury.

What think you of this? The repeated injunction of the Secretary had been, that at the end of each month he should deposit the public money in hand; and if he failed to do so, without good excuse, he should be removed from office. Well, sir, he fails to make his deposit in October, not by accident or necessity, but voluntarily; and sends, in advance, his excuse to the Secretary. What is that excuse? It is that his Democratic friends thought that he ought not to leave until after the election for President; in other words, that his duty to the party was paramount to his official duty; that his obligations to Mr. Van Buren, (the candidate for the Presidency,) were greater than his obligations to the country, in whose service he was at least nominally employed.

Accordingly, he neglected his most important duties for many days, that he might use in the election that political influence of which the honorable Mr. Hendricks speaks with so muchunction.

The Secretary receives this excuse; recognizes its sufficiency, by not recommending his removal from office, as he had promised to do, in case the reason should not be satisfactory; and has thus convicted himself of entertaining and practicing the profligate doctrine that interference in elections by an office-holder is not only justifiable, but involves a higher degree of obligation than the mere performance of official duty. It was not merely to exercise his elective franchise as a citizen that Spencer violated the injunction of the Department; this right he could have exercised where his duty called him, as well as at Fort Wayne. But that would not do; he had influence at the latter place, which it was important to the party he should exercise. Having thus violated his solemn official obligations, for the purpose of assisting Mr. Van Buren into the presidential chair, it was of course no more than fair that the President should return the favor. He did return it. He continued Colonel Spencer in office; and thus, at the same time, exhibited his gratitude, violated his duty, and prostituted his high station. This, Mr. Chairman, is but a specimen of that corrupt reciprocity of service which constitutes the ligature that binds together, like the Siamese twins, the Executive and the office-holders.

Sir, the document from which I have made the foregoing extracts is a public record, and was furnished to the Senate at the time when Mr. Van Buren was President of that body. Of course, he cannot plead ignorance of its contents. Yet, in the face of the report of West; of the profligate letter of Hendricks; of the shameless avowal of the receiver himself, that he neglected the paramount duties of his office for the purpose of exercising his influence at the election—in face of all this, the President neglects and refuses to apply the power of removal; and the unblushing partisan still remains in office, ready, doubtless, at the next election, to play again the game which proved so profitable at the last.

I will no longer detain the committee with this disgraceful case, but, leaving it and the parties concerned to the judgment of the country, proceed to the consideration of another. I will take the case of Harris, receiver of the land office at Columbus, in my own State. In this instance I expect to convict the Secretary of the Treasury, not of a single isolated neglect of duty, but a continued, daily, miserable winking and connivance at malversation and defalcation, during a period of two years, implicating alike his honesty, his veracity, and his capacity. First, however, I will show what importance the Treasury Department attached to the duty incumbent upon collectors and receivers; of depositing in bank, at stated periods, the public moneys in their hands, because it was from the continued violation of this duty that the defalcation in the case of Harris as well as in most others, occurred; and because it will leave the Secretary no excuse, from the supposed insignificance of the duty, for the gross and culpable negligence on his own part, which makes him, in justice and truth, a particeps criminis in the whole affair.

I hold in my hand a book of some four hundred pages, entitled "Letters from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copies of letters to collectors and receivers who have failed to comply with the laws and regulations for their government; and also copies of reports of examinations of land offices since 1st January, 1834," &c. It is Document 297, and was furnished the House by the Secretary on the 30th of March, 1838. It is the most extraordinary publication that ever fell under my observation. It is a moral, political, and literary curiosity.

If you are a laughing philosopher, you will find in it ample food for mirth; if you belong to the other school, you cannot but weep at the folly and imbecility which it exhibits. The Secretary must have been frightened when he compiled it, for it is without form, and darkness rests upon its face. It contains two hundred and sixty letters to defaulting collectors and receivers; in some instances, from ten to twenty to the same defaulter; yet, so curiously is the book constructed, that you must read the whole of it to trace a single case. Its contents are as strange as the "hell broth" that boiled and bubbled in the witches' caldron. From this fragment of chaos I shall proceed to extract and arrange such matter as is material to my purpose. And first, to show, as I proposed, what importance the Secretary attached to the duty of depositing the public moneys in bank, at stated periods, so that they might not accumulate in the hands of the collector, and thus afford temptation to defalcation.

The first letter I shall quote was from Mr. Taney, then Secretary of the Treasury. It is No. 1 of the letters to receivers, is dated January 16, 1834, directed to R. B. Sterling, receiver of public moneys, and concludes as follows:

"I will only further add that the obligations to deposit the public money promptly, and to render your returns and accounts punctually, are imperative, and must in future be regarded as paramount to all other duties."

Again, under date of 18th of May, 1834, Mr. Taney writes to J. W. Dickson, receiver at Mount Salus, Mississippi:

"Certificates of deposit are to be addressed to this office; these, and the prompt and punctual deposit of the public money, are to be regarded as paramount duties, the strict performance of which will be insisted on."

On the 18th of July, 1834, Levi Woodbury writes the following circular to some seven or eight receivers:

"I regret to be under the necessity of noticing your omissions to make returns for the months of April, May, and June last. By a circular, dated the 15th of January last, you were advised of the necessity of promptitude in this respect. It remains that I should again remind you, once for all, that this is a duty which must be punctually observed."

In a letter to the receiver at Augusta, Mississippi, dated August 4, 1834, he says:

"Upon the subject of the request made in your letter of the 6th instant, I have to observe that the Department cannot relax in the regulations prescribed for the periodical deposits of the public money."

On the 30th January, 1835, he writes to the receiver at Helena:

"The Department having received no duplicate of the monthly returns required by its regulations, showing the transactions of your office, since your appointment, it becomes proper to call your immediate attention to this duty, and to inform you that punctuality in this respect, and in the deposit of the public money, are to be regarded as paramount duties, and will be insisted on accordingly."

To Linn, receiver at Vandalia, he says, February 12, 1835:

"Once for all, then, I will inform you that a strict observance of the regulations of the Department for the periodical deposit of the public money, and the transmission of your accounts and returns, are paramount duties, the neglect of which will be reported for the action of the Executive."

To the receiver at Demopolis, he writes, February 20, 1835:

"I embrace the occasion to say to you, once for all, that punctuality in making your returns, and deposit of the public moneys, are to be regarded as paramount duties, the neglect of which will be reported for the action of the Executive."

Again, February 28, 1835, in a circular to some fifteen receivers:

"I cannot omit the occasion to impress upon you the necessity of a strict attention to, and punctual compliance with, the duties required of you in regard to the prompt deposit of the public money, and transmission of your returns; and to say to you that the performance of those duties must be regarded as paramount to all others in your official station."

Again, July 30, 1835, the Secretary writes to the receiver at Helena:

"The regular deposit of the whole of the public moneys, as prescribed by the regulations of the Treasury, and the punctual transmission of your accounts and monthly returns, ARE PARAMOUNT OFFICIAL DUTIES."

I give these extracts from the letters and circulars of the Secretary to show that the periodical deposit of the public money was a paramount duty of the collectors and receivers.

If, then, I show that the Secretary neglected to enforce the performance or punish the neglect of this paramount duty, it may be fairly inferred that he is either unwilling or incompetent to enforce, in his subordinates, the performance of any duty whatever.

I come now to the case of Harris, which I will present in the shape of fourteen letters from the Secretary, and a rarer specimen of official correspondence cannot be easily found.

Mr. Harris was receiver of public money at Columbus, Mississippi. The correspondence commences during Mr. Taney's administration of the Treasury Department, from whom there are some three or four letters to Harris, complaining of his neglect of official duty.

I will quote, however, only Mr. Woodbury's epistles, and beg you to mark how well he enforces the performance of paramount duties. His first letter follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 6, 1835.

SIR: I regret that there should be occasion for again calling your attention to the omission to render your monthly duplicate returns to this office, for the months of November and December, (those being in arrear,) and to remind you that punctuality in this respect is indispensable.

I am, &c.,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

W. P. HARRIS, Esq.,

Receiver of Public Money, Columbus, Mississippi.

This refers to the previous defaults, and shows that Mr. Woodbury was cognizant of them. The next month he writes again:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 17, 1835.

SIR: Having received no monthly duplicate return of the transactions of your office since that for the month of October last, it becomes my unpleasant duty to call your immediate attention to the omission. Allow me to express a hope that there may be no further occasion to remind you of the importance of punctuality in the transmission of these returns.

I am, &c.,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

W. P. HARRIS, Columbus, Mississippi.

Here, it seems, Harris was in arrear for four returns; in other words, had violated four paramount duties.

But Mr. Woodbury is a man of long-suffering; so he writes again, and with some severity. He is determined to be trifled with no longer. Hear him:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, June 25, 1835.

SIR: Having, in a communication addressed to you on the 17th of March last, and on several prior occasions, urged upon you the indispensable necessity of a strict attention of making your monthly returns, and finding that no returns have been received from you since that for the month of November last, it becomes my unpleasant duty to say to you that if these in arrear are not transmitted by return of mail, I shall be constrained to report your neglect for the action of the Executive.

I am, &c.,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

RECEIVER OF PUBLIC MONEY, Columbus.

I think, if Mr. Harris don't make his returns now, he's a gone case; the Secretary is in earnest. Here is another letter. Let us see:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, August 28, 1835.

SIR: Agreeably to the intimation given you in my letter of the 20th June, it has become my disagreeable duty to report your continued neglect to the President, who has instructed me to say to you that if the monthly returns required from you by the regulations of the Treasury, which are in arrears, are not received at the Department on or before the 10th of October next, you will then be dismissed from office.

I am, &c.,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

WILLIAM P. HARRIS, Esq.,

Receiver of Public Money, Columbus, Mississippi.

There, sir, I told you so. If Mr. Harris don't make his returns by the 10th of October, he will be dismissed; the President himself has said it, and General Jackson is a man of his word.

In the mean time, however, the Secretary gives him another hint:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, September 22, 1835.

SIR: Allow me to inquire why it is that your deposits are not made in the branch of the Planter's Bank at Columbus, instead of the parent bank at Natchez? Does the branch refuse to receive them, and credit the amount at the mother bank?

I am, &c.,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

WILLIAM P. HARRIS, Esq.,

Receiver of Public Money, Columbus, Mississippi.

P.S. Your return for the month of February last has been received to-day, and shows a large amount on hand not deposited; and you are hereby required, if not already done, to deposit any balance still on hand in the above branch, to the credit of the Treasury, and forward receipts therefor, in order to save time and expense in traveling to Natchez.

Before the fatal 10th of October, the kind-hearted man writes still again, that he may give the victim one more warning before the day of grace is past:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, September 28, 1835.

SIR: I regret to say that the reasons assigned in your letter of the 14th instant, for withholding your monthly returns, cannot hereafter be deemed satisfactory. I can perceive no sufficient cause for their being delayed longer than the first week in each succeeding month, as there can be no difficulty in ascertaining at once the amount of money received within the month, or in stating the amount of your disbursements and deposits during the month. This is all that is required in them. The object of these returns is to afford the Department the earliest information in regard to the money operations of the Land Office, and the punctual transmission of all the moneys received to the bank of deposit. They are, therefore, of paramount importance, and cannot be permitted to await the completion of detailed book entries, or the perfection of other business, be its character what it may.

I am, &c.,

LEVI WOODBURY,

Secretary of the Treasury.

W. P. HARRIS, Esq.,

Receiver of Public Money, Columbus, Mississippi.

And now, sir, I am sorry to say this contumacious receiver paid no attention to these kind warnings and friendly solicitations. He did not make his returns; the 10th of October is passed; and Mr. Harris is doubtless removed; for General Jackson and Levi Woodbury have both said it. But, softly; here is a letter dated the 12th of October; no doubt it is the letter of dismissal. Let's read it:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, October 12, 1835.

SIR: Trusting to the assurances given in your letter of the 14th ultimo, and to those of your friends made in your behalf, the President has consented, upon the facts now before him, to continue you in office until the 12th of November proximo; then, unless your monthly returns are all rendered, and satisfactory evidence that the whole of the public moneys with which you are chargeable are deposited, [is received,] you must be removed from office, however painful to both him and this Department.

I am, &c.,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

W. P. HARRIS, Esq.,

Receiver of Public Money, Columbus, Mississippi.

Well, this is strange! a reprieve! and based upon Mr. Harris's letter of the 14th ultimo? Why, the Secretary says in his last, that the reasons given in this letter of the 14th ultimo, for withholding the returns, are unsatisfactory; that he can perceive no sufficient cause for their being delayed.

I wish Levi would explain why he and General Jackson violated their pledge in this case. I confess I do not understand it. I thought if Harris did not make his returns he would certainly be removed. But if he does not make all his returns and deposits by the 12th of November, he will positively have to go, "however painful" to both the President and the Department. Lest he should forget all about the matter, the Secretary in a few days writes again:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, October 26, 1835.

SIR: I have to observe, in reply to your letter of the 9th instant, that the allowance authorized by the regulations of the Department, as a compensation for traveling expenses, and risk in the transmission of the public moneys to the bank of deposit, can only be made when such expenses and risk have actually been incurred, and not in any case where both are avoided by means of the facilities afforded by the mail or deposit banks; moreover, inasmuch as the branch Bank of Columbus receives and credits the moneys received by you in the first instance, I can perceive no reason why each deposit in past months should not have embraced the whole amount in your possession at the time of such deposit, as the instructions require.

I am, &c.,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

W. P. HARRIS, Esq., Receiver of Public Money, Mississippi.

Sir, the 12th of November arrived and passed; and yet Harris had failed to deposit the public moneys with which he was chargeable, according to the requisition of the Secretary's letter. Of course he was dismissed without further hesitation, you exclaim. Not so fast; do not be rash in your conclusions. I have become suspicious about the matter since the reprieve. I do not believe now he was removed at all.

And, sure enough he was not. Here is the very next letter from the Department, talking to him as mildly as if he had never offended:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, November 28, 1835.

SIR: Your letter of the 11th instant, and return for the month of October, is received. As your deposits of public moneys are made at Columbus, no reason whatever can be seen why the whole money in your hands at the end of the month is not deposited. It is expected that it will be hereafter.

I am, &c.,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

W. P. HARRIS, Esq.,

Receiver of Public Money, Columbus, Mississippi.

Very true; no reason can be seen why he should not have deposited the money, and no reason can be seen why he was not removed for failing so long and so repeatedly to do it. But to the correspondence:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 28, 1836.

SIR: Your letter of the 13th instant, inclosing your return for the month of November, is received. Again it becomes my unpleasant duty to complain of your neglect in this respect, and to inform you that the omission to transmit the required monthly statements, for a whole quarter after they are due, cannot be permitted in any public officer; and especially after having been heretofore so often reminded of the consequences of such neglect. On the return of the mail, therefore, if the usual statements for the other months in arrear are not received, I shall be under the disagreeable necessity of again submitting the subject to the President for his immediate action.

I am, &c.,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

W. P. HARRIS, Esq.,

Receiver of Public Moneys, Columbus, Mississippi.

Why, Mr. Secretary, you are crawling out at the same place you crept in. This is the tune you played at the commencement. It is rather too late in the day to think of frightening Harris now, by threatening to turn him out, when he and everybody else know you never intend to do it.

Mr. Chairman, let me crave your patience. We are nearly through this case, and then we will rest for a moment. The following letter begins to exhibit the catastrophe:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, June 6, 1836.

SIR: Your letter of the 23d ultimo, accompanied by your returns for the month of April, is received. Seeing the balance of public moneys in your hands amounted to $128,884 70 at the end of that month, I have to request that you will explain why it was that the whole of the public moneys in your hands on the last of the previous month was not deposited, instead of a part, in conformity to explicit and frequent instructions on that point. It is painful to be obliged to ask you so often for explanations.

I am, &c.,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

RECEIVER OF PUBLIC MONIES, Columbus, Mississippi.

Yes, I should suppose it was painful. The Secretary is truly a man of much patience. He must be a lineal descendant of Job. He gives to his subordinates "line upon line," "precept upon precept," "here a little" and there a great deal. He strives hard to teach them honesty. Whether his ill success is attributable to master or pupils, I will not pretend to say.

At length Mr. Harris does what neither the President nor the Secretary dare to do—he dismisses himself from office; in other words, he resigns.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, September 21, 1836.

SIR: Your letter of the 27th ultimo, addressed to the President, has been referred to this office. Your duties as receiver will, of course, have ceased, or been suspended, after the 31st ultimo, the time when you propose your resignation should take effect; immediate steps, it is hoped, will be taken to adjust your accounts, and pay over the balance. Soon as the President returns, a further communication will be made to you.

I am, &c.,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

W. P. HARRIS, Esq., Columbus, Mississippi.

He resigns, a defaulter for $100,000. He had quite a moderate appetite, compared with Swartwout and some others.

There is but one more morsel of this correspondence on record, and it is of a piece with the balance. It consists of regret on the part of the Secretary that legal steps had been taken "to attempt to secure" what was due the Government:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, November 19, 1836.

SIR: I have received your letter of the 1st instant, by the mail of this morning, and regret to inform you that, as long ago as August last, steps were taken by the Solicitor of the Treasury to attempt to secure the balance due from you.

I am, &c.,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

W. P. HARRIS, Esq., Columbus, Mississippi.

Now, will any one dare deny that General Jackson and Secretary Woodbury were literally guilty of this defalcation? Did it not result from their wilful neglect of duty—from absolute and unqualified connivance? For two years and a half this receiver was never for a single instant out of default; he was during that whole period in continued violation of the acknowledged "paramount duties of his office." The Secretary was aware of the whole of it. The case at length becomes so ripe that it falls of itself—a good round golden apple of the value of $100,000 and upwards. And yet the Secretary swears that no such fruit grows in his garden.

But let us again take a bird's eye view of this correspondence. Let us group it: without giving the exact language, we will take the meaning—the idea.

Letter 1st. Mr. Harris, I am sorry to tell you again, you hav'n't made your returns.

2d. Mr. Harris, you hav'n't made your returns.

3d. Mr. Harris, if you don't make your returns I'll tell the President.

4th. Mr. Harris, you had better settle up; if you don't, out you go.

5th. Mr. Harris, please to tell me why you hav'n't settled; do, that's a good man.

25TH CONG., 3D SESS.

Public Defaulters—Mr. Prentiss.

Ho. OF REPS.

6th. Mr. Harris, now don't behave so.
7th. Mr. Harris, how would you feel if you were dismissed from office? Better pay up, or you'll know.

8th. Mr. Harris, it's lucky for you you've got strong friends; that's the reason we don't turn you out. But you'd better mind your eye.

9th. Mr. Harris, fie!

10th. Mr. Harris, ain't you ashamed?

11th. Mr. Harris, perhaps you don't know it, but you are very much behindhand. Do you intend to pay up, or not? I wish you would. 'Tis very strange you will hurt my feelings so, and the President's too.

12th. Mr. Harris, how comes it that you are a defaulter for $128,884 70? I don't wish to hurt your feelings, but I should like to know. I have a curiosity on the subject; can't you tell me?

13th. Mr. Harris, you've resigned, have you? Well, that beats anything. What a cunning dog you are? Feathered your nest well, ha? I'll tell the President all about it when he comes home. How he will laugh!

14th. Dear Mr. Harris, I regret to tell you that the rascally Solicitor of the Treasury is a going to try and recover back that money you've got, which belongs to the Government. Never mind; we'll fix it some way.

Such is an epitome of the correspondence of Levi Woodbury, Secretary of the Treasury, and constitutional adviser of the President. What a rich specimen of an American statesman!

But to our task. The next defaulter whom I shall mention was Boyd, the successor of Harris, a "follower in the footsteps." In little better than six months after he had been in office, we find the following account of his fidelity. It is extracted from the report of one V. M. Garesché, who was sent out by the Secretary to examine the condition of the land offices. It is dated 14th June, 1837. In relation to Boyd, he says:

"The account of the receiver, which I have made out and transmit herewith, presents against him a balance of $55,965 34. His own account makes it $53,272 73; it is also annexed. His assets, of which I also send you the list, amount to $61,549 98, voting the land at $25 only, but might probably realize double the amount. The man seems really penitent; and I am inclined to think, in common with his friends, that he is honest, and has been led away from his duty by the example of his predecessor, and a certain looseness in the code of morality, which here does not move in so limited a circle as it does with us at home. Another receiver would probably follow in the footsteps of the first. You will not, therefore, be surprised to recommend his being retained, in preference to another appointment; for he has his hands full now. He will have not been disposed to speculate any more. He will have his bond signed by the same sureties, and forwarded in a few days to Washington. This speaks favorably. He has, moreover, pledged his word that, if retained, he will strictly obey the law, and receive nothing but specie in payment for lands. He tells me that he is about selling a great portion of his lands; that, and some other negotiation, will enable him to discharge a large portion of his debt to the United States before the expiration of the present quarter. Lenity towards him, therefore, might stimulate him to exertions which severity might perhaps paralyze. I have, in the mean time, enjoined the closing of the land office until the bond is completed and returned. No land has been sold since the 20th ultimo."

Sir, who but a profligate panderer could have written the above? Who but a political bawd could have received it without indignation and contempt?

"You will not be surprised if I recommend his being retained;" "for he has his hands full now."

No; I presume the Secretary was not surprised, though any honest man would have been, at the corrupt and wicked proposition.

The licentious familiarity of this, as well as other of the reports and letters to the Secretary, cannot fail of arousing in the breast of every premeditated man sentiments of scorn and disgust.

But, says this polypus feeler of Levi Woodbury:

"The man seems really penitent; and I am inclined to think, in common with his friends, that he is honest, and has been led away from his duty by the example of his predecessor, and a certain looseness in the code of morality which here does not move in so limited a circle as it does with us at home."

Now, sir, a more infamous slander was never promulgated against an intelligent and moral community; for a more upright, intelligent, and moral community cannot be found in the Republic than that which is the subject of this vile libel. Why, sir, I do not believe there is a citizen of that community who would not spurn, with honest and indignant scorn, the profligate sentiments of this self-constituted "censor morum."

No, sir; it was that looseness of political morality which marks the party in power, which more especially illustrates the official conduct of the Secretary of the Treasury, that induced Boyd to embezzle the public property.

And he did it with a vengeance. His accounts exhibit his defalcation as of some fifty or sixty thousand dollars in money. But it was a more splendid robbery than this: it was of some twenty-eight thousand acres of the public domain, which, by virtue of his office, he transferred to himself, without even paying for it a single dollar. Sir, this was a bold operation; most of the appropriators of other people's property prefer personal chattels—something which can be concealed, and, if necessary, taken across the waters. But "there be land rats as well as water rats;" and Boyd, it seems, was a land rat. What a huge slice he cut from the public loaf!—twenty-eight thousand acres of land! Why, it is more than a German principality. The Norman robber, when he divided out the broad lands of merry England, gave not to his haughty barons such wide extent of wood and field. Who would not be the feudatory of this Administration, when the tenure is so easy, and the reward would constitute materials for a dukedom?

Sir, the Secretary deserves impeachment for this case alone. Why has he not proceeded to set aside the illegal and false titles to these lands? The receiver never had a shadow of right to them. Yet his pretended title has been recognized, and portions of the land are now being sold by the officers of the Government, as the property of the delinquent.

After this extensive land conspiracy, what does the Secretary do? Does he, with virtuous indignation, turn him out of office? No, sir. He permits him to resign at his leisure. Two months after Garesché's report, he writes him as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, August 8, 1837.
SIR: I am happy to hear of the frank and honorable course proposed in your letter of the 24th ultimo. It would be convenient to have the bond and resignation arrive here by the early part of September.
I am, &c.,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

G. D. BOYD, Esq.,

Receiver of Public Moneys, Columbus, Mississippi.

Yes, sir; according to the morality of the Secretary, resigning after robbing the Government of twenty or thirty thousand acres of land, is very "frank and honorable."

I will give you one case more, and then I am done. It is the case of Linn, receiver of public money at Vandalia.

As early as June 23, 1834, Mr. Taney wrote to him, admonishing him of his neglect in depositing the public money, and warning him of the indispensable duty of doing so.

On the 20th of October, 1834, Mr. Woodbury writes him on the same subject; calls to his mind his continued neglect and violation of this duty, and tells him that if he fails any longer in its performance, "it will be my painful duty to submit the case for the action of the Executive, and to recommend the appointment of another person as your successor."

Again, under date of 4th of December, the Secretary renews the complaint of neglect in the deposit and non-compliance with the positive directions of the Department.

Instead, however, of being removed for this continued contumacy, Linn receives the following letter from the Secretary:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 12, 1835.

SIR: Although it has pleased the President, under the explanations given, notwithstanding your past neglect in some cases to deposit the public moneys as required by law and the instructions of the Department, to reappoint you for the office of receiver of public money at Vandalia, and your nomination has been confirmed, yet it is not to be inferred from this evidence of his regard, that any future omission in this respect can be overlooked. Once for all, then, I would inform you that a strict observance of the regulations of the Department, for the periodical deposit of the public money, and the transmission of your accounts and returns, are paramount duties, the neglect of which will be reported for the action of the Executive.

I am, &c.,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

WILLIAM LINN, Esq.,

Receiver of Public Money, Vandalia, Illinois.

But it seems Mr. Linn thought differently; and came to the conclusion that, "from this evidence of the President's regard," "future omissions would be overlooked." And it seems his opinion on the subject turned out to be more correct than that of the Secretary; for, under date of July 25, 1836, we find the indefatigable Mr. Woodbury still complaining of Linn's failure to deposit the moneys on hand; yet he does not have him dismissed.

September 2, 1836, he tells him, with as much gravity as if it were for the first time:

"The Department trusts your deposits will hereafter be promptly made, and that no exchanges whatever of money will take place, on any terms, as they open a door to improper practices and unfounded imputations."

December 8, 1837, he says:

"Again it becomes my duty to call your attention to the subject of my former letters, in reference to the deposits of the public money, and to inform you that, if by return of mail, evidence is not received of your having complied with the requisitions of my letters of the 16th August and 3d November, it will be my unpleasant duty to report your neglect to the President, and to recommend your removal from office."

Well, sir, instead of being removed, he is permitted, like Boyd and Harris, to retire with honor, upon his own voluntary resignation, as appears by the following and last letter of the infamous series:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 26, 1838.

SIR: Your letter of the 7th instant is received, and your resignation is accepted by the President. I regret that so large a balance stands unadjusted in your hands, and trust that certificates of deposit for the amount with the Bank of Missouri, will, without delay, be forwarded here.

I am, &c.,
LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

WILLIAM LINN, Esq., Vandalia.

Now, how dare the President and Secretary to say that defalcation deserves to be punished with the penitentiary, when they did not consider it deserving even of removal from office in the case of Linn, who was allowed to resign and retire a defaulter for $—

But the Secretary says he was not bound to notice these defalcations; that it was impossible for him to scent them out. After reading the foregoing letters and extracts—"elegant extracts" they may be called—I am inclined to think Mr. Secretary Woodbury has taken his cue in this matter from the following fable, which, if my friend from Virginia [Mr. WISE] will do me the favor to read, he will afford a moment's relief both to the House and myself.

Mr. WISE read, with much humor, from a paper handed him by Mr. P.

"And how did it happen, Pat, that Misther Van Buren always kept in with the old General as he did?"

"Why, I'm thinking, Murphy, it was because he always had such a bad cold, jist!"

"An what had his having a cold to do with the matter, at all, at all?"

"Why, did ye never hear, Murphy, my boy, of the fox that had a cold? Then I'll tell ye. Once there was a lion that wanted to know how polite all the bastes were. So he made a great smell in his den with brimstone—or something else, I don't mind what, jist, but it smelt enough to knock you down intirely; and then he called in the bear, and says he, 'Good morning, Mr. Bear; and what d'ye think of the smell here this morning?' And says the bear, says he, 'Why, it smells bad.' 'What's that you say?' says the lion; 'take that,' says he, (ating him up altogether!) 'take that, and see if it will tache ye politeness, ye unmannerly son of a cub!' Now, when the bear was ate up, the lion called in the monkey, and asked him the same question precisely. Now, the monkey, seeing the bear that the lion had swallowed lying dead in the corner, says he, 'May it please yer Majesty,' says he, 'it's jist the most delightful smell I ever smelt in my life, at all, at all.' 'So it is,' said the lion, (patting him on the head, easy like, so as to bate the breath clane out of his body,) 'so it is,' said he, 'and now you'll not tell another lie soon, I'm thinking.'"

"Now, when the lion had kilt the bear and the monkey, he called in the fox to him, and says he, (looking very savage, and ready to ate him up if he should make the laste fox-paw at all,) 'Good morning, Fox,' says he, 'how does my parlor smelt to-day?' And says the fox, (wiping his nose with the brush of his tail, and pulling down his eyelid with his paw, as much as to say, 'D'ye see any green there, my honey?') 'Faith,' says he, 'may it please yer Majesty, I've a very bad cold this morning, and it's me that can't smelt at all, at all.' So the lion laughed, and told the fox he was a very clever baste, and he might tread in his footsteps if he could straddle wide enough, and that all the other bastes should mind him, or he would ate them up as he had done the bear."

Mr. PRENTISS. The Secretary, though in other respects he resembles a much larger and less cunning animal, yet, in this matter, has certainly taken a lesson from the fox. "He's had a very bad cold," and "couldn't smelt at all, at all." No, sir; the stench of corruption, which has been so long steaming up from his Department, has not, it seems, yet offended his olfactory. Besides all this, his friends excuse him by saying that the Government will, probably, not ultimately lose anything by these defalcations; that the money will be recovered back, either from the defaulters or their sureties.

Public Defaulters—Mr. Prentiss.

Sir, if a thief is detected, and compelled to disgorge the subject of his larceny, does it relieve the rogue and his accomplice from guilt? does it extinguish the crime? Upon the answer to this question depends the validity of the Secretary's excuse.

It is also urged in his favor, that defalcations have occurred under other Administrations; that the public money has been stolen before. This plea I feel compelled to allow to its whole extent. "Brave men lived before Agamemnon," and great rogues before Levi Woodbury. In justice to the Secretary, I cannot deny that his pets are not the first thieves on record; and I give him joy of the able defense which his friends have extracted from this remarkable circumstance.

And now, Mr. Chairman, what do you think of this Secretary of the Treasury? of his epistolary talent? of his capacity and fitness for the station he occupies? He resembles much, both in manner and morality, that worthy old lady who lived at "The Mug," in Bulwer's "Paul Clifford," and rejoiced in the name of "Mrs. Margery Lobkins," more familiarly called "Peggy Lob."

His correspondence with his subalterns cannot fail of calling to your recollection the exquisite admonitions of honest "Peggy" to "Leetle Paul."

Thus moralized, not Levi, but the kind-hearted dame:

"Mind thy kittychism, child, and reverence old age. Never steal, specially when any one be in the way. Be modest, Paul, and stick to your situation in life. Read your Bible, and talk like a pious 'un. People goes by your words more than your actions. If you wants what is not your own, try and do without it; and, if you cannot do without it, take it away by insinuation, not bluster. They as swindles does more ad risks less than they as robs."

Yes, sir; "people goes more by your words than by your actions." Well has the President studied this maxim, and cunningly did he practice upon it when he recommended that defalcation should be made a penitentiary offense. Peggy Lob placed in "leetle" Paul's hand the sum of five halfpence and one farthing. "There, boy," quoth she, and she stroked his head fondly when she spoke, (just as Levi caresses his subordinates,) "you does right not to play for nothing—its loss of time! But play with those as be less than yourself, and then you can go for to beat 'em if they says you go for to cheat."

Ay, and it has not been long since this was the doctrine of those in power, and "to go for to beat those who say you go for to cheat" became the watchword of the party. I recollect well, and my honorable friend who sits near me [Mr. Wise] recollects still better than I do, these days of terror, when he had to legislate, as he told us the other day, with "harness on;" when the best argument was the pistol, and the only law was club law. It was the time when "Hurrah for Jackson!" constituted the "open sesame" of power, which gained at once admittance into the robber's cave and participation in the plunder.

Then General Jackson had but to whistle, and

"Instant from copse and heath arose Bonnets, and spears, and berded bows."

His followers, like those of Roderick Dhu, started up in every direction, ready and eager to perform his bidding. He had but to point his finger, and his fierce blood-hounds buried their muzzles in the unfortunate victim of his wrath.

Then were the saturnalia of the office-holders; and, like the locusts of Egypt, they plagued the land. Few dared to whisper of corruptions or defalcations; and a bold man was he who proposed to investigate them, for it was sure to bring down upon his head the rage which never relented, and the anger which nothing but furious persecution could assuage.

There was one man, however, who blanched not before General Jackson's frown, and who dared to propose an investigation into frauds and corruptions which had become so palpable and gross as to be an offense in the nostrils of the community. He occupied, at that time, a seat in the other end of this building, as Senator from my own State; a State upon whose laws and institutions his talents and genius are indelibly impressed. The political history of Mississippi is illustrated by his name from its very commencement. He served her in all her departments; and as legislator, judge, and Governor, advanced her prosperity and added to her character. What he was as Senator you all know. He stood proudly among the proud, and lofty among the loftiest, at a time when the Senate Chamber contained the garnered talent of the country; when its intellectual giants shook the whole nation with their mighty strife; when, sir, it inclosed within its walls the most transcendent deliberative body that ever was assembled upon this earth. The floor of that body was his proper arena. To a correctness of judgment, which would have given him reputation even without the capacity of expression, he joined a power of debate which for parliamentary strength and effect was unsurpassed. To all this was added a stern, unyielding attachment to his political principles, and an indomitable boldness in expressing and sustaining them.

Do you not recollect, sir, when General Jackson, like Charles I., strode to the legislative chamber, and thrust among the Senators a despotic edict, more insulting than if he had cast at their feet a naked sword? It was that fierce message which commenced with breaking down the independence and character of the Senate, and finally resulted in that worse than felon act, the desecration of its records. But the mandate passed not unopposed or unrebuked.

When it burst, like a wild beast from his lair, upon the astonished body whose degradation it contemplated, and in the end accomplished, most of the distinguished Senators were absent; but he of whom I speak was at his post. Single-handed and alone, like Cæsar at the head of the bridge, he held at bay the Executive squadrons, and for a whole day drove back the Mamelukes of power; till at the sound of his voice, as at the sound of a trumpet, his gallant peers, the champions of freedom, the knights—not of the black lines, but of the Constitution—came flocking to the rescue. Sir, it was a noble scene, and worthy of the best times of the Republic. A Senator of the United States, in bold and manly pride, trampling under foot Executive insult, and protecting, at the same time, the honor of his country and the dignity of his high station. There was a moral chivalry about it far above the heroism of the field. Even now, the contemplation of it makes the blood thrill through the veins, and flush the forehead to the very temples.

I need not tell you that man's name was George Poindexter, a name that will long and honorably live among the lovers of independence and haters of tyranny. But he dared to propose an investigation into the frauds and corruptions of the Government, and from that moment his doom was sealed. The deep, turbid, and resistless current of Jacksonism swept him from the State in whose service the best of his life had been expended; and, ostracised from her councils, he became an exile in other lands.

Sir, the office-holders in this country form an oligarchy too powerful to be resisted. Why was not Spencer removed? why was not Harris? why not Linn and Boyd? I will tell you. The Administration did not dare to remove them, even had it wished to do so; like pachas, they had become too powerful for the Sultan, and would not have hesitated in twisting the bowstring round the neck of the messenger who presented it.

Since the avowal of that unprincipled and barbarian motto, that "to the victors belong the spoils," office, which was intended for the use and benefit of the people, has become but the plunder of party. Patronage is waved like a huge magnet over the land, and demagogues like iron filings, attracted by a law of their nature, gather and cluster around its poles. Never yet lived the demagogue who would not take office.

The whole frame of our Government, the whole institutions of the country, are thus prostituted to the uses of party. I express my candid opinion, when I aver that I do not believe a single office of importance within the control of the Executive has for the last five years been filled with any other view, or upon any other consideration, than that of party effect; and if good appointments have in any instances been made, and benefit accrued to the country, it has been an accidental, and not a voluntary result. Office is conferred as the reward of partisan service; and what is the consequence? Why, the office holders are not content with the pitiful salaries which afford only small compensation for present labors, but do not in their estimation constitute any adequate reward for their previous political services. This reward, they persuade themselves, it is perfectly right to retain from whatever passes through their hands. Being taught that all moneys in their possession belong not to the people, but to the party, it requires but small exertion of casuistry to bring them to the conclusion that they have a right to retain what they may conceive to be the value of their political services; just as a lawyer holds back his commissions. The Administration countenances all this, winks at it as long as possible, and when public exposure is inevitable, generally gives the bloated plunderer full warning and time to escape with his spoils.

Do you not see the eagerness with which even Governors, Senators, and Representatives in Congress, grasp at the most trivial appointments, the most insignificant emoluments? Well do these sons of the horse-leech know that there is more blood in the body than what mantles in the cheek, and more profit in an office than is exhibited by the salary.

Sir, I have given you but three or four cases of defalcations; would time permit, I could give you a hundred. Like the fair Sultana of the oriental legends, I could go on for a thousand and one nights; and even as in those eastern stories, so in the chronicles of the office-holders, the tale would ever be of heaps of gold, massive ingots, uncounted riches. Why, sir, Aladdin's lamp was nothing to it. They seem to possess the identical cap of Fortunatus. Some wish for $50,000, some for $100,000, some for $1,000,000; and behold it lies in glittering heaps before them. Not even "The gorgeous East, with richest hand, Showers on her kings barbaric pearl and gold" in such lavish abundance as does this Administration upon its followers. Pizarro held not forth more dazzling lures to his robber-band when he led them to the conquest of the Children of the Sun.

And now, Mr. Chairman, have I not redeemed my promise? Have I not shown that the President is but a hypocrite in his pretended horror at defalcation; that the Secretary is much worse—a conniver; a weak, imbecile particeps criminis? Let his defenders reconcile his conduct in the case of Harris with his official duty, with the dictates of common honesty, if they can; I dare them to the trial. Let them reconcile his licentious correspondence with Spencer, Hendricks, and more especially Garesché, with the principles of common decency.

Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to examine minutely the case of Swartwout. I know not why the President should have selected it out of so many as the subject of special communication. There is, however, one curious matter connected with this subject, which I shall notice. The President, the Secretary, and the party, all profess to unite in the belief that the defalcations of Swartwout, Price, and others, afford the best possible argument in favor of the sub-Treasury scheme. Most of these defalcations, say they, occurred under the deposit system; and, therefore, to that system these losses are attributable. Now, sir, if you will look over this Document 297, you will find that, out of the two hundred and sixty-five letters to receivers and collectors, nearly two hundred contain complaints that the public money had not been deposited in bank, but retained in the hands of the officer. If you will look into the cases of Harris and Boyd, you will see that their defalcations could not have taken place had the Secretary not indulged them in a continued and habitual violation of this duty of periodical deposits. But the proposition itself is grossly absurd. It amounts to this: that the running away of sub-Treasurers with large amounts of the public money is proof of the safety of the sub-Treasury system; in other words, stealing is proof of honesty. It is the holding of the money in the hands of the officer which produces the temptation to speculate. By having it in his custody, by continual viewing and counting, he comes at length to look upon and use it as his own.

The system is corrupt in its tendency; all experience says so. The first sub-Treasurer, since the Christian era, was Judas Iscariot; he carried the bag; and it was doubtless as much by his disposition to appropriate its contents to his own private use, as by the thirty pieces of silver, that he was tempted to betray his master.

But I understand the Executive goes still further; and, pointing to those very defalcations, demands an additional band of officers to watch the rest, and prevent them from walking in the footsteps of their predecessors. So Pisistratus gashed himself with unseemly wounds, and telling the people they had been inflicted by his enemies, asked for an additional guard to protect him. His request was granted; fifty men were given him, with whom he immediately seized upon the citadel, and became tyrant of Athens. Let the lesson not be lost, when you are asked to increase the number of the office-holders.

No, sir; these defalcations teach another lesson, and one well worth the cost, if we will but profit by its admonitions. They teach that the sub-Treasury system is but the hot-bed of temptation and crime. They teach that the public treasure cannot be safely confided to individual custody.

Sir, this Government may determine to watch, like Turks, with jealous care, its golden harem; but it will seek in vain for the financial eunuchs who have the power to guard without the wish to enjoy.

Mr. Chairman, the amount of money we have lost, great as it is, presents a question of but little comparative importance. If this whole Administration would take passage in the Great Western, and, with the Treasury in their pockets, follow after Swartwout and Price, I doubt not the country would cry "quite," and think it a happy riddance. But it is a deep and vital question, how such things are to be prevented in future; how this running sore is to be healed; how this system of negligence and corruption is to be stopped, and the action of the Government brought back to its original purity.

Give us the right sort of a committee—one that will go through the Departments as Van Tromp swept through the British channel, with a broom at the mast head—and something, perhaps, may be done. But for my own part, I look for no permanent good except in a change of rulers.

This Administration was "conceived in sin and brought forth in iniquity;" it has not belied its parentage. It is essentially and radically corrupt. In the language of an English historian, describing the reign of Henry VIII., "it has attained as near to perfect depravity as the infirmities of human nature would permit." Just before an election it will talk of reform, and deprecate, with holy horror, the consequences of its own misdeeds; but no sooner is the object accomplished, than it returns to its policy, like a dog to his vomit.

I have no hope of reform in the party in power; my only hope is, that the people, convinced of their hypocrisy and wickedness, will hurl them from the high places they have so long disgraced. That a consummation so devoutly to be wished for may be obtained, let us unite in exhibiting to the country their true principles; let us fasten upon them the responsibility of their actions. In this patriotic work I trust I shall find with me my honorable friend from South Carolina who sits near me, [Mr. PICKENS.] Often has he led the fierce assault against these very corruptions. "Has his hand waxed weak, or his heart waxed cold," that his war-cry has not yet tingled in our ears? Surely the "horn of Roland" will sound again; surely in this, his favorite battle, he will strike one more blow for Christendom before he renounces the cross and assumes the turban. Sir, I see by his flashing eye his soul is with us; the spirit of the past is rising before him; he recollects that many moons have not yet waxed and waned, since this very party who now claim him as an ally, crouched and howled like an exorcised demon beneath the magic of his burning words. Let him come out from among them—he and his friends, for they are not of them: eagles mate not with kites and carrion crows.

Sir, I should rejoice to see the gallant gentleman resume his original position. I should be proud to win my spurs under so well approved and accomplished a leader.

Let me call to his mind a fable, with which he is doubtless familiar. A gaunt and ravenous wolf, hastily gorging the spoils of some plundering expedition, was choked by a bone, and lay at the point of death. A stork happened to be passing that way, and, moved by an ill-judged pity, extended her long neck down the wolf's throat, and extracted the bone. Upon modestly suggesting the propriety of some reward for so generous an act, the stork was told, with a wolfish scowl, that she ought to consider herself fortunate that her head was not bitten off during the operation.

Now, I take it that it requires no name written beneath this picture, to enable the most obtuse to recognize in the ravenous wolf the present party in power. The picture will also call to mind how this party, some years ago, while gorging with wolfish appetite upon the "spoils," got a bone in its throat, and lay at the point of dissolution. I leave it to the sagacity of the gentleman from South Carolina to finish the resemblance; to say who acted towards the Administration the part of the benevolent stork; and to reflect upon the boon she is likely to receive for her kindness.

Sir, the immense peculations of Swartwout, Price, and others, or rather the exposure of them, has alarmed the Administration.

They propose to make up the losses by retrenchment. And what do you suppose are the subjects of this new and sudden economy? What branches of the public service are to be lopped off on account of the licentious rapacity of the office-holders? I feel too indignant to tell you.

Look into the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and you will find out. Well, sir, what are they? Pensions, harbors, and light-houses. Yes, sir, these are recommended as proper subjects for retrenchment. First of all, the scarred veterans of the Revolution are to be deprived of a portion of the scanty pittance doled out to them by the cold charity of the country. How many of them will you have to send forth as beggars upon the very soil which they wrenched from the hand of tyranny, to make up the amount of even one of these splendid robberies? How many harbors will it take—those improvements dedicated no less to humanity than to interest; those nests of commerce to which the canvass-winged birds of the ocean flock for safety? How many light-houses will it take? How many of those "bright eyes of the ocean," as my friend from Virginia beautifully calls them, are to be put out? How many of those faithful sentinels who stand along our rocky coast, and, peering far out in the darkness, give timely warning to the hardy mariner where the lee-shore threatens; how many of these, I ask, are to be discharged from their humane service? Why, the proposition is almost impious. I should as soon wish to put out the stars of heaven.

Sir, my blood boils at the cold-blooded atrocity with which this Administration proposes thus to sacrifice the very family jewels of the country to pay for the consequences of its own profligacy. If they wish to retrench, let them cut down salaries, instead of light-houses; let them abandon offices instead of harbors; let them turn out upon the world some of their wide-mouthed parisons instead of the soldiers of the Revolution.

Mr. Chairman, I have done. I had intended to notice other portions of the message, but shall defer it, for I have already too far taxed the patience of the committee. I shall vote in the House for an investigation, though I do not expect much from it. My hope is in an investigation by a higher authority than this House—by the people. The evil of the times lies not in particular cases, but in the principles of the party. Legislation cannot reach it. It is a radical evil, and the people alone can cure it. That they will do so, and in the only way it can be done—by a change of rulers—I have a high and holy confidence. This Administration has eaten, like a cancer, so far into the institutions of the country that, unless the remedy be soon applied, it will be too late. I do most conscientiously believe that if the present dynasty is continued in power, constitutional liberty cannot survive. Already our institutions are half corrupted; already anarchy and despotism are leagued together against the Constitution and the laws. Let him who doubts it look at the proceedings in a neighboring State, and the conduct of the Federal Executive in relation thereto.

Let Mr. Van Buren be reelected; let him continue to be guided by the counsels of Mephistophiles and Asmodeus, the two familiars who are ever at his elbow—those lords, the one of letters and the other of lies—and it will not be long that this mighty Hall will echo to the voice of an American Representative. This Capitol will have no other uses than to attract the curiosity of the passing traveler, who, in melancholy idleness, will stop to inscribe upon one of these massive pillars, "Here was a Republic!"

SPEECH OF HON. HENRY A. WISE,

OF VIRGINIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

December 21, 1838.

On the subject of the late defalcations.

Mr. WISE rose to address the House, on Mr. CAMBRELENG's motion for a select committee to investigate the defalcation of Samuel Swartwout, late collector at New York. Several gentlemen solicited him to defer his remarks until to-morrow. Mr. WISE declined, and said:

Mr. SPEAKER: After once losing the floor in the manner I did, by complying with such requests the other day, and by your decision yesterday, that petitions had precedence for thirty days over this motion, I feel very timid of locofocoism in yielding it again. I see, sir, gentlemen desire that this discussion should not proceed, at least not yet. They are afraid that public sentiment will be forestalled. They are heartily sick of this subject already, and would gladly get rid of it altogether. For their sakes, then, I shall go on; let them be patient under the operation; if they are hungry, let them go home and get their dinner; I shall not have concluded before their return; for, by refusing me leave to proceed yesterday, they have only given me more time to provide more materials; they have only laid up for themselves wrath against the day of wrath. I feel better prepared, much better, in body and mind than I was before; and, with this bank of documents before me, I could rain forty days and forty nights upon their sins and iniquities!

Sir, in my rambling remarks the other day I said many things which I will prove now. I said the proposition of the gentleman [Mr. CAMBRELENG] did not go far enough. Instead of inquiring only into the manner and extent of Swartwout's defalcation, it should propose an investigation of the official conduct of the Secretary of the Treasury, with a view to his impeachment, if sufficient be found on which to base the articles of specification.

Let gentlemen understand me. I measure my terms. I speak in no spirit of bravado. I declaim not when I say that if a majority of this House would do their duty without fear, favor, or affection, the Secretary of the Treasury would, before this House adjourns, be impeached. If ever a felon deserved the hangman's knot, the Secretary of the Treasury, Levi Woodbury, deserves impeachment! That is the proposition which I will now proceed to demonstrate.

This is a bold declaration; I know the weight of its responsibility; it requires some exertion to prove it; and I must be permitted to go back a little, to take a review of the past, from the beginning, and to gather, and group, and array all my exhibits and proofs.

To go back to the beginning, then; you all know that this present Administration that now is, is only a continuation of the one which went before it; a different stage of the same disease. It came into power a reform Administration, an investigating Administration! Yes, sir, they were hot in the pursuit and detection of all the iniquities of the reign of the venerable gentleman before me, [Mr. ADAMS,] and they found victims on whom to glut and gorge their party vengeance, on whom to vent their holy hatred of corruption, and through whom they might gain public confidence by making an example of one offender, which would at once blast the character of the past Administration, and emblazon their own immaculate purity and self-righteousness. They succeeded. Their first and last victim was Tobias Watkins; they seized upon him and his effects, incarcerated him nearly four years for a defalcation of less than $4,000, prostrated the power and the party which trusted him with place, and ingratiated themselves in the favor of the nation as pure patriots and honest men who would reform and retrench all abuses, and who were themselves incapable of like transgressions.

They were vigilant and faithful, energetic and efficient, untiring and relentless; they swept like new brooms; they swept clean as long as any of the dirt of the Adams administration was left in any of the Departments. They, in this time, exposed all the enormities of their predecessors, and began to form a character for themselves. It was thought that they—they who had been such scourges to all offenders against the purity of the Government, would hardly be suspected of like offenses themselves. But mark you, sir, as soon as the immaculate administration of General Jackson had been long enough in power to conceive iniquity and bring forth corruption and crime, worse—tenfold blacker than had ever before been perpetrated, all at once we witness an entire change, and hear from “the party” a different tone. The cry of corruption was now heard from another quarter; the trumpet-blast came loud and long from a different point of the field. The Post Office Department was first charged with every crime in the calendar of malversation and malfeasance in office. The charges were denied; those who made them vilified; and investigation was scorned and scoffed at, until the complaint became too popular to be unheeded longer. A committee was at last granted by both Houses of Congress; their investigations could not be stifled; and their reports from both sides, in both branches of Congress, exposed more bribery and corruption, more flagrant violations of official duty and crying abuses of official power and trusts, than had ever been charged or dreamed to exist. The Administration made a narrow escape; they ran the gauntlet through this exposure, and they were by it taught a lesson which they have ever since remembered—not foolishly again to grant or yield so another investigation. To appease the public indignation, Mr. Barry, the only honest man among that den of thieves, was given over to the tender mercies of—what? A FOREIGN MISSION! O. B. Brown was permitted to resign with eclat and the gains he had laid up against a day of trouble from the profits of favored mail contractors, and the rest and worst of the robbers were retained in their places.

But, sir, I was not for permitting the Administration to be “whipped and cleared” after conviction upon indictment against one Department, the Post Office alone. I believed that there were other Departments as foul, and that investigation was more necessary in the Treasury Department, especially, than any other. I so charged during the long session of 1835-36. I was laughed at as a madman. The Globe denounced me as the tool of a faction, and daily were I and my friend [Mr. PERRY] placarded for calumny and falsehood, “by authority,” in the official organ. During that session, whilst there was time to investigate, we were not heeded, except by bitter denunciation for false clamors. But our clamors brought forth fruit at the next session—an official notice, though indirect, in the message of the President—the “last annual message” of the greatest and best.

In December, 1836, General Jackson sent to us his “last annual message,” in which he gave a certificate of honesty, probity, and good demeanor to all the officers of all the Executive Departments. It was given, no doubt, expressly to falsify the charges which had been intimated by myself and others at the previous session respecting the then connection between the Treasury and Reuben M. Whitney. He held to Congress this language:

“Before concluding this paper, I think it due to the various Executive Departments to bear testimony to their prosperous condition, and to the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted. It has been my aim to enforce in all of them a vigilant and faithful discharge of the public business; and it is gratifying to me to believe that there is no just cause of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which they have fulfilled the objects of their creation.”

And, sir, as if to give this certificate all possible solemnity of asseveration, it was made immediately to precede that closing paragraph in which as with a sigh of regret heaved from the bosom of the old Cæsar at the thought of leaving power, he pours out his gratitude to his fellow-citizens for their encouragement and support—expresses his consciousness of having come short of all he desired to accomplish, his confidence in a favorable construction of his motives, his consolation that his errors would find a corrective in the intelligence and patriotism of those who would succeed him, his inspiration of increased confidence in our institutions, and his pledge, if spared by age and infirm health in retirement, so much desired by him, to invoke that beneficent Being to whose providence we were already so signally indebted, for the continuance of His blessings on his beloved country.

We will soon see whether there were errors to be corrected, and time has developed whether “intelligence and patriotism, sufficient in those who succeeded him, have been found to apply the ‘corrective.’”

Sir, I forthwith joined issue with the propositions of this certificate. I reviewed this “last annual message” in a speech, to which I now refer, as part of the “res gesta” of this subject. I denied the proposition—

1. That the various Executive Departments were in a prosperous condition.
2. That they had been conducted with ability and integrity.
3. That it had been the aim of the Executive to enforce in all of them a vigilant and faithful discharge of the public business.
4. That there was no just cause of complaint from any quarter at the manner in which they had fulfilled the objects of their creation.

I charged the very reverse of these propositions upon the pure, virgin administration of him who could do no wrong, and declared it was more corrupt than that which had, on the plea of corruption, been thrust out of power. I pledged the proof, and demanded a committee. It was not until within one month and twelve days of the 4th of March, 1837, of the expiration of the Twenty-Fourth Congress, that I was able to wring from a reluctant Executive majority the appointment of a committee of investigation. It would never have been granted had not an issue been tendered by the President himself.

And here, sir, before I proceed in the regular chronology of my history of investigation, I must pause to draw your attention to the message of President Van Buren, of December 10, 1838, transmitting Mr. Secretary Woodbury's report of December 6, 1838, “in relation to the RECENTLY DISCOVERED default of Samuel Swartwout,” &c. Such is the new title of this old work! The fact disclosed in this report, to which I wish to call your attention, is, that the deficit of Mr. Swartwout at the end of each successive year was as follows:

On the 31st December, 1830.....	$692 34
On the 31st December, 1831.....	1,168 87
On the 31st December, 1832.....	30,801 33
On the 31st December, 1833.....	35,298 54
On the 31st December, 1834.....	50,370 04
On the 31st December, 1835.....	137,061 69
On the 31st December, 1836.....	336,718 69
On the 31st December, 1837.....	1,016,955 32
On the 28th March, 1838.....	1,225,705 69

Thus is it now officially reported by Mr. Woodbury in 1838, who was himself Mr. Secretary at the head of the Treasury Department, in December, 1836, when the certificate was given, that then, at the very date of the presidential certificate of honesty and probity, ability and integrity, Mr. Swartwout's deficit was $336,718 69! So much for the “integrity” of the chief officer of the custom-house at New York. While I was denounced for insinuating even a breath of suspicion that any one of the President's pets was impure, here was the officer in receipt of customs at the very flood-gate of duties—the very emporium of commerce, embezzling public money to the tune of $336,000! And was he alone a defaulter? Was it at the receipt of customs alone that the public money was purloined? No, sir. Other Judases held the other bags. The receivers at the land offices, too, were, at the same date, equally in default, morally, and in a pecuniary point of view. There were tens and fifties of cases even worse in moral turpitude, though less in amount of dollars and cents, than the case of Swartwout, as I will show directly by House document No. 297, dated March 30, 1838, containing the official correspondence of Mr. Woodbury with receivers, and the reports of commissioners upon the “condition” of their offices; a document which shows defaulting receivers were as numerous as land offices themselves. I did not know of these cases then; no one had heard a whisper of the defalcations of a single one of the long list which is now reported. All was then kept quietly and snugly concealed in the dark chamber of Mr. Woodbury's secret cabinet. I did not know, but, in Yankee phrase, I “guessed” a great deal, though not half of what is since told.

To return to my history. I challenged the opportunity of inquiry and investigation, and not until the 17th day of January, 1837, the session necessarily to expire on the 4th of March, it was granted—grudgingly, delusively, hypocritically, it is true, but it was granted.

Now, let us see what then were the doctrines and practices of the administration, of the President, of the heads of Departments, of the Speaker of this House, of the committee appointed by him, of the House itself, and the whole party, touching the rights and powers and duties of investigating the official abuses and corruption in the Government?

Sir, the whole party, from the President down to you, sir, resorted to every device to evade, and finally defied and denounced, all inquiry and all investigation. You all attempted to bell the cat! You warned the rats. You hid them. After ostensibly giving full scope in the resolution of inquiry, to gull the people with fair pretensions, you shut the doors of the Departments; you silenced all resolutions and interrogatories in the committee rooms!

On the 17th day of January, 1837, the House of Representatives passed the following resolution:

“Resolved, That so much of the President's message as relates to the ‘condition of the various Executive Departments, the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted, the vigilant and faithful discharge of the public business in all of them, and the causes of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which they have fulfilled the objects of their creation,’ be referred to a select committee of nine members, with power to send for persons and papers, and with instructions to inquire into the condition of the various Executive Departments, the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted, into the manner in which the public business has been discharged in all of them, and into all causes of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which said Departments, or their bureaus or offices, or any of their officers or agents of every description whatever, directly or indirectly connected with them in any manner, officially or unofficially, in duties pertaining to the public interest, have fulfilled or failed to accomplish the objects of their creation, or have violated their duties, or have injured and impaired the public service and interest; and that said committee, in its inquiries, may refer to such periods of time as to them may seem expedient and proper.”

The committee appointed by you, sir, was constituted thus: Mr. WISE, Mr. PEARCE of Rhode Island, Mr. MÜHLENBERG, Mr. CAMPBELL, Mr. HANNEGAN, Mr. PARKS, Mr. LINCOLN, Mr. MANN of New York, and Mr. CHANEY.

Six good liege men, and true, to three in favor of investigation! Thus constituted, stocked, the committee went to work; proceeded with its task until the 3d day of March, 1837, and on that day made three reports, as was to have been expected. One report was signed by the majority of six, the other by the minority of three, and I made a separate report, in which Messrs. LINCOLN and CAMPBELL did not or could not unite, for want of time to examine it in detail. If I am wrong in assigning this reason for not having his signature with mine, the gentleman, [Mr. LINCOLN,] now present, will correct the statement.

Mr. LINCOLN here nodded assent to its truth. Mr. WISE. This report at large, written and composed wholly by myself, I beg leave to read in part, as the best commentary I now can make upon the history and proceedings of that committee.

25TH CONG....3D SESS.

Public Defaulters—Mr. Wise.

Ho. of Reps.

[Mr. W. read that part of his report which showed that the committee was not organized until the 21st of January; that the resolution of the committee was broad enough to embrace every species of legitimate inquiry; that there were many subjects of inquiry near at hand which the committee could pursue; that they took up four of them, and adopted four resolutions: first, as to patronage to the public press; second, as to appointments without consent and advice of the Senate; third, as to contingent expenses of Departments; fourth, as to sinecures; that these resolutions were all amended by the President's own friends by inserting the words "without authority of law;" that they were adopted on the 23d of January, 1837; and he, as chairman, was ordered to communicate them to the President and heads of Departments; and that he did communicate them on the 24th of January, in a respectful note; that, on Friday, the 27th of January, Mr. Wise was called on, together with Mr. BELL and others, by Mr. MANN, of New York, to answer the question: "Do you, of your own knowledge, know of any act by either of the heads of the Executive Departments which is either corrupt or a violation of their official duties?" That he (Mr. Wise) was proceeding to answer this question, when the Private Secretary of the President entered the committee room, and presented to the committee the following letter in reply to his of the 24th, communicating the resolutions of the committee:

WASHINGTON CITY, January 26, 1837.

SIR: I received, on the evening of the 24th instant, your letter, covering a copy of certain resolutions purporting to have been adopted by a committee of the House of Representatives of which you are chairman, and request that you will lay before that committee this, my reply, which I hasten to make.

It appears, by the published proceedings of the House of Representatives, that the committee of which you are chairman was appointed on your motion. The resolution offered by you, and finally adopted by the House, raised a direct issue with that part of my annual message in which I held the following language:

"Before concluding this paper, I think it due to the various Executive Departments to bear testimony of their prosperous condition, and to the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted. It has been my aim to enforce, in all of them, a vigilant and faithful discharge of the public business; and it is gratifying to me to believe that there is no just cause of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which they have fulfilled the object of their creation."

Your resolution is in the following words:

"Resolved, That so much of the President's message as relates to the condition of the various Executive Departments, the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted, the vigilant and faithful discharge of the public business in all of them, and the causes of complaint from any quarter, at the manner in which they have fulfilled the objects of their creation," be referred to a select committee, to consist of nine members, with power to send for persons and papers, and with instructions to inquire into the condition of the various Executive Departments, the ability and integrity with which they have been conducted, into the manner in which the public business has been discharged in all of them, and into all causes of complaint, from any quarter, at the manner in which said Departments, or their Bureau or offices, or any of their officers or agents, of every description whatever, directly or indirectly connected with them in any manner, officially or unofficially, in duties pertaining to the public interest, have fulfilled or failed to accomplish the object of their creation, or have violated their duties, or have injured and impaired the public service and interest; and that said committee in its inquiries may refer to such periods of time as to them may seem expedient and proper."

It also appears from the published proceedings of the House that this resolution was accompanied and supported by a speech of considerable length, in which you prefaced many severe but vague charges of corruption and abuse in the Executive Departments. The resolution adopted by the committee, as well as that adopted by the House itself, must be taken in connection with your introductory speech, which gives a character to the whole proceeding. When thus regarded, it is obvious that, by the resolution of the House, an issue is made with the President of the United States, as he had alleged in his annual message that the heads of the Executive Departments had performed their official duties with ability and integrity. In your speech you denied this; you charged them with manifold corruptions and abuses of trust, as you had done in former speeches, to which you referred; and you demanded an investigation through the medium of a committee. Certain other members of Congress, as appears by the published debates, united with you in these accusations; and for the purpose of ascertaining their truth or falsehood, the committee you demanded was ordered to be raised, and you were placed at its head. The first proceeding of the investigating committee is to pass a series of resolutions, which, though amended in their passage, were, as understood, introduced by you, calling on the President and the heads of the Departments—not to answer to any specific charge; not to explain any alleged abuse; not to give information as to any particular transaction; but assuming that they have been guilty of the charges alleged, calls upon them to furnish evidence against themselves!

After the reiterated charges you have made, it was to have been expected that you would have been prepared to reduce them to specifications, and that the committee would then proceed to investigate the matters alleged. But instead of this you resort to generalities even more vague than your original accusations; and in open violation of the Constitution, and of that well-established and wise maxim, "that all men are presumed to be innocent until proven guilty according to the established rules of law," you request myself and the heads of the Departments to become our own accusers, and to furnish the evidence to convict ourselves; and this call purports to be founded on the authority of that body in which alone, by the Constitution, the power of impeaching us is vested! The heads of Departments may answer such a request as they please, provided they do not withdraw their own time, and that of the officers under their direction, from the public business, to the injury thereof. To that business I shall direct them to devote themselves, in preference to any illegal and unconstitutional call for information, no matter from what source it may come, or however anxious they may be to meet it. For myself I shall repel all such attempts as an invasion of the principles of justice, as well as of the Constitution; and I shall esteem it my sacred duty to the people of the United States to resist them as I would the establishment of a Spanish Inquisition.

If, after all the severe accusations contained in the various speeches of yourself and your associates, you are unwilling, of your own accord, to bring specific charges, then I request your committee to call yourself and your associates, and every other member of Congress who has made the general charge of corruption, to testify before God and our country, whether you or they know of any specific corruption or abuse of trust in the Executive Departments; and, if so, what it is. If you are able to point to any case where there is the slightest reason to suspect corruption or abuse of trust, no obstacle which I can remove shall be interposed to prevent the fullest scrutiny by all legal means. The offices of all the Departments will be opened to you, and every proper facility furnished for this purpose.

I hope, sir, we shall, at last, have your charges, and that you will proceed to investigate them, not like an inquisitor, but in the accustomed mode. If you either will not make specific accusations, or if, when made, you attempt to establish them by making freemen their own accusers, you will not expect me to countenance your proceedings. In the short period which remains of my official duty, I shall endeavor, as I have heretofore endeavored, to fulfill the obligations of that oath of office by which I engaged "to the best of my ability, to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States;" and for this, and other reasons of the most solemn character, I shall, on the one hand, cause every possible facility, consistent with law and justice, to be given to investigation of specific, tangible charges; and, on the other, shall repudiate all attempts to invade the just rights of the Executive Departments, and of the individuals composing the same. If, after all your clamor, you will make no specific charges, or bring no proof of such as shall be made, you and your associates must be regarded by the good people of the United States as the authors of unfounded calumnies; and the public servants whom you have assailed will, in the estimation of all honorable men, stand fully acquitted.

In the mean time, I cannot but express my astonishment that members of Congress should call for information as to the names of persons to whom contingent moneys are paid, and the objects of those payments, when there are six standing committees, under the 7th rule of the House of Representatives, whose special duties are to examine annually into all the details of those expenditures in each of the Executive Departments. The like remark is applicable to some other branches of the information sought by you, ample details in respect to which are to be found in the reports laid before Congress, and now on your files; and to which I recommend you to have recourse.

I am, respectfully, &c., ANDREW JACKSON.
To the Hon. HENRY A. WISE, Chairman of the Investigating Committee on the Abuses and Frauds of the Executive Departments—charged.]

Sir, this was an extraordinary letter to be addressed by the President of the United States to a committee of the House of Representatives. It at once explained to me why I had been called on first to purge myself on oath of all knowledge of Executive corruption. I immediately changed positions with Mr. MANN—assumed the seat of interrogator, and put him upon the witness stand, as to what information he had been carrying to the palace of the proceedings of a committee of the House of Representatives charged to inquire into executive abuses. He admitted, on oath, that he had informed the President of our proceedings, and swore that "the President told" (him) "that he would desire" (the) "committee to examine, upon oath, such gentlemen as had charged corruptions and abuses against the heads of the Executive Departments." But, sir, the report is the best history and commentary upon this extraordinary letter and all its incidents.

[Mr. W. again read from his report, showing "this letter to be an official assumption of authority by the Executive over the proceedings of the House of Representatives, and over the proceedings of one of its committees; an official attack upon the privileges of members of both Houses of Congress; and that it opposed an unauthorized resistance to the just powers of the House and its committee, in direct hostility to inviolable principles necessary to the administration of a free Government;" that the letter was official; that in this official letter the President assumed authority over the proceedings of the House; it shows he did not look to the results alone of those proceedings, but assumed to look behind them, and to supervise what each House, for itself alone, by the Constitution, has power to determine—the proceedings by which it arrived at those results; that the President did not look to the resolution alone, but to its mover and its advocates, and to their speeches on this floor; that the President assumed to control as well as supervise the proceedings of this House; that the House had ordered an inquiry into the condition of the Government; that, in coming to that order, it was contended in debate there should be specific charges on the one hand, and on the other that, whether the condition of the Government was good or bad, it was simply a duty of Representatives to inquire into its condition; that magistrates were but trustees and servants of the people, at all times amenable to them, and that they might be required at any time to render an account, without being specifically charged with a fault; that it was the duty of the President, by the Constitution, "from time to time to give to the Congress information of the State of the Union;" that officers were removable from office on impeachment; that the House had the sole power of impeachment, which it could not exercise without inquiring into the conduct generally of public officers; that the Congress had power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States, and it could not protect the public lands and public money without inquiring for information necessary to protect them from abuses and corruption; that, in reply to all these arguments, it was urged by the friends of the Administration that the resolution constituted an inquisition; and violated that part of the Constitution which provides—"the rights of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated."

In reply to this, it was contended that the rights here spoken of were rights of the people; that they were not the rights of the public Departments; that the Departments, the public houses, papers, and effects, were not the private property of Executive officers; that, if this resolution was inquisitorial, the standing rules of the House had, from the foundation of the Government, been standing inquisitions, which proved that the right of inquiry into the condition of the Government had never before been denied; that there were various precedents for inquiry—the resolution offered by Mr. CONNOR, in June, 1834, in relation to the Post Office Department, was general and sweeping; that General Jackson himself had, in his message of 1829, recommended "general and minute inquiry into the condition of Government," especially in relation to "frauds on the Treasury;" and upon this discussion the House rejected an amendment requiring specific charges, and thereby declared that such should not be required before "general and minute inquiry." The President said, in his letter, in direct contradiction, that he would repel all inquiry as he would the establishment of a Spanish Inquisition, unless specific charges were made. The House declared that a member should not be required to prefer an accusation before inquiry. The President declared he should be so required; and, if he did not prefer and prove his charges, he denounced him and his associates as authors of unfounded calumnies. The House declared inquiry should not be perverted into impeachment. The President declared the House should not inquire unless it did impeach. The House declared the committee to be necessary and proper by constituting it. The President denounced it as unnecessary and improper. The House resolved the committee should have power to send for persons and papers. The President declared that the heads of Departments should devote themselves to their public business, in preference to any calls for information, which he was pleased to denounce as illegal and unconstitutional.

But he not only supervised and controlled the proceedings of the House, he supervised and controlled the proceedings of its committee. He was informed by one of its members that its first proceeding was to pass a series of resolutions; that they were introduced by the chairman, and that they were amended in a particular manner on their passage. It was believed that a system of espionage was in terrible operation in this metropolis, and began to be felt throughout every precinct of power in the land; but it was not imagined that a member of Congress on a committee would degrade himself to the level of an informer, and regularly report its proceedings to the President, without license to do so. That the President controlled the proceedings of the committee by the bold request, amounting to an order to the committee to examine upon oath such gentlemen as had charged corruption and abuses against the heads of Executive Departments; that the President did inquire about the acts of the committee, was informed by a member of the committee concerning its proceedings, did indicate to that member, in conversation, and afterwards to the committee itself, in writing, his desire that it should call upon members of Congress to testify to the truth of their speeches on the floor of either House in debate; that the member and the committee obeyed his desire and request, and did cause members obnoxious to Executive displeasure to be summoned to testify in manner as the President had indicated in conversation and in his letter; and he thus repelled inquiry from the Executive, and turned an inquisition upon the two Houses of Congress, making the committee what he denounced it to be, and invaded their privileges and violated the Constitution, by holding members directly accountable to him for words spoken in debate—holding them accountable in the most odious and insulting manner, by the oppressive torture of a test oath! that the Constitution provides that "for any speech or debate in either House, the Senators and Representatives shall not be questioned in any other place;" that yet, notwithstanding this sacred protection, the President's verbal and written, his secret and open orders, were summarily obeyed by instantly summoning hoary and honored Senators, and young and inexperienced Representatives, to purge themselves, on oath, of their contempt to the Executive! They obeyed not the mandate of a master or summons of his slaves, but a sense of obligation to the country, to show that their speeches were not the declamation of demagogues, not ad captandum harangues, not merely "spargere voces," to excite false alarms, or to raise a senseless clamor, but that they solemnly believed the truths they had uttered, and were ready to seal that belief with their oaths! That if they had speed before them the whole catalogue of Executive offenses against law, liberty, right, reason, justice, truth, principle, precedent, the Constitution, and the country, they would scarcely expect to find one offense more ruthless than this official act of the President, characterized, as it was, by the worst principles, prejudices, and passions, in violation of his duty, and injurious to private rights and the public institutions!

The House, the Congress, the nation should rebuke this act with patriotic indignation—with the indignation of freemen, of jealous lovers of liberty and of the law by which it was secured; that they should defy it as they would treason and tyranny; that if this Executive act and its pretensions should be sustained and go unrebuked—if it should be settled that there should be no inquiry into the condition of Government without specific charges against its officers—that inquiry was trial and inquisition—that public officers were to be secure in their departments, and the houses, papers, and effects belonging to the people, as private persons in private rights—that public servants were as free as their masters, the people, from all scrutiny—that they were not subject, neither indeed could be, to reasonable accountability—that they must be impeached before they could be called on to report to the people—that select committees should not be appointed to ascertain abuses—that agents unknown to the law might be protected, for that very reason, from all search into their conduct—that there should be no general and minute investigation—that there was no constitutional power in the House of Representatives to inquire into the conduct of Executive officers—that there should be no inquiry tending to impugn the veracity and integrity of the President—that inquiries should tend to render odious those who institute them—that the President might supervise and control the proceedings of both Houses of Congress, and of their committees—that he might resist their just powers—that he might convert their committees of inquiry into inquisitions upon themselves—that he might officially denounce their proceedings, grossly insult their members in the discharge of their duties, and violently trample upon their most sacred privileges—then was utterly gone all purity, all honesty in the Government, its strength, its dignity, its glory, its freedom, itself?

Such, sir, was the letter of your reform President in 1837, when simple inquiries were addressed to him by an investigating committee, then in mere mockery constituted, and such, sir, were then my views of its character and tendency—views which have been more than confirmed by experience, reflection, and time. When the indictments, the prosecutions, were pressed unrelentingly against poor Watkins—when the Administration was crying, Shylock-like, "my bond, my bond!" against one of Mr. Adams's defaulters, then "general and minute inquiries" were not only lawful, but a duty; but, sir, the moment the band of investigation touched one of his "little ones," then inquiry was worse than a "Spanish Inquisition."

I did not notice the personal attacks upon me contained in this letter, because General Jackson was honored by office and by age. He had fought the battles of his country, and was the President of the United States. Besides, sir, the wrongs of the country and the Constitution merged the individual wrongs of a person as insignificant as I or any other one man or Representative. But, sir, could my voice now reach him in that retirement which he professed to desire so much, I would, with all deference to him, but with still more deference to truth and the public weal, inquire of him whether I and my "associates" were the "authors of unfounded calumnies"—whether even "the severe accusations of myself and my associates" were false—and whether "the public servants, whom we assailed, would, in the estimation of all honorable men, have stood acquitted?" I would ask him, had a full examination been permitted and aided by him, as it should have been, whether his favorites could have borne the scrutiny of inquiry, and whether inquiry would not probably have saved millions of the public money? Sir, the President, in this letter, prated about the records of the Government and the public documents as if he had read and examined them. I doubt whether he ever examined, or read to examine, any one subject thoroughly, whilst he was in office. No, sir; I venture to guess that Amos Kendall—"honest Iago"—whose official misconduct was most likely to be exposed, was the infamous author of this daring outrage; he was a tool fit to be its author, of every word and letter and doctrine of it; he was the President's thinking machine, and his writing machine—ay, and his lying machine! Sir, if General Jackson had been elected for the third term, one great good would have come of the evil—Amos Kendall would have been worked to death! Poor wretch, as he rode his Rosinante down Pennsylvania avenue, he looked like Death on the pale horse—he was chief overseer, chief reporter, amanuensis, scribe, accountant general, man of all work—nothing was well done without the aid of his diabolical genius. Since Jackson's "retirement," he has assumed to be obeyed himself, instead of being a slave. He has worked hard for his lever of mischief. God send the country may not suffer for his pains in obtaining the supremacy which he now holds.

Sir, I have read to you this letter and my report upon it, to show the landmarks of the respective positions assumed by the Executive and the Opposition in relation to inquiry and investigation, in 1837. You, see, sir, that the very first principles of our Government were denied by the President, and the very A, B, C doctrines of free government had to be contended for by the Opposition, because they were denied and scoffed at and trampled upon by the tools and advocates of a lawless power. They had the impudence to appeal even to the Constitution itself to shield them. They raised the very shield of the people themselves from unreasonable search-warrants and seizures, forsooth, as a safeguard and protection to them, the public servants, against the people's right of investigation, through their representatives, into their conduct whilst plundering the pockets of the people!

And, sir, not only did the President thus resist the right and the attempt of inquiry by the House of Representatives, but the heads of the Executive Departments, to a man, followed his example—they all replied to the queries of the committee in the same tone and temper, especially the Postmaster General, Amos Kendall.

You remember the name of the celebrated Alfred Hocker, who was so truly faithful to "the party" Democracy as to withhold the votes of the people in the election of Moore and Letcher, in Kentucky, to give the minority candidate the return, whose acts have since been made felony by the laws of that State. To reward him for that Democratic party service, an honest and faithful servant was removed from a post office at Stanford, Kentucky, in order to make room for this ex post facto felon. The committee determined to inquire into the case, and, on Tuesday, January 31, the committee adopted a resolution calling on the Postmaster General for information as to the removal of the late postmaster at Stanford, Kentucky. The next day this resolution was communicated to the Postmaster General, and on the 4th of February the following letter was received from him:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT, February 3, 1837.

SIR: I have received your note of the 1st instant, inclosing a resolution of the committee of which you are chairman, requesting me to furnish you with the following papers:

- "1. The papers relative to the removal of the late postmaster at Stanford, Kentucky.
- "2. The papers and letters recommending the appointment of any person or persons other than the individual who was appointed and who now holds the office.
- "3. The papers and recommendations in favor of the appointment of the present postmaster, Alfred Hocker."

In reply, I have the honor to state that the power of making appointments is vested by the Constitution and laws in the President, heads of Departments, and courts of law; checked, in relation to the higher appointments, by the Senate of the United States.

No power whatever in relation to them, except the power to impeach for corrupt or illegal appointments, is vested in the House of Representatives. Although there is nothing in this case (so far as I am personally concerned) I could wish to conceal, yet, believing it to be one of the duties of my station to regard the constitutional limitations of power, and that a compliance with the request of your committee would be a precedent tending to subvert them, I am compelled most respectfully to decline it.

In justice to a persecuted fellow-citizen, I deem it proper to add, that Alfred Hocker's private character is believed to be without a blemish, and his qualifications undoubted; and that to hunt him through life for an error of opinion, in a particular case, as to his legal power, appears to me as unjust as it would be inhuman.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

AMOS KENDALL.

HON. HENRY A. WISE, Chairman, &c.

Such are specimens of the conduct of the President and his heads—hydra heads they were! Now, sir, I propose to show that your committee obeyed the will of their master. Yes, as you had done, by packing and stocking the committee. It was your committee—peculiarly and emphatically yours—its appointment, its conduct, its honor or infamy, will forever attach itself, sir, to your name. In illustrating the conduct of that committee, I could consume days to show how the plainest and most obvious and undeniable propositions were voted down; how resolution after resolution, question after question to witnesses, going into the very vitals of inquiry, were unblushingly rejected and stifled by the majority of the committee. But I will give you but one specimen.

I had received information of the most outrageous frauds upon the Indians and the Government in the land sales of Mississippi, under the Chickasaw and Choctaw treaties. It was represented to me that various companies and individuals were combined in practicing these frauds; that they frequently came into conflict with each other in purchasing from the Indians; that the Government land officers there were more or less concerned in the purchases and frauds; that the settlers and honest people of Mississippi were grossly cheated and imposed upon by the speculators; that the State was likely to be shingled over with conflicting land titles; that the President of the United States, in all cases of dispute as to whom patents were to be issued, decided in the last resort; that it was found necessary to have some one interested with speculators, who had the good will and the ear of the President, to influence his decisions; that Amos Kendall was selected by one of the companies, the Boston Land Company, as their palace pimp, let into profits to the amount of $50,000, perhaps without the advance on his part of a cent, but merely in consideration of his good will with the President in deciding upon the issuing of patents. All this was given to me in writing through a responsible person, who vouched for the source whence the information was derived. This charge was handed to me in writing, with the caption, "Story of Indian reservations." When Mr. Kendall was before the committee I handed him the paper, and propounded to him the interrogatory:

"Will you please look upon the paper handed you, and state what you know respecting the facts therein spoken of?"

The question was objected to by Mr. MANN, and rejected as follows:

"YEAS—Mr. Campbell, Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Wise—3.

"NAYS—Mr. Hannegan, Mr. Muhlenberg, Mr. Pearce, Mr. Parks, Mr. Mann, Mr. Chaney—6."

The question was not allowed to be put—size-ace, or rather size-tray, was the throw. Thus shielded, Mr. Postmaster Kendall then assumed pretty high airs. He began to be bold, and actually made a fuss about the matter! Sir, he wrote us a letter—a letter full of indignant virtue! Amos's virtue! As soon as I received this letter, I immediately (February 18, 1837) offered the following resolution:

"Communication from Mr. Kendall.

"Mr. Wise presented and read a letter from Hon. Amos Kendall, with a request by the writer that it be entered on the journal; whereupon, Mr. Wise submitted the following:

"Resolved, That, whereas the chairman of this committee did offer to propound a certain question, to wit: 'Will you please to look upon the paper handed you, and state what you know respecting the facts therein spoken of?' The paper handed was in these words:

"'Story of the Indian reservations.

"Some years ago, certain tracts of land, situated principally or wholly in the State of Mississippi, were reserved by Congress (or by Indian treaty to which Congress assented) for the use of the Indians, and to be disposed of by them, and for their benefit, whenever the President of the United States should give his assent to such sale and transfer, (not otherwise). These lands were known to be very valuable, and the poor Indians could be easily enough managed—perhaps they had, or were about to leave, the east for the west side of the Mississippi river; but how to obtain the assent of the President to so large a sale of Indian lands to a company of speculators seemed a more difficult matter. A company was formed in Boston, two or three years ago, with, as it is believed, a capital of $300,000, to try to effect this object. Amos Binney, Esq., was a leading man in the company, and it is believed that Broadhead, navy agent at Boston, was another; and various other individuals had a greater or less interest in it; but what did, as is believed, obtain the President's assent to the sale and transfer, was the admission of Amos Kendall, at present Postmaster General, into the concern; he to have one third part of the profits of the speculation when it shall be closed up, without, in fact, paying one dollar of the consideration, although he may appear to have paid his part as well as all the others. Yet the agreement of the other partners with Mr. Kendall was, that they would furnish the money to pay his one third part of the consideration, free from interest, provided he, Kendall, would obtain the assent of the President to the sale, and would, when requested so to do by the other partners, go to the lands and transact such matters and things relating to their common interest as the company might deem expedient. The lands were purchased by the company; therefore, we are to infer that Mr. Kendall did obtain the President's assent to the sale; but Mr. Kendall was not, and probably will not be, called on for any further services. Those interested in the purchase speak confidently of their expectation of realizing, at the end of the sales, three or four dollars for every one invested. The people of the United States, by this transaction, have not been defrauded or overreached; but the interest of the Indians in these reservations has probably been obtained by this company for less than half its market value. How far the President should guard the interest of the Indians for him and Congress to determine; possibly it may have some connection with his oath of office. But if the interests of the Indians must or may be sacrificed, shall it be so done for the benefit of a few favorites, and at the sole suggestion of one individual, himself more deeply interested than any other?"

which this committee refused to permit to be propounded to Amos Kendall; and whereas the said Kendall has this day communicated the following letter, to wit:

"WASHINGTON, February 20, 1837.

"SIR: You will remember that, while I was under examination before your committee, an anonymous letter was produced, and made the basis of a question, which the committee refused to let me answer, although requested. Of that refusal I do not complain; but I complain that the anonymous letter was permitted to be put on your journal.

"That letter, sir, is an atrocious libel on the President of the United States and on myself, and, in all its essential parts, is utterly false. I never made such a bargain as is therein described; nor has the President, under such circumstances, or under any others, so far I know and believe, confirmed the sales of any Indian lands purchased by a Boston company.

"This infamous libel has been placed upon your journal; it is presumed it will be reported to the House, and will thus be published. And where is my remedy? By the Constitution and laws of my country, I am authorized to seek protection for my character, as well as my person, from the attacks of private citizens, in the courts of justice; but in this case, members of Congress, around whom the Constitution spreads the shield of privilege, become the publishers, and the name of the libeler is withheld from me. Of this I complain. By me, the immunity of a member of Congress, in the performance of his public duties, will ever be held sacred. But I deny his right to extend the like immunity to every villain in the country who has malice enough to stab, but not courage enough to meet the responsibility. I deny his right to receive and publish, under his privilege, any anonymous libel in any shape. To say the least, it is an abuse of a constitutional immunity, which was granted for purposes more noble and more just.

"I ask, therefore, that the name of the libeler in this case may be ascertained and communicated to me. After entering the libel upon their journal, the committee, I respectfully conceive, cannot, in justice, do less than place me in an attitude where I may avail myself of the protection and redress which the Constitution and laws promise, in like cases, to every citizen.

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"AMOS KENDALL.

"Hon. HENRY A. WISE, Chairman, &c."

this committee will proceed to examine into the facts and circumstances involved in, and alluded to, by the said question and the said letter; and will cause witnesses to be summoned to prove or disprove the said facts and circumstances.

"Which resolution was rejected by the following vote:

"YEAS—Mr. Campbell, Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Wise—3.

"NAYS—Mr. Pearce, Mr. Hannegan, Mr. Parks, Mr. Mann, Mr. Chaney—5."

Thus, sir, I took him in his temper and at his word, and proposed to try the truth of the charge and the sincerity of his passion; but the vote of the committee was the same again—the same old throw—size-tray! I had put this same interrogatory to Kendall, eye to eye, face to face. It was explicit and specific. He was willing, oh! how willing, to answer it! But then, sir, his own friends on committee were so cruel and unjust as to allow the charge to go upon the journal unanswered. Not exactly so either. I caught David Henshaw, of Boston, in the city. I put him upon the witness stand. After proposing to him numerous questions, which the committee rejected, I did get in one or two questions, and as many answers, which satisfied me fully that there was foundation for the information given to me:

"Question 9. Have you any information of persons interested with Mr. Kendall in the profits of buying and selling public land? If so, state what.

"Answer. I have no information of any persons interested, at this time, with Mr. Kendall, in the profits of buying and selling public lands.

"Question 10. Have you any information of persons who have been interested with Mr. Kendall since he has been an executive officer, in the profits of buying and selling public lands?

"Objected to by Mr. Parks, and rejected as follows:

"YEAS—Mr. Muhlenberg and Mr. Wise—2.

"NAYS—Mr. Hannegan, Mr. Parks, Mr. Mann, and Mr. Chaney—4."

The committee could not be coaxed to permit fair and full investigation.

Sir, I could show you pile upon pile of proof, but these instances will serve as specimens of the manner in which you, the Speaker, the President of the United States, the heads of the Executive Departments, your committee, and your whole party, combined and conspired to stifle investigation, when proposed in 1837.

Sir, not only did you and the Administration pursue this course upon the committee to examine the condition of the various Executive Departments, of which I was chairman, but, in like manner, you played the same game on the committee and towards the committee of which my friend and colleague [Mr. GARLAND] was chairman. You repelled inquiry, refused interrogatories, prostrated and postponed resolutions, encouraged contumacy in witnesses, resisted investigation in every form there, too, with this difference only, that there the usual throw of the die was "cinque-four" instead of "size-tray," my colleague, the chairman, usually voting with the minority of three—Johnson, Peyton, and Wise.

Such was your reform Administration! You denied, resisted, and defeated all investigation, all inquiry. One of the committee was appointed to sit on Reuben, and the other on Levi. One was to investigate the pet bank concern, the other was to examine the virtue and honesty of the Treasury Department. Sir, Reuben and Levi were then in Co—they "rode and tied." But how soon, sir, did truth—"mighty truth, prevail," notwithstanding all your resistance and attempts to stifle her mighty throes! Sir, this was in the session of 1836-37; these committees reported on the 3d of March; before sixty days expired, the explosion of the pet banks, the crush of credit, the destruction of confidence and commerce, the ruin of everything, proclaimed, thundered the truth of my charges, to establish which the Garland committee was raised—thundered it, sir, in the ears of every man—touched the nerves of every man's pocket, and was literally so tangible as to be felt by every man, woman, and child in the country. The Secretary Levi himself admitted the system to be corrupt and unsafe to the called session, and poor Reuben has been turned to the dogs. And now, sir, the truth of the charges against the Departments is about to be verified as clearly by the explosion of the sub-treasurers, Swartwout, Price, Gratiot, and others, as the truth of the charges in relation to the pet banks was made manifest by their explosion!

Some of Mr. Wise's friends entreated him to yield the floor for a motion to adjourn.

Mr. WISE. No, sir, I do not yield the floor. I may never get it again until the 4th of March, 1839. I will go on, without turning aside from my purpose, to expose these outrages upon the country. I feel better now; much better, sir. I was sick last night; these documents made me sick. I was poring over them late last night. The discussion of them makes me perspire; the perspiration comes now freely, and I am relieved. I distrust you, sir, to be frank; I will go on, and you must bear it.

First came the explosion of the pet banks—now come the explosions, one after another, in quick succession, of the sub-treasurers who were, or are to be, substituted for banks, and I will show you that they prove all I ever charged to be true.

I said that in December, 1836, when General Jackson gave his certificate that all was well, honest, fair, this very leg-treasury, Swartwout, at New York, was in default $336,718. Well, sir, now it appears that, in twelve months after, he was in default to the tune of $1,016,955! and, three months after that time, was a defaulter in the still larger sum of $1,225,705 69! Previous to my attempt at investigation, he had been stealing public money at the rate of $56,000 per annum. After the cat was belled, he stole in one year $680,236 63, and in the next three months $208,780 37. Yes, sir, after the President had given him a certificate of honesty, and you, sir, and the House, and the committee, and the Executive, had shielded him from all scrutiny, he stole in one year the sum of $680,236 63, and in the next three months at the rate of more than eight hundred thousand dollars per annum—his defalcation averaging, throughout his official career, the sum of more than one hundred and seventy thousand dollars per annum, for seven years—and this, too, we are now told, without the least suspicion! "A Jew may believe it: but I don't!"

Sir, I said the other day that I did not rejoice in these public losses and calamities, though I confessed I did feel a thrill of triumph at having gained a victory for the truth. The pet bank system and the sub-treasurers have exploded, as I said they would, and exposed their hidden enormities, concealed until they could be concealed no longer; but I do not rejoice at it. I made me no booth to sit and watch for the destruction of corrupt Nineveh. But, sir, there is one poor human being on this earth, alone now in the world, wrecked in reputation, blasted, slighted by men not half as worthy as he, whose soul at scenes like these does rejoice, must exult. Who, and where is he? Sir, if you will go down Pennsylvania avenue to the corner of Four-and-a-half street, beneath Mrs. Peyton's boarding-house, you will find a gray-headed man, stricken in years; his name is Tobias Watkins! That man, for borrowing money of public officers, funds in their hands, not converting funds in his own hands to his own use, was imprisoned on the 14th of August, 1829, and tried on three several indictments, on all of which he was convicted.

and fined, on one the sum of $750, on another $300, and the third $3,000. He was sentenced to be imprisoned three months on each indictment, in all nine months; but though imprisoned in August, 1829, he was not released until March, 1833. Kept in jail three years and six months for a real or factitious defalcation of $3,050!

Where are now the defaulters of this reform Administration? Where is Swartwout, after embezzling public money for eight years in succession, till he had taken and carried away $1,250,000? Where is Price? Where is Gratiot? How long since their carriage-wheels proudly hurled the Olympic dust of the fashionable streets and avenues of your metropolis of court and of fashion? No marshals at their heels; no district attorneys prosecuting against them triple indictments; they ran away, or walked away, unforbidden, and none to hinder! Where is Boyd? that land-office defaulter, who appealed to "the misfortunes of speculation" to elect him to the Senate of his State of Mississippi! These are all innocent and unfortunate or escaping defaulters! These are full-handed public plunderers, pet plunderers, and go "unwhipped of justice." Sir, so was Tobias Watkins unfortunate. He was born and bred a gentleman; dazzled by the tinsel glare of this metropolis of "splendid misery and shabby splendor"—as it was once, with equal force, truth, and beauty, described by that unequalled orator of Virginia, John Randolph—of liberal mind, and habits, too, he lavished some three thousand imprudently, thinking in his heart that he should be able to replace that sum, and more, and "make all straight," and he was imprisoned for his imprudence for nearly four years, and made to bear a felon's brand! Ah, sir, but he was a gentleman; he belonged to "all the decency," to the "silk-stockinged gentry;" he was not one of your Locofoco defaulters; he was not unfortunate to the amount of millions; he was no robber on a large scale; he was not one too full-handed to be touched by the rude hands of the tipstaff; he was not a defaulter of the great Democracy, and, poor fellow, he suffered for being a gentleman! By-the-by, sir, that word reminds me of the fact that it was during, or not until the past summer, your party first discovered that your President was a gentleman! The discovery was made first, I think, by granny Ritchie. That venerable gentleman took me to task for finding some gentlemen in Petersburg, and, as a set-off, it seemed, boasted that President Van Buren, too, was actually a gentleman! Very strange, that a man whom they made President, the successor of the "illustrious" in 1837, they did not find out to be a gentleman until the summer of 1838! They must surely have been trying to make him out a Whig. For myself, I always knew he was, in the ordinary sense, a gentleman; and it was mortifying to me to see that the Enquirer, by implication at least, had supposed until lately that the President of the United States could be other than a gentleman—judging, I mean, from its boast of the sudden discovery; but my colleague there [Mr. DROMGOOLE] will not, however, recognize Mr. Ritchie as a genuine Locofoco editor.

Mr. DROMGOOLE. No, no; he is a conservative.

There is a cheering consideration connected with this discovery, though by the Administration press; it is the brightest omen which has occurred for years of Mr. Van Buren's downfall. Yes, sir, that cry of "gentleman" upon him by his friends will finish him—with the party which supports him, they might as well have cried "mad dog!" It is a certain prognostic that he is going down. From the hour that father Ritchie made that fatal discovery, the man's doom was sealed. But, sir, the gentleman defaulter, Watkins, as I was saying, met his fate; and now that he has been purified by the fires of the law, we may be permitted to do him justice, and to make him the instrument of retribution. I call him up; I invoke his wrongs, his sufferings, his injuries, his expiation, to rise in judgment against his persecutors to condemn them. Where is he now? In a station where he is, no doubt, far happier than in his day of precarious and terror-haunted show, when he toiled as a poor slave in one of the stalls of your document factories called Departments. He is now an humble apothecary; and here I will say, for the benefit of all who would be honest, and who wish to be clean, that he keeps for sale the very best of "palm soap" and chloride of lime, and other chemical compositions, to take off the spots of locofocoism, and to cleanse from all corruption! I recommend to certain sub-Treasury gentlemen to go and buy; but what if they be once washed white as snow, they will, like the hog, return to their wallowing in the mire.

The Administration may pretend that they wish investigation. It is full time. But how is the matter pressed? Every now and then the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. CAMBRELENG] comes forward, and, in solemn tone, asks you to drop the subject for what he is pleased to term "business;" as if it was not the business of this House, and its chief duty now—a-days, to look into abuses. Sir, "the party" are in reality, at heart, as much opposed to inquiry now as of old. It serves their turn at this time to pretend to be diligent and zealous for inquiry. They are no more its friends now than they ever were.

Mr. CAMBRELENG. I hope the gentleman will not do me injustice. I never voted against any of his investigations. Never.

Mr. WISE. I said your party.

Mr. CAMBRELENG. My party; ha! ha! That is another affair.

Mr. WISE. Yes, sir, I believe the gentleman is "another affair" since the New York election. And now that the iniquities of your party are daily coming to light, now that concealment is no longer possible, every man of "the party" is prompt to exclaim, "you can't say I did it!"—the party itself must be brisk to make the disclaimer, lest the people set all down as rogues together, those who are found out, and those who are not. The people are beginning to compare Watkins with Swartwout—hundreds of cases of defalcation with one—thirteen millions of expenditure with thirty or forty millions—and to see that the administration of Adams, however bad, was, in comparison with the iniquities of this dynasty, about as Watkins to Swartwout—$3,050 to $1,225,000—thirteen millions to forty millions—one case of defalcation severely punished, to one hundred not only unrebuked, but countenanced and connived at!

And this, sir, brings me to the message of this session. So enormous, appalling, have your iniquities grown, that at one time we were called to an extra session to cure one system of experiments, and again another system's blotches and blains are the special subjects of Executive communications. The President himself, in self-defense, and Mr. Secretary, are compelled to acknowledge them in order to account for them. This message of Mr. Van Buren directly contradicts the letter and certificate of his "illustrious predecessor." He confesses that all the Departments are not, and were not, sound, and is all in a hurrah for investigation. Let us see:

"A change in the office of collector, at one of our principal ports, has brought to light a defalcation of the gravest character, the particulars of which will be laid before you in a special report from the Secretary of the Treasury. By his report, and the accompanying documents, it will be seen that the weekly returns of the defaulting officer apparently exhibited, throughout, a faithful administration of the affairs intrusted to his management."

Sir, quere de hoc? I will endeavor to show you directly that this is an error; that "the weekly returns," if they had been properly examined and compared in the Secretary's office, would have detected and exhibited the very reverse of "a faithful administration" long ago. But the President proceeds:

"It, however, now appears that he commenced abstracting the public money shortly after his appointment, and continued to do so, progressively increasing the amount for the term of more than seven years, embracing a portion of the period during which the public moneys were deposited in the Bank of the United States, the whole of that of the State bank deposit system, and concluding only on his retirement from office," &c.

Sir, this is a confession which tallies well with the illustrious predecessor's certificate of the "ability and integrity" of the Departments in December, 1836:

"The way in which this defalcation was so long concealed, and the steps taken to indemnify the United States, as far as practicable, against loss, will also be presented to you. The case is one which imperatively claims the attention of Congress, and furnishes the strongest motive for the establishment of a more severe and secure system for the safe-keeping and disbursement of the public moneys than any that has heretofore existed."

Ay, sir, and from this we learn the most extraordinary deduction that this defalcation of a sub-treasurer, of the "gravest character," is an argument to recommend to our favor the sub-Treasury system!

"It seems proper, at all events, that, by an early enactment, similar to that of other countries, the application of public money by an officer of Government to private uses should be made a felony, and visited by severe and ignominious punishment."

I will soon show you, sir, that millions of the public money have been applied by officers of the Government to private uses, with the knowledge of the Administration:

"The Government, it must be admitted, has been, from its commencement, comparatively fortunate in this respect. But the appointing power cannot always be well advised in its selections, and the experience of very country has shown that public officers are not at all times proof against temptation."

Is the Government fortunate in this respect? Can any one tell us how much we have lost? We have certainly been taught of late that Government officers are not always proof against temptation; and we may all verily pray that part of the Lord's prayer which prays: "Lead us not into temptation!"

"If a more direct coöperation on the part of Congress in the supervision of the conduct of the officers intrusted with the custody and application of the public money is deemed desirable, it will give me pleasure to assist in the establishment of any judicious and constitutional plan by which that object may be accomplished."

Now, sir, what would the President consider a judicious and constitutional plan? We recollect that his illustrious predecessor considered a committee to report to Congress as worse than a Spanish Inquisition. What is Mr. Van Buren's plan? We will soon see:

"I submit to your consideration whether a committee of Congress might not be profitably employed in inspecting, at such intervals as might be deemed proper, the affairs and the accounts of officers intrusted with the custody of the public moneys. The frequent performance of this duty might be made obligatory on the committee in respect to those officers who have large sums in their possession, and left discretionary with respect to others."

Sir, all this would seem to be reversing the rule and line of conduct pursued by General Jackson. He would seem to be coming at last to my doctrine of inquiry and investigation. But no, sir, hear him:

"They might report to the Executive such defalcations as were found to exist, with a view to a prompt removal from office unless the default was satisfactorily accounted for," &c.

Ah, sir, here the mystery is solved. Here is the clew to all executive concession—it is but another step to executive aggrandizement. The committee of Congress is to report to the Executive, is it? A committee of Congress is to travel all over the United States, as Executive servants, to supervise the officers of a President who is sworn to see that the laws are faithfully executed. And pray, what have we an Executive for? Why have we a President, and Secretary, and Auditors; and Comptrollers, with plenary powers, to do this very service? Could they not have done this, whenever they pleased to do their duties, for the last nine years? We are to convert our committees into missionaries. This House is to be a new sort of "American Board," with this difference, that, instead of being missionaries of Christ, we are to be missionaries of Mr. President Van Buren! General Jackson claimed it as the duty and prerogative of the Executive alone to see that his subordinates executed the laws faithfully; but his successor asks Congress to perform the executive duties for him. Does Mr. Van Buren mean to say that it has been for want of such congressional aid heretofore that there has been no such supervision by the Executive? That there has been no such supervision is true; but that such aid was wanting, or necessary, is not true. The President has always had the full power of this supervision; he might have found some honest men of his own party fit for offices, and have appointed honest commissioners to supervise those who were not fit. This, sir, is an insuperable objection, that the President not only asks us to go out of our usual course, but to become merged in the Executive. What, sir, is this House in fact, in actual service, to become an executive slave? Is it the aim of the President still more to prostrate the dignity of the legislative branch of Government? Would any other President have dared to propose such a thing? I would ask the venerable gentleman from Massachusetts whether he would have dared to ask Congress to direct its committees, by law, to report to him? That gentleman's worst foes, those who vilified him most, never charged him with thus insulting the dignity of Congress. Is this the sort of committee you are now asking from us? I would prefer that defalcations should go on; that the public moneys should all be squandered; that the public character and morals should go with it overboard, to having the great lines of demarkation between the coordinate branches of the Government destroyed, to amassing all power in the Executive. This would bring us at once, and at a leap, to the lowest degree of degradation—whither defalcations and general corruption were only gradually and slowly leading us—to the very footstool of a despot.

Public Defaulters—Mr. Wise.

HO. OF REPS.

But, sir, I come to the important question now: With what view would the President have these committees report to him? He tells us, "with a view to a prompt removal from office." This brings me to another branch of this subject. I will proceed now to show that case after case has been reported to the Executive, of defalcation, and of delinquency in office, and violation of duty, in subordinate officers—reported by commissioners appointed by the President himself—cases not only of default, but fraud, of repeated applications of public money to private uses—no less than forty since 1835, in three years—and yet the officers were retained in office, and reappointed to office after their delinquencies and moral turpitude were known to the Department. I will go further: they have been countenanced and encouraged to become defaulters, and to perjure themselves and defraud the Treasury. I am not declaiming—I will prove what I say. When I say forty cases, I mean that number, at least, which I can enumerate since 1834—I can give the names; I have them before me. I will first take up the case of Joseph Reckless, a collector at Perth Amboy, New Jersey. I advert to this case particularly to do General Jackson justice. I believe that he was imposed on in this case by a false abstract of testimony made out at the Treasury Department. William Van Hook, of New York, preferred the charges against Reckless in a letter to Secretary Woodbury:

New York, January 3, 1835.

SIR: The following facts of fraud upon the Government of the United States came to my knowledge some time since; but being desirous of satisfying myself of their truth before I submitted them to you, I delayed doing so till this time. I now feel it my duty to charge J. W. Reckless, the collector of Perth Amboy, New Jersey, with the following frauds, committed by him, in his official character, upon the Government.

First charge.—A willful omission to credit the Government, in his accounts, with the sum of $147, received by him as collector, on the 18th July, 1833, or thereabouts, for tonnage duty on the schooner Pacific, seized by his predecessor in office for a violation of the revenue law, and remaining under seizure when he came into office, and which remains unaccounted for at this time. This sum was received from Messrs. F. Secor & Son, of this city, under a compromise made with them by said collector, of the sum actually due, and which amounted to about four hundred and seventeen dollars.

Second charge.—That the said collector has charged the United States, in his quarterly accounts, a sum of about one hundred dollars per quarter, for wages of the boatmen of his revenue barge, more than he has ever paid them. The mode in which this has been effected, was by obtaining from them receipts in blank as to the sums paid, and, after paying them, filling up the amount with such sums as suited his views.

This practice commenced, I believe, with the third quarter of 1833, and has been continued in all his accounts since, as I believe; by comparing his accounts for the first two quarters of 1833 with those subsequently rendered, and by comparing them with the accounts of the collector who preceded him, I think the fact will appear.

The first charge can be proved by F. Secor & Son, of this city; and the second charge can be also proved by the comparison of the accounts, and by the boatmen in Perth Amboy, and also by F. W. Brinley, of Perth Amboy, who was his deputy for some time, and was removed from office because he would not consent to be the instrument of his frauds. Any communication you may think fit to make to me will be answered promptly.

Respectfully, I am your obedient servant,

WILLIAM VAN HOOK.

The Hon. LEVI WOODBURY,

Secretary of the Treasury.

WASHINGTON, January 5, 1835.

SIR: I transmit, herewith, a letter to you from William Van Hook, Esq., of New York, containing a representation of frauds upon the Government, committed by Joseph W. Reckless, collector of the customs at Perth Amboy, in New Jersey.

Mr. Van Hook is a gentleman of high standing for integrity, and, in addition to his representation, I do not hesitate to add my own belief of the charges made by him to their full extent. With the facts relating to the tonnage duty on the schooner Pacific, I am personally acquainted; and the receipt of the amount of $147, and the withholding the credit for it to the Government, are facts of which no doubt exists.

The overcharge of wages to the crew of the revenue boat, as detailed by Mr. Van Hook, is no doubt correct. My personal observation and knowledge of the employment of that boat (being in view of my own house) would satisfy me that the account rendered is grossly overcharged, were I not apprised of the fact otherwise.

Circumstances, unnecessary here to be detailed, have delayed the making of these charges officially before this time; but a proper examination into the conduct of the collector will substantiate these and probably other frauds.

I am, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

JAMES PARKER.

Hon. LEVI WOODBURY,

Secretary of the Treasury, Washington.

Such were the charges of Mr. Van Hook, vouched by the Hon. JAMES PARKER, then a member of the House of Representatives, and a partisan of the Administration. On the 6th of January, 1835, Mr. Woodbury notified Reckless of the charges, and asked him for explanations. January 22, 1835, Reckless replied, as follows:

WASHINGTON, January 22, 1835.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 6th instant, covering a copy of charges made against me, in my official capacity, to the Department over which you preside, by William Van Hook, and requesting to be furnished with my explanations in regard to the same. In accordance with that request, I have the honor to state, in relation to the first charge, that, when I came into office as collector at Perth Amboy, I found the schooner Pacific under seizure by my predecessor for a violation of the laws of the United States. This vessel was a foreign bottom, employed in carrying stone from South Amboy to New York, and was destitute of papers at the time she was seized.

Soon after entering upon the duties of my office, I consulted the district attorney, G. D. Wall, Esq., as to the course I should pursue. He advised me to adopt that course by which I could obtain the value of the vessel without further delay. In accordance with that advice, I made a compromise with Messrs. F. Secor & Son, who represented the owners, and received from them the sum of $200, which I considered the full value of the schooner, and a sum about what a ship carpenter valued her at. This sum was held to meet the various claims which then existed against the vessel, and for which I had made myself liable; and when paid, the balance to be brought to the credit of the Government in my accounts. The charges which I have paid are as per receipts accompanying:

August 7, 1833. M. Bruen, for wharfage.....	$23 00
Sept. 28, 1833. G. D. Wall, district attorney, for advice and directions.....	41 40
Dec. 30, 1834. B. Maurice, wharfage.....	29 29
	93 69
The sum received in compromise.....	200 00
Balance due the Government.....	$106 31

This sum will be brought to the credit of the Department, in my accounts for the present quarter.

In regard to the second charge, it is true that the quarterly accounts which have been rendered by me do embrace a sum beyond that which has been paid for wages to the boatmen of the revenue barge, because incidental expenses have been united with those under that head for the same time; but not one sou has been charged which has not been actually expended. When I came into office, I found Mr. F. W. Brinley in that of deputy collector. He suggested this mode of charging incidental expenses; by which I was led to suppose that it was in accordance with the established previous usages of the office. This mode of keeping the accounts and making those charges has continued ever since.

Any further explanations I shall at all times be happy to give, in case they be deemed necessary.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. W. RECKLESS.

Hon. LEVI WOODBURY,

Secretary of the Treasury, Washington.

With this letter the two receipts for wharfage and the receipt of Wall, were transmitted. January 24, 1835, Woodbury notified Van Hook and Parker of Reckless's explanation, in which, it will be observed, he admits second charge, and offers excuse for it. February 2, 1835, Mr. Van Hook replied, as follows:

NEW YORK, February 2, 1835.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 24th ultimo, covering the copy of the answer of J. W. Reckless to the charges of fraud preferred by me against him, and asking my "assent or dissent to the correctness of his explanations, and whether any further inquiry is desired."

Your letter would have been replied to sooner, but my absence from town has prevented it. I maintain the utter untruth of the explanations he has made. I am ready to prove the truth of the charges made in all such parts not admitted by the statement of Mr. Reckless, or fully to the extent of them as made, in such manner as you shall require. A copy of the original receipt of Mr. Reckless for the money received under the compromise, and which I can produce to you, will show a variance of the items contained in it, and in his statement, and will show an afterthought in regard to the amount he alleges he has paid out of the sum received; I can, by this and other testimony, prove that, at the time the settlement was made for the tonnage of the schooner Pacific, the accounts against her had been ascertained, and that they were separately and specifically paid for by Messrs. Secor, the owners of the vessel, and will therefore fully sustain that charge.

His accounts will show that he has applied for, and obtained from, the Treasury, large sums of money to pay the expenses of his office since the receipt of this money; and I cannot imagine a satisfactory reason, why an honest man should conceal the receipt of this sum, or any other; to me the reason he assigns is utterly unsatisfactory, because I believe it untrue.

As regards the boatmen's wages, he admits the amounts are untrue, and that the sums charged are beyond the sums paid. That charge requires no further proof, according to my understanding of his answer; should it be required, I will furnish it. I deny that the overplus money, or difference between the money paid the boatmen, has been expended for public purposes, and challenge Mr. Reckless to show the fact. I assert that it was applied to his own use, and to his emolument; and this I can prove, if it is required. As regards the reason for stating his accounts in the manner he alleges, that he has done it under the advice of Mr. Brinley; this I also deny. I will prove by Mr. Brinley that it is wholly, and in all its parts, untrue. He never advised the mode of keeping or rendering his accounts as he alleges; but, on the contrary, expressly stated to him, at the time, that it was incorrect and improper.

I am, sir, with respect, your humble and obedient servant,

WM. VAN HOOK.

Hon. LEVI WOODBURY, Secretary of the Treasury.

February 7, 1835, Woodbury notified Parker, Van Hook, and J. W. Reckless, to take affidavits, upon notice, of witnesses, for and against the charges. On the 31st of March, 1835, Joseph Marsh, Mayor of the city of Perth Amboy, returned and certified the examinations had before him.

Mr. Reckless admits that the sums set forth in the statement in the revenue boatmen's time-book, and which is set forth in Mr. Brinley's affidavit, are the sums actually paid to the boatmen, and no more, in the several quarters mentioned.

JOSEPH MARSH,

Mayor of the City of Perth Amboy.

I, Joseph Marsh, Mayor of the city of Perth Amboy, in the State of New Jersey, do hereby certify that, on the 30th day of March instant, Francis W. Brinley, Benjamin Maurice, and James Parker were severally duly sworn and examined before me, and that the said examinations are hereto annexed, and were signed by them, respectively, and were reduced to writing in my presence, except the direct examination of said F. W. Brinley, which he produced to me in his own handwriting, and was admitted by Mr. Wall, of counsel for Mr. Reckless, should be received as his examination. And I do further certify that said J. W. Reckless attended said examinations, and Garret D. Wall, Esq., his counsel, also attended said examinations.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto subscribed my name, in the city of Perth Amboy, this 31st day of March, 1835.

PORT OF PERTH AMBOY, NEW JERSEY.

The above for Francis Secor, and delivered to J. MARSH.
18, 1833.

I, Francis W. Brinley, of Perth Amboy, in the State of New Jersey, do solemnly, sincerely, and truly swear to the truth of the following statement:

That I was deputy collector and inspector of the customs for the district of Perth Amboy from the 11th day of November, 1830, to the 7th day of May, 1834; during which time I served under James Parker, collector until the 1st day of April, 1833; and on his resignation, at the last-mentioned date, under Joseph W. Reckless, his successor in office.

That during the whole of said time, it was part of my duty to prepare and make out the quarterly accounts and returns of the office, under direction of the collector for the time being, to be transmitted to the Treasury Department, at Washington, after the same had been examined, corrected, and signed by the collector.

That, in the first or early part of the month of July, 1833, Joseph W. Reckless being then collector, I made out the accounts and returns for the second quarter of that year, (ending 30th June,) according to the established forms and instructions from the Comptroller of the Treasury, which forms I had, from my first holding the office, universally followed; charging only to the revenue-boat account and pay-roll; the sums actually paid to the boatmen, which sums were ascertained each quarter from a rough book kept for the purpose, called the "revenue boatmen's time-book," wherein were noted the days and times that each of the boatmen was employed, and stating the contingent or incidental expenses of the office not chargeable to the United States in the "statement of salary, fees, emoluments, and expenditures," for the quarter, as will appear by reference to these accounts, sent to the First Auditor of the Treasury, and which were proved to be correct by their allowance without alteration. These accounts for the quarter were minutely examined by Joseph W. Reckless, and many questions asked by him relative thereto, which I answered, and also referred him to the printed forms and instructions from the Comptroller of the Treasury, and the accounts of Mr. Parker, his predecessor in the office; from which, and the knowledge he had then obtained of the duties of collector, (during the three months he had then been in office,) Mr. Reckless was satisfied of their correctness, and the same were signed by him and sent to the First Auditor of the Treasury, as before stated, and allowed without alteration.

The schooner Pacific (foreign bottom) had, previous to the resignation of Mr. Parker, been seized by him for transgressing the laws of the United States regulating the coasting trade, by carrying stone from the State of New York to the Camden and South Amboy railroad, at South Amboy; and, in the answer of the Comptroller of the Treasury, under date of the 6th of February, 1833, to Mr. Parker's letter advising of the seizure and requesting instructions, he directs "to charge the vessel for every trip you can ascertain she has made since she was sold in the United States." Mr. Parker accordingly proceeded to collect proof, and obtained from Mr. Thomas Conover, agent at South Amboy for the Camden and Amboy Railroad, a list of the dates of eleven trips made by the schooner from the date of Mr. Conover to Mr. Parker was dated the 19th of February, 1833; and (with the letter of the Comptroller) is, or ought to be, now on file in the collector's office at Perth Amboy. These two letters were handed over by Mr. Parker to Mr. Reckless, on the 1st day of April, 1833, with a memorandum of the date of the seizure, of the time the vessel had subsequently lain at the wharf of Matthias Bruen, and the date when she was taken from thence to the wharf of Mary Ann Patrick; at which latter wharf she was still lying under seizure on the 1st of April, 1833. The bill or memorandum delivered by Mr. Parker to Mr. Reckless was as follows:

Charging the vessel with admeasurement.....	$0 75
75 80 95ths tons, at fifty cents per ton, $37 90—eleven trips.....	416 90
Wharfage at Mr. Bruen's wharf, (stating the dates and time).....	23 00

Date when the vessel was removed to M. A. Patrick's wharf, and rate of wharfage.

The schooner continued to lie at Mrs. Patrick's wharf until she was given up by Mr. Reckless.

In July following (1833) I was informed by Mr. Reckless that he had agreed to deliver up the schooner to Francis Secor & Son, New York, who were, or who represented the owners, for $200.

I stated to Mr. Reckless, that this arrangement did not follow the instructions of the Comptroller of the Treasury in his letter before referred to, of 6th February, 1833, which was the only instruction in the case. Soon after Mr. Reckless made out an account against Francis Secor & Son from the memorandum left by Mr. Parker, of which account the small bill in Mr. Reckless's handwriting, now submitted, (marked V,) was the commencement. Mr. Reckless went to New York, and on or about the 17th day of July returned to Perth Amboy, and the next day left for his residence in Monmouth county; while he was there, a person, who stated that he was the son of Mr. Francis Secor, came to the office and stated to me that his father had paid Mr. Reckless the two hundred dollars for the release of the schooner, and presented me an order on Mr. Reckless, from Francis Secor, for the vessel. I told him that I had received no instructions to deliver the vessel, but had no doubt that the order was correct; yet I could not on board and put the vessel to him; but nevertheless, he might go on board and put the sails, rigging, &c., in order for a removal, and that Mr. Reckless would be in Amboy shortly, when he would do everything necessary and proper. On Mr. Reckless's return to Amboy, the vessel was delivered up by him.

In the next weekly return of moneys received and expended in the office, I entered to the credit of the United States the proceeds of the two hundred dollars, but was informed by Mr. Reckless that he was not yet ready for such entry to be made. I consequently made out another weekly return, omitting the above credit. For several successive weekly returns I adverted to the two hundred dollars, and always received for answer that it should not be credited; I especially asked if it should be credited, at the time of making out the accounts for the quarter ending 30th September, 1833, and received the same answer; I subsequently spoke of it to him at various times, but got no satisfaction. The affair remained in this same position when I left the office in May, 1834.

In the mean time, I stated the above-mentioned facts, as well as others hereinafter mentioned, as they occurred to certain gentlemen, and consulted with them on the best course I should pursue. A resignation was suggested as the most distinct and proper; but I was advised to remain in the office, and, as any facts occurred of the nature of those before stated, to make them known in the same manner, as the prospective means of satisfying any future inquiry that might be made, or any exposition that I might in future make of the transaction.

Before making out the accounts for the second quarter, 1833, as above stated, I mentioned to Mr. Reckless that he would require about six hundred dollars to pay the inspector's and other bills for the quarter, and that it was necessary to write to the Comptroller of the Treasury, who would supply the requisite sum. Mr. Reckless said that if he had to draw, he would draw for a good round sum, say three or four thousand dollars; I told him but $600 were required; he then directed me to write a letter to the Comptroller of the Treasury, stating the necessity of the office, and asking for $2,000, which I accordingly did; and, to the best of my recollection, Mr. Reckless copied this letter, and sent the copy to the Comptroller, who answered, under date of 23d of July, 1833, that the collector at New York was authorized to pay him $2,000; which sum was received before his accounts for said second quarter were transmitted to Washington; which was, so far as my recollection serves me, on or about the 1st of August, 1833; and the bills were paid out of the money so received. The receipt of the $2,000 being after the expiration of said second quarter, they could not possibly be entered to the credit of Government, in those accounts; but, of course, stood over to be entered in the accounts for the quarter in which it was received. The above accounts for the second quarter of 1833 were examined and allowed at Washington; and in a letter of 30th of August, 1833, the Comptroller, overlooking the fact of the $2,000 already advanced, stated to him that the collector at New York was authorized to pay, to his order, $600, as, in settlement of the balance of $535 85, standing in the said accounts as advanced by Mr. Reckless; but which balance, however, had been arranged by the prior advance of the $2,000, and was actually a part thereof.

"Mr. Reckless, on the receipt of this letter, said that he would draw for the $600. I stated to him that the authority to draw for that sum was evidently occasioned by the Comptroller having overlooked the advance of $2,000 just before made; and I pointed out the mode that ought to be followed under such circumstances. He said he did not care for that; that it was the business of Mr. Anderson, and not his; and that, as he had the order, he would get the money; which was soon after obtained from the collector at New York.

In making out the accounts for the third quarter, 1833, I credited the Government for the $2,000, and also for the above $600, (notwithstanding Mr. Reckless had not advised me of the receipt of this last sum,) in a rough general account current, made for the collector's inspection. This was in October, 1833. Mr. Reckless examined the same, and, in answer to my question, if the $600 was to be credited, he said, "not yet;" and immediately began to converse about the contingent expenses not chargeable to the United States, saying that he was determined to get them out of Government; and directed me to charge in the general account current for the third quarter the amount of $43 95, contingent expenses of the second quarter, 1833, (already sent, as before stated, to the First Auditor of the Treasury, in the "statement of salary, fees, emoluments, and expenditures for that quarter," and adjusted,) and also to charge the amount of $39 75, the amount of contingent expenses for this third quarter, in the same account current. I stated to him that it could not be done, as it was directly contrary to the established forms and instructions from the Comptroller; and besides, that the $43 95 had already been stated and sent on in the accounts for the second quarter, 1833, with the vouchers for that sum, and had been examined and adjusted at Washington. It could not, therefore, with any plea of right or correctness, be now again either entered or stated in the accounts for the present quarter; nor could the $39 75 be debited Government, as it was plain, from the vouchers, that it was not chargeable to the United States; and upon examination of the accounts with such charges in them, at Washington, that it would not be looked upon as a blunder, but as an evident intention of worming money out of Government, and that the sums would certainly not be allowed; moreover, that I was unwilling accounts, with such charges in them, should go to Washington in my handwriting, as it would certainly be evident to the First Auditor of the Treasury, from accounts previously made out by me, that I knew better. Mr. Reckless nevertheless insisted on my making such entries in the general account current, saying that, as an inferior officer, I was bound to obey his orders; and that, in all events, the responsibility rested on him. I accordingly made out the account current as he ordered.

The revenue boatmen's account for this third quarter was made out truly and correctly, as in the second quarter.

By letter of the 18th of December, 1833, from the Comptroller, advising adjustment of the above-mentioned accounts for the third quarter, it will be seen that the sum of $43 95, as above mentioned, and $15 75 of the $39 75, were disallowed; making about the sum of $60 for the second and third quarters of 1833, not chargeable to the United States. The general account current for this third quarter was otherwise defective, in not having a credit to Government of the proceeds of $200 obtained for schooner Pacific, nor a credit of the $600 obtained from the collector at New York, on the authority of the Comptroller's letter of August 30, 1833, before referred to. I several times after this advertised to the $600 in making out the weekly returns, until on doing so on the 16th December, 1833, he said that he supposed it might then come in, and entered it himself in the book of weekly returns, as that book will testify on inspection.

From this time my conversations with Mr. Reckless were very few and short on any subject, for reasons which I do not consider necessary to state in this deposition, as not bearing on the matter in question. My situation was in every sense mortifying and irksome.

In January, 1834, while I was preparing the accounts and returns for the fourth quarter of 1833, Mr. Reckless ordered me to make out the revenue boat and pay-roll of the seamen blank; that is, to leave the money columns in these accounts blank. I had, consequently, to leave the corresponding debit to the United States, in the general account current, blank also; and in this state these accounts, with the rest of the accounts for the quarter, were laid on Mr. Reckless's table in the office; they lay there several days, until I suggested to him that they ought to be completed and sent on; he requested me to get the boatmen to come up to the office, which I immediately did, all except James Seguire, who was absent at New York to pilot a brig to Amboy; Mr. Reckless requested me to sign for James Seguire, which I did (he being absent) in the presence of the other boatmen. After the other boatmen had signed, Mr. Reckless asked me how much money they were to receive? I told him $53, per revenue boatmen time-book, which I presented to him. Luke Ross, one of the boatmen, could not sign his name, and requested me, as usual, to write it for him, he making his mark. Mr. Reckless then gave me $53, and I paid the boatmen in his presence. The amount due James Seguire, was, I think, paid to Francis Seguire, his son, to be delivered to his father. This was the general rule in the absence of any boatman at the time of making payment for the quarter. I had, at times, before signed for the absent boatmen, but the accounts were always, before this, complete, and filled with the right sums. The boatmen, on being paid, immediately left the office.

I presume it is necessary here for me to state that, immediately after the boatmen left the office, my impressions were unfavorable, and that, in consequence, I again laid the accounts so signed on Mr. Reckless's table; and the next morning (Mr. Parker being absent at Washington) stated the above facts to William Whitehead, Esq., personally, and it was suggested that I had, under the circumstances, better proceed in the manner I had begun, and let the accounts go on as they were; that I was effectually justified in doing so, by its tending still more to confirm circumstances before communicated; and that my making them known in the manner I had, was an evidence of my not coinciding with Mr. Reckless. The above-mentioned accounts lay on the table for several days more, until Mr. Reckless stated to me that he wanted to send them on to Washington by that day's mail, and selected the boat account and pay-roll, and required me to fill up the blanks opposite the names signed as above, so as to make up $113. I adverted to the fact that this sum exceeded that actually paid the boatmen, by sixty dollars; he said that it would cover contingent expenses. I told him that it was incorrect; when he plainly and distinctly said that he was determined to get it out of Government; that he had consulted Mr. Lyon, deputy collector at New York, who had told him that it could be entered in this manner. He stated more on the subject, in an urgent manner, which I do not now recollect; and I reflected that however the accounts went on, I would, at a proper time, put it right; and, on his again requiring me to complete the accounts in the manner above-mentioned, I did as I was ordered; directly afterwards, when he went out of the office, with the papers, to the post office, noting the circumstances, and the next day (Mr. Parker being still absent) stated them to William Whitehead, Esq., and to Robert A. Thorp, and particularly advising with Mr. Whitehead, to whom I showed the memorandum in the collector's office, and to Mr. Thorp at his store. I state this circumstance, because that memorandum has been lost or mislaid, and, after diligent search, cannot be found. Either of the above-mentioned gentlemen can, I have no doubt, qualify to the above facts. The substance of that memorandum was of such a nature as to be indelibly impressed on my memory.

If it be asked why I signed the pay-roll for the boatmen, Luke Ross and James Seguire, in blank, (as stated,) I can answer, that it was done by the order of the collector; and under that order I mechanically signed for them as I had usually before done, but at the time not advertent to any circumstance that might thereafter accrue in consequence of my having done so; besides, I did not suspect, until immediately after the boatmen left the office, that anything wrong was intended in the transaction, because bonds and other papers are frequently signed in blank in the custom-house, to be filled up thereafter at leisure; and when subsequently I was required to fill the blanks with a sum which I knew to be incorrect, I remonstrated on the impropriety of such charges, until, as an inferior officer, an absolute requirement to do so, but not without at the same time communicating the facts to Messrs. Whitehead and Thorp, and making a private memorandum, in order that at a proper time the transaction might be fully explained by an exposition that might thereafter be made by me. While continuing in office, I was frequently admonished of the necessity of my obeying, as an inferior officer, the commands of my superior; but at the same time it was a duty I owed to myself to take care that my own conduct, under whatever circumstances, could be shown to be governed explicitly by correct motives.

In making out the accounts for the first quarter of 1834, (in April of that year,) I was determined to forestall, as much as in my power, the foregoing method of proceeding in regard to the revenue boat account and pay-roll, and filled the columns of the pay-roll with the sum in figures of three dollars ($3) each man, (there being four men,) which was the actual sum they were to receive for this quarter. I filled up the general account current and the other papers accordingly, and placed all the accounts ready for signature on Mr. Reckless's table for his examination and signature. They lay there for more than a week, until one day, in overlooking them Mr. Reckless said to me, "you have only put the sum that the boatmen are to receive on the pay-roll." I told him "yes; and that I had filled the columns of the other accounts accordingly." He said he "would not have it so, and that it must be altered." I told him "it would not do," but he required me to erase the figures "3" in the pay-roll; which I did; he standing by in such a manner as that the erasure could be plainly perceived, and intentionally left so by me. I immediately went out of the office, determined to have nothing to do with paying the boatmen. In a day or two I was sent to the beach to superintend the discharge of a wreck, and when I returned two of the boatmen had signed the pay-roll; the two others signed afterwards, in my presence. The boatmen were not then paid, nor did they receive their three dollars each from Mr. Reckless until some time after the 7th of May. I did not see the boatmen paid, as I was not then in office; but I ascertained from each of them that they had received their three dollars.

On or about the last of April, or 1st of May, Mr. Reckless brought the accounts for the first quarter of 1834 to my desk, and required me to fill the pay-roll with the sum of twenty-nine dollars opposite to each man's name, making the total sum of $116. I remonstrated for some time; but, having fully made up my mind as to the course I should pursue, I did as I was ordered, carefully placing the figures "29" to the left hand of the "3's," before erased; which fact is substantiated by that document, now in Washington. I immediately afterwards made the circumstances known to proper persons. I did not remain more than a day or two longer in the office, and, of course, can give no further information.

I never informed Mr. Reckless that it was the usage of the office to charge the incidental expenses, and cover them by the receipts of the boatmen of the revenue boat. It never was done until the making up of the accounts for the fourth quarter of 1833, which were made up in the month of January, 1834. He does know that the boatmen always received the sum specified in their accounts until the fourth quarter of 1833; and that, during the time that Mr. Parker was collector, the boatmen always received the sum specified in their receipt. Witness has looked into the revenue boatmen's time-book, produced by the collector, and it appears that the amount paid to the boatmen for their services for the second quarter of 1834 is thirty-five dollars only; it appears, by the account rendered to the Government by the collector, that he charges $124 for boatmen's wages. He has looked into the book produced by the collector for the third quarter of 1834, and finds that the sum of forty-five dollars is the sum set down as paid to the boatmen for that quarter: the account rendered to the Government shows the amount paid to the boatmen for that quarter, as charged by him, $124.

The annexed receipt, signed by J. W. Reckless, collector, port of Perth Amboy, New Jersey, bearing date July 18, 1833, is in the handwriting of J. W. Reckless.

Being cross-examined by General Wall as counsel for the collector, he said the blanks in the boatmen's account for the fourth quarter of 1833 were filled up by him, by order of the collector; that the difference between the sum filled up in the receipt and the sum actually received, he said would cover the contingent expenses, which had been disallowed by the Government. These contingent expenses were those charged by order of the collector to the debit of the United States, in the general account of the third quarter of 1833, and disallowed at Washington by the Comptroller's letter of 18th December, 1833. The blanks in the boatmen's receipt for the first quarter of the year 1834 were filled up by the witness, by the order of the collector. That he did not tell witness what constituted the difference, or how it was made up, between the sum actually paid and the sum specified in the receipt; nor did the witness ask him how it was made out. On recollection, he thinks that Mr. Reckless did, at the time of filling up these receipts, make a calculation on my desk relative to the sum, but witness cannot tell what it was. That at this time my feelings were very much excited. That he remembers going twice to the sea-shore to attend the discharge of the cargoes of wrecks. On those occasions, Mr. Reckless advanced him money for his expenses, and of the inspectors who went with him, and for which he accounted to the collector on his return. That these expenses were covered by the inspectors' receipts for an extra number of days, sufficient to cover the amount. This was agreeable to the usage in the office before Mr. Reckless came there, and while witness was in the office; and witness always understood that it was the custom in all custom houses, and particularly in New York.

Sworn at Perth Amboy, the 30th day of March, 1835, before me,
JOSEPH MARSH,
Mayor City of Perth Amboy.

Benjamin Maurice, being duly sworn, deposed and said: He remembers that the schooner Pacific was at Mrs. Patrick's wharf, at the city of Amboy, in February, 1833, until June or July, 1833. A day or two before the vessel left the wharf, the collector called upon him for a bill for her wharfage, and asked him to hand him the bill, which deponent promised to do. A few days afterwards, I met Mr. Reckless, who informed him that he need not trouble himself to give him a bill, that he had ascertained the amount of wharfage from documents in his office, and that he would pay the amount to Mrs. Patrick, the owner of the wharf; that in the month of August or September, 1834, he ascertained that the wharfage bill had not been paid to Mrs. Patrick. Some little time afterwards, he called on Mr. Reckless (it may have been five or six weeks) for the money, and Mr. Reckless informed me that it was entirely a mistake, and regretted that he had not paid it, and paid me twenty-seven dollars, and I mentioned to him that it was $29 25. Mr. Reckless endeavored then to hunt up the papers, but could not lay his hand on them, but said he would pay the balance at any time that I would call. The twenty-seven dollars was paid to him about the 10th of October last. The balance of $2 25 was paid in February, or the present month. On or about the last day of December last Mr. Reckless called upon Mr. Maurice, with a receipt for $29 25, and requested his signature to it. He observed that he had only received twenty-seven dollars. Mr. Reckless said he would pay him the balance any time he would call, and thereupon he signed the receipt. The receipt purports to bear date the time he signed it. The actual amount paid me was $29 25, being at the rate of $1 50 per week, which was the actual amount of the wharfage. Witness never delivered the bill to Mr. Reckless, because Mr. Reckless told me he knew the amount from documents in his office.

BENJAMIN MAURICE.

Sworn before me this 30th day of March, 1835.

JOSEPH MARSH,
Mayor of the City of Perth Amboy.

James Parker, being duly sworn, doth depose and say: That during the month of January, 1833, while he was collector of the port of Amboy, the schooner Pacific was found running without papers, and detained for the payment of foreign tonnage money. He ascertained that she had run a number of trips with stone for the railroad, and that she was liable for tonnage money to an amount exceeding $400. The precise sum he does not recollect. The hands all left the vessel, and she was laid at Mr. Bruen's wharf; and, after some time, as her expenses were too large at that wharf, I removed her to Mrs. Patrick's wharf, under an agreement with Mr. Maurice, her agent, at $1 50 per week. I left the collector's office on the 1st of April, 1833, and delivered over to Mr. Reckless the vessel and all the papers relating to her; among these were a letter from the Comptroller of the Treasury, stating the law in regard to the vessel; a letter from Mr. Conover, stating the number of loads of stone she had brought to the railroad; an account of the tonnage money due; and an account of the wharfage due by the vessel to Mr. Bruen; and a memorandum of the time she went to Mrs. Patrick's wharf; and the rate per week that was to be paid for wharfage to Mr. Maurice. That, late in the summer or early in the fall of 1833, as he was passing the door of the collector's office to go to his own office, Mr. Brinley, the deputy collector, called me into the collector's office, and told me that he wished to communicate to me a fact, for the sake of his own reputation, fearing that he, keeping the accounts of the collector, might hereafter be blamed. He then told me that Mr. Reckless, the collector, had received a sum of money for tonnage of the schooner Pacific, and had refused to suffer him (Mr. Brinley) to place it to the credit of the United States in the weekly accounts of moneys received and paid. Mr. Brinley stated that he had given me this information that I might testify to the fact when occasion may require. At some time in the spring of 1834, while he (this deponent) was at Washington, he received a letter or letters from Mr. Brinley, informing him that Mr. Reckless, the collector, had directed him (Mr. Brinley) to fill up the receipts given by the boatmen of the revenue boat, for an amount much larger than the sums actually paid. That Mr. Reckless had done this for the avowed purpose of thus obtaining from the Government certain commissions and office expenses improperly charged by him in his general account current for some of the quarters of the year 1833, and which charges had been rejected by the Treasury Department. The precise time he (this deponent) received the communication he cannot say, not having the letters by him; but it was at the time that Mr. Brinley was acting as deputy collector, and before he was superseded by Mr. Reckless's son.

Some time in the summer of 1833, in a conversation with this deponent and Mr. Reckless, the collector, respecting the expenses of the office, the deponent stated to Mr. Reckless that no allowance was made, according to the rules of the Treasury Department, for the expenses of his office. That office rent, fuel, stationery, and other incidental expenses of the office, were never charged or allowed in the general account, but were to be paid out of his fees or emoluments.

DISTRICT OF PERTH AMBOY, April 1, 1834.

Received from J. W. Reckless, collector of the customs, the several sums annexed to our names respectively, being in full for our wages for the quarter ending March 31, 1834.

JAMES SEGUIRE,

LUKE ROSS, his mark,

ROULIN SOFIELD,

FRANCIS SEGUIRE.

Witness: F. W. BRINLEY.

New York, April 2, 1835.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose to you the depositions taken by me before the Mayor of the city of Perth Amboy, on the 30th ultimo, to sustain the charges preferred by me against the collector of that port.

These depositions would have been taken at an earlier day, but the accounts deemed necessary to be used in the case did not arrive until the early part of March; and, being desirous of examining the Hon. Mr. Parker, I did not give notice till I had ascertained when Mr. Parker would be in Amboy. On the 12th March I caused notice to be served on the deputy collector on the 18th, and on that day I attended, as did all the witnesses who had been formerly summoned; but Mr. Reckless not attending, and, on inquiry at his office, finding him absent at Washington, I postponed the examinations until the 30th, and caused a new notice to be served on him for that day, when they were completed. I state these circumstances to account for the apparent unnecessary delay, and because Mr. Reckless represents in Amboy that, while at Washington, he had settled his accounts, paid his defalcation, and received a discharge from the Treasury Department. Mr. Reckless attended the examination, with his counsel, G. D. Wall, Esq., United States district attorney for New Jersey, and cross-examined the witnesses as he saw fit. The boatmen of the revenue boat were in attendance, but were not examined, in consequence of the admission made by him that Mr. Brinley's statement of the sums actually paid to the boatmen, taken from the book produced, is correct.

Mr. Brinley, at my request, prepared a statement in the form of a deposition; and, when called up to testify, I offered it to General Wall as such; and he, having read it, agreed to receive it as a direct examination.

You will find, on an attentive perusal of the evidence, that every part of the charges made is fully proved; and there is no proof, or attempt to prove, that the money charged above what is paid has been expended for the account of the Government.

The testimony of Mr. Maurice and Mr. Parker proves that Mr. Reckless had documents in his office, left by Mr. Parker, showing the amount of the charges against the schooner Pacific, and that Mr. Reckless admitted to Mr. Maurice that fact, and dispensed with a bill. The receipt made at the time the money was received from Secor shows this fact also, for it shows the exact sum paid, with the exception of Mr. Ward's bill, paid in September, 1833; and there cannot be found any excuse why the net amount was not credited to the Government in the fourth quarter of 1833. Mr. Brinley proves that he repeatedly reminded him of this sum, and that he refused to permit him to carry it to the credit of the Government in his accounts. The weekly return-book showed the entry in Mr. Brinley's hand writing, and erased; he cannot plead, therefore, that it was omitted from mistake. And equally untrue is the reason he assigns in his letter in answer to the charge that he could not procure the bills against the vessel; all the evidence disproves it fully and completely. That charge is fully sustained, and his fraud fully made out.

As regards the second charge, relative to the boatmen's wages, his answer to it admits he has not paid them the sums he obtained their receipts for; and his admission annexed to the papers goes fully to admit the statement of Mr. Brinley as to the sums actually paid and actually charged, and shows that in four quarters (fourth in 1833 and three first in 1834) he paid $145, and charged the Government $477, being $332 fraudulently obtained by the production of false vouchers. This charge is also fully sustained, and not a shadow of proof to excuse either of them.

Mr. Brinley's deposition will also show that Mr. Reckless also availed himself of an oversight in the Comptroller's office to obtain $600, having just before received $2,000, and not accounting for this sum for several months after it was received. When he drew for $2,000 he knew he did not require $600 for the purposes of his office, and it was a fraud to draw for $2,000; and when the order came to him for $600, had he been an honest man, he would have immediately communicated the fact to the Department, and not received the money.

Another case of fraud came to my knowledge a few days since, of a small amount, but showing the dishonesty of this man. He has obtained a credit in his accounts for the second quarter of 1834, of sixteen dollars, for painting the revenue boat, and he only paid twelve dollars. This will appear by the inclosed deposition of J. B. Daniels, the painter. I did not examine him in Amboy, (because he lives in this city,) and because it was not included in either of the charges,) but took his affidavit this morning. You can, if you wish proof other than the inclosed, direct the district attorney in this city to call on me to produce the man, and I will do it.

The maxim of law, as applied to evidence, that a witness false in one fact will not be entitled to credit in anything he may swear to, fully applies to the collector; and more especially applies if it is true, as I am informed, that he has sworn to his accounts quarterly—all of them are false, from the first one.

With these remarks, I submit the case to you for the decision of the Department. I cannot doubt the result. This case has made much noise in New Jersey, and many persons attended the examinations, of all political parties; and the testimony is pretty generally known.

Mr. Reckless requested copies of the depositions, and I have this day furnished him with them.

I shall be glad to hear the decision of the Department.

I am, respectfully, your humble, obedient servant.

WILLIAM VAN HOOK.

Hon. LEVI WOODBURY, Secretary of the Treasury.

PERTH AMBOY, April 6, 1835.

SIR: Testimony has been taken, on the 30th ultimo, at this place, on the charges made by William Van Hook, Esq., against Joseph W. Reckless, collector of the customs at this port, in January last.

The first charge against the collector was the willful withholding of credit to the United States for tonnage money received for the schooner Pacific, in July, 1833. The receipt of this money Mr. Reckless acknowledges in his letter to you of the 23d of January, but says that he withheld the credit, having "held [the money] to meet the various claims which then existed against the vessel, and for which he had made himself liable, and, when paid, the balance to be brought to the credit of Government." The charges he states to be, and to have been paid, as follows:

August 7, 1833, M. Bruen, for wharfage.....$23 00
September 28, 1833, G. D. Wall, district attorney, for advice and directions..... 41 40
December 30, 1834, B. Maurice, wharfage..... 29 25

The first two (if the one of them is a proper charge) are admitted to have been known at the time, and paid before the end of the quarter, and the question is only on that of Mr. Maurice's account for wharfage. As to this, you will find that Mr. Maurice swears that Reckless told him at the time when the vessel was about to be delivered up, that he (Reckless) had ascertained the amount from documents in the office, which documents you will find, by the testimony of Mr. Brinley and myself, I left there, and handed over to him, when he took charge of the office; and you will further observe that the amount of this account of Mr. Maurice, as well as Mr. Bruen's, was distinctly stated by Reckless as charges against the vessel at the time she was given up, and the amount receipted for separately and distinctly from the tonnage, as is fully proved by documents Nos. 1 and 2 attached to Brinley's affidavit.

When the direct testimony of Mr. Brinley is connected with these facts, the willful omission to credit the money is proved, and the falsehood of the pretense for withholding it, set up by Reckless, established beyond all doubt.

In regard to the second charge, that receipts have been exhibited and amounts charged to the Government for boatmen's wages for more money than was actually paid, you will observe that this fact Mr. Reckless has also admitted; but he states, in his answer, that "incidental expenses have been united with those under that head for the same time," and that Mr. Brinley "suggested this mode of charging incidental expenses," &c.

This allegation is disproved by Mr. Brinley, and by the first account (second quarter of 1833) rendered by Mr. Reckless, in which the mode directed by the Comptroller and followed by me was adopted; and you will find that the expenses to which Mr. Reckless alludes were not those not chargeable to the revenue, but to his own emoluments, and which, being put into his general account in the quarter ending 1st October, 1833, against Mr. Brinley's advice and remonstrance, were disallowed by the Auditor, in his letter of the 18th December, 1833. Mr. Reckless, being refused the credit for these charges, resorted to his next account to the fraud of adding the amount to the money actually paid the boatmen, so as to obtain from the Government by fraud what could not be obtained by law and the regulations of the Department; and by his own declaration in his letter to you of 23d January, 1835, "this mode of keeping the accounts and making these charges has continued ever since!"

The testimony of Mr. Brinley shows the amount paid to the boatmen in the quarters ending 31st December, 1833, and 31st March, 1834, from his own knowledge, as from the "boatmen's time-book," exhibited by Mr. Reckless, for the quarters ending 30th June and 30th September, 1834. The boatmen were not examined, because Mr. Reckless admitted (and it is so certified by the officer) that the sums paid to the boatmen, according to Mr. Brinley's testimony, were the correct amounts. How, then, stands this part of the account? The sums actually paid for this service, and the sums actually charged, are as follows:

	Paid.	Chg'd.
In the quarter ending 31st December, 1833.....	$53	$113
In the quarter ending 31st March, 1834.....	12	116
In the quarter ending 30th June, 1834.....	35	124
In the quarter ending 30th September, 1834.....	45	124
Total.....	$145	$477

The difference between these two amounts ($332) has been thus fraudulently obtained from the Government for the reimbursement of moneys not chargeable to the United States, and which, if the amount ever was disbursed, was expended by Mr. Reckless for his own private use. I cannot refrain from again noticing the attempt made by Mr. Reckless to defend or palliate his frauds by charging Mr. Van Hook and Mr. Brinley with improper motives. I have known these gentlemen intimately and for many years. Their characters and integrity never were, and cannot be, impeached.

I do not doubt that you will examine this case with the attention due to it, and lay it before the President; and that you will be satisfied that Joseph W. Reckless is unfit for the station he occupies, and ought to be removed.

I am, with great respect, your obedient servant.

JAMES PARKER.

Hon. LEVI WOODBURY, Secretary of the Treasury.

In reply to a letter of Reckless, dated May 19, inclosing certain testimony, Woodbury, on the 29th of May, 1835, returned to Reckless this testimony, taken informally, in the following letter, which shows the Secretary's disposition, and manner of discharging his duty towards the accused:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, May 29, 1835.

SIR: I herewith return to you the evidence forwarded by you to the Department in relation to the complaints made against you. It appears that this evidence was taken without having given (as was required) notice to the complainant; it therefore cannot be received. I request that you give notice of the time and place of taking any testimony intended to rebut the charges against you, to the complainant, allowing sufficient time to attend.

As you have referred to the New York custom-house as a precedent for your justification for a part of your conduct, it is proper that the evidence of the collector at New York and some of the other officers of the customs, should be taken on that point, after due notice to the complainants.

It is very desirable that you should very promptly attend to this business, and transmit the evidence taken by you to the Department as soon after as possible; the case having been pending so long, and the complainants being impatient for a decision.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

J. W. RECKLESS, Esq.,
Collector, Perth Amboy, New Jersey.

July the 16th, 1835, G. Wood, Reckless's counsel, sent to Woodbury a long deposition of J. W. Reckless, jr., the son of the accused, of David S. Lyon, first deputy collector of New York, and sundry papers explaining the defense of Reckless, &c.

July 23, 1835, Mr. Parker again addressed the Secretary the following letter:

PERTH AMBOY, July 28, 1835.

SIR: After a lapse of nearly four months since testimony was taken here in support of the charges made against Joseph W. Reckless, the collector of the customs at this port, he has attempted to furnish testimony to exculpate himself, which is now in your hands.

It seems to me almost unnecessary for me to make any observations upon the nature of this defense, (if such it may be called,) which goes, by the testimony of the witness adduced by Reckless, if he proves anything, to establish the guilt of the collector, and to corroborate every part of the testimony produced in support of the charges.

As to the first charge, namely, the willful suppression of a credit to the United States of money received for tonnage of the schooner Pacific, nothing has been shown, or attempted to be proved, to contradict the direct testimony of Mr. Brinley and others, and the written evidence, under Reckless's own hand, proving the facts charged, and destroying all pretense of apology on his part. You will observe, as regards the testimony in this charge, that, although the district attorney attended as counsel for the accused, he did not think it expedient to cross-examine any one of the witnesses by whom the charge was so fully proved, and the excuse of Reckless so fully shown to be false and unfounded in fact.

The first charge, then, that the collector, in July, 1833, received the sum of $147 for tonnage money of the schooner Pacific, and willfully refused to credit the amount to the United States, is proved beyond a question.

As to the second charge, that fraudulent receipts, signed by the revenue boatmen, for an amount of money far exceeding the sums actually paid them for that service, for four successive quarters, have been exhibited as evidence of disbursements chargeable to the revenue, and charged in his general account with the United States. The testimony of the son of the collector, you will observe, corroborates precisely the testimony of Mr. Brinley as to the sums actually paid these men, which, as I have before stated, exceeds the amount of their wages $332; the sum charged being $477, and the amount paid only $145. The witnesses on both sides established this fact.

I stated, in my former communication to you, of the 6th of April last, that the difference ($332) thus fraudulently obtained from the Government, if ever expended, was for the private use of the collector. I ask your attention to the affidavit of young Reckless, and the accounts accompanying it, and referred to therein, to prove this fact.

The collector is required to render, quarterly, an account of the fees and emoluments of his office, and to state, in the same account, his expenses for fuel, stationery, office rent, and other incidental expenses. These expenses, as you well know, are a charge upon the collector's official emoluments; they are stated as such. The collector here was apprised of the law, and rendered his account accordingly.

By an examination of his account of salary fees, you will find charged for expenses, in the quarter ending the 30th of June, 1833, $43 95; and for the quarter ending 30th September, 1833, $35 79; of which last, fifteen dollars was for office rent, and seventy-five cents for quills.

By looking at his general account for the quarter ending 30th September, 1833, you will find the same sums also charged to the United States in that account.

In a letter from the Comptroller of the Treasury to the collector, dated 18th December, 1833, stating the settlement of his account for the quarter ending 30th September, 1833, he adds to the balance stated by the collector:

Amount improperly charged for office rent, the same being chargeable in your account of official emoluments, $15 75.
Amount charged in contingent account, second quarter, suspended for want of vouchers and receipts, $43 95.

A part of the sum of $35 72 charged, being for blank emoluments, was allowed, and $15 75, for office rent and quills, rejected.

The law and the rules of the Department allowed no credit for these expenses. The collector was told so. He persisted, as Mr. Brinley testifies, in making a charge of them against the Government, and the account was rejected by the Auditor of the Treasury.

Let us now see what the collector has done, in consequence, according to his own showing, the testimony of his son and deputy. This young man exhibits, among others, statements and receipts for expenditures for the second and third quarters of 1833, amounting to $59 20, composed of the same items which were rejected by the Treasury, in the same account ending 30th September, 1833; and positively swears that the amount fraudulently added to the boatmen's receipts for the first quarter of 1834, was so added and intended to cover the amount; which you will observe had been thus disallowed and rejected by the Government. And he goes on to exhibit other accounts and receipts for expenses of the same nature, and equally unauthorized; to cover which, the subsequent receipts were fraudulently increased up to the time when the charges of fraud were made against collector!

It is sufficient for the purpose that all the expenses thus stated are such as neither law nor the rules of the Department allow. But I cannot help remarking that two bureaus are charged in an account of J. C. Smith, said to be paid 30th June, 1834, (A No. 3), one of which, as I am informed, was sent to the collector's house in Monmouth, and the other to his lodgings here. I doubt if a single article embraced by this bill of Smith's is in the office; but if they were, they are not chargeable to the United States.

The second charge is fully established, that receipts of the revenue boatmen have been fraudulently obtained and rendered for an amount greatly exceeding the sums actually paid; and this has been done to cover money expended for the private benefit of the collector, and no way chargeable to the Government.

Both charges being plainly and unequivocally proved, I consider the removal of an unfaithful officer as beyond a doubt.

HO. OF REFS.

In laying the papers connected with this business before the President, I have to request that you will include this communication, and also my letters to you of the 5th of January last, covering Mr. Van Hook's charges, and that of the 6th of April last.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

JAMES PARKER.

HON. LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington.

NEW YORK, August 1, 1835.

SIR: Mr. Reckless having transmitted to you the affidavits intended to be a defense against the charges preferred by me, I think it my duty to submit to you, and through you to the President, some remarks upon them. It is a little singular that he should have been upwards of three months preparing his evidence, which, on inspection of the accounts submitted, and upon which he relies for his exculpation, he must, if they are correct and true, have had in his possession more than a year; and one would naturally ask why, with those means of defense, if such they are, in his power, he had not been a little more expeditious in endeavoring to clear himself from the very serious charges against him. But these accounts are not true; they have been procured, and made to bear date in certain quarters, for the purpose of covering the amounts fraudulently charged in the revenue boatmen's receipts for those quarters. I will mention one of those cases, which can be proved not to have been incurred in the first quarter of 1834—that of J. F. Sibell, for stationery, under date of 31st March, 1834; I assert that none of the articles in that bill had ever been received in the collector's office prior to the 7th May, 1834; up to that time, the stationery was purchased at New Brunswick. The bill of J. C. Smith, in the same quarter, is for articles which were not for the office; the bureau was for his own private use, one of them never was in the office, but was sent to his house in Monmouth county, and one to his private lodgings in Amboy, and no old one put in the office very recently. One of the book-cases is not and never was in the office, and the chairs in that bill are at his private lodgings. The gas lamp was not needed for the office, because it was never open in the evening, and never has been after dark. I point out these cases to you, not because it can make any manner of difference in deciding the merits of the question, but for the purpose of showing that he has attempted to sustain his frauds by false documents. I contend that he has no right to claim any credits in his accounts for articles not chargeable. He knew this from the fact that the same items now produced for the second and third quarters of 1833 had been charged before in his accounts for those quarters, and had been rejected by the Comptroller; and he was then informed that they were inadmissible. In consequence of this information, he determined to charge (to the United States a sum greater than the sum rejected, and more than he actually paid) in the revenue boatmen's accounts, and fraudulently obtained from them their receipts to cover it. The testimony of his son proves this, and fully sustains that of Mr. Brinley on this point. It cannot be possible that either you or the President will permit him to do indirectly, and under cover of false vouchers, what the law and the usages of the Department will not permit to be done openly and directly. That charge is fully and completely sustained in all its parts, and no comments of mine can make it more plain and palpable as a premeditated fraud.

The charge of not crediting the Government with the money received in July, 1833, in the case of the Pacific, is also fully sustained, as well by the evidence of Mr. Brinley, Mr. Maurice, Mr. Parker, as by the receipt to Messrs. Secor. The receipt proves that when he received the money he knew the amount of charges to be deducted from the sum received; he then knew the amount then legally chargeable against the money received; and his fraudulently obtaining from Mr. Maurice a receipt dated 30th December, 1834, only goes more fully to establish his whole conduct to be dishonest. I will make one remark upon one of the receipts he produces in this case, but not specified in his receipt to Messrs. Secor—that of G. F. Wall, Esq., the United States district attorney for New Jersey, for professional advice in this case. I apprehend that Mr. Wall had no legal claim against the collector or the Government for advice in this case; he had a salary from the United States for the express purpose of paying him for advice to the public officers in his State, and he cannot, legally, make a charge while receiving a salary, except in cases where costs accrue in suits instituted or defended. It is a little singular that Mr. Wall appeared for him as his counsel at the examination of the witnesses in New Jersey, and virtually against the United States.

You will observe the sweeping manner in which young Reckless swears. He says that all the articles furnished, as well from April, 1833, to May, 1834, as all others since that time, were for the use of the collector's office, and were necessary. How can he know this, when he also swears that he came into the office only in May, 1834? He could not know that the articles were furnished for the use of the office, or were needed, and the rule of law, as well as of common sense, is, that a man who will swear to what he cannot know, ought to be received as a witness very cautiously as to anything he may say, will forcibly apply to him. You will also observe that on his cross-examination he unqualifiedly said that none of the bills he then produced, and which he referred to in his direct examination, had been ever charged in any account against the United States. Knowing, as I did, the absolute falsehood of the statement, (because I had copies of the accounts for the second and third quarters of 1833,) I informed him he was incorrect, and should prove it so. He then, at the suggestion of his father's counsel, qualified the statement by saying he did not know of their having been before charged and rejected. Had I not corrected him, his affidavit would have gone forth with a palpable falsehood on its face.

Mr. Parker, in his letter to you, under date of the 28th ultimo, which I have seen, so fully analyzed and destroyed the whole of Mr. Reckless's defense, that I will not add anything further on the subject. The affidavit of Mr. Lyon is unimportant; if it proves anything, it only goes to show that Mr. Reckless had never forgot that he had received the money from Secor; but at the time Reckless made the inquiry of Mr. Lyon, he was, no doubt, aware that he would be charged with the fraudulent omission to credit the amount received, as I understand that the fact of withholding it had been previously mentioned by Mr. Parker to more than one person, by whom it would most probably be communicated to Mr. Reckless, and particularly to Mr. Wall, who was his counsel at the taking of evidence in Amboy.

The whole case is now before you for the decision of the President. I cannot permit myself for one moment to think that he will retain in office a man proved dishonest, or permit him to obtain, by false and fraudulent vouchers, and by embezzlement, money he is not and cannot be permitted to receive by an open and direct course.

I shall be glad to hear from you as soon as this case is decided upon.

I am, sir, with respect, your humble servant,

WILLIAM VAN HOOK.

The Hon. LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington.

September 16, 1835, Reckless wrote a letter to Mr. Woodbury, in reply to the last letters of Parker and Van Hook, of which the Secretary had notified him, inclosing an affidavit of John Arnold, dated 18th September, 1835, in relation to a desk and small lamp in his office, which he proves had always been there, &c. Such, sir, were the charges and the proofs in this case. A pretended abstract of them was made out in the Treasury Department. What do you suppose was the decision of the President in the case? On the abstract he indorsed this judgment:

"First charge.—Disproved.

"Second charge.—Mr. Brinley acknowledges, on oath, that the manner of Reckless's accounts were made agreeably to the usage of the office before he came into it.

"Third charge.—Disproved. It was irregular to charge incidental expenses in boatmen's accounts; but no proof of corruption, or that any was charged, but what had been disbursed."

Sir how could such a decision be made in such a case? Mr. Parker and Mr. Van Hook told the committee how it was done:

"Of the papers marked by the Secretary 25, with the inclosures, and 26, I have no knowledge until now handed for my perusal. The evidence furnished with them being taken without notice from the collector to Mr. Van Hook, they appear to have been returned for that reason, with a letter from the Secretary to J. W. Reckless, May 29, 1835; (XIX) in consequence of which, the testimony of J. W. Reckless, Jr., and David S. Lyon, was taken at New York, before Richard Riker, June 23, 1835, with sundry exhibits, (XX), and appears to have been forwarded to the department with a letter from George Wood, the collector's counsel, on the 16th of July, 1835, (XXI). Having received this evidence from the department, upon a request made in a letter of the 20th of July, I wrote to the Secretary on the 28th of July, 1835, a letter (XXII) stating my view of the case as it rested upon the evidence. This letter, with one from Mr. Van Hook, of August 20, 1835, with comments by him upon the testimony, (XXIII), dated August 1, is stated to have been forwarded to the collector, whose reply, (XXIV), dated September 16, 1835, appears to have been received by the Department on the 21st of September, inclosing an affidavit of John Arnold, (G.) taken without notice to the complainant and in the handwriting of George Wood, Esq., of New York, counsel for the collector, sworn to at Perth Amboy, September 18, before Joseph Marsh, intended to rebut an observation in Mr. Van Hook's letter of the 1st August, (XXIII). This letter of the collector, of September 16, (XXIV), appears by a memorandum upon it, signed 'Ridman,' to have been received the 21st of September, and a direction is thereon in pencil, as follows:

"G. W., make out an abstract of the charges, and evidence and explanations, for and against them, and mark and file all for the President.—W."

"A paper marked 39 and 40 by the Department (XXV) appears to have been made out entitled 'Abstract of charges and testimony in the case of J. W. Reckless, collector of the district of Perth Amboy.' The documents submitted with the abstract, and referred to therein, appear to have been as follows, viz: William Van Hook's letter, and the letter of James Parker, inclosing it, (I and II), referred to as paper A."

"The abstract of the charges and testimony submitted to the President is defective and erroneous. In the statement of the first charge, it makes no reference whatever to any testimony taken in its support on the part of the complainant. The evidence of F. W. Brinley, Benjamin Maurice, and James Parker, as to this charge, was contained in the testimony taken at Perth Amboy, marked C and XV; and with the exhibit No. 1, attached thereto, completely falsified the pretense set up by J. W. Reckless in his statement (V) for not crediting the tonnage duty received for the schooner Pacific. The abstract referring to no evidence in support of this charge, the President decided that it was disproved; whereas, if the testimony had been stated, it would have been found to be fully sustained and proved.

"As to the second charge, the assertion of J. W. Reckless, in his letter of January 23, 1835, (V), that Mr. Brinley suggested the mode of making out the accounts, is expressly contradicted by that witness, in the testimony taken at Perth Amboy, (CXV). The witness expressly swears that he told Reckless 'that it was incorrect;' and particularly he swears 'that he never informed Mr. Reckless that it was the usage of the office to charge the incidental expenses, and cover them by the receipts of the boatmen of the revenue boat; it never was done until the making up of the accounts for the fourth quarter of 1833, which were made up in the month of January, 1834; that he does know that the boatmen always received the sum specified in their accounts, until the fourth quarter of 1833; and that during the time Mr. Parker was collector, the boatmen always received the sum specified in their receipts."

"The President, on this charge, decided that Mr. Brinley acknowledges, on oath, that the manner of Reckless's accounts were made agreeably to the usage of the office before he came to it.

"As to the third charge, no testimony was taken by Mr. Van Hook; and the affidavit of John Arnold, on behalf of the collector, (C), was ex parte, contrary to the instructions of the Secretary, and the affidavit prepared by counsel, in New York, and afterwards sworn to at Perth Amboy.

"Immediately after this decision upon the case, on the 24th of September, 1835, a letter appears to have been written by the Secretary of the Treasury to the Comptroller, (XXVIII), directing him to call upon J. W. Reckless to make settlement for expenses referred to, which the Comptroller (Mr. Anderson) refers to the Register of the Treasury. The answer of the Register not furnishing the requisite information, the Comptroller (Joseph Anderson) appears, on the 2d of October, 1835, to have written to J. W. Reckless, (XXIX), and called upon him for a statement of the incidental expenses included in the boatmen's accounts, which are not, by law, allowable, &c.

"The letter of J. W. Reckless, dated Perth Amboy, November, 1835, (XXX), incloses an account of items, covered by boatmen's receipts; and the certificate of T. L. Smith, Register of the Treasury, (XXXI), shows that the sum of $376 41, thus covered by those receipts, has been placed to the debt of the collector, 17th of December, 1835, as 'amount improperly charged by the collector as disbursements to boatmen; $153 96 of the same having been allowed in his account of emoluments.'"

Such is the evidence of Mr. Parker. Mr. Van Hook testified as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, April 15, 1835.

SIR: I have to acquaint you, in reply to your letter of the 13th instant, that the collector of Perth Amboy, as well as yourself, was requested to give notice when about to take testimony in the case, and none will be received and considered unless taken in the presence of both parties.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

WM. VAN HOOK, Esq., New York.

"Testimony of William Van Hook.

"Question by Mr. Wise to Mr. Van Hook. Will you please state all you know respecting certain charges preferred against Joseph W. Reckless, collector at Perth Amboy, and the action of the Treasury Department thereon?

"Answer by Mr. Van Hook. Some time previous to the month of January, 1835, I became acquainted with the fact that Joseph W. Reckless, the collector of Perth Amboy, New Jersey, had defrauded the Government; and on the 3d of the same month, I addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury the letter (No. 1) herewith presented, and which I beg may be received as part of this my answer, and which contains the charges in detail. On the 26th or 27th of the same month of January, I received from the Secretary the letter dated 23d January, (No. 7), covering the answer of Mr. Reckless (No. 5) to the charges. My answer to the Secretary (No. 9) denies the truth of the excuse offered by Mr. Reckless, and offering to prove the truth of the charges. The Secretary (in No. 13) directs me to take evidence of the truth of the charges, on notice to Mr. Reckless; and I accordingly proceeded to take the deposition, first having given him notice of the time and place of taking it; at which time Mr. Reckless, attended by his counsel, G. D. Wall, Esq., then district attorney of the United States for the district of New Jersey, appeared, and cross-examined such witnesses as he pleased. This testimony is contained in the paper marked No. 15, and is the deposition of F. W. Brinley, Hon. James Parker, and Benjamin Maurice, and the certificate of the Mayor of Perth Amboy, and to which I beg leave particularly to call the attention of the committee.

"No 32 is a letter from the Secretary to me, stating that no evidence will be laid before the President which I have not had the opportunity of being present at the taking of; and No. 24 is the deposition of John Arnold, taken ex parte on the 16th of September, only five days before the date of the letter to me communicating the President's decision. This deposition is referred to in the abstract of the case laid before the President, of the taking of which I had no knowledge, and which I could, I verily believe, at that time have disproved, had I had any notice of it.

"I must now call the particular attention of the committee to the abstract laid before the President, (No. 25.) This abstract entirely omits all mention of any evidence bearing on the first charge, and the President decides it not proved; whereas there was not only full and complete evidence of the charge, but full proof that the excuse of Mr. Reckless was false. And again: in referring to that abstract, it will be seen that the same is made out from the ex parte deposition of young Reckless, marked D, and which I had never seen or been notified of the taking of. And this I did in despite of the Secretary's pledge to me in his letter (32.) And thus all the evidence on the part of the accused laid before the President was ex parte, while I was forced to take my testimony at my own expense, to give notice, and then find it suppressed."

But, sir, the worst of it all is, that the President or Secretary, or both, were convinced of his guilt, notwithstanding their decision; for we find them ordering the accused to pay back the moneys which he had admitted he had falsely charged:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, September 24, 1835.

SIR: In compliance with the direction of the President, referred to in the inclosed copy of a letter addressed by this

25TH CONG....3D SESS.

Public Defaulters—Mr. Wise.

HO. OF REPS.

Department to Mr. Van Hook, of New York, in the case of certain charges preferred by him against J. W. Reckless, collector of the district of Perth Amboy, I transmit herewith the papers in the case, in order that the officer named may be called upon to make settlement for the expenses referred to, and will thank you to take the necessary measures to accomplish that object. The papers now sent may be returned to this Department when done with.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

JOSEPH ANDERSON, Esq., Comptroller of the Treasury.

Respectfully referred to the Register of the Treasury, who will be pleased to ascertain, from the settled accounts in his office, the amount of the improper charges made by Collector Reckless, alluded to in the accompanying documents, which the Register will return with his report to me.

JOSEPH ANDERSON, Comptroller.

September 29, 1835.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

COMPTROLLER'S OFFICE, October 2, 1835.

SIR: In a communication received from the Secretary of the Treasury, dated the 24th ultimo, I am informed that the President, in relation to the charges preferred against you by Mr. Van Hook, had directed that I should call upon you for a settlement of all the incidental expenses included in the boatmen's account, which are not by law allowable, together with the amount of the fees retained and paid to the district attorney out of the proceeds of the schooner Pacific.

I have, accordingly, to request that you will, as early as practicable, furnish a statement, specifying each and every incidental expense included in the several boatmen's accounts; stating on whose and what account, and in what manner so included; to which statement you will add the fees retained and paid to the district attorney aforesaid.

Respectfully,
J. W. RECKLESS, Esq.,
Collector, Perth Amboy, New Jersey.

COLLECTOR'S OFFICE,
PERTH AMBOY, November, 1835.

SIR: I have received your favor of the 2d ultimo, requesting a statement of all the incidental expenses charged in the boatmen's account, which you have herewith; and, on examination, you will please charge me with such amounts as cannot be allowed by law. The amount paid district attorney, $41 44, whose receipt, together with all the others, are on file in the Secretary's office in Washington.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
J. W. RECKLESS, Collector.

To JOSEPH ANDERSON, Esq., Comptroller.

Following these are the statements of the irregular charges against Government by Reckless. The Register states these as admitted:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
REGISTER'S OFFICE, July 2, 1836.

I do hereby certify that the preceding letter and statements are true copies from the originals filed in this office with the accounts, for the third quarter of 1835, of Joseph W. Reckless, collector of Perth Amboy, and that the amount under the heads of contingent and incidental expenses—
Second quarter 1833..... $59 20
Fourth quarter 1833..... 106 77
September 28, 1833, cash to district attorney for advance in claim against schooner Pacific..... 41 44
Second quarter 1834..... 90 17
Third quarter 1834..... 78 83

Amounting to the sum of $376 41 has been placed to his debit in the Treasury settlement No. 65927, dated 17th December, 1835, as "amount improperly charged by the collector as disbursements to boatmen, $159 26 of the same having been allowed in his accounts of emoluments."

T. L. SMITH, Register.

Sir, these documents comment upon themselves! I could present you with another case from the testimony of Mr. Parker—the case of Arnold—but I proceed to others.

Sir, I will now turn from the customs to the land offices. I will give you a flagrant case of violation of duty on the part of the Executive in the instance of William Linn, a receiver at Vandalia, Illinois. On the 23d day of June, 1834, the Secretary of the Treasury, then Mr. Taney, wrote to that officer the following letter:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, June 23, 1834.

SIR: I regret to be under the necessity of calling your attention to that provision of the regulations for the deposit of the public money which requires that each deposit should embrace the whole amount in the possession of receivers. According to your returns, there is in your hands on the 31st of March last, the sum of $10,643 49; on the 30th of April, the sum of $12,453 32; on the 31st of May, the sum of $13,505 10; yet it appears that its transfer to the bank of deposit was deferred until the 31st of May, and that the sum then deposited amounted to no more than $8,000. Under these circumstances, it becomes my duty to direct that the whole amount of public moneys in your hands, at the time of the receipt of this letter be forthwith deposited, and to apprise you that strict and punctual attention to the regulation in relation to the deposit of the public money is indispensable.

I am, &c.,
R. B. TANEY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

WILLIAM LINN, Esq., Receiver of Public Money, Vandalia.

By this letter a duty is ordered to be discharged, attention to which is regarded as "indispensable." Well, sir, you may judge of the officer's obedience by the following from Mr. Woodbury:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, October 20, 1834.

SIR: I would remark, in reply to your letter of the 30th ultimo, that you are not authorized to retain the public money in your hands, to meet anticipated demands arising under the circular of August last, contrary to the regulations which the Department has prescribed for the periodical deposit thereof.

Observing, from your monthly return of the 30th ultimo, that, notwithstanding the positive injunction contained in a letter from the Department, dated the 23d June last, (of which a copy is herewith inclosed,) the public moneys have been permitted to accumulate in your hands, in violation of the law and the instruction of the Department since the 31st of May last, and that it amounted, on the 30th ultimo, to the sum of $10,976 39, I am constrained by your continued neglect, to call your immediate attention to the subject, and again to require that the whole of the public moneys in your possession be deposited forthwith. Unless you exhibit to the Department satisfactory evidence of your having done so prior to the 1st day of December next, accompanied by a statement showing your receipts and disbursements, and the balance with which you are chargeable at the time of such deposit, it will be my painful duty to submit the case for the action of the Executive, and to recommend the appointment of another person as your successor.

I am, &c.,
LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. WILLIAM LINN,
Receiver of Public Money, Vandalia, Illinois.

Now, sir, herein is contained, by the Department itself, a specification against this officer, of "violation of the law and of instruction," after warning, and one would suppose that, in case he refused to do his duty, he would have been removed. Let us see:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, December 4, 1831.

SIR: Allow me to inquire why it is that your letter of the 16th ultimo is entirely silent as to your neglect to comply with the positive directions contained in a letter from the Department, dated the 23d June last, and that you still neglect to pay over the public money in your hands, or to furnish the statement as required by my letter of the 23d ultimo, and a statement of your advances to Colonel Ogden?

I am, &c.,
LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

WILLIAM LINN, Esq.,
Receiver of Public Money, Vandalia, Illinois.

This proves contumacy as well as defalcation and neglect. Let us see what again is done with this faithless servant. Would you not suppose that the next time he would be removed? Sir, do notice what follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 12, 1835.

SIR: Although it has pleased the President, under the explanations given, notwithstanding your past neglect in some cases to deposit the public moneys as required by law and the instructions of the Department, to reappoint you for the office of receiver of public money at Vandalia, and your nomination has been confirmed, yet it is not to be inferred from this evidence of his regard, that any future omission in this respect can be overlooked. Once for all, then, I would inform you that a strict observance of the regulations of the Department, for the periodical deposit of the public money, and the transmission of your accounts and returns, are paramount duties, the neglect of which will be reported for the action of the Executive.

I am, &c.,
LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

WILLIAM LINN, Esq.,
Receiver of Public Money, Vandalia, Illinois.

A renomination to office! And the very renomination recites his "past neglect"—his violation of law and instructions! This was an evidence of the President's regard, too! But he was not to infer from this evidence that he was licensed to sin! And he is warned that if he does sin again he will be reported to the Executive! Now, sir, he had reason to be afraid of that, had he not? Does this not prove a corrupt retention of a faithless officer, from personal regard, favoritism? But, sir, would you not suppose that, after this criminal indulgence, this super-kindness, this winking at past neglect, as well as threat of future punishment, the fellow would, from gratitude as well as fear, have done his duty afterwards? One might think so. Let us see:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, July 25, 1836.

SIR: I am in the receipt of your letter of the 30th ultimo, covering your account current for the month of June, with two certificates of deposit; one of which bears date on the 30th of said month. I wish, therefore, to be informed why the entire amount of money on hand at the time the last deposit was made was not included in it; the balance appearing by your account, not deposited, amounts to $15,129 04, which I have to request may be forthwith placed in bank to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States.

I am, very respectfully, &c.,
LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

WILLIAM LINN, Esq.,
Receiver of Public Money, Vandalia, Illinois.

Thus he does "likewise." Again:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, December 8, 1837.

SIR: Your letter of the 28th ultimo, announcing the death of Mr. Prentiss, register, is received. Again it becomes my duty to call your attention to the subject of my former letters, in reference to the deposit of the public money; and to inform you that if, by return of mail, evidence is not received of your having complied with the requirements of my letters of 16th August and 3d November, it will be my unpleasant duty to report your neglect to the President, and to recommend your removal from office.

I am, &c.,
LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

WILLIAM LINN, Esq., Receiver, Vandalia, Illinois.

This case needs no comment. Sir, it is but justice to this officer, Linn, to say that William J. Brown, the examiner of the Vandalia office, on the 12th day of June, 1835, made to the Secretary, Woodbury, a very favorable report of him, from which I extract the following:

"Of his fidelity to the Government I have no doubt, though engaged in speculating to a considerable extent, I have no evidence that he uses the public funds, nor could I learn that such an opinion prevailed in his neighborhood."

But, sir, be it kept in mind that he failed always to perform that "paramount" and "indispensable" duty to deposit the public money. Perhaps he did not speculate. Were ever defalcation and neglect so palpably approved by superintendents? If the money had been Levi's own, would he have thus trusted and forgiven, forgiven and trusted a defaulter? No, sir. A Secretary who charged Government fifteen cents a mile and a per diem for attendance to testify before an investigating committee of this House, as he did, and overcharged his account at that, would have discharged a trustee so faithless, at once. He is a Levi, sir, but not a son of Alpheus, who would leave the receipt of customs even to obey the command of the Savior, "Follow me!" He would not leave his own money for his God! Linn is reported a defaulter.

I will give you another case. I take it from fifty, par example, and for the special benefit of my friend before me, [Mr. PRENTISS.] It is the case of Harris, the receiver at Columbus, Mississippi. He was a notorious drunkard and defaulter, kept in office for two years, with all his sins about him, in full knowledge of the Department, until he became minus to Government in the pretty little sum of about one hundred and sixty thousand dollars! I find to this man no less than fifteen warnings, continued through two years or more, and at last was never punished.

March 6, 1834, Mr. Taney wrote to him that he was in arrears, and that to render his returns was an "indispensable" duty. Again, Mr. Woodbury wrote to him:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 6, 1835.

SIR: I regret that there should be occasion for again calling your attention to the omission to render your monthly duplicate returns to this office for the months of November and December, (those being in arrears,) and to remind you that punctuality in this respect is indispensable.

I am, &c.,
LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

W. P. HARRIS, Esq.,
Receiver of Public Money, Columbus, Mississippi.

Again:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 17, 1835.

SIR: Having received no monthly duplicate return of the transactions of your office since that for the month of October last, it becomes my unpleasant duty to call your immediate attention to the omission. Allow me to express a hope that there may be no further occasion to remind you of the importance of punctuality in the transmissions of these returns.

I am, &c.,
LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

W. P. HARRIS, Columbus, Mississippi.

Again:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, June 25, 1835.

SIR: Having, in a communication addressed to you on the 17th of March last, and on several prior occasions, urged upon you the indispensable necessity of a strict attention of making your monthly returns, and finding that no returns have been received from you since that for the month of November last, it becomes my unpleasant duty to say to you that if those in arrears are not transmitted by return of mail, I shall be constrained to report your neglect for the action of the Executive.

I am, &c.,
LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

RECEIVER OF PUBLIC MONEY, Columbus, Mississippi.

Again:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, August 23, 1835.

SIR: Agreeably to the intimation given you in my letter of the 20th June, it has become my disagreeable duty to report your continued neglect to the President, who has instructed me to say to you that if the monthly returns required from you by the regulations of the Treasury, which

25TH CONG...3D SESS.

Public Defaulters.—Mr. Wise.

Ho. of Reps.

are in arrears, are not received at the Department on or before the 10th of October next, you will then be dismissed from office.

I am, &amp;c.,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

WILLIAM P. HARRIS, Esq.,
Receiver of Public Money, Columbus, Mississippi.

Well, sir, one would have supposed that without doubt he would the next time have been removed. Again:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, September 22, 1835.

SIR: Allow me to inquire why it is that your deposits are not made in the branch of the Planter's Bank at Columbus, instead of the parent bank at Natchez? Does the branch refuse to receive them, and credit the amount at the mother bank?

I am, &amp;c.,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

WILLIAM P. HARRIS, Esq.,
Receiver of Public Money, Columbus, Mississippi.

P. S. Your return for the month of February last has been received to-day, and shows a large amount on hand not deposited; and you are hereby required, if not already done, to deposit any balance still on hand in the above branch, to the credit of the Treasury, and forward receipts therefor, in order to save time and expense in traveling to Natchez.

It seems, sir, he liked to have forgotten that the fellow was in default at all! The postscript recollects it, but then merely requests the performance of an oft-neglected duty! But he writes him again in a week:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, September 28, 1835.

SIR: I regret to say that the reasons assigned in your letter of the 14th instant for withholding your monthly returns cannot hereafter be deemed satisfactory. I can perceive no sufficient cause for their being delayed longer than the first week in each succeeding month, as there can be no difficulty in ascertaining at once the amount of money received within the month, or in stating the amount of your disbursements and deposits during the month. This is all that is required in them. The object of these returns is to afford the Department the earliest information in regard to the money operations of the Land Office, and the punctual transmission of all the moneys received to the bank of deposit. They are, therefore, of paramount importance, and cannot be permitted to await the completion of detailed book entries, or the perfection of other business, be his character what it may.

I am, &amp;c.,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

W. P. HARRIS, Esq.,
Receiver of Public Money, Columbus, Mississippi.

But next, sir, comes a terrible warning!

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, October 12, 1835.

SIR: Trusting to the assurances given in your letter of the 14th ultimo, and to those of your friends made in your behalf, the President has consented, upon the facts now before him, to continue you in office until the 12th of November proximo; then, unless your monthly returns are all rendered, and satisfactory evidence that the whole of the public moneys with which you are chargeable are deposited, you must be removed from office, however painful to both him and this Department.

I am, &amp;c.,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

W. P. HARRIS, Esq.,
Receiver of Public Money, Columbus, Mississippi.

He gives him till November proximo. Now for your duty—work up, my honest, faithful fellow! It will be painful to remove so worthy a servant! October 26, 1835, the Secretary writes:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, October 26, 1835.

SIR: I have to observe, in reply to your letter of the 9th instant, that the allowance authorized by the regulations of the Department, as a compensation for traveling expenses, and risk in the transmission of the public moneys to the bank of deposit, can only be made when such expenses and risk have actually been incurred, and not in any case where both are avoided, by means of the facilities afforded by the mail or deposit banks; moreover, inasmuch as the branch bank of Columbus receives and credits the moneys received by you in the first instance, I can perceive no reason why each deposit in past months should not have embraced the whole amount in your possession at the time of such deposit, as the instructions require.

I am, &amp;c.,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

W. P. HARRIS, Esq., Receiver of Public Money, Columbus.

Again:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, November 23, 1835.

SIR: Your letter of the 11th instant, and return for the month of October, is received. As your deposits of public moneys are made at Columbus, no reason whatever can be seen why the whole money in your hands at the end of the month is not deposited. It is expected that it will be hereafter.

I am, &amp;c.,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

W. P. HARRIS, Esq.,
Receiver of Public Money, Columbus, Mississippi.

He has escaped! But, sir, he is soon in a tight place again:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 19, 1836.

SIR: I inclose a copy of a letter from Henry Plattner, complaining of your official conduct, and have to request that you will furnish prompt and satisfactory explanations. I am, &c.,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

REGISTER OF LAND OFFICE, Columbus, Mississippi.

Again:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 28, 1836.

SIR: Your letter of the 13th instant, inclosing your return for the month of November, is received. Again it becomes my unpleasant duty to complain of your neglect in this respect, and to inform you that the omission to transmit the required monthly statements, for a whole quarter after they are due, cannot be permitted in any public office; and especially after having been heretofore so often reminded of the consequences of such neglect. On the return of the mail, therefore, if the usual statements for the other months in arrears are not received, I shall be under the disagreeable necessity of again submitting the subject to the President, for his immediate action.

I am, &amp;c.,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

W. P. HARRIS, Esq.,
Receiver of Public Money, Columbus, Mississippi.

Again:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, June 6, 1836.

SIR: Your letter of the 23d ultimo, accompanied by your returns for the month of April, is received. Seeing the balance of public moneys in your hands amounted to $138,884 70 at the end of that month, I have to request that you will explain why it was that the whole of the public moneys in your hands on the last of the previous month was not deposited, instead of a part, in conformity to explicit and frequent instructions on that point. It is painful to be obliged to ask you so often for explanations.

I am, &amp;c.,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

RECEIVER OF PUBLIC MONEY, Columbus, Mississippi.

At last, sir, the fellow himself cannot be ungrateful any longer; he proposes himself to resign!

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, September 21, 1836.

SIR: Your letter of the 27th ultimo, addressed to the President, has been referred to this office. Your duties as receiver will, of course, have ceased, or been suspended, after the 31st ultimo, the time when you propose your resignation should take effect; immediate steps, it is hoped, will be taken to adjust your accounts, and pay over the balance. Soon as the President returns, a further communication will be made to you.

I am, &amp;c.,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

W. P. HARRIS, Esq., Columbus, Mississippi.

And, sir, to cap the climax of this case, the Secretary's last was as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, November 19, 1836.

SIR: I have received your letter of the 1st instant, by the mail of this morning, and regret to inform you that, as long ago as August last, steps were taken by the Solicitor of the Treasury to attempt to secure the balance due from you.

I am, &amp;c.,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

W. P. HARRIS, Esq., Columbus, Mississippi.

He "regrets," after letting him run on from March 6, 1834, to September 21, 1836—two years and six months!—to inform him "that as long ago as August last, steps were taken"—taken at last, Mr. Speaker, after the horse was stolen! the fellow was full!—"to attempt to secure the balance due from him! Was there ever such a flagrant case before confessed, under the official hand and seal, by a head of a Department?

Yes, sir, just such a one in the instance of this Harris's successor; a man named Boyd! Sir, would not one have reasonably supposed that the Secretary would have been careful to prevent his very successor from doing the very same thing? Was it too much to expect that he would at least have been watchful to prevent the same abuse immediately in the same office? Sir, it was even worse. Soon after his appointment, the Secretary wrote to him as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, December 26, 1836.

SIR: In reply to the inquiry made in your letter of the 7th instant, I would respectfully refer you to the inclosed circular. I embrace the occasion to call your attention to the necessity of making your monthly returns to this office as soon after the expiration of each month as practicable.

I am, &amp;c.,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

G. D. BOYD, Esq.,
Receiver of Public Money, Columbus, Mississippi.

The next letter shows that Boyd was in "the line of safe precedents," and "following in the footsteps of his illustrious predecessor:"

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, June 10, 1837.

SIR: In consequence of your neglect to render your monthly return, and pay over the public moneys, as required by law and the instructions of the Department, and the further omission to execute your official bonds in perfect form, the President has directed that the sales of public lands within your district be temporarily suspended, until your compliance with the duties reposed on you, or such other steps as the facts may justify. The register has been instructed accordingly. Under these circumstances, I have to require that a bond be renewed, in the form required by the Commissioner of the Land Office, and that your returns be promptly rendered; and that the whole amount of public moneys in your hands be specially deposited to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, in the Planters' Bank at Natchez, and evidence thereof transmitted here without delay.

I am, &amp;c.,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

RECEIVER OF PUBLIC MONEY, Columbus, Mississippi.

In the mean time, sir, the Secretary had appointed V. M. Garesché, a citizen of Delaware, I believe, an examiner of this office at Columbus, and others, to report upon its condition. After this last letter to Boyd, Garesché made his report, on the 14th day of June, 1837, directed to Levi Woodbury, Secretary of the Treasury. From that report, sir, contained in this official document, No. 297, I extract the following:

"The account of the receiver, which I have made out and transmit herewith, presents against him a balance of $55,965 54. His own account makes it $53,272 73; it is also annexed. His assets, of which I also send you the list, amount to $61,549 98, rating the land at $1 25 only, but might probably realize double the amount. The man seems really penitent; and I am inclined to think, in common with his friends, that he is honest, and has been led away from his duty by the example of his predecessor, and a certain looseness in the code of morality which here does not move in so limited a circle as it does with us at home. Another receiver would probably follow in the footsteps of the two. You will not, therefore, be surprised if I recommend his being retained, in preference to another appointment; for he has his hands full now, and will not be disposed to speculate any more. He will have his bond signed by the same sureties, and forwarded in a few days to Washington; this speaks favorably. He has, moreover, pledged his word that, if retained, he will strictly obey the law, and receive nothing but specie in payment for lands. He tells me that he is about selling a great portion of his lands; that and some other negotiation will enable him to discharge a large portion of his debt to the United States before the expiration of the present quarter. Lenity towards him, therefore, might stimulate him to exertions which severity might perhaps paralyze. I have, in the mean time, enjoined the closing of the land office until the bond is completed and returned. No land has been sold since the 29th ultimo."

Sir, is there any parallel to this in the history of corruption? He reports to the Secretary that Boyd is a defaulter to the amount of $55,965 54, in less than twelve months! Among his assets we find enumerated a principality of the public lands! A monster monopoly he; he had absorbed public land and public money, too! And, sir, he is recommended to be "retained in preference to another appointment," for the reason that the dog or the fox gave for not driving off the gorged swarm of flies: lest a lank and hungry swarm would immediately fasten on the body! He has his hands full now, and will not speculate any more! He will give a bond signed by the same sureties, and has pledged his word for a faithful performance of duty, and to receive nothing but specie! The land office closed for his malfeasance in office! Great God, was ever public crime more flagitious and unblushing! Here is his list of assets, which will show you what he had probably been doing with the public money, to use which for private profit, we are now told, should be made felony by statute:

List of notes belonging to G. D. Boyd, (given in the table,) amounting to.....$37,150
About one thousand dollars, other good notes, not secured by land..... 1,000

$38,150

I have, also, say twenty thousand acres of land unsold. I owe out of this one debt of $1,500; which is all I do owe, except some small debts. I have, also, an interest of half of the profits which may be made out of about fifteen thousand acres more.

June 5, 1837.

G. D. BOYD.

In his list of notes $3,300 are due to him as partner in a firm of G. D. Boyd & Henderson. Sir, his assets prove that he must have been guilty of perjury as well as defalcation. He must have returned lands as sold which were never paid for; he must have filed his receipts for moneys paid which never were paid. And this fact must have been known to the Department from the very report. What has been done to recover this twenty thousand acres of "unsold land"—public land never, in fact, sold by Government—to recover this $37,000 for its land, which was sold by Boyd as his private patrimony? Let Mr. Woodbury, his marshals, and district attorneys, answer me these questions. Sir, I will tell you what has been done with Boyd. After this report was made, the Secretary wrote as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, August 8, 1837.

SIR: I am happy to hear of the frank and honorable course proposed in your letter of the 24th ultimo. It would be convenient to have the bond and resignation arrive here by the early part of September.

I am, &c.,
LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

G. D. BOYD,
Receiver of Public Money, Columbus, Mississippi.

He permits him to resign, and commends his course as "frank and honorable!" Boyd is retailing lands plundered from the people at an immense profit—is making a fortune by his defalcation—is permitted by the Secretary to strut off with his "hands full," unscathed by a prosecution; he is elected an independent Locofoco Senator to the State Senate of Mississippi, and there is a warm and grateful supporter of Mr. Van Buren! Well he may be! Such is his fate compared with that of Tobias Watkins, to whom I would beseech you again to go and buy soap to clean yourselves. These are the crying abuses, sir, the flagrant enormities, the damnable outrages upon the public interests and morals, upon my patience, which have so roused my spirit oftentimes, as to afford you and your party grounds for representing me to be mad! Yes, sir, and I appeal to every honest man if such monstrous abuses are not enough to make the blood boil—to frenzy! Would a pure Secretary ever have allowed Garesché to address him as he did Woodbury? Did not Garesché know that Woodbury was himself corrupt, or would he, a subordinate, have dared to address to him such reasons for retaining in public trust such a faithless villain? Would a Crawford, or even a Rush, have been thus addressed? Would a pure President retain such a Secretary, who could unblushingly report such appeals to his dishonesty in an official communication? Sir, Garesché concludes his report thus. Speaking of Harris, the predecessor of Boyd, he says:

"Various are the reports of the late receiver's solvability; some say that he will pay the whole, whilst others, and the greatest number, do not believe that he will pay seventy-five per cent.; but they all concede that his intemperance has been his greatest crime, and that the loss of his money has been caused by that of his reason; and that, as in algebra, the minus on one side has been made plus on the other. It is my belief that his forced confidence has been sadly abused. He, too, passes for an honest man."

"I am, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,
V. M. GARESCHÉ.

"Hon. LEVI WOODBURY, Secretary of the Treasury."

Why should not such a Secretary be impeached? Impeach him, and I will go before that humbled and disarmed Senate, and convict him out of his own mouth and the mouths of his own minions. I will call no other witnesses. I will dare the constitutional judges to acquit him—overawed as they are by an arrogant Executive; they might acquit him in the face of these facts, and in the face of the people if they dare. To read the Swartwout report, one would think Woodbury was astonished, astounded by a defalcation; yet here are fifty cases of like character with those of Linn, Harris, and Boyd.

It is worthy of remark that Garesché, in a subsequent report, dated October 12, 1837, says:

"I understand that Mr. John Davis, of Columbus, has applied for the office of receiver of public moneys, in the room of G. D. Boyd, resigned. From what I know of the character of the postulant, I think it would be a very judicious choice; he has been brought up to the bar, is amiable and talented, and a warm friend of the Administration. I should be surprised if the Department suffered disappointment from that quarter."

No; likely enough not to suffer from a warm friend of the Administration, after the experience of the two predecessors in that office!

But to proceed: I will give you the case of the "Receiver at Fort Wayne." To save time and space, instead of reading all the letters and documents, I will give you, sir, the synopsis of this case, as detailed by my friend B. Peyton, in his testimony before the select committee of which I was chairman, in 1837:

"I believe the Secretary of the Treasury has been guilty of a violation of official duty in retaining in office Colonel John Spencer, receiver of public moneys in the land office at Fort Wayne, Indiana. It appears, by a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, bearing date April 25, 1836, in his report to the House of Representatives of the 4th of February instant, an extract of which I herewith file, as a part of my evidence, is in these words:

"The returns required to be made to the Secretary, as you will perceive from the inclosed circular, are monthly, &c. As these statements for January and February last have not been received at this Department, I must claim your attention to the omission, and insist on their transmission, in future, immediately after the close of each month. At the same time, I would also claim your strict attention to the regulations of the Department in respect to the periodical deposits of the public money, and to the duty of transmitting the usual evidences of such deposits to the Secretary of the Treasury, as the instructions require."

"[Signed by the Secretary of the Treasury, &c.]"

In another letter of the Secretary to said receiver, bearing date May 23, 1836, he holds this language:

"Since the date of my letter to you of the 25th ultimo, your returns for the month of April have been received, from which I perceive that the public moneys in your hands on the 30th ultimo amounted to the sum of $247,251 64; which amount is the accumulated receipts of your office since the 1st of January last. You cannot but be aware that the retention of the public moneys in your hands beyond the period of one month, unless the receipts of such month be less than $10,000, is a violation of your instructions."

"The object of this letter is—

"1. To require that the whole balance on hand at the time of the receipt of this letter shall be immediately deposited, and a certificate of such deposit transmitted to the Department without delay.

"2. To inform you that the Department cannot overlook the omission to do so; or your future neglect to deposit monthly, and to transmit your monthly returns, accompanied by the evidence of your deposit, in time to be received at this office within the month next preceding that for which the return is rendered.

"3. That any neglect or inattention to these requirements, unless satisfactorily accounted for, will require of me, from a sense of official duty, that you be reported to the President, with a recommendation that you be removed from office."

"[Signed by the Secretary, and directed to the same.]"

In the two letters above referred to, the duties of the receiver are so clearly defined, and the consequences to him of future neglect so explicitly stated, that it would seem there was but one alternative left for him; that is, a strict performance of duty on his part, or a prompt removal from office on the part of the Secretary, by reporting him to the President.

Secretary of the Treasury to Ethan A. Brown, Esq., Commissioner of the General Land Office.

"Sir: It is desirable that an examination should be made of the land office at Fort Wayne, Indiana. And I request you to notify Nathaniel West, Jr., of Indianapolis, that he has been selected for that purpose; and forward to him the usual instructions, and particularly to direct his inquiries into the causes of the delay on the part of the receiver in forwarding the returns required under the regulations of the Department, and in making deposits to the credit of the Treasurer. That officer has lately made a deposit of a large amount, which has been accumulating for several months past. The examiner will ascertain, if possible, whether the receiver or register had been using the money received on sales in any manner, by loaning it or otherwise; and what are the reasons for the delays in depositing the money, and in making returns, by both the register and receiver."

To which Mr. Brown replied, giving certain information, by his letter of the 1st of July; to which Mr. Woodbury replied, as follows:

"July 1, 1836.

"Sir: Your letter of this date, respecting the examination of the land office at Fort Wayne, has been received. I see no excuse in the papers presented with your letter, for the receiver not having deposited a dollar from March till June, nor having sent any monthly abstracts to me in that time, nor answered my letters remonstrating against his neglect. These things I wish specially investigated, as well as the present state of money on hand, &c.; and the points before indicated."

This is the tone in which the Secretary speaks at the bare suspicion which attached to the receiver. But see how changed, how softened, his tone, how ready to find excuses for him, when all the facts, and more than he seemed to have apprehended, were established by Mr. West, the examiner!

From a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury to E. A. Brown, Esq., Commissioner of the General Land Office, dated July 8, 1836, it appears that—"The returns of the receiver for the month of May have been received, and exhibit a balance of money in his hands at the close of that month, amounting to $601,360 49. He has transmitted, under date of the 27th ultimo, a certificate of deposit in the branch bank of Indiana, made on the 27th of the same month, of $540,433 09, leaving a balance in his hands of $60,947 40. I have to request that you will instruct Mr. West, the examiner referred to in my letter above stated, to make special inquiry into this matter, and to report to the Department the result." &c., &c.

Mr. West was appointed and entered on his duties on the 11th day of August, 1836. In his report he says he shows a balance of $18,795 03 then due from said receiver to the United States. He says:

"Why this balance of $18,795 03 appears, has not been explained; and if any explanations could be made, Mr. Spencer's absence precludes me from giving it. His clerk thinks that he has still more money at Richmond; but as he left for collection there, on the 1st of June, what they, on the 1st day of August, finally passed to his credit, I have thought this not very probable. His clerk, though called up, gives me no schedule of the money he took with him to Richmond, when he went to make his deposit on the 1st of June.

"I think Mr. Spencer could not with propriety urge, when he went to make a deposit on the 1st of June, as a good cause for delay for not having done so before, the state of the roads; as a free passage was open to him via Logansport, and no difficulty in his way."

(See his apology in his letter of the 20th June, 1836.) He represents the books, papers, &c., in the office, as being very negligently kept.

"The clerk urges as an excuse for the return not being regularly made, during the months of January, February, and March, that Mr. Spencer did not think it necessary, as the office was closed and no business doing. This is a different excuse from what Mr. Spencer made. His irregularity since, he (the clerk) states is owing to the great pressure of business; and I am convinced it has been very great."

"In answer to my question, why the present large sum now with Mr. Spencer was allowed to accumulate, they offer the letter of the president of the Indianapolis Bank as an excuse, a copy of which is herewith inclosed. It does not appear when it was received, but probably about the 22d of July."

From this it appears that the $100,599 32 spoken of by the receiver in his letter of the 22d of August, as having been retained so long on hand, was so retained by him without any such excuse as therein set up.

But what is stated heretofore by the examiner may fall, perhaps, under the head of gross negligence on the part of the receiver, which should have been considered good cause of instant removal from office.

But what follows must be placed under the head of positive offense against law, principle, and morality. He says:

"Upon the subject of using the money of the United States, I beg leave to state that I find it universally stated and believed, and it is conceded to as a fact by the clerks in the receiver's office, that both he and his relative, Dawson have been much in the habit, in the office, of shaming money—that is, exchanging the money which could not be received for public lands; the rate of exchange or discount varying from three to five per cent. I find in the case of Isaiah Wells, of Marion county, Ohio, that so recently as the 6th instant, he paid into the hands of the receiver, in his office eight dollars for exchanging $240 of Ohio bank notes of five dollars each. To what extent this shaming business has been carried on in the office, of course I do not know, but I am satisfied it has been to a very considerable extent; and that the Government money paid in by one person has been handed out by the receiver in exchange for uncurrent, or not land office money—he receiving for his own private use the discount as agreed upon; and that the same Government money again is passed into the land office, to be again used for the like purpose, in pay for the public lands. That the receiver has taken in bank notes of five dollars, contrary to orders, the schedule prepared at his office, herewith inclosed, will prove; that he received a bonus for taking the same is, I think, almost beyond a doubt."

The examiner adds:

"P. S. Mr. Spencer has just come in, having been as far as Richmond, where, by obtaining a discount on some drafts due in September, originally taken here for land, he was enabled to swell his deposit there to $52,531 34; which, together with the money taken with him from here, and some other money, enabled him to deposit to the credit of the United States $455,906. His own account will stand thus:

Here he states the account debtor and creditor, and strikes a balance, bringing the said receiver indebted to the United States in the sum of $5,206 84, which was at first stated at $3,216 84, but corrected on the last page.

After this report of West was made, William Hendricks wrote to the Secretary the following:

MADISON, August 31, 1836.

SIR: I am informed that some things are stated recently, to the prejudice of Colonel John Spencer, receiver at Fort Wayne; and I am requested to write you.

In doing so, I can only say that I have been gratified in learning that his deposits have been made to your satisfaction; and if so, I hope that minor matters, if mere irregularities, will be overlooked. He is reputed to be an honest and honorable man, and I do not believe that he has intentionally either done wrong, or violated his instructions. It would, to some extent, produce excitement, if he were removed, for he has many warm and influential friends both at Fort Wayne and in Dearborn county, from which he removed to his present residence. BETTER LET IT BE.

With much respect, WILLIAM HENDRICKS.

Hon. LEVI WOODBURY, Secretary of the Treasury.

This was enough. "Better let it be!" And immediately the Secretary wrote to Spencer the following:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, September 2, 1836.

SIR: I have received the report of Mr. West, upon the transactions of the land office under your charge; upon which I beg leave to remark, that the Department trusts your deposits will hereafter be promptly made; and that no exchanges whatever, of money, will take place on any terms, as they open a door to improper practices and unfounded imputations. I am happy to add that the Department can readily see the difficulties in resting opportunities to exchange money, and to receive what is not permitted by regulation. It can also duly appreciate your excuses for not making more prompt returns and more frequent deposits, but it trusts that, hereafter, a more rigid conformity to your instructions will be practicable, and will remove all cause of apprehension and complaint.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
LEVI WOODBURY.

Colonel JOHN SPENCER, Receiver, Fort Wayne.

This is not only a great falling off from the tone of the other letters of the Secretary, but seems to be an encouragement to the receiver in writing the following letter:

RECEIVER'S OFFICE, FORT WAYNE,
October 27, 1836.

SIR: This is to inform you that I have forwarded to the deposit bank $104,000, in silver, there to remain until I arrive with the gold and paper money.

Why did he not go along with it?

My Democratic friends think that I ought not to leave until after we hold our election for President, on the 7th of November, which I have concluded to await, and shall leave on that evening, or the next morning, to deposit, with all the funds on hand up to that time. I shall write you again before I leave. The sales are rapid; mostly paid in gold and silver. My quarterly report will be forwarded by next mail, for last quarter, which ought to have been done sooner, only for the want of help in the office. Hereafter, I think I can get my reports off without much delay, after the close of the month and quarter.

I am yours, respectfully,
JOHN SPENCER, Receiver.

Hon. LEVI WOODBURY, Secretary of the Treasury.

This bold avowal of sending a large portion of the public money by other hands, and awaiting himself to unite with his Democratic friends at the presidential election, does not appear to have been the cause of complaint on the part of the Secretary.

And here, sir, is his answer to Governor Hendricks:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, September 7, 1836.

SIR: Your letter of the 31st ultimo is received, and I am happy to inform you that Mr. Spencer's explanations have been such, that he will probably continue in office.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. WILLIAM HENDRICKS, Madison, Indiana.

Is this not willful, base official corruption? Shaving with the public money was mere "irregularity," and "improper practices" thrice proved, admitted, reported, became "unfounded imputations" as soon as a political partisan whispered, "better let it be!" Sir, these words ought to be inscribed over the doors of the Treasury Department, and to be branded, like Cain's infamy, upon the forehead of Levi Woodbury—"better let it be!" Sir, this embraces all your principles and practices in respect to investigation of fraud, embezzlement, corruption, and official malversation for years. These words converted of a sudden the Secretary's frowns and threats into the clearest perception of "difficulties" and the clearest proofs into "unfounded imputations." After this, what should be thought of this Secretary's denunciation of any charges as "unfounded imputations?"

Sir, I will read no more of these cases; these few I have given as specimens are not the gravest or the last of forty or fifty I can enumerate. In addition to these I could show you facts in the instances of Lewis, Alsbury, Dickson, Sterling, Sheldon, Rogers, Taylor, Ryland, Allen, Hawkins, Blackburn, Carlin, Owens, Cannon, M. J. Allen, Hutchins, Benson, Holleman, Mitchell, McCarty, Simpson, Hays, Skinner, Blakely, McRoberts, and numerous others, "too tedious to mention," all going to the same point—official neglect, violation of law and duty, and corrupt administration. All going to show more—that the losses have all occurred by failure to deposit in banks, and by leaving moneys in the hands of sub-treasurers. And more still—that, notwithstanding the pretensions set up in the President's message to this session, this Administration is guilty beyond all former examples of "the improbity of diverting public money to private purposes."

No, sir, I will wade through no more of these cases. I come at last to that of Samuel Swartwout, the largest, though not the last of the list.

Samuel Swartwout went out of office the 29th of March, absconded on the 16th of August, and was not proceeded against until the month of November, 1838. How does the Secretary account for this delay?

According to the report to this House, Swartwout's last return, March 28, 1838, showed a balance against him amounting to the sum of $201,096 40.

Letter of Swartwout to Secretary, dated April 13, states that he holds this sum subject to sundry suits at law then pending to recover back duties.

Letter from Woodbury to Swartwout, April 16, hopes that Swartwout will deposit one half of that amount to the credit of the United States.

Letter from Woodbury to Comptroller Barker, April 16, would thank him to have Swartwout's accounts settled.

And here, sir, you must permit me to digress a moment to show you a piece of Mr. Secretary's chicanery in the numbering of this last letter. You will perceive that it is dated the 16th of April, prior in date to Swartwout's excuses contained in his letter, and those of Price of the 20th, 21st, and 25th of April; yet, in the Secretary's report, page 3, it is referred to as if subsequent to those three letters of later date. This is some of Mr. Woodbury's obfuscation, some of his muddy water to escape by. It is important; and you would not observe the effect of this upon a hasty reading. You will see the effect directly.

The next letter in the series is that of Barker, the Comptroller, to Miller, the First Auditor, dated April 17, requesting him to settle the accounts of Swartwout.

Letter of Barker to Swartwout, dated April 17, requests him to return his accounts to the First Auditor.

Letter from Woodbury to Barker, dated April 18, would thank him to call on the Solicitor, to get from the district attorney (asks Tom to call on Dick to get from Harry!) in New York (Price) a list of the suits pending against Swartwout for return duties, and their amount, &c., indorsed with the same request to the Solicitor.

Now, this letter, you will observe, was written in obvious reference to Swartwout's of the 13th of April, giving these suits pending as excuse for retaining the balance in his hands of $201,000.

The next letter is from Swartwout to Woodbury, dated the 21st, in reply to Woodbury's letter of the 16th, inclosing one from Price, dated the 20th, showing his individual liability for judgments on protests, and stating that the notices of protests were estimated at between two and three hundred thousand dollars.

Woodbury then, in a letter to Barker, dated April 23, refers Swartwout's letter to him, and suggests that Swartwout should furnish Hoyt, his successor, with funds to meet refunded duties paid under protest.

Barker, by letter to Swartwout, dated 24th of April, states his of the 21st had been referred to him, and that it was necessary he should so furnish Hoyt with funds.

Barker to Swartwout, April the 26th, requests him to render his accounts to the First Auditor. Gilpin, the Solicitor, in a letter to Barker, April the 27th, inclosing Price's letter, as district attorney, in reply to the Secretary's, of the 18th of April, showing the lists of suits. This letter of Price, dated the 25th of April, to Gilpin, shows that there were but two suits pending undecided—damages in one $2,000, in the other $158 80, and the amount of unsatisfied judgments to be but $5,561 63; the whole amount for which Swartwout was individually liable but $7,720 43. And, further, that there were one hundred and fifteen protests, uncertain in amount; "but, by examination of invoices and appraisements at custom-house, the amount of each claim could be readily ascertained." He adds:

"I will apply to the present collector (Hoyt) for such statement, and transmit it to you, upon my receipt thereof. It will, however, require several days to prepare such a document."

Now, sir, in this letter we see that Swartwout's excuse for retaining this large balance of $201,000 to meet $7,000 was false, or could readily be made to appear true or false in a period not exceeding, at most, "several days." Were any steps taken to ascertain the amount of these protests? None. And, sir, here I bring your attention to the letter of Woodbury, dated April the 16th, numbered 9, and to his report. Mark you, sir, page 3, he says:

"A further inquiry into the case was, however, immediately instituted by me, through the First Comptroller and Solicitor of the Treasury. It terminated in an impression that the facts and the law, as to suits and protests, might justify a short delay in the adjustment. See copies of letters Nos. 6 to 8," &c.

The letters Nos. 6 to 8 in his report, are his of the 18th of April, Gilpin's of the 27th of April, and Price's of the 25th of April. In the very next paragraph of his report he adds:

"But the Comptroller was, notwithstanding, directed to bring Mr. Swartwout's accounts to an early settlement, and to have a prompt payment made of whatever amount should appear to be not in doubt or controversy."

Now, would not any one suppose, from this report, in this connection, that this direction to the Comptroller was given subsequently to the date of this letter from Price, of the 25th, falsifying Swartwout's of the 16th. The Secretary intended to create such an impression, but upon referring to the No. 9 he cites, you find that it is his old letter of April 16, prior in date to all this correspondence with Barker, Gilpin, and Price!

So far, then, from his taking any steps after this falsification of Swartwout's excuses for retaining so large a balance, you find no step whatever until a letter from Wolf, the Comptroller, to Swartwout, dated June 13th; nearly two months after Price's of the 25th, stating that upon an adjustment of his accounts he was charged with the enormous sum of $8,365,377 18!

This, even, started not the Rip Van Winkle of the Treasury; but next comes lazily along another letter from the Auditor's office, signed by clerk Mahon, to Swartwout, dated August 13—two months again, after Wolf's adjustment—nearly four months after Price's of the 25th, which was to admit of but a short delay, and which required only "several days," at most—calling upon him to forward his accounts!

Swartwout took steam for England in two days afterwards, August 16! If this was speed, "go it, ye terrapins!" Put Woodbury after Swartwout and Price! He gave them the word "go," and said "I am coming!" A Muscovy drake after night-hawks! Sir, every step he took was like those of his own unwieldy body—heavy and slow; every indication here is that he was rather for giving them timely and friendly warning to take steam, not leg-bail!

It is amusing, now, to look at the next letter of the Department and its date. Miller, the Auditor, reports to Barker, the Comptroller, August 31, half a lunar after the bird had flown, that Swartwout's accounts had not been received! On the 3d of September his (Swartwout's) securities were notified that he had not rendered his account! The poor fellows took advantage of this notice, no doubt. They were fools, if they did not; and then came the circulars, the letters of inquiry, the dispatches to New York, the bustling activity, the hurly-burly of confusion and wonder and surprise—"Why, why, why! Swartwout is gone! He is a defaulter! Who would have thought it? How did it happen? Can anybody tell how? Can you, Mr. Auditor?—you, Comptroller?—anybody?"

Such is a picture of the administration of your Treasury. It is literally administered, and returned insolvent.

Why was this delay from April to October, 1838, to ascertain what Price told them they might readily ascertain? Why this postponement to examine invoices and appraisements? I will tell you, sir. Notwithstanding Mr. Secretary tells you there was no suspicion, even—no, not the least—this thing was as well known, not perhaps the amount exactly, but the defalcation was as well known, before October, as afterwards in November. But the elections were in October, and concealment of this nefarious transaction was everything until after the Empire State and her sisters of the Union had voted. This was the secret of this delay, and this was Swartwout's passport to Europe! "Better let it be" until after the elections! It would not do. If it had been known, when elections were turning on the sub-Treasury scheme, that the chief sub-treasurer had marched off with a million and more of the public money, it would have had an electric effect; it would have won for the country a victory in Ohio, notwithstanding abolition and its kindred political vices! Thank God, it is in time for you, sir, in Tennessee!

But, again. From the joint report of the Comp-

Public Defaulters—Mr. Wise.

HO. OF REPS.

troller and Solicitor, Barker and Gilpin, dated at New York, November 8, 1838, (page 19, of this Document No. 13,) we learn the following facts:

"It appeared that the last settlement of his accounts at the Treasury was up to the 31st December last, (December, 1837,) and that, though he was called on by the First Auditor, and notice subsequently given to his sureties by the Comptroller, his accounts and vouchers from that time to the 23rd of March, 1838, when his term of office expired, had never been furnished."

Indeed, sir, it fully appears that he was never made to return his accounts and vouchers at all; they were not returned, as you see by the letters read long after his escape. Now, why was this? What was the balance against him in December, 1837? The same report informs us:

"The stated balance against him on the 31st of December, 1837, was $9,678,984 56; this, however, was known to include all the uncollected bonds not due, bonds in suit, &c. This made it necessary, as the accounts and vouchers were not furnished, that immediate steps should be taken to ascertain the sum really due as accurately as possible."

Were such steps taken? None, none! Time after time was Mr. Swartwout requested and thanked to return his accounts. Time after time he failed. It was left, as it were, optional to furnish his vouchers or not; he chose to furnish none; he eloped on the 16th of August, 1838; and no such step was taken at all until the orders to Underwood in November, 1838—twelve months after it was necessary for "immediate steps to be taken"—to proceed to New York!

But again, sir. From this report, pages 33, 34, it does appear that the accounts of Swartwout, for the term commencing October 1, and ending December 31, 1837, were made out at the First Auditor's office as early as May, 1838, showing the balance due the United States to be $9,678,984 56. Here is this statement in full, reported by the First Auditor, and certified by the Comptroller, and certified by the Register and Woodbury himself. Why was this delay from December, 1837, to May, 1838; and why, when reported in default, was Swartwout permitted to escape as late as August, without accounting at all?

Again, sir; it further appears, from the second report of Barker and Gilpin to Woodbury, dated New York, November 15, 1838, that one of the funds in which there is a deficit is the fund of "forfeitures and penalties."

"The 'forfeitures and penalties' belonging to the United States constitute the second fund in which there is a deficit. It amounts, in the aggregate, to $39,823 12."

"Of this there occurred—
In the year 1832, the sum of.....$29,632 46
In the year 1833, the sum of.....3,674 04
In the year 1834, the sum of.....1,173 09
In the year 1835, the sum of.....5,343 53
$39,823 12

"By the provisions of the eighty-ninth section of the act of the 2d of March, 1799, the collector is to receive from the court all sums received on account of fines, penalties, and forfeitures, for a breach of the revenue laws, and he is to account for them quarterly to the Treasury. The sum above stated belonged to the United States, as their portion of various penalties and forfeitures, and was received by Mr. Swartwout under the above provision. It was not, however, debited in his own cash account; and though admitted in his accounts rendered to the Treasury, it has never been paid over."

These sums you see were received by the collector from the courts of record. Now, if proper supervision had guarded his official conduct, was it not the easiest thing in the world to detect his deficit in this fund by inspection of the court's records? Was there ever such inspection? None.

Again: Another fund in which was a deficit was that consisting of "three Treasury warrants:"

"Three Treasury warrants, amounting in the aggregate to $39,240 05, were received by Mr. Swartwout during the years 1834 and 1835. They were for the following sums respectively:

1834, August 23, No. 9,677 .....$7,637 21
1835, May 2, No. 837 .....21,895 15
1835, June 22, No. 993 .....9,707 69
$39,240 05

"Mr. Swartwout received these warrants under the authority of the second section of the act of the 97th of June, 1834, to make up an alleged deficiency in the fees and emoluments of his office to meet the compensation due to his clerks. Their receipt appears by his books, but the proceeds have never been debited in his cash account, and their whole amount still remains entirely unaccounted for."

Now, sir, from whence did Swartwout receive these warrants? From the Secretary's Department—from Washington! The Secretary himself knew that he had received these warrants, of course. Swartwout, it seems, did charge himself with these warrants, as their receipt appears by his books, but their proceeds were never debited in his cash account. Now, sir, how could the Secretary fail to detect this deficit? Yet it appears to have continued from August 23, 1834, through May and June, 1835, up to November, 1838, without a suspicion!

Again: Sir, it appears another item of deficit was for "fees and emoluments of office overdrawn:"

"Cash was withdrawn for the alleged purpose of paying the expenses of the office, beyond the actual amount of these expenses, as exhibited by Mr. Swartwout's own accounts and vouchers. The aggregate of this excess is $60,291 42. The application of this fund commenced in the third quarter of 1835, and extended down to the last quarter of his official term. It is thus distributed through the several years:

In 1835 the excess of cash withdrawn was....$36,368 25
In 1836 it was .....30,788 29
In 1837 it was.....23,134 88
$60,291 42"

Did not Mr. Secretary know what should have been the correct charges for fees and emoluments? This, it seems, pervaded three years, and was never suspected until the defaulter had run away with a million!

Fines and forfeitures.....$39,823 12
Treasury warrants .....39,240 05
Office expenses.....60,291 42
$139,354 59

Here is the sum of $140,000, in round numbers, abstracted for years, which Mr. Secretary must have known was embezzled, unless he was blind in his eyes, or perfectly senseless in his olfactory nerves; yet he never suspected! Sir, vigilance in supervising the accounts of Swartwout would have detected, to a certainty, either one of these deficits during the years 1834, 1835, 1836, and 1837, and would have saved the sum of $1,225,000, lost in March, 1838!

But, sir, I have been proving, so far, gross neglect only. I will now proceed to show something worse than laches in this case, on the part of Mr. Secretary Woodbury.

On page 2 of his report, Mr. Secretary says:

"While Mr. S. remained collector, suspicions do not seem to have been excited at the Department that he was guilty of any default."

Were suspicions excited anywhere else than at the Department? He says, page 3:

"Subsequent disclosures [disclosures subsequent to Price's letter of the 25th, which ought to have excited suspicions at the Department] made to the Department in November, excited suspicions," &c.

Not until November, then, three months after Swartwout's departure from the country, were suspicions excited at the Department! November 5, 1838, as soon as suspicions were excited, the Secretary wrote to the Solicitor, Gilpin, inclosing a memorandum from Hoyt, Swartwout's successor, which memorandum is without a date, no mention being made as to when it was communicated, and is in the following words and figures:

Copy of Hoyt's Memorandum.
$13,682 75.
Deferred bond account.....$646,954 83
Cash retained.....201,096 40
Cash retained.....80,769 53
Overdrawn emoluments.....60,291 42
Retained forfeitures.....39,823 12
Retained amount of warrants.....39,240 05
1,067,475 35
Deposit account balance.....164,010 60
Tonnage balance.....1,783 24
Error account balance.....166 44
$1,233,435 63

Gilpin is ordered, for the first time, to see whether there were not mistakes in Swartwout's holding over so large a balance in his hands to cover his liabilities for suits and protests. In case of defalcation, a distress warrant was sent. Gilpin and Barker both then proceeded to New York, and made two reports, one of November 8th, and one of November 15, 1838; and Gilpin made two separate reports of the 10th and 13th of November, ascertaining the facts of the defalcation as they now appear.

Now, sir, I should like to know when this memorandum of Hoyt was sent to the Secretary. Why is it sent to us without date? Was this sent before November, when suspicions were first excited? When did Hoyt know the secret? It was his memorandum, mark you, which started Gilpin with dispatches to New York, primed them November 5th, for the first time, with plenary powers to catch a flying defaulter or seize his effects.

Sir, the Secretary tells us, page 3:

"The circumstances which led to most of those disclosures transpired in the course of preparing the first quarterly accounts of Hoyt, the successor, for settlement; and the Department was first indebted for them, in a great measure, to his care and vigilance."

Hoyt's care and vigilance then caught the rogue, and the disclosures were made in the course of preparing his first quarterly accounts. Mark these two facts, and bear them in mind. When did Hoyt's first quarter expire? He came into office in March, 1838; his first quarter expired in June! How did suspicion sleep, then, until November? More than four months! Hoyt's second quarter had expired, it seems, before suspicions were awake; yet it was during the preparation of his first quarter's accounts that the disclosures were made!

But again, sir. Swartwout's whole defalcation amounts to $1,225,705 69; the principal item being his deficit on the "bond account," amounting to $646,754 83. Gilpin and Barker, in their report to the Secretary of the 15th of November, say:

"The remaining fund, the deficiency in which makes up the whole debt of Mr. Swartwout, is the bond account. By Mr. Swartwout's return to the Treasury Department, it appears that when his term of office expired he was chargeable with $3,994,666 59 of bonds for duties not paid into the Treasury. Of these, he transferred to his successor, the present collector, $6,045,386 13, constituting the portion of these bonds not yet due, or unpaid. He also accounted for a further portion, amounting to $2,302,525 83, as having been sent to the district attorney for suit. This leaves the sum of $646,754 83, being the aggregate of the deficit in Mr. Swartwout's bond account. On examination, we ascertained that of this aggregate the amounts that became due were as follows:

In the year 1837, the sum of.....$611,999 93
And of the first quarter of 1838.....2,504 28
Making, together.....$613,804 21
Of the remaining sum of.....32,950 62

Which is necessary to make up the.....$646,754 83"

Thus it appears, at the expiration of his term of office, Swartwout was chargeable with.....$8,994,666 59
Of the bonds constituting that sum, he transferred to Hoyt.....$6,045,386 13
Sent to district attorney for suit.....2,302,525 13
$6,347,911 26

Leaving deficit.....$646,754 83

Why did not Hoyt know then of this deficit on the bond account as soon as the transfer was made to him? He did know it; for see what Gilpin says in his report of November 10:

"All the abstracts, vouchers, and other documents, relating to the collector's account for the first quarter of 1838, (being the last of Mr. Swartwout's term,) which had never been furnished, have been now transmitted to the First Auditor. These documents, however, want the signature of Mr. Swartwout, though prepared by the officer who transacted that branch of his official business. The cause of their being thus incomplete appears to have been the desire of Mr. Swartwout that they should not be furnished to the accounting officers until his return from abroad. By that time, according to the statements of Mr. Ogden, he hoped to be able to make arrangements for the settlement of the whole defalcation. The want of them, however, delayed the present collector in the completion of his own accounts, as it was necessary to include therein an accurate statement of the balances in cash and uncollected bonds, handed over by Mr. Swartwout, and that the same should agree with the final accounts of the latter, as rendered to the Treasury Department. The urgent demand for this made by the present collector upon the officer having charge of these accounts, and the difficulty of obtaining it, first led to the suspicions communicated by him to the Department, which were rendered more certain by the subsequent examinations he immediately instituted."

Here, it seems, Hoyt was first put upon the scent. When? When the transfer was made—when he, of course, was, upon coming into office, looking after what was to be transferred by his predecessor. Yet we are still told there were no suspicions until November, 1838!

Again, sir, we are told by the report of Gilpin and Barker, of November 15, that—"When Mr. Swartwout's term expired, on the 23rd March, 1838, it appears, by his own account, that he was chargeable with $301,096 40 of cash retained to meet 'protests,' and with $164,010 60 of cash 'deposited with him to meet

25TH CONG....3D SESS.

Ho. OF REPS.

unascertained duties." The only portion of this which he paid over to his successor was $8,229 94 to meet 'protests,' leaving the amount of that fund retained by him, $192,866 46."

Thus Swartwout's own account showed a balance of $201,096 40 of cash retained to meet protests, and $164,010 60 of cash deposited with him to meet unascertained duties; he paid over to his successor only $8,229 94 to meet protests; and yet no suspicions were excited until November, 1838!

Sir, all this is too much to expect of our credulity. I will show you now that Hoyt must have known of this defalcation long before November—in fact, soon after he came into office; that his subordinate knew of it long before—years before Swartwout himself went out of office; and if Hoyt and his subordinates knew it, that the Secretary must have been informed long before November, 1838.

Ogden, the cashier of Swartwout and Hoyt, Phillips, the assistant cashier, and Fleming, the auditor of the custom-house, all knew of this defalcation for years. In proof of this I quote first the report of the 8th of November, signed by Gilpin and Barker, to the Secretary:

"The examination requisite to ascertain the manner in which the money was abstracted, and the details of the defalcation which has been going on for seven or eight years, will require some days. All that we know in regard to it at present is derived from a voluntary communication made to us last evening by Mr. Henry Ogden, the cashier of the custom-house during Mr. Swartwout's term."

"Having been informed that the large defalcation was known to the public officers, and that we had come to New York for the purpose of investigating it, he called on us, and at once, in the presence of Mr. Price, the district attorney, who was with us, entered frankly into a conversation on the subject. He commenced by saying that the circumstances of the case had troubled him exceedingly for some time, and that he had strongly urged Mr. Swartwout not to leave the United States in August last; that he had told him it was scarcely possible the defalcation could remain much longer concealed, especially since the accounts for the last quarter had been called for and not furnished; that he advised him, instead of going to Europe, to go at once to Washington, submit a statement of the whole matter to the Secretary of the Treasury, surrender his property, and make the best arrangement he could; that Mr. Swartwout told him in reply he was confident of being able to raise money in England, by which he could pay his whole debt to the United States as soon as he returned; and he did not think the business would be known before that time."

"In reply to our inquiry as to the time when the abstraction of the public money commenced, he stated that it was about nine months after Mr. Swartwout was appointed collector. He afterwards said he supposed it might have been a year after—that is, in 1830; that, as the amount of the defalcation increased, he frequently spoke to Mr. Swartwout upon the subject; and that, about four years since, it had become so large that he told Mr. Swartwout that, unless measures were taken to reduce it, he could not consent to continue in the situation he held. Mr. Swartwout was, however, confident that the operations in which he was engaged would be so profitable as to make it easy for him to pay off the whole deficiency. This mode of treating the subject Mr. Swartwout continued to persist in to the last, always expressing his belief that he could set matters right."

"In reply to our inquiry as to the mode in which the affair had been conducted, and the amount, Mr. Ogden stated that Mr. Phillips, the assistant cashier, was more fully acquainted with the particulars than himself, but that it commenced by Mr. Swartwout not passing to the credit of the Treasurer the whole sums received."

Again, sir, from Gilpin's separate report, November 10, we learn:

"From Mr. Phillips, the assistant cashier during Mr. Swartwout's official term, we received a verbal statement confirming that previously made to us by Mr. Ogden; and, in a written communication, he has given a general view of the course of proceeding, to which he has offered to add such a particular account of the details of the transactions as he can gather from the books and accounts."

Again, sir, from the report of Gilpin and Barker, November 15, we learn:

"According to the statements of Mr. Ogden and Mr. Phillips, heretofore mentioned to you, and subsequently confirmed by them in writing, as well as verbally, the use of the public money commenced as early as the close of 1829, or the beginning of 1830; the practice being to transfer at the commencement of the week, to the Treasurer of the United States, no more than the amount received previous to Saturday morning; and thus to place successively from the subsequent receipts the sums withdrawn, so that the deficiency might not appear. Though the sums thus replaced, after they were taken, can form no part of the balance now charged against Mr. Swartwout, which consists only of sums never returned, yet we endeavor to obtain from Mr. Phillips the items of this sort from the commencement. We were unable to do so. The original check book of Mr. Swartwout from June, 1830, to December, 1831, through which, perhaps, they might have been traced, was not, after diligent search, to be found; and although Mr. Phillips commenced, as he stated, in the year 1834, when the deficit began to be large, to make a memorandum of which he can now designate the sums withdrawn, subsequent to that period, by Mr. Swartwout, from the cash fund for his own use, yet he declared his inability to do so any earlier. The evidence, therefore, in regard to the moneys that were withdrawn and replaced, is found in the verbal communications made to us by Mr. Ogden and Mr. Phillips, which were given in our previous reports to you, and in their letters and written statements, of which copies will be found among the documents transmitted to you herewith."

Again, sir:

"We endeavor to ascertain exactly the amounts of cash which had been successively withdrawn, so as to make up the whole of these funds. Mr. Phillips, the assistant cashier, who kept the check-books, from which only this can be traced, has given us a statement of such of the sums thus drawn out by Mr. Swartwout for his private use as he was able to obtain from the old check-books in the office and his own memorandums. It embraces only the interval between November, 1834, and June, 1837, and amounts in the aggregate to $193,602 20. Of this sum the cash noted by Mr. Phillips as being withdrawn was—

In the year 1834.....	$6,261 20
1835.....	43,700 00
1836.....	97,841 00
1837.....	45,800 00
	$193,602 20

"In the earlier period of these transactions (that is, from 1829 until the close of 1831) Mr. Phillips was not in the habit of noting the checks thus used by Mr. Swartwout, and he states that from this circumstance, and from the loss of the check-book of 1830 and 1831, (to which we have adverted,) he is unable to trace out the particular items which constitute the residue of the cash thus withdrawn. The statement of Mr. Phillips, giving the amount of each check so drawn, will be found among the documents transmitted to you herewith."

Again, sir:

"It will be seen that this deficit in the bond account first occurs in the year, 1837. Shortly after its commencement Mr. Phillips, the assistant cashier, kept a list for his own satisfaction, as he stated, of a large number of these bonds, which had been paid, and the money received by Mr. Swartwout. It amounts altogether to $597,331 63. When the bond account came to be finally adjusted, in the summer of 1838, by Mr. Fleming, the auditor of the custom-house during the latter part of Mr. Swartwout's term, he received from Mr. Phillips the original list, thus made out and kept, and found it to agree, as far as it went, with the deficiency in the bonds which he had ascertained himself, and to which he had called Mr. Swartwout's attention. It fell short, however, of the whole amount of the deficiency in the bond account of the year 1837, and the first quarter of 1838, by $16,472 58; but the particulars of this latter sum Mr. Fleming obtained, so as to make the whole amount of the bond account chargeable to Mr. Swartwout, during that period, $613,804 21, as before stated. An explanatory communication of Mr. Fleming, relative to the bond account, together with the list made by Mr. Phillips, will be found among the documents transmitted to you."

Again, sir, I refer to the statement of Ogden himself, page 47:

NEW YORK, November 8, 1838.

DEAR SIR: As far as my memory serves me in regard to the difficulties of Mr. Swartwout, I should say that they began not long after his appointment as collector; and that, from that period, he has continued to draw sums from time to time; that my assistant (Mr. Phillips) and myself have held frequent conversations with him respecting the sums of money which he had received, and that we often, when he applied to us, urged him to endeavor to raise money elsewhere, if he possibly could, and not to draw any more from the bank; that, about four years since, when we again spoke to him on the subject of the amounts we supposed he had received, he requested us to have an interview with him at his house; that we met him agreeably to appointment, and that he then assured us, as he had done frequently before, that he did not doubt that, before many months, the speculations he had entered into would result in such a way as to enable him to pay all up. From that period we occasionally called his attention to the balance due, until the period of my leaving for Canada, (the 4th of August.) Mr. Swartwout sailed on the 16th of August.

I am, with great respect, your obedient servant,
HENRY OGDEN.

HENRY D. GILPIN, Esq., Solicitor of the Treasury.

Again: The statement from Phillips himself:

NEW YORK, November 9, 1838.

SIR: Mr. Swartwout came into office as collector of the port of New York on the 1st of May, 1829; and, as far as my memory serves, but a few months had elapsed before he commenced drawing money for his private uses, which he continued for a period of nearly nine years, without any great intermission.

It is necessary, in order to make myself understood, that I should state the manner in which the business of the custom-house was conducted in respect to the financial concerns with the branch bank, and afterwards with the three deposit banks, namely: the Mechanics', Manhattan, and America, the receiving banks for the bonds for duties due the United States—the branch bank from 1st May, 1829, to 7th October, 1833; and the deposit banks from that period to the 16th May, 1837, (the time of their suspension of specie payments.)

The bonds and the records being completed at the custom-house, were delivered to the banks, with a statement of the amount, &c., of each, for which a receipt was given by the cashier (with whom they were placed) for the amount received. This was usually done about thirty days previous to maturity, when it became the business of the bank to notify the principals of the date when payable. This being done, the amount collected daily would be placed to the credit of S. Swartwout, and subject to his drafts, without particularizing the purpose for which they were drawn, which was an invariable practice; and the same was always the case in regard to all moneys collected through the banks on account of customs, during the period before stated, and he availed himself of it as he required.

After the passage of the law which required that all sums of $300 and under, and all duties on woolsens, should be cash, by direction from the Treasury Department it was ordered that the amount should be paid direct to the bank instead of the custom-house, which was done by giving the importer a certificate, which was by him taken to the bank, and there paid, and the signature of the receiving officer to the certificate, returned to the custom-house, was authority for his receiving a permit for his goods, and the amount so collected daily placed to the credit of S. Swartwout, and subject to his drafts as before.

Independent of the bonds, &c., collected at the banks, a large amount of money was received at the custom-house on deposit for duties on merchandise paying a specific rate of duty, which was considered in suspense until the actual amount to which it was liable was ascertained, and the settlement with the parties making the deposit, which, in a great many instances, did not take place for twelve months, and frequently longer, which placed a large amount at the disposal of the collector, as the duties on deposit were not placed to the credit of the United States until the merchant had made a settlement. As the collections made by the banks up to three o'clock do not appear on the books of the custom-house until the following day, consequently, in making up the weekly accounts for the Treasury Department to three o'clock on Saturday, the amount received on Saturday would not appear until the following week, when the same occurrence would take place in respect to that week, and so continue on.

By reference to the weekly returns made to the Treasury Department, it will be seen that large amounts were frequently retained under the head of "amount due the United States, to be carried to next return," which accounts have the signature of Mr. Swartwout; and, in many instances, would not be forwarded until Tuesday, in order that the collections of Saturday and Monday might place him in funds to make the transfer from his account to that of the Treasurer of the United States.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,
J. PHILLIPS.

H. D. GILPIN, Esq., Solicitor of the Treasury.

Again: the statement of J. A. Fleming himself:

CUSTOM-HOUSE, New York.

AUDITOR'S OFFICE, November 16, 1838.

SIR: Having been called upon by you to state my knowledge of the situation of the accounts of Samuel Swartwout, late collector, and to render such information as I possess in regard to the amount due by him to the United States, I have to observe that, as auditor of the custom-house, which office I have held from the 1st of July, 1836, the adjustment of the accounts devolved on me, and that I carried forward the balance from preceding quarters, deeming it correct.

In the month of June, 1837, being engaged in proving the account of bonds paid for the quarter ending the 31st of March of that year, I found there was a large discrepancy between the bonds payable and bonds paid, and that the latter fell short of the former about five hundred thousand dollars. This circumstance I mentioned to Mr. Phillips, the assistant cashier, whose office it is to keep the cash-book, and was informed by him that his book contained the record of all the bonds paid to the Government in that quarter. Upon this reply, I accordingly closed the bond account as it existed; and the banks having previously suspended specie payments, and the troubles in the mercantile community being very disastrous, I supposed that the payment of all the remaining bonds was suspended.

Mr. Swartwout, then collector, had received instructions from the Treasury Department to allow an extension of credit upon all bonds unpaid, and to transfer them for extension to the district attorney, until the Government should decide what further course was necessary to be pursued. Congress, having then been convened by the President to legislate on these matters, on the 16th October, 1837, enacted a law authorizing an extension of credit of nine months, from the date of maturity, upon all bonds given prior to the passage of the act, and which were then unpaid. The number of these bonds was upwards of ten thousand, and they exceeded in amount five million dollars. No suspicion existed with me that any portion of these bonds had been paid and the money abstracted.

When Mr. Swartwout's term of office expired, it became necessary to make a thorough examination of all outstanding bonds, and to render abstracts for the delivery of the same to his successor. This work was completed, after much labor, in the month of August last, and when the total amount was ascertained, it was found to fall short of the amount appearing due by the books of the office by $646,000. This alarming circumstance I mentioned to the cashier, Mr. Ogden, and requested him to communicate the fact to Mr. Swartwout. On the following day, the cashier observed to me that I had better inform Mr. Swartwout myself of the condition of the bonds. I at once did so. He seemed greatly surprised, and remarked that it must be impossible that so large a deficiency could exist, and requested that the account might be reexamined. It was accordingly reexamined, and every bond found paid by the records of the office was marked off. Still the same deficiency existed. A list was then prepared of all the bonds unchecked and unaccounted for, and was placed on file in the office. Prior to this, and during the reexamination, Mr. Swartwout sailed for England.

I afterwards proceeded to close all his accounts, and to prepare a final account current with the Treasury, when there appeared to be due from him to the United States $1,225,000. When this result was finally ascertained, I informed Mr. Hoyt, the present collector, that his accounts would be delayed in consequence of great discrepancies in Mr. Swartwout's accounts.

J. A. FLEMING, Auditor.

25TH CONG., 3D SESS.

Public Defaulters—Mr. Wise.

Ho. of REPS.

Thus, sir, Ogden, Phillips, Fleming, all knew! And the latter tells us that he told Hoyt that his accounts would be delayed "in consequence of great discrepancies in Mr. Swartwout's accounts." When? Certainly before the 31st of October, 1838, when he submitted to him the prepared statement. Sir, who are Ogden, Phillips, and Fleming? The cashier, assistant cashier, and auditor of Hoyt, as well as Swartwout! They were not dismissed until within the last few weeks. Do you not suppose, sir, that these minions communicated all to Hoyt—were officious and superserviceable to do so, in order to retain their places? And if they knew all, and Hoyt knew all, don't you suppose that Woodbury knew all? Why was Hoyt's memorandum, I again ask, without date? Should Hoyt be retained in office while he keeps such subalterns in his office? Would Woodbury retain him if he were not a bird of the same feather? These men, it seems, are well indoctrinated in the whole black art and mystery of the trade of defalcation. Ay, sir, one of them even reports his plan of keeping the public money! Hear him, sir:

NEW YORK, November 12, 1838.

Sir: Agreeably to request made by yourself as to the manner of conducting the business at the custom-house, in comparison with the former mode, I have to state that Mr. Hoyt, in coming into office, adopted a course which, in my opinion, is every way calculated to insure a safe collection of the revenue, and a prompt discharge of duty by every one connected with the customs; and more particularly as he is, as far as practicable, endeavoring to make himself acquainted with the business of his subordinates generally. As all the receipts for customs are now collected through the custom house direct, I will give a statement of what he has required of me, being the person by whom all moneys are received and disbursed.

He goes on to state the mode, and concludes thus:

I do not find myself capable of suggesting any alteration in the mode of managing the public funds different from that now pursued. It is simple in its operations, and one least calculated to create a multiplicity of agents, by which the public money might be endangered.

In all payments made by me, they are on the authority of the auditor, through whom all bills must pass.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. PHILLIPS.

H. D. GILPIN, Esq.

Yes, sir, he thinks his mode is "every way" very commendable—makes "every one" prompt—Hoyt "himself" acquainted; very complimentary to Mr. Hoyt! But, above all, sir, he can suggest no improvement—just as he wants it—"it is simple!"—not complicated by too many checks! least calculated to multiply agents!—he and Hoyt have it now all to themselves! And this rogue, who kept written memoranda for years of Swartwout's embezzlement and fraud, is verily the officer under Hoyt "by whom all moneys are received and disbursed!" This is a "part of Mr. Secretary Woodbury's system!" He is the very man, true, to tell how to detect and expose Swartwout—is he not, also, the very tool to assist Hoyt to smuggle after his predecessor's example? This excellent agent—this Democratic Loco-foco—is in the very clover he desires; he is suited to a penny—would not have the thing changed at all!

Is there not moral turpitude in some others as well as in Swartwout, in this transaction? I believe that the Secretary down to Phillips are as criminal as the defaulter. They will never allow Swartwout and Price to return, or this would fully appear, as I believe, before my country.

Sir, let us now inquire further, whether this defalcation might not have been prevented altogether, if the Secretary had done his duty. After the defalcation was known, the Secretary then woke up; he wrote the following letters:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, November 9, 1838.

Sir: In consequence of the report made in part by the Solicitor of the Treasury, on the examination by him and yourself into the accounts of the late collector at New York, I wish now to call your immediate attention to a few considerations:

1. I think a circular should be issued by you to all naval officers, calling their prompt and careful attention to their official duties, in check of any error or wrong by collectors.
2. That an examination be made in every case of any considerable balance reported as unadjusted or due, to see if the bonds and money purporting to be on hand, or which ought to be on hand, are so in point of fact. This can be done by letters to the collectors, stating that recent events have rendered the inquiry proper; and that the naval officers, or district attorneys, in cases where there are no naval officers, will make the scrutiny, and certify on the subject, both as to the bonds and money.
3. I wish increased attention given to the examination on settlements here of the bond accounts of collectors; and in your office, as well as in the Auditor's, all necessary force employed to make the present legal checks as efficient as possible.

Please to adopt any additional step which has occurred to you for discovering any errors, and for securing the public against losses.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

J. N. BARKER, Esq., Comptroller of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, November 19, 1838.

Sir: The recent development of the great defalcation of the late collector at New York, renders it essential that it should be ascertained, if practicable, why it was so long undiscovered; I therefore request you to inform me of the causes why it was not in the power of your office to report his defalcation when it first commenced, or at the different settlements afterwards; before his term of office expired. If, under the present system of adjusting the accounts of collectors, it be impracticable to ascertain defaults like these immediately after they occur, I will thank you to report to me such modifications and improvements as may suggest themselves to you, in order that all defalcations hereafter may be immediately known, if possible; and, in case you should consider that further legislation may be necessary to attain this object, I wish you to point out the defects that should be provided for, and also such additional checks as might be imposed to prevent the embezzlement of the public funds received by the collectors and receivers of the public revenue.

This report I should be glad to receive soon, that a communication on the subject may be made to Congress at the commencement of the ensuing session.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

J. N. BARKER, Esq., Comptroller of the Treasury.

This letter of the 9th shows exactly the duties which the Secretary had before neglected:

1. The naval officers under him had not been made to do their duty.
2. The examination of balances had not been attended to.
3. Sufficient attention had not been bestowed by him on settlements here of the bond accounts of collectors.

In addition to these letters, he sent a circular to the Comptrollers and Auditors of the Treasury. He is terrible for circulars! They are his Colonel Pluck spurs, by which he makes the nation believe that he is constantly roweling the sides of his official steeds, and keeping them full up to their mottles. Ah! no man knows better how to "run with the hare and hold with the hounds." This circular itself shows, too, what had been neglected. But to proceed. Gilpin and Barker, in their report from New York, November 15, say:

"These defects readily suggest the following remedies:

"1. That the system for the collection of the revenue from customs should resemble that adopted in regard to the revenue from lands; that the officer who ascertains the amount due to the Government, admits vessels to entry, and performs the various functions connected with those parts of a collector's duty, should be distinct from, and independent of the officer who receives and is accountable for the moneys accruing on those duties. Each making his separate reports, and held to a separate responsibility, would prove a complete check upon the other, and lead to an immediate detection of error, neglect, or defalcation.

"2. That all sums of money should be paid into the Treasury; that no officer should be permitted to retain funds, under any pretext, or make payments, except on estimates previously made to the Treasury, or on accounts properly submitted and examined. There would be no difficulty in so arranging this plan as to give quite as much facility as exists at present in the payment of debentures, and all other charges now deducted from the accruing revenue, while it would obviate the disadvantages that are inseparable from the present mode.

"3. That actual inspections by competent officers from the Treasury Department should be made from time to time, at every principal custom-house. Had such inspections been made at New York, this defalcation could have been easily detected before it had long existed, or reached any very considerable amount.

"4. That the use of the public money by any officer intrusted with its collection, safe-keeping, or disbursement, should be made a criminal offense, severely punishable.

"We are, very respectfully, yours,

H. D. GILPIN,
J. N. BARKER.

Hon. LEVI WOODBURY, Secretary of the Treasury."

Now, sir, could not all this have been done? Did it require a law? None. Why was it not done? Mr. Secretary does not inform us.

Again: the First Auditor, in reply to Woodbury's letter, reported as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

FIRST AUDITOR'S OFFICE, December 1, 1838.

Sir: Your letter of the 19th ultimo should have received an earlier reply, had the state of my health permitted; and even now, confined as I am to my chamber, I must crave indulgence for omissions that may occur, and the privilege of supplying any such in a future communication.

The first inquiry contained in your letter, in reference to "the great defalcation of the late collector at New York," is in the following words, viz: "I therefore request you to inform me of the causes why it was not in the power of your office to report his defalcation when it first occurred, or at the different settlements afterwards, before his term of office expired."

In reply to this question, I would respectfully state that it was not in the power of this office to report his defalcation when it first occurred, because it never possessed the means of ascertaining it. By the twenty-first section of the collection act of 2d March, 1799, the collectors are allowed three months after the expiration of a quarter to make up and render the accounts to this office for adjustment, and in reference to New York, the Secretary some years since extended the time two or three weeks longer, so that the accounts of that district, for the first quarter of the year, do not usually reach this office until the middle of July; it is therefore apparent that this defalcation could not have been ascertained in this office when it first occurred.

But it is also asked why it was not reported "at the different settlements afterwards, before his term of office expired." To this inquiry the same reply might also be made. "This office had no means of ascertaining the defalcation of Mr. Swartwout at any time prior to the final settlement of his account. It could and did report the correct balances due from him, 'at the different settlements,' but it had no means of ascertaining that a portion of his balance had been used by him for his private purposes. The accounts, as soon as received at this office, are carefully examined; and all the checks furnished for testing their accuracy, in addition to the certificate of the naval officer, are read, and the duties secured, as well as the disbursements made, having been correctly ascertained, the account is stated, and the balance struck and reported to the First Comptroller, to whom the account and all the abstracts belonging to it are transmitted forthwith. From the investigation, however, which has recently taken place at the custom-house, New York, it appears that a large portion of this defalcation consists of bonds abstracted by the late collector, to whom payment was made, and for which the bond-account was not credited; and it may with propriety be inquired, why this had not been discovered by the accounting officers on the examination of the accounts.

In replying to this inquiry, I beg leave first to state the facts in regard to the manner in which the bond accounts have been kept at the Treasury. Previous to the year 1822, as I am informed, on examining the accounts of the customs in this office, the accounting clerk ascertained that the balance of the bond account was correctly brought forward, that the additions were correct, and the balance, as returned, properly stated. But, as the bond account accompanied the quarterly account current of the customs and the other abstracts to the Comptroller's office, where it was retained, no reference could be had in this office to said accounts, to mark off the bonds paid, or put in suit, in subsequent quarters, which reference was absolutely necessary to a thorough examination of the bond account. In 1822, however, the First Auditor directed a register to be kept in his office of all the bonds taken and paid, as well as those put in suit. Two clerks were appointed to this duty, to whom the accounting clerk, immediately on receiving the quarterly returns, handed over the bond account, to be recorded, &c. The accounts for the smaller districts were generally entered and marked off in time to accompany the adjusted accounts to which they belonged; but the duty of recording all the bonds being very arduous, and the clerks engaged on them being occasionally called to other business, the larger districts by-and-by fell in arrear, especially the district of New York; which, from what I can learn, was perhaps never once recorded and marked off in time to accompany the accounts of the Comptroller; and, as it now stands, I find that the bonds taken are recorded only to the second quarter, 1834, while those paid or put in suit are marked off only to the fourth quarter, 1832. The present condition of the bond accounts in this office is about the same that it was when I received my appointment. But for the present, passing over the imperfect manner of keeping the bond accounts, let us inquire whether, under the most perfect system that could be devised for discharging this duty, the fraud committed on the bonds in New York could have been promptly detected in this office? Suppose that, when the account of the customs is taken up for adjustment, the bonds paid and put in suit are marked off forthwith on the original bond accounts; any omission of the collector of New York to return bonds paid, &c., could not, in ordinary times, be ascertained until five or six months after the expiration of the quarter in which the transactions took place; but, in the case under consideration, the embezzlement of the proceeds of the bonds occurred under very peculiar circumstances. It was at a period, in 1837, when, owing to the derangement of commercial affairs, the suspension of specie payments by the banks, then no longer used as agents of the Government, &c., the due were not put in suit, the Secretary of the Treasury having authorized a temporary suspension, which was afterwards extended by Congress to nine months, and when six or eight thousand bonds were lying over at the custom-house at one time, and when all was in such a state of confusion that, as has been stated by the auditor of the custom-house, it was utterly impracticable, even there, to ascertain, in making up the amount for the first quarter, 1837, the true condition of the bonds; and where, even at this late day, after a great deal of investigation, it has been found impracticable to identify an amount of these abstracted bonds exceeding $30,000; and, in order to ascertain them, a thorough examination of the bond account will have to be made from the commencement—a work of great labor, and requiring considerable time.

With these facts before us, it is quite evident that it would have been impracticable for this office, had the system of examining the bond accounts been the most perfect, to have ascertained the fraud committed by the late collector in the bonds until about the time for rendering his final account. This account was not received at this office until the 10th

25TH CONG....3D SESS.

Public Defaulters—Mr. Wise.

Ho. OF REPS.

November, 1838, long after his neglect to forward the account in due time had been reported by this office to the Comptroller. It is true, that somewhere about August, 1837, on the examination of his account at this office, there would have appeared to be a large amount of bonds due in the first quarter of 1837, not returned as paid or put in suit, and the collector would have been called upon for an explanation. Under all the circumstances of this case, he might have, and no doubt would have, replied to such an inquiry, that these bonds had been extended under the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury and the act of Congress; but that, owing to the great mass of such bonds, amounting, it is believed, to more than five million dollars, and to the great confusion into which the bonds had been thrown, increased, too, by the fact, not then known to the accounting officers of the custom-house, that the collector had actually collected a large amount of said bonds, he could not, at least for a considerable time, render any particular account of them. Such a reply would have been considered, at least for the time being, as satisfactory; certainly it would not have excited any suspicion at the Treasury, because all the bonds referred to were actually entitled to the extension provided for by Congress, and would naturally have been supposed to have been so extended.

Having, as I presume, thus clearly shown that this office had no means of ascertaining this delinquency, when it "first occurred," nor "at the different settlements afterwards," I proceed to the next inquiry in your letter, which is in the following words: "If, under the present system of adjusting the accounts of the collectors, it be impracticable to ascertain defaults like these immediately after they occur, I will thank you to report to me such modifications and improvements as may suggest themselves to you, in order that all delinquencies hereafter may be immediately known, if possible; and in case that you should consider that further legislation may be necessary to attain this object, I wish you to point out the defects that should be provided for, and also such additional checks that might be imposed to prevent the embezzlement of the public funds by the collectors and receivers of the public revenue."

It may not be improper to state here that by the fifth section of the act of the 2d of September, 1789, "to establish the Treasury Department," and the fourth section of the act "to provide for the prompt settlement of public accounts," approved the 3d of March, 1817, the duties of the First Auditor are defined as follows: "To receive all accounts accruing in the Treasury Department, and, after examination, to certify the balance and transmit the accounts, with the vouchers and certificate, to the First Comptroller, for his decision thereon." Now, if the "modifications and improvements" called for by the Secretary be confined to this office only, there are but two suggestions which occur to me at this time, as all that are necessary, and steps have already been taken to carry them into effect. The first is that the collectors be required to render an account of all the outstanding bonds, showing their actual condition on the 30th of September, 1838; and that hereafter, instead of recording the bonds in this office, the bond accounts, as soon as received, are to be compared with the preceding original accounts, and all the bonds paid or put in suit during the quarter forthwith marked, so that the actual state of the bonds will always be exhibited simultaneously with the report on the account of the customs. The other suggestion is, that the collector of New York return, with his quarterly account of the customs, a copy of his "suspense accounts," showing what items compose that part of the balance not consisting of bonds or cash on hand, so that in stating the items of the balance at the Treasury, this office may be able to designate what is actually cash on hand from that which consists of unsettled and suspense accounts.

But as this request of the Secretary embraces a pretty wide range, I may, with propriety, be permitted, in my reply, respectfully to suggest some other "modifications and improvements," although, in doing so, I may be trenching upon the prerogatives of others. It appears, from the investigation recently made at the custom-house, New York, that on the debt side of their "suspense account" is found an item called "duties on merchandise," which means "cash deposits for duties not ascertained;" and this, according to their mode of keeping the accounts, has never been regarded as cash until the duties are actually ascertained and settled, at some future date, with the merchant, but retained in the suspense account, and returned by the collector to the Treasury, in his balance, as belonging to unsettled and suspense accounts. This practice placed at the disposal of the collector a sum varying from one hundred thousand to five hundred thousand dollars, not available at the Treasury, or not regarded or returned as cash, although such de facto, upon which the collector might draw from time to time for his private purposes, without any check upon him, even in the office of the Secretary himself; and it appeared, on the recent investigation, that it was this fund which first tempted the late collector of New York; and it was only when this source was exhausted, and the peculiar occasion referred to presented itself, that he seized upon the bonds. How it has happened that at New York these deposits for duties are not regarded as cash, and at Philadelphia they are, and very properly, too, accounted for as such, this office has no means of ascertaining, having no control whatever over the internal regulations of the custom-house; but such is the fact. The remedy is obvious.

Again: the naval officer has always been regarded, not only as an aid to the collector, but an important check upon him. The twenty-first section of the "act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage" requires him, among other things, "to examine the collector's abstracts of duties, and other accounts of receipts, bonds, and expenditures, and, if found right, he shall certify the same." It is to be apprehended that the naval officer at New York has not, under this requisition, considered it to be his duty to examine the cash and bank accounts; and although he has certified the bond accounts of 1837 "to have been examined and found to be correct," the fact is now apparent that they were not correct. Had this officer performed his whole duty, this defalcation must have been discovered sooner. I would, moreover, respectfully suggest that an examination be made of the concerns of the custom-house occasionally, by an agent, as is the practice, I understand, in reference to land offices, which would greatly facilitate the discovery of malpractices where they exist, and enable the proper authority to apply the corrective. These "improvements," in addition to the weekly and monthly returns of "moneys received and paid at the custom-house," the "return of debentures," "abstracts of bonds put in suit," "summary statement of duties collected," "schedule of bonds taken and liquidated," &c., required for the Secretary's office, agreeably to ancient regulations and usages of the Treasury Department, as embodied in the circular of Secretary of the Treasury, dated November 19, 1835, if properly arranged and compared with each other, and with the quarterly account current of the customs, also formerly entered on the Secretary's books as soon as received at the office of the First Auditor, would, it is believed, furnish the Secretary the means of ascertaining defaults like these immediately after they occur.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
for JESSE MILLER, Auditor,
A. MAHON, C. C.

To the Hon. LEVI WOODBURY, Secretary of the Treasury.

From this report, sir, we learn—

1. That one reason for not detecting this defalcation is, that the Secretary extended the time to the collector at New York for making up and rendering his accounts for adjustment.

2. The accounting clerks in the First Auditor's office have not been made, since 1822, to ascertain that the balance of the bond account of the collector was correctly brought forward, that the additions were correct, and the balance, as retained, properly stated.

3. Bonds from New York have not been recorded. Never in time to accompany accounts of the Comptroller. This duty has been wholly neglected during Mr. Woodbury's term of office, since the second quarter of 1834.

4. The account of Swartwout was not received at the office of the First Auditor until the 10th of November, 1838, long after his neglect to forward the account in due time had been reported to the Comptroller.

5. That the collector had not been required to render an account of all outstanding bonds.

6. That the collector at New York had not been required to return, with his quarterly account of the customs, a copy of his "suspense accounts," showing what items compose that part of the balance not consisting of bonds or cash on hand.

7. That deposits for duties have not been regarded as cash at New York, whilst at Philadelphia they have been so regarded—and the Secretary himself had control of this—unaccountable to Auditor, but the "remedy obvious."

8. The naval officer has not been made to do his duty, and, if he had done his whole duty, this defalcation could not have occurred.

9. That the "weekly and monthly returns of moneys received and paid at the custom-house," the "return of debentures," "abstracts of bonds put in suit," "summary statement of duties collected," "schedule of bonds taken and liquidated," required for the Secretary's office have not been properly arranged and compared with each other and with the quarterly account current of the customs by the Secretary of the Treasury himself.

Such, sir, is the expose by this able and masterly and independent report of the ability and integrity with which your Treasury Department has been conducted, and by which this million of public money has been abstracted! Sir, this report must have been gall and wormwood to Woodbury. I understand that the manly clerk by whom it was made is already under the ban of his displeasure. It is a biting sarcasm, it is a sneer throughout, upon Mr. Secretary's unblushing effrontery in his inquiry into the causes of this defalcation. He knew above all men, how it happened. Sir, if ever a Whig President be elected, and I have a title of influence with his councils, this man Mahon shall be remembered by me as a firm and faithful public servant. I know him not, but this report is a voucher to me of his character. But, sir, I forget! I am doing a good and true man an injury by daring here alone to commend his worth. It may remove him. Oh! the tyranny of proscription! This man lets the cat out of the bag—he tells you that the meal tray was left uncovered—wholly neglected, and the rats have been permitted, at will, to go in and come out with full license from the Secretary. It shows that every check has been abandoned and neglected by the Secretary—the naval officer—the Comptroller—not to say by the First Auditor. Sir, if party spirit, like a fiend, did not befriend and sustain this Secretary—pardon and whitewash his hideous deformities and delinquencies—blight all moral sensibility here in this Hall and at the White-house, he would be removed from office instantly, or be impeached. Go where you will—trace him anywhere, and you will find him dull, stupid, incompetent, neglectful, faithless, and corrupt. I mince no terms—fear no responsibilities. If he had the sensibilities of a man, he would demand a trial. Give me an honest jury, and I will, upon these papers, convict him!

Sir, the report of the First Comptroller confirms the report of the First Auditor:

"In relation to that portion of your communication of the 19th instant, in which you request the suggestions of this office as to the modifications and improvements that may be necessary in the present system of adjusting the accounts of collectors, or as to the further legislation requisite to prevent or immediately detect future defalcations, I beg leave to refer you to the joint report of the Solicitor of the Treasury and myself, dated at New York, the 15th ultimo, for my views as to the principal defects of the present system, and their remedies by legislation."

"Until efficient alterations, however, shall be made by law in the system of collecting, guarding, and accounting for the public moneys received by collectors of the customs, the principal check on embezzlement must, in the custom-house, be sought in the integrity and vigilance of the naval officer. The duties of this officer are highly responsible and important, and cannot fail, if properly performed, to aid materially in the prevention or detection of frauds. The law declares that 'the naval officer shall receive copies of all manifests and entries, and shall, together with the collector, estimate the duties on all goods, wares, and merchandise, subject to duty, (and no duties shall be received without such estimate,) and shall keep a separate record thereof, and shall countersign all permits, clearances, certificates, debentures, and other documents, to be granted by the collector; he shall also examine the collector's abstracts of duties and other accounts of receipts, bonds, and expenditures, and if found right, he shall certify the same.'"

"In the Treasury Department, much, also, it is conceived, might be done towards the prevention of the recurrence of defalcations like that in question. In the office of the First Auditor, it is understood that some years since a record was kept of all duty bonds taken, a thorough examination of which, in every rendition of the quarterly abstract of bonds liquidated and bonds in suit, could scarcely fail to lead to the detection of any attempt at fraud, in withholding the amount of any one of the bonds recorded. This branch of the subject, however, it is presumed, will be more satisfactorily discussed in the report of the First Auditor, to whom it more properly appertains."

"The abstraction of the amounts paid on bonds never returned as liquidated forms about one half of the entire defalcation of the late collector at New York. Of the other moiety, the two principal items are cash held on deposit to meet unascertained duties, and cash retained ostensibly to refund duties paid under protest."

"In connection with the abstraction of those sums, as well as of those paid on bonds, I would observe that, until a few years past, the account current received at the office of the First Auditor, with the quarterly accounts of collectors, were called for and compared, in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, with a record therein kept, and with the several returns rendered to the Secretary, in conformity with the requisitions of his circular, dated the 14th of October, 1818, and repeated on the 14th of November, 1825."

"The list of returns thus rendered, embraced the following: A weekly return of moneys received and paid; a monthly return of debentures paid; a monthly abstract of bonds put in suit during the month; a monthly summary statement of duties collected; a monthly schedule of bonds taken and liquidated during the month; and a quarterly return of the moneys received and paid under the acts for the relief of sick and disabled seamen."

"Those examinations and comparisons would, it is conceived, be greatly useful, and especially when it is considered that the returns thus rendered to the Secretary, weekly and monthly, are the only returns of the kind received by the Department within or during a current quarter."

"Should it be deemed proper to revive the practice, it is suggested, to obviate the inconvenience and delay in the office of the First Auditor attending the use, in the office of the Secretary, of the account current, that the collectors furnish those documents in duplicate."

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,
J. N. BAKER.

Hon. LEVI WOODBURY, Secretary of the Treasury."

Now, sir, be it remembered that this Administration and the preceding are both alike distinguished for the doctrine that the Executive was a unit—"that it was the President's duty to take care that the laws be faithfully executed." Why has not this duty, so strenuously insisted on with the view of maintaining Executive prerogative, been performed in discharge of Executive obligation and responsibility?

I am now done with the review of these cases. And, after what I have laid before you, let me ask—"What use would there be in humbling ourselves to become spies and censors to report defalcations and crimes to this Executive, with a view to a prompt removal from office? Why pass laws to enact that the application of public money by an officer of Government to private uses shall be a felony? Will reports or statutes avail anything? Vain and idle! they would the more cloak and conceal and protect these plunderers! The President, if he will, may say, as the Duke of Vienna, disguised as a friar in his own capital, that he might overlook the actions of his people:

"My business in this State
Made me a looker on, here, in Vienna;
Where I have seen corruption boil and bubble
Till it o'erran the stew. Laws for all faults,
But faults so countenanced, that the strong statutes
Stand, like forfeits in a barber's shop,
As much in mock as mark."

Pass any pains and penalties, adopt any system of laws you please—United States Bank, pet bank system, sub-Treasury—and let me ask if either could be expected to work well in the hands of such men who "countenance" such "faults?" Sir, we are told by that philosopher in government, William Penn, that the best system will be as the worst if badly administered by bad men; and that the worst system will be as the best, if righteously administered by good men. Yes, sir, a change of men is what is wanted—a general turn-out of all faithless trustees and servants.

I must bring my remarks to a close—I am aching from my head to my hips. But, sir, did I tell the truth or a falsehood in 1836. Have the Executive Departments been conducted with integrity and ability? Let every honest man answer. Add the defalcations of Swartwout, Price, Gratiot, Reckless, Boyd, Harris, Linn—the whole list, and tell me how much was stolen in 1836? But, sir, it is all to be thrown on the poor banks! How much in default have the banks been? The Secretary's annual report says:

"First. A list of the banks still indebted to the United States for defaults previous to the close of 1834, none of which are believed to have given originally any collateral security, is annexed, [M.] The whole amount now due, without computing interest, equals $1,000,676; and a great part of this must be regarded as a total loss.

"Secondly. Another list of indebted banks is annexed, most of which gave collateral security, [N.] The remaining dues from them to the Treasurer, on defaults accruing between 1834 and October, 1837, though at first very large, have been reduced to about $2,400,000; and most, if not all, of these debts, with some others, owing to public disbursing officers for money on deposit, it is confidently expected will, in the end, be paid.

"The first installment due from those which have since executed other bonds and given new security, under the act of October, 1837, has been promptly met, and portions of the second have already been advanced by some of them. Suits are pending against only two, on account of their liabilities."

According to this, nothing has been lost since 1834 by banks. How much by sub-treasurers? The same report says:

"Thirdly. The eventual losses sustained from receivers and collectors, while, as a part of the bank-deposit system, they were collecting the public funds, to be afterwards placed for safe-keeping in banks, were, at the last session, estimated at a sum ranging from nine to twelve hundred thousand dollars.

"Collateral security had generally been taken of these officers; but, in former times, it was not always in so large amounts and with so great care as of late, and consequently most of the foregoing losses happened many years ago.

"A list of all those officers who, on the 15th of October, 1837, the time designated in the resolution of the House of Representatives, stood on the books of the Treasury as having neglected to settle their accounts in season, may be seen, with the amount charged to each, in the printed report made on the 15th January last. (Doc. No. 111.) But several of these were not then actually indebted to the United States, though, having neglected to adjust their accounts at the Treasury, they came within the express words of the resolution, and consequently were included."

Here, sir, you may judge of the truth and justice of this officer's reports. He reports losses by receivers and collectors at from nine hundred thousand to one million two hundred thousand dollars only, when we know that the defalcations of Swartwout alone exceed the largest sum! Sir, the banks are to be blamed, whether they lost or embezzled the public moneys or not; but the only sin of sub-treasurers is in being caught! They may pick and steal at pleasure, but they are especially to beware of detection! The Administration says as to them: "Better let it be!" Phillips even intimates that it is all owing to the banks! Sir, the last inquiry is: what are to be the consequences and effects of these defalcations?

I have nothing to say now as to the public morals or public credit. They are subjects above these times. No, sir, no. I learn what is to be the effect here—here only—by listening to the Administration's shout of those old worn-out, humbug watchwords, "economy! retrenchment! reform!" After the President and Secretary have permitted all the public money to be stolen; after they have stimulated and encouraged the Government and the people to the utmost extravagance; after raising expenditures to $40,000,000, and creating another public debt, they now, from necessity, prudently recommend to our patience and self-denial a becoming economy! economy!—that is the word.

The fact is, they must starve and be disgraced, unless they reduce expenditures. They turn, now, from electioneering with the public money, after it is all spent, and electioneer, in turn, with the watchword economy!—economy! And upon what is this economy to fall? What objects are to be made the victims of defalcations and financial bankruptcy?

Sir, we are told by Mr. Secretary that some of the most beneficial appropriations are to be arrested. The States were led to expect that they would receive the fourth installment of your distribution act—an act, by-the-by, for which I never voted, but would now execute to the letter. Why? Because you, by your own voluntary legislation, led them to expect the facilities which the act afforded, for the promotion of their systems of internal improvement and education, and they have been led to legislate on the faith of your action here. Now, we are told, their hopes must be disappointed, their systems of moral and physical improvement arrested, and the ordinary appropriations here to like objects must be stopped, and why? Because the office-holders have squandered and run off with the public treasures!

And, sir, the system of light-houses is to be destroyed, in conformity with the policy and interest of this Administration—to put out the lights! The eyes of commerce are to be put out or blinded, to support the extravagance and profligacy and frauds of office-holders!—Sir, during the past disastrous fall season on the Atlantic coast, the shores of my district have been literally strewn with wrecks from the raging deep. A few days before I left home, $150,000 worth, at least, of dry-goods, was floating on the sand beaches of Northampton county, Virginia, from the wreck of a single brig. For years I had been endeavoring to have a light-house put near the very spot where this vessel bilged upon the bar. A large cargo of cotton, and several other wrecks, came ashore, to remind us daily of the improvements necessary on our coast to protect life and property. A star of the ocean is needed on almost every promontory, as much as the north star in the vault of the sky; but they are all to be dimmed, and never to give light to the sea-beaten mariner, because Swartwout and Price and Gratiot, et id omne genus, have carried off the means of buying the lamps!

This is not all. The widows and orphans of your revolutionary heroes and patriots are to be deprived of their bread earned by patriotic toil. All pensions are to be stopped for the sake of parasites and public plunderers. The people are to be denied all the blessings and boons of their Government—and for what? To pamper your pretorian bands, your legions with the means of good living and display; to tempt the Swiss corps who long for their portion of the spoils; to furnish your renegade Democrats with millions to sport their fraternity of defaulters in the splendor of Europe; to endow your Boyds with principalities of the public domain and mints of public money; to bribe and buy up enough of the mercenary and vile in the land, to retain for you the power which you have ignominiously obtained, and which you have flagrantly abused, and the places which you have faithlessly filled and shamefully dishonored!

This is but an epitome of the history of your outrages upon the morals, the law, and liberty of a still glorious country, which you are degrading to the bondage of a money power, which you profess to abhor—a country which you are ruining by an absolute Executive, which you do profess to worship! If the fathers of the country could now rise from their tombs, and enter this their temple—"which should be called of all nations the house of" liberty—what would they say? What was said to the money changers in the temple at Jerusalem—"But ye have made it a den of thieves!" And, sir, what think you would your chief priests and scribes say, even to them? What they have said to me: "By what authority doest thou these things?" But, sir, I cannot say of your priests and scribes as is said in Holy Writ of the Jewish—"They feared the people!" No, sir, your arrogance has surpassed all fear, all bounds of caution. If the people do not soon make you fear them, you will be past the remedy of reform by their power.

Why not make your economy fall upon the salaries of your "trained bands," your office-holders? Go for a reduction of salaries; in that I will support you. Sir, the other day, when the Globe published the debate in the Senate upon economy—economy echoed by your party there—it contained, in almost immediate juxtaposition, an advertisement of poor Gratiot's furniture. Here it is: the Globe, you know, as General Jackson says, never lies! Here it is:

"EXTENSIVE SALE OF RICH AND FASHIONABLE FURNITURE.—Will be sold on Wednesday, the 26th day of December, instant, commencing at half past ten o'clock, a.m., at the residence of General Gratiot, F, near twenty-first street, if fair, (if not, the next fair day thereafter,) his splendid furniture, consisting of very superior Saxony Imperial Carpets, elegant Grecian Mahogany Chairs, Sofa and Ottoman, covered with crimson silk plush, large French Mantel, pier Mirrors, rich Mantel Lamps, elegant Console Table, with Egyptian marble top, Center Table with marble top, fine-touted Chickering Piano, Stool, and Music Stand; with various other articles of Drawing-room Furniture; very handsome Berlin Iron Grates; also, very superior bed-room Furniture, consisting of elegant Dressing Bureaus, with fine Mirrors and marble tops; Inclosed Washstands, with marble tops, Mahogany Bedsteads, fine Hair Mattresses, Feather beds and Palliasses, Imperial three-ply Carpets, Mahogany Wardrobes, &c. "EDWARD DYER."

How many poor "unwashed and uncombed" children in your district and mine, sir, would this costly furniture of a splendid defaulter educate? How many sons of unworthy sires would it raise, elevate in virtue above the price of a Price? Sir, the substance of the people; their education; their commerce; their systems of improvement; their funds of honor and gratitude, are all to be sacrificed to the appetites of corrupt partisan harpies! Such, sir, are the consequences of your great and glorious, immaculate "economy, retrenchment, and reform Administration!"

Sir, "in piping times of peace," the great service a Representative can render is to save the public money. I have faithfully endeavored to discharge this duty; to save the public money from wicked rulers, and to preserve the purity and virtue of both the people and their servants from the temptations of a splendid Government and a wicked Administration. If I have done nothing towards this end, it is not my fault. The task has been a hard one. I have had to labor at the oar against wind and tide; against a most powerful and popular President and party; against you, sir, your committees, and this House. But the blaze of glorification is espied. Thank God, the day-star dawns from on high. There is now hope of salvation; an hour of retributive justice is coming; Truth, though slow, is coming gradually along with her torches! I have been waiting for her long, but never without hope. I have had to carry my life itself in my hand; the harness of deerskin and cold steel and iron has often galled my shoulders; an armed arsenal against the king's forces—they are dangerous when there are such rich spoils; but I have escaped unscathed, thank God! though my slanderers and persecutors and revilers would have the world believe that my war upon corruption has not been bloodless.

I care not for these aspersions—they pass me as the idle wind. Much less have I regarded some good, honest friends who have assisted to "damn me with the faint praise" of doing, or trying to do, some good—notwithstanding my faults and indiscretion. Sir, what other course could I pursue but that of fearless boldness—ay, apparent recklessness? But this is egotism. I know who will defend me—who do back me. I have my reward—the only reward I ever looked for—at home, in the affections of my people. Yes, sir, my people! They are mine, because I am theirs—in devotion, in sacrifice, in service—in good report, in evil report—theirs not politically, personally theirs! And all your party and all its power cannot separate me from my people, or shake me in their confidence. I must myself first forfeit it, before I am ever by them distrusted, or proscribed. They will pardon my infirmities, and indulge my weaknesses, provided I remain true to them, and their country. May Heaven reward them and their children's children as they reward me! But, sir, I had rather have been fighting for them in the Florida swamps, with blade against tomahawk, than to have been warring as I have upon this almost overwhelming power of corruption! Dangers beset you in every path in this war—dangers of life and limb; dangers to character, dangers in fact to your own virtue. No man can oppose himself to universal corruption here, without having all his virtues tempted and tried as in a fiery furnace. My hope is in the majority of the next House of Commons. The empire State has declared for the people against the President.

That now is the issue: shall the people or the President prevail? The contest is no longer about measures. The sub-Treasury may be proved to be the best system which the wisdom of man could devise; but, sir, the President and his minions have dared to force it upon us, have arrogantly proclaimed it shall be the law, "notwithstanding the lamentations here or elsewhere!" The measure has been thrice rejected; it is again presented; and, if passed, will prove that the President is too strong for the people. In this issue, I can no longer debate its policy or expediency. Another consideration is paramount. I oppose it now because it is an Executive measure. Prove it to be the best, I would have my arm chopped off, my tongue pulled out, before I will be forced to vote for it by the will of one man. I will not have "pudding itself stuffed down my throat!" There was a majority of fourteen against it last winter; now, I fear, a much smaller majority. Some have gone over! No wonder. The President, notwithstanding the manifestations of public sentiment, has all the odds against the people. He has one hundred thousand officeholders to do his bidding, stationed at every outpost—spies, informers—throughout the country. He has the press; he has the public money wherewith to pay "the bounty," unprotected by law, in hands of partisans, placed where he pleases, distributed as he pleases. He has the public lands. This is the great source of patronage and power.

Sir, how can State-rights men support this mammoth Executive? How expect a large portion of the States to be free and independent, and stand upon their reserved rights against power consolidated in the hands of the Executive of the Federal Government; when every new State is raised, nurtured into very being and existence upon Executive pap and patronage? Look at every new State on your frontier, and count their Executive force in the Senate! This is the domain corruption which buys and secures States—the other sources of patronage, offices and money retain men. Men and States will render the President omnipotent! I call upon all the patriotic of this land to drop currency, banks, finance—every minor consideration and topic—and to devote themselves wholly to the great work of resisting and reducing this Dagon Executive—to come up to our help—to come soon, or we will be powerless to resist! May an overruling Providence prevent the reduction of our strength to a weak minority before this very session expires! The President has but a short time to "fatigue us into compliance," but if the "favorite measure" be passed, no tongue can tell the horrible results to this nation. It will surely re-elect him to a second term; and who will succeed him? That is the last great question. Let me tell certain gentlemen of the South particularly, no matter what may be their hopes and their calculations for their man, there is one whom I cannot call a man, who is as sure of the succession as he surely deserves nothing but ignominy and disgrace—that monster is Thomas H. Benton!

The SPEAKER. Not in order.
Mr. WISE. "The man" of Missouri, then; and who can bear the thought? I hold the horrible result up to the American people as the last, worst result—the climax of horror—of the present corrupt dynasty! When that happens, I will follow the examples of Swartwout and Price, and take passage for England!

UNITED STATES BANK.

SPEECH OF HON. W. C. RIVES,

OF VIRGINIA,

IN THE SENATE, December 20, 1838.

The following resolutions, offered by Mr. RIVES yesterday, being taken up for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury communicate to the Senate, at as early a day as practicable, the information called for under the following heads of inquiry:

1. The period at which the third bond of the Bank of the United States, sold to that institution, amounting to $2,251,871.38, was placed to the credit of the Treasurer on the books of the bank; the terms on which it was negotiated; the person acting on behalf of the bank, with whom the negotiation was made; the particulars of any understanding or agreement that the proceeds of the same should be left on deposit with the said bank until wanted in the ordinary disbursements of the Government; and what understanding or arrangement, if any, has taken place respecting the benefit which might accrue to the bank in the transfer of money it should make to distant places on account of the Government.

2. The period when the sum of $1,600,000, in part payment of the second bond of the Bank of the United States, was placed to the credit of the Treasurer by that bank; and the nature of the agreement or understanding had in reference to the payment of a part of said bond before, and of another part after, it became due.

3. Whether any sum or sums of the public money have been deposited in the Bank of the United States other than those derived from the payment or sale of its bonds; if so, the amount and date of each deposit, and by whom and by whose authority and direction they were made.

4. The aggregate balance standing weekly to the credit of the Treasurer in the Bank of the United States, its branches or agencies, whether subject to draft or not; as well as the weekly aggregate balance in the Treasury from the time the first deposit was made in the said bank of moneys arising from the payment or sale of its bonds up to the present period.

5. A list of all the branches or agencies of the said Bank of the United States on which the Treasury Department has drawn drafts; the amount of public moneys directed to be placed at each, and of the drafts severally drawn on them, and the rates of exchange between Philadelphia and each of the places to which sums were ordered to be transferred.

6. The amount, so far as it can be conveniently ascertained, that has been drawn from the Bank of the United States, its branches or agencies, in notes of said bank, for paying Indian annuities, or other claims of the Indians on the Government, or for defraying the expenses attending the removal of the Indians, and, in general, the nature of the "arrangements," if any, made for the more distant public disbursements in the notes of the bank, together with all the correspondence, agreements, and instructions, given or entered into, connected with any or all the heads of inquiry above stated.

Also, resolved, That he communicate the nature of the arrangements made with him by those banks in which, according to his report of the 3d instant, portions of the public money have been "placed to the credit of the Treasurer on special deposits," the kinds of money in which the said "special deposits" were made, whether the same were entered on the books of the bank, whether the identical moneys deposited have continued to be held by the banks, whether the drafts of the Treasury Department that have been drawn on those deposits have been paid in the specific moneys deposited, and whether the balances remaining are part and parcel of the very moneys originally deposited.

Mr. RIVES said: The resolutions just read, Mr. President, carry, in a great measure, their purpose and intention on their face. Still it may be expected of me to state somewhat more in detail the particular views with which they are offered, and the scope of the information they are designed to elicit. The first resolution, it will be perceived, relates to the negotiations and transactions which have recently taken place between the Treasury Department and the Bank of the United States, and is intended to ascertain the precise relation which at present exists between the Government and that institution. For several months past rumors of an extraordinary character have prevailed, that notwithstanding the convulsions through which the country had passed, to put an end to the fiscal connection formerly existing between this institution and the Government, the Treasury Department had recently entered into arrangements with it, which, to a great extent, renewed that connection. Rumors of this sort could not fail to awaken a high degree of anxiety, as well as surprise, in the public mind. When the "seven years' war," which had been prosecuted by the party in power to put down, and keep down, this institution, was recollected; when the constant and loud denunciations directed against it by the Administration and its friends, were still ringing in the ears of the people, they were slow to believe that so sudden and extraordinary a change of position could have taken place on the part of the Government.

It was true that the Bank of the United States now held its charter under the authority of the State of Pennsylvania, and not of the United States. But this circumstance, according to the declared opinions of the Administration and all its present prominent supporters, had not changed the essential character of the institution or lessened its dangers to the country. The head of the Administration himself took an early occasion, after the recharter of the bank by the State of Pennsylvania, in a letter addressed to an assemblage of his fellow-citizens, called together to celebrate "the emancipation of the country from the thralldom of the bank," to declare that this institution, under its State charter, "was still the same power, fighting under the same panoply, and only varying the manner of its approach." The Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BREHMAN,] I need not say one of the most distinguished champions of the Administration; had also addressed a letter to his fellow-citizens, in which he eloquently and forcibly denounced "the Bank of the United States as rechartered by his own State." He pronounced it to be "the very same monopoly which had heretofore convulsed the country, with the same capital of $35,000,000, owned by the same stockholders, (except the United States,) and guided by the same controlling will"—"the same monster bank, recalled into existence by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, but with powers and privileges greater and more dangerous than those which had been conferred on it by Congress." The Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] now a leading supporter of the financial policy, at least, of the Administration, had also signaled his zeal in the same cause. We all recollect the alarm he manifested, both during the extra session and the late annual session of Congress, lest this dreaded institution should repossess itself of the Government deposits; and that he declared he should consider such an event as one of the deepest disgraces, as well as direct calamities, which could fall upon the country. It was but the other day we saw a published letter of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] in which, speaking of the present Bank of the United States, he declares, in his emphatic phraseology, "we know it is more wicked, and we have the authority of its president that it is more powerful, than ever."

With these accumulated maledictions of the Administration and all its leading supporters on the present as well as the former Bank of the United States, after the solemn and constantly repeated declarations of uncompromising hostility to it, was hard to believe, without the most unequivocal proofs, that the Administration could have entered into any connection with so denounced and dreaded an institution. Notwithstanding, therefore, the developments which, from time to time, gave an increasing probability to the rumors of this connection, the public mind was still incredulous, and awaited with anxiety the further disclosure of facts. In this state of things, Congress assembled, and everybody looked with confidence to the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury to clear up all mystery on a subject which had attracted so much of the public attention, and which deeply concerned the character of the Government as well as the interests of the people. But, instead of information, there seemed to be a studied reserve and ambiguity, and almost total silence in the Secretary's report on the whole subject. Although he had been charged by an act of Congress with a special trust, to sell the bonds of the bank held by the United States, and nothing seemed, therefore, both more natural and proper than that he should render to Congress an explicit account of the manner in which he had executed that trust, yet all that he says of the slightest importance on that subject is comprehended in this single oracular line: "The sale of one of the bonds becoming expedient, it was effected within the limitations prescribed." Of the specific terms of the sale, to whom sold, the mode of payment, and other particulars of the transaction, he is altogether silent. It had been stated, and generally believed, that the bond had been sold to the bank itself. But there is nothing in the report which gives the slightest intimation of who the purchaser was. Then, as to the proceeds of the bond, what was done with them, where deposited, how applied, there is the like mysterious reserve and ambiguity. There is nothing in the report of the Secretary even to assist conjecture on this point, but a small document subjoined to his report, which he calls "a list of banks in which special deposits have been made to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, derived only from debts due from banks, and the amount in each subject to draft on the 1st of December, 1838." This list comprehends but two banks—"the Bank of the United States, of Pennsylvania, in which the amount is $1,738,488," (one million seven hundred and thirty-eight thousand four hundred and eighty-eight dollars,) and the "Bank of Virginia, Richmond, with the pittance of $32,146," (thirty-two thousand one hundred and forty-six dollars.) Now, whether these deposits in the Bank of the United States are the proceeds of the sale of its bond, or of whatever other funds they may consist, we are left wholly in the dark. We are told, with a vague generality, that they "are derived from debts due from banks;" but from what banks, from the Bank of the United States itself, or from some other banks, or part from one and part from another, we are left without any means to solve the enigma. From this singular and ambiguous phraseology, it would seem as if the Secretary were desirous to cover up, by the obscurity of his language, all traces of his negotiations with the monster bank, as one honorable Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] graphically describes it.

But, in the midst of the darkness in which the Secretary's report had enveloped the subject, a broad and strong light breaks in upon us, all at once, from another quarter of the horizon. Within the last two days we have an account of these negotiations and arrangements from the other high contracting party—the president of the bank himself. He shows nothing of the coy reserve and diplomatic vagueness of the Secretary; apparently conscious that, if there has been any loss of dignity, or of advantage, or of consistency, in the negotiations with his ancient adversary, it was, at least, not on his side: everything in his statement is direct, explicit, positive, and unequivocal. He announces to the country, through his letter to Mr. Adams, that his differences with his old antagonist are settled; that "he has no longer controversies with the Government of the Union;" that "arrangements had been made"—he courteously adds "as honorable to the executive officers as beneficial to the public service"—"which had brought the Government into efficient coöperation with the bank for the reëstablishment of the currency;" yes, sir, had brought (mark the phrase) the Government into efficient coöperation with the bank; that "in the month of July the Government had agreed to receive an anticipated payment of the bonds of the bank, to the amount of between four and five million dollars, in a credit to the Treasurer on the books of the bank;" and, also, that "arrangements were made for the more distant public disbursements in the notes of the bank." Under these circumstances, the bank is willing to disarm; it proclaims a cessation of hostilities; "it abdicates its involuntary power," and "desires only repose." It may well, indeed, retire from the field of controversy, under such circumstances, to "repose" on the laurels of its victory.

Now, Mr. President, this letter is the first official information we have had of who the purchaser of the bank's bonds was. It shows, as had been generally believed before, that they were sold to the bank itself—a fact which, from some cause or other, the Secretary seemed sedulously to withhold. It shows also in what manner the bank was to pay the purchase money of the bonds, which the law required should be sold for "money in hand." "The Government," says Mr. Biddle, "agreed to receive payment 'in a credit to the Treasurer on the books of the bank.'" But the Secretary of the Treasury, speaking of the Government funds in the bank, describes them (as we have already seen) as special deposits. Presuming that the public funds in the bank are, for the most part, at least, of the proceeds of the sale of its bonds, it will be for the Secretary to show what sort of a special deposit can be made of a naked credit on the books of a bank. This, it seems to me, would be a sort of iusus nature in banking accounts. The president of the bank also says that the Government had agreed to receive an anticipated payment of its bonds to the amount of between four and five million dollars. The only anticipated payments shown by the Secretary, in his statement of the Treasury receipts for the year, are one of $2,254,871, being the proceeds of the third bond, and another of $1,600,000, part of the second bond, being an aggregate of $3,854,871—$3,854,871 only. The president of the bank finally informs us that "arrangements were made for the more distant public disbursements in the notes of the bank." The Secretary is wholly silent as to any such arrangements. He will, doubtless, be glad of the opportunity I propose to afford him of explaining these discrepancies and omissions, and of showing on which side the error or fault lies.

At all events, these transactions should be thoroughly and distinctly understood by the country. The character of the Government and the public interests demand it. Was the sale of the bank's bonds, as their conversion into credits on the books of the bank has been called, a simple and naked transaction of sale, or was it not connected with stipulations and conditions that the bank should have the deposit of the public moneys accruing from them, till they were wanted for actual expenditure; that it should enjoy also the benefit arising from the unequal rates of exchange, in transferring them to the points where they would be required for disbursement; and that the circulation of the bank should be aided and extended by the Government by its making use of the notes of the bank in its more distant disbursements? Has the bank been made depository and fiscal agent of the Government for the sums arising from the sale of its bonds only, or for other sums also transferred to it from other sources? All these are questions to which the public attention is keenly awakened; and it will be satisfied with nothing short of a thorough elucidation of them. If the hostilities so long existing between the Government and the bank have all of a sudden ceased, and their controversies been happily adjusted, as the president of the bank informs us, the country is interested in knowing on what terms, and by what means, the adjustment has taken place. Is the cessation of hostilities an armistice only, or a final pacification? Is it a treaty of peace, or of both amity and peace? Is it an alliance, or a convention of subsidies? If an alliance, is it offensive and defensive, or defensive only? If a convention of subsidies, which party pays the subsidies, and which furnishes the contingent of auxiliary troops? If, finally, the bank "abdicates its involuntary power," is it a total and complete renunciation of its claims to empire; or does it abdicate the throne only that it may be "the power behind the throne greater than the throne itself?"

These questions acquire a still graver character and deeper interest from the significant speculations indulged on the appearance of Mr. Biddle's letter by certain leading journals known to be friendly to the bank, and supposed to be, more or less, conversant with its views. One of them, commenting on the letter of the president of the bank, says, "the bank will, no doubt, in the course of a short time, by an insensible process, become the fiscal agent of the Government." Another, with reference to the same letter, says, "it will be a curious and not improbable spectacle if we see, through the instrumentality of concurring circumstances, a national bank reëstablished without the action of Congress," &c. A national bank reëstablished without the action of Congress! What easier or simpler than to do it, by the "insensible process" already commenced? Let the Executive, at his own will and pleasure, adopt the Pennsylvania Bank of the United States as the fiscal agent and depository of the Government—let it join the weight of the public revenues to the already enormous capital of that institution—let it superadd the credit arising from a connection with the Government to the extensive and pervading operations in which the bank is engaged throughout the Union, and have you not a national bank reëstablished to all intents and purposes—reëstablished without the concurrence of Congress, and in despite of its authority? and would it not be a national bank of the most dangerous and worst possible kind? Created by the fiat of the Executive alone—allied with the Executive and dependent on the Executive—without any of those guards and securities against abuse which the legislative authority would provide—no committee of Congress to examine and report on its condition and proceedings—"the secrets of its prison-house" open to no eye but its own, and its relations with its political patron and ally screened from all knowledge but that of the high contracting parties themselves. The imagination of man cannot conceive a more perfect and fearful personification of that "concentrated moneyed power" which the President speaks of in his message, not "tempted" merely, but compelled by the law of its being, "to become an active agent in political affairs." Obsta principis is the admonition of wisdom in all human concerns; and now that the "insensible process" is just begun, which, if not arrested, may terminate in a connection so dangerous and fatal between this powerful institution and the Executive, I come forward, and as was done on the occasion of another memorable coalition in another country, in the name of my country, I forbid the bans.

But I have still another and more extensive object, Mr. President, in moving the resolutions on your table. I desire to show, by the acts of the Administration, that, whatever dissertations and homilies the executive officers may favor us with, on the sub-Treasury system, and in favor of a divorce from banks, they have, by their practice, borne the highest of all testimony to the superior safety, convenience, and other advantages of banks as depositories and fiscal agents of the Government. Since the suspension of specie payments by the banks, according to the construction put upon the deposit act of June, 1836, by the Secretary of the Treasury, and concurred in by the Committee on Finance of this body, there are hardly any banks which are competent to be employed as depositories under the provisions of that act. By that law, it is said, no bank can be legally employed as a depository of the public moneys, in the manner and on the terms contemplated by it, which may have at any time since July 1, 1836, issued notes of a less denomination than five dollars. This being the case with nearly all the banks, the consequence has been that the Treasury Department has been left almost entirely to its own discretion as to the manner of keeping the public money; and, in the exercise of this discretion, it has continued, for the most part, still to employ banks as depositories, styling them, however, special instead of general depositories, as they would be under the act of June, 1836. It appears from the annual report of the Secretary, now before me, that there are at present sixteen banks (including the Bank of the United States) so employed, at the discretion of the Department, over and above the four which still remain general depositories, under the provisions of the law of June, 1836. The public moneys deposited in these sixteen banks are described by the Secretary as placed there on special deposit; but I apprehend these special deposits vary, in no essential respect, from the general deposits made in banks under the provisions of the act of 1836. I have, therefore, added to the resolution respecting the transactions with the Bank of the United States, another calling upon the Secretary for precise information as to the nature of his arrangements with the whole of the sixteen banks in which public moneys have been placed on special deposit, requiring him to state in what kinds of money these special deposits have been made; whether they have been held in the identical moneys originally deposited, and whether the drafts drawn upon these deposits have been paid out of, and the balances remaining exist in, the very moneys originally deposited, and none other. The answer to these queries will serve to test the true character of the Secretary's special deposits, and, unless I am greatly deceived, will prove them to be nothing but a delusive play upon words.

In reviewing the list of the different public depositories, contained in the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, this singular and striking state of things appears: that while the sub-Treasury system is still urged upon us, and the Secretary of the Treasury has, in the existing condition of things, full discretion to direct the keeping of the public moneys as he thinks best, of an aggregate of public moneys in the possession of all the different depositories, amounting to the sum of $4,599,300, the sum of $2,879,665 is deposited in banks, $1,320,827 in the four mints, and the sum of $398,818 only at present in the hands of collectors and receivers. Could there be a stronger testimony than this involuntary tribute on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury to the superior safety and convenience of banks as public depositories? Of the sum of $2,879,665 deposited in the banks, 235,114 only is deposited in banks employed under the provisions of the act of 1836. The balance, to wit, $2,584,451, is deposited in banks employed at the discretion of the Treasury Department, and, of that, $1,738,488 in the Bank of the United States alone.

The practice of the Executive, then, even while professing to have adopted the sub-Treasury system, affords the most implicit recognition of the superior value and advantages of banks as depositories and fiscal agents. They deprecate, it is true, a connection with banks; but it is a legal connection, sanctioned and regulated by law, it seems, which they deprecate, not one depending on Executive discretion. Not only the practice of the Administration, but the express language both of the President and Secretary of the Treasury, recognizes the high, and, in the present condition of the commercial world, I might add, almost indispensable utility of bank agency in the fiscal operations of the Government; but they are for leaving the employment of banks to the will and discretion of the administrators of the Government. The Secretary of the Treasury, while reasoning in favor of his sub-Treasury scheme, says:

"An appropriate and occasional use would still be made of the banks by the Treasury, as is done by others, whenever convenience should require it. But neither party would be forced into a species of vassalage—a constant, necessary, and dependent connection," &c.

The President, in his message, taking up the same idea, says:

"Banks, like other State establishments, may be used or not, in conducting the affairs of the Government, as public policy and the general interests of the Union may seem to require. The only safe or proper principle upon which their intercourse with the Government can be regulated is that which regulates their intercourse with the private citizen—the conferring of mutual benefits. When the Government can accomplish a financial operation better with the aid of banks than without, it should be at liberty to seek that aid as it would the services of a private banker, or other capitalists or agents, giving the preference to those who will serve it on the best terms."

It seems, then, that the Secretary of the Treasury and the President are by no means against the employment of banks, but they are against tying up the hands of Executive discretion in their employment. "An appropriate and occasional use may be made of them by the Treasury," says the Secretary, "whenever convenience should require it." "They may be used or not," repeats the President, "as public policy and the general interests of the Union may seem to require;" and "the Government should be left at liberty to seek their aid as it would the services of a private banker," &c. Who, I would ask, under this system, would be the judge when "convenience," to use the language of the Secretary, or "public policy," according to that of the President, required the use of banks? Of necessity, the Executive—the Department charged with conducting the "financial operations" of the Government.

Now, with due deference, I must be permitted to say, Mr. President, that of all the systems yet suggested for conducting the finances of the country, this, to my mind, is fraught with the deepest dangers to the public liberty. What, sir! banks "to be used, or not," as fiscal agents, according to the President and Secretary of the Treasury may determine it to be useful, politic, or convenient to do so! The consequence would necessarily be to put all the moneyed institutions of the country under the power and at the devotion of the Executive. No rule of law being established regulating the employment of banks—no limit fixed to the number which might be employed, or terms prescribed on which they should be employed, as one might be employed to-day and another to-morrow; as those already employed might be dismissed, and new ones taken into the service of the Government, at the sole will and pleasure of the Executive—what would this be but to convert the whole community of banks into suitors for Executive favor, and to subject them to the dominion of Executive power? Under this system, if the Executive so willed it, the sub-Treasury scheme might be carried out, in one section of the country, with all its desolating exactions of specie, runs upon the banks, &c.; while, in another, banks would be the favored agents of the Government, and, through them, every facility be given to the operations of industry and trade. What would this be, I again ask, but to create in the hands of the Executive a power absolutely despotic over the pecuniary concerns of the people? It would give to the Executive not merely that "exclusive custody and entire control of the public moneys" which is the great end of the sub-Treasury scheme, but it would invest them with a sweeping dominion over the whole of the moneyed institutions of the country. To so fearful an accumulation of power in the hands of a department of the Government whose patronage and influence have already proved an overmatch for the Representatives of the people and the States, and, I sometimes fear, for the people and the States themselves, I, for one, will never consent. No, sir; if banks are the safest depositories and best fiscal agents of the Government, as I believe them to be, and as the practice, and in a great degree the language, of the Administration, admit them to be, let their employment be regulated by law; let the number to be employed be limited by law; let the terms and conditions on which they are to be employed, the manner of their selection, and the services they are to perform, be all defined by law; let the power of the Executive over them be strictly guarded by a legislative declaration of the sole causes for which, when once employed, they shall be discontinued, and requiring, in every such case, a prompt report to Congress of the special reasons of the discontinuance. In so grave and important a trust as the care and management of the public treasure—one, too, so peculiarly the province of the legislative department to supervise, and which, in all countries, is felt to be so intimately connected with the public liberty—let us leave nothing to Executive discretion which can be defined and regulated by law.

The progress of this great financial controversy has, as it seems to me, Mr. President, at length brought us to this single issue—a grave and portentous one it most assuredly is, but yet simple and disembarassed. That the State banks are to be employed as fiscal agents of the Government is, as I have shown, admitted both by the practice and language of the Administration. The only question is, how and in what manner they are to be employed? Are they to be employed at the sole will and pleasure of the Executive; or are they to be employed under the sanction, limitations, and responsibility of law? The sub-Treasury scheme, though still recommended, and even earnestly recommended in name, and intended, possibly, to be pressed in fact, is virtually abandoned in argument. The objections taken to it by its opponents have, one by one, been practically admitted, not only by the public reason, which has emphatically pronounced its condemnation of the scheme, but by the Administration itself. The great and vital principle of the system is the collection of the revenue in hard money. This, accordingly, was put forward most prominently in the message of the President at the extra session of Congress, and was urged by him, with peculiar earnestness. The legislative discussion, during that session, it will be recollected by all of us, turned mainly on that fundamental principle of the system. It was found to be untenable in the open field of argument, and accordingly we have heard nothing more of it in either of the two subsequent messages of the President, or annual reports of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The next great question on which issue was joined, between the advocates and the opponents of the sub-Treasury scheme was the comparative safety of the banks and of public officers, as depositories of the public money. Notwithstanding the triumphant appeal we made to the past experience of the Government on this head, and the vast amount of losses which we showed, by the authentic records of the Treasury had been sustained from defaulting public officers, it was still contended that banks were less safe than individual agents, and reports were called forth from the Secretary of the Treasury, explaining away the conclusive testimony of his former reports, and making out, by certain recondeite calculations of interest and of alleged depreciation, a heavy loss in figures (though not in fact) against the banks, to offset the enormous defaults of public officers. But what does the Secretary now say under the teachings of "recent events," on reviewing his reports both for and against the comparative safety of banks as public depositories? "Banking institutions have never been regarded by the undersigned" (says Mr. Woodbury in his late annual report to Congress) "as a class of agents generally unsafe, when looking to eventual losses," or, as he says in another part of his report, "in relation to eventual payment." I should like to know from Mr. Woodbury what prospect of "eventual payment" he has from the sub-Treasurers who have recently fled the country, and put the ocean between them and the Solicitor of the Treasury.

In like manner, the President bears, in my opinion, the most impressive testimony to the superior safety of banks as depositories, by the extraordinary and unusual provisions he recommends to guard against the defalcations of public officers. He expressly says, indeed, that "the experience of every country has shown that public officers are not at all times proof against temptation." To countervail the force of this temptation, he invokes the penal legislation of Congress to "visit" the infidelity of these agents "with severe and ignominious punishment." But of what avail would be even the bloody code of Draco, when the improved methods of locomotion to which the enterprising and inventive genius of the age has given birth, and of which two of our sub-Treasurers have already availed themselves, afford so ready a means of escape, and of consequent impunity, under a foreign jurisdiction? Far better would it be, in my humble judgment, to heed the prayer which Divine wisdom has taught to human weakness, and to "lead not" public officers (who are but men) into "temptation," by committing to their custody large sums of the public treasure.

But the President, as if conscious that neither the rigors of legislative enactment, nor the vigilance of Executive supervision, could adequately provide for the safety of the public moneys in the hands of individual agents, has gravely submitted to Congress a proposition which, I must with all deference say, appears to me the most extraordinary on record, and utterly opposed to the spirit at least of the Constitution. What is it? Why, that Congress should appoint an ambulatory committee of their own body to look after the President's sub-Treasurers, to make "frequent examinations of their affairs and accounts," of which these officers, the President adds, "should have no previous notice," and then to "report to the Executive such defalcations as are found to exist." Yes, sir, a committee of Congress to hunt up defaulters, and report them to the Executive! Whose duty is it, I would ask, under the Constitution, to supervise and inspect the conduct of public officers? "The Executive power," by the Constitution, is expressly "vested in the President." He appoints the public officers, who are his agents and assistants in the performance of his high trust; he alone has the power of removing them, and upon him alone should rest the responsibility for their conduct, and the measures necessary to ascertain their fidelity or unworthiness. Congress is the legislative department, whose province it is to enact laws, the execution of which then devolves on the President. Congress can have nothing to do with the functions and details of administration, the responsibility of which rests on the President alone. A proposition, then, making them sharers in that responsibility through a committee of their body, to which should be assigned the subordinate and ministerial duty of "inspecting the affairs and accounts" of sub-Treasurers, and reporting "their defalcations to the Executive," I must repeat, appears to me utterly opposed to the principles of the Constitution; and wholly incompatible with the dignity of Congress. No, sir, even if the occasion were a legitimate one, we shall never see, I trust, a committee of Congress reporting to any other body than to Congress itself. If the President will have sub-Treasurers, he must look after them by agents of his own. As much as Executive power, I lament to say, has invaded and subdued the lofty spirit and rightful independence of the legislative department, we are not yet, I trust, prepared for a humiliation of appointing a committee of the American Congress as a corps of beadles to hunt up defaulting sub-Treasurers, and report them to the Executive. That so novel and extraordinary a measure should have been proposed by the President as a necessary means of guarding the public money from defalcation in the hands of sub-Treasurers, is the most emphatic acknowledgment he could have made of the inherent insecurity of that system.

Notwithstanding, however, all these admissions, express or implied, of the superior safety and convenience of banks as depositories and fiscal agents, the President recommends again the sub-Treasury scheme to Congress, and even says his opinions in favor of it "have been strengthened by recent events." What the President can find in "recent events" to sustain his renewed recommendation of the sub-Treasury scheme, it utterly surpasses my powers of comprehension to imagine. Recent events, sir! Let us, for a moment, inquire what these recent events have been, and how they bear on the two rival systems proposed for the safe-keeping of the public moneys. First, as to the system of State banks as public depositories. What is the testimony of recent events with regard to them? Have we not recently seen them within fifteen months after a general suspension of specie payments, brought upon them by an unprecedented combination of adverse circumstances, among which not the least was the hostile policy of the Government itself—have we not seen them, within this short period, without even a cheering voice from the Government amid the difficulties which surrounded them, resuming their payments in specie, meeting all their engagements to the country with promptitude, paying many millions to the Government punctually at the periods designated by law, and even anticipating, in some instances the payment of the small balances remaining, before they have become due under the provisions of law? So prompt a recovery, under circumstances of such peculiar difficulty and embarrassment, is without example in the financial history of the world, and afford the most triumphant evidence of the general soundness and integrity of these institutions. The President himself says "it is no more than just to the banks" to bear testimony "to their honorable course in the late emergency." The voice of the recent events, then, of everything which has occurred since the adjournment of Congress down to the date of the President's message, is in favor of the system of State banks as public depositories.

Now, let us inquire what is the verdict of these same recent events on the sub-Treasury system. For the last two or three months, the country has been filled with consternation and alarm by successive defalcations of sub-treasurers, ranging from twenty or thirty thousand dollars up to a million and a quarter each! We have hardly had time to recover from the shock of one of these explosions before we have been astounded by the report of another and another. Almost every rank and profession of life has been invaded by, and yielded to, the "temptations" of this corrupting system. Even here, under the very eye of the Government, the shrine of the national honor, the Army, has not been able to resist the infection. I refer with pain to these things; but they have become part of the public history of the times, and it is in vain to attempt to throw a veil over them. The robes of the law (a profession which the most profound and sagacious of all the foreign observers of our institutions has pronounced to be the real aristocracy of the country) have been soiled by the pollution. The peace and honor of families, as well as the pride of the nation, have been dragged down to the dust by this system of overwhelming temptation and corruption, while the public treasure has been wantonly dissipated and wasted by it. Deeply humiliating as these occurrences are to the national pride, I yet look upon them as providential admonitions, intended to save us from the thorough adoption of a system which I verily believe, would spread more general demoralization and corruption through the land than any which the arch-enemy of man could devise. It is not surely in such "recent events" as these that the President can find any recommendation of the sub-Treasury scheme, which he again proposes to Congress. No, sir; be assured that whatever party may effect here, these same "recent events" have forever sealed the fate of this system with a virtuous and enlightened people.

Why, then, is it again recommended and urged upon us? Is it as a rallying cry of party? Is it to drive through a party triumph, fatal, as I firmly believe such a triumph would be in the end, to those who achieve it? Are there, then, Mr. President, no circumstances of national exigency, appealing to the dormant, but I hope not yet extinguished spirit of patriotism, in which we can rise superior to this fatal bondage of party, and act for our country? Can we not, now that the tarnished honor and dilapidated interests of the nation call upon us to close up every avenue of corruption and abuse—can we not devote this short session, at least, to the pressing wants of the country, out of the many we have given up to the interests and conflicts of party? If we could do so, nothing would be easier, in my opinion, than to settle finally and satisfactorily this great financial question which has hitherto so much divided and agitated us. The circumstances of the moment are unusually propitious. The scheme of a national bank is now, and I trust finally abandoned. The late happy and successful restoration of a sound currency by the State banks, without the aid of such an institution, has produced a general conviction that it can no longer be maintained on that ground of necessity, on which alone its advocates have heretofore rested it. The sub-Treasury scheme should, in my humble judgment, be considered equally out of the question. It has over and over again been rejected by the representatives of the people, and the people themselves have ratified the judgment of their representatives. "Recent events" proclaim its condemnation in a still louder voice. What, then, remains? No other alternative than the use of the State banks. Let this be adopted as the general principle, as it seems to me it ought to be by all parties, in the present attitude of things, and after the decisive expressions of public opinion which have taken place; and there would then be but little difficulty in solving the subordinate questions as to the manner of using them, never losing sight, however, of the cardinal republican maxim that that use must be regulated by law, and not abandoned to Executive discretion.

INTERFERENCE IN ELECTIONS.

SPEECH OF HON. W. C. RIVES,
OF VIRGINIA,

IN THE SENATE, February 12, 1839,

On the bill introduced by Mr. CRITTENDEN to prevent the interference of certain Federal officers in Elections.

Mr. RIVES said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The subject now under consideration is, in my humble judgment, by far the most important in its bearing on the liberties and future destinies of this country which has occupied the deliberations of Congress for years past, and is not surpassed in importance, indeed, by any which has arisen since the establishment of the Constitution. It concerns the vital principle of free government itself—the right of the people freely to choose their representatives. Hitherto, in the theory, at least, of all parties, this great remedial right of the people has been held to be sacred from all interference on the part of the Government, or any pretension of the agents of executive power to influence or control its exercise. But now, for the first time in our history, we have a solemn and elaborate report from one of the leading committees of this body, (the Judiciary Committee,) boldly proclaiming it to be the right and duty of executive officers to busy themselves in elections, to endeavor to shape and direct public opinion, and to influence and control the people, as far as they can, in the highest and most important function of their sovereignty.

I confess, when I listened to the reading of this portentous report, some days ago, from the table of your Secretary, I was amazed and bewildered. I could not but ask myself, whither hath the mad dominion of party carried us? Where am I, that I hear such doctrines openly proclaimed in the Senate-house? Am I in free republican America, the land of jealous constitutional freedom, or am I in England, amid the "brooding darkness" of the seventeenth century, under the arbitrary and lawless sway of the Stuarts; or am I in imperial Rome, under the sordid despotism of the Cæsars? I must say that nothing has ever impressed me with so deep a despondency as to the fortunes of our young and glorious Republic as the doctrines of that report, received and welcomed, as they have been, by a majority of this body.

I do not look upon it as expressing merely the opinions of its author, or even of the committee in whose name it is presented; but I am compelled to regard it as the creed of a party; as the exposition and defense of a political system which relies upon party organization, party discipline, and official patronage, to control and govern this mighty country. It comes to us from a committee consisting (with but a single exception, I believe) of gentlemen of the same political party—friends and supporters of this Administration. It is no sooner read than it is hailed and openly applauded on the floor by one member of the party; and another instantly moves to have ten thousand copies of it printed for distribution among the people, which is accordingly ordered without a division. A report, treating of such "high matter," and so sanctioned and indorsed by a majority of this body, cannot fail to awaken the most anxious attention to the character and tendency of its doctrines.

The honorable chairman of the committee, [Mr. WALL.] fearing that his former political associations and opinions might by possibility prejudice his report in the eyes of some, thought fit to inform us that a solemn council had been held on his admission into the Democratic party, and by that council it was determined "he never had federalism enough to spoil his democracy." We are to understand, then, that modern democracy admits of an infusion of more or less federalism; and, if we are to judge of the orthodox democracy of the day by this report, I should say it admits of a very large infusion, for I have never yet seen the document which is more thoroughly saturated with all the characteristic elements of the Federal faith than this.

Is it not an elaborate plea, throughout, for the rights and prerogatives of Federal executive power; for the influence of Federal patronage, not merely on those who are its immediate beneficiaries, but, through their party services and electioneering activity, upon the great body of the people themselves? While Federal patronage and Executive power are thus exalted, the State authorities are studiously disparaged and held up as special objects of jealousy and distrust. The functionaries of the States are spoken of habitually in connection with "the officers of the corporations of associated wealth," evidently, as it would seem, with the view of directing against them a portion of the odium which it has been the policy of the party to excite against the banking institutions of the country. In one passage of the report the unseemly case, even, is supposed of "the State functionaries uniting with the corporations of associated wealth in a party struggle to obtain the power of the Federal Government."

Interference in Elections—Mr. Rives.

There was a time; Mr. President, in the better days of the Republic—the days of Jefferson and Madison—when democracy, or rather republicanism, as it was then called, signified a reverence for the rights of the States; respect for State authorities and State institutions; jealousy of the power and influence of the Federal Government, and especially of the Executive branch of it; economy in the public expense; suppression of useless offices; curtailment of patronage; a sacred "care of the right of election by the people;" and "absolute acquiescence in the decisions of the majority; the vital principles of republican Government." These were the great principles of Democracy as taught and practiced by him whom the report justly styles "the great apostle of Democracy." But Democracy now-a-days, if we are to judge of it by this report, and other practical expositions of the modern Democratic creed, means a disparagement of the State governments; war upon State institutions; enlargement of the powers and influence of the Federal Government; extension of Executive patronage; multiplication of offices; augmentation of the public expenditure; everything left to Executive discretion, instead of being regulated by fixed rule of law—a virtual nullification consequently of the Legislative Department, the true representative branch of the Government; the decisions of the majority "of the people, as pronounced in their elections and through the medium of their Representatives, wholly disregarded by the Executive, and the sacred "right of election by the people" itself now openly sought to be "smothered" (to use the language of Mr. Jefferson) "by the enormous patronage of the General Government," and by the licensed interference of Federal Executive officers. If modern Democracy has espoused doctrines such as these, it is no wonder that the council which sat on the Democratic pretensions of the honorable Senator from New Jersey [Mr. WALL] should have pronounced "he never had federalism enough to spoil his Democracy."

But let us come now to the report itself; and here I give notice to the Senator from New Jersey that it is to the doctrines of the report, fraught, as I consider them to be, with the greatest danger to the liberties and public morals of the country, and invested, as they have been, with a fearful importance by the solemn sanction and imprimatur of a majority of this body, that I intend mainly to address myself.

Interesting and important as the questions involved in the measure introduced by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CURTIS] undoubtedly are, I hold them but "dust in the balance" compared with the portentous doctrines inculcated by the report. The gentleman from New Jersey complained that the honorable Senator from Kentucky, in the able and eloquent speech with which he instructed and entertained this assembly, had not confined himself to showing the constitutional power of Congress to pass his bill, instead of assailing and commenting upon the doctrines of the report. But, I would ask the honorable Senator from New Jersey, if the constitutional question, of which he makes so much now, was not the least of all his topics dwelt on in the report? The report consisted, I think, of ten printed pages; and, of these ten pages, but a single one is devoted to the suggestion of any constitutional impediment to the passage of the bill; all the rest of the report—nine tenths—are given up to an elaborate defense of the right and duty of office-holders to take an active part in popular elections, and of the tyranny, injustice, and impolicy of any restraint upon them in doing so. It is throughout, indeed, not merely a justification of the interference of Federal office-holders with popular elections, but is an incitement to them to exert their influence to the utmost in directing and controlling those elections.

The Senator from New Jersey says the report only asserts the right of Federal office-holders to enlighten and advise the people in elections; but does not encourage or instigate them to the exercise of that right. Now, sir, let the report itself answer how far this construction of it is sustained by its text. I will proceed very rapidly to review it. I must ask the attention of the Senate while I read a few extracts from it, taken promiscuously from its text, which will serve to show the steady, uniform, and pervading spirit and tendency of the whole document. It will then be seen, unless I am most grossly deceived, that, from beginning to end, it not merely asserts the right, but inculcates the duty of office-holders to exert their influence in elections—a duty which they are admonished to perform under the penalty of being declared infamous, idiots, outlaws, lepers, slaves, if they shall fail of themselves, or be disabled by law from performing it; it denounces any restraint upon their interference as tyranny and proscription; and finally, they are significantly told that if any such restraint should be imposed by law, the people, in behalf of the injured office-holders, would resist the "execution" of so atrocious an enactment. If this be not instigation and excitement, I know not what is.

But to the extracts. The first I shall read is taken from the second page of the report, where the following significant language is used:

"It is both the right and duty of every one freely to discuss and communicate, both publicly and privately, such matters as he may suppose will advance the public interest, or inform the public mind. One of the most salutary and effectual agents to promote such interest is an enlightened public opinion. To evolve such opinion, and to give form and direction to the general course of national policy, and the future destinies of all, every citizen, whether intrusted with public office or not, has a like deep, abiding, and active interest, and no citizen is at liberty to withdraw himself from this high responsibility, inseparably connected with republican institutions. One of the most celebrated law-makers of one of the ancient republics declared every citizen infamous who refused to take part in the affairs of his country; and the word idiot, derived from the language of that republic, bears, through all time, this impress of their institutions, denoting one who was destitute of the spirit or intelligence requisite for the discharge of this highest duty of a citizen."

Here we are emphatically told that it is not merely the right, but the duty, of every citizen, "whether intrusted with public office or not," to take part in "the affairs"—meaning evidently, from the whole context, the election—of his country; that no citizen, office-holder or not, is "at liberty to withdraw himself from this high responsibility;" and, if he should do so, he would deserve to be declared infamous, and to be stigmatized as an idiot. If any language can convey a stronger instigation to the electioneering activity of office-holders than this, I confess myself wholly incompetent to imagine it.

Pratermitting numerous other passages, all conceived in the same spirit, and inculcating the same doctrine, I beg leave now to call the attention of the Senate to one which will be found on the 5th page of the report:

"The object of the bill is to render what is lawful and praiseworthy, and in strict conformity with both the letter and spirit of our institutions, for all citizens, criminal in a particular class, who have been honored by the confidence of the people of the whole States. It is not to punish a crime malum in se, but to create a new crime. It is not to punish bribery and corruption, the robbery of the ballot-box, the suppression or forging of returns, or usurpation or neglect of official duty in giving effect to the will of the majority in elections, or the improper use of official power, but the use of persuasion or dissuasion, of intermeddling to control or influence voters, by means that are lawful and right in others. Every citizen ought to qualify himself, by study, conversation, and every other means of acquiring knowledge, to understand the theory and principles of our institutions, and to ascertain the best mode of administering them in their true spirit, so as to promote the greatest good of the greatest number, and to render himself capable of discharging any trust that may be conferred on him by his fellow-citizens."

"It is as well his inherent right as his duty to discuss and promulge freely the measures of any Administration, and the character and conduct of those who support or oppose it, as well to control them by the censorship of public opinion as to subject them to the test of the Constitution. In doing so he may win the confidence of his fellow-citizens by his declared opinions, or may become identified with some great principle which conciliates their support. All this is innocent and praiseworthy; even if the motive is the acquisition of office, because it promotes the public good. Can it be wise, or even just, to punish as a crime, when a citizen attains office, what was patriotic and praiseworthy while he was seeking it?"

Here, then, we find that "the use of persuasion or dissuasion," of "intermeddling by office-holders" to control or influence voters, is declared by the report to be not merely "innocent" and "lawful," but "patriotic and praiseworthy!"

As in the former extract the penalty of infamy was denounced against those who should fail to perform their duty in "intermeddling" with elections, so in this a positive reward, the crown of patriotism, is decreed to those who shall come up boldly and fearlessly to the great work of indoctrinating the people by official dictation. And here I cannot but remark, Mr. President, in what a specious and deceptive guise these official advisers of the people are constantly presented by the report. In this passage, and throughout the report, they are artfully spoken of as "honored by the choice and confidence of the people." But what, sir, have the people to do with them? The officers whose interference in elections is objected to, are officers deriving their appointment from the Executive alone, and wholly dependent on the Executive for their official existence. It is, therefore, an unauthorized and gratuitous assumption, an ad captandum appeal, unsupported by fact, but one habitually recurring through the whole of this report, to speak of the office-holders in question as "honored by the choice and confidence of the people."

But to return to the interpretation of the real character of the report. As if to leave not even the shadow of a doubt on the intention of the committee to justify and encourage the interference of office-holders in elections, the following unequivocal avowal of their meaning occurs on the 9th page of the report:

"The committee can perceive no reason for the adoption by Congress of any restriction upon any of what they deem the inherent and inalienable rights of every class of citizens, merely because they have been honored with the confidence of the people." "They know no objection to reason, argument, or even persuasion, by word, message, or writing, at any time, from whomsoever it may proceed; or by whatever motive prompted. Nor do they understand on what just principles it can be maintained that the possession of office simply should deprive a citizen of the influence arising from character, intelligence, integrity, and the confidence and influence which they inspire, and of the right to use them as others are left free to use theirs."

The committee here expressly declare they "know no objection" to the "persuasion" of voters, "by word, message, or writing," at any time, "from whomsoever it may proceed," office-holders or others. This passage is referred to, at present, simply to show the open avowal which the committee make in it of their approbation of the interference of office-holders with elections. The sophism by which that interference is attempted to be palliated will be hereafter, in the progress of these remarks, I trust, abundantly exposed.

But, sir, this is not all. Office-holders are not only encouraged and stimulated, as we have seen by this report, to intermeddle in elections; they are not merely told that it is both their right and their duty to exert their influence over voters at the polls, but any attempt to restrain them in the exercise of that influence is denounced as tyranny and proscription, and assimilated to the revolting cruelty of the inquisition. The poor "proscribed office-holders," as they are called, are likened to "mutes," to "outlaws," to "lepers," to "slaves;" and, to cap the climax of this inflammatory exaggeration, we are solemnly admonished, on the 8th page of the report, that "the people would never submit to the execution of a law" which deprives their office-holding "fellow-citizen" of his "inherent, common, and equal rights." Now, sir, this looks very much like a provocation to revolutionary violence to protect the imputed rights of "these proscribed office-holders;" and, if the strong Federalism of other parts of the report is not sufficient to spoil the Democracy of its author, the undisguised Locofocoism of this must, at least, bring into question his republicanism, of which the vital principles are law, liberty, and public order.

It is in vain, then, Mr. President, to endeavor to disguise the real drift and tendency of this report. The passages I have read to the Senate, taken sparsim from every part of the report, prove beyond controversy that it is an incitement, throughout, of the office-holders, by every motive which can be addressed to the reason or the passions of man, to exert their utmost activity and influence in the elections and party contests of the day. And who are these office-holders that are held up by the report as the legitimate advisers of the people in the exercise of their precious and invaluable sovereign rights? I have already shown how gratuitous is the artifice which would represent them as "honored by the choice and confidence of the people." No, sir; they are chosen by the Executive alone, are removable by the Executive alone; and are, consequently, wholly dependant on the Executive. How far persons standing in such a relation are competent to perform the part of safe and patriotic counselors to the people, in the exercise of their electoral rights, let the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN,] and the present Attorney General of the United States, [Mr. Grundy,] as severally quoted by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] in his able speech in support of his bill, give the answer. In the celebrated report on Executive patronage, the Senator from Missouri told us that officers deriving their appointments from the President would be animated with his spirit and moved by his will—that "a power over a man's support was a power over his will." The Attorney General of the United States, in a speech made by him during his service in Congress, declared that when he saw an office-holder going to the polls, he could not resist the conviction that he was "thinking of his salary and his bread;" and the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, in a speech made by him some years ago, in the other House, had told us that these "office-holders are but the enlisted soldiers of the Administration!" Now, Mr. President, it does seem to me that persons standing in such dependant relations on the Executive are not the most proper counselors of a free people in the exercise of their electoral rights.

I know, sir, there are honorable exceptions to this general description of office-holders; that there are men in office who, however desirable their places may be to them, would never consent to purchase a continuance in office by the sacrifice of their consciences, or by unworthy compliances of any sort. But still it will be true, in general, from the very nature of things, that those who fill public offices will be animated by the same spirit, and governed by the same views, with the power which confers and can take away those offices. More especially must this be the case when that licentious motto of party pillage, "to the victors belong the spoils," uttered in "evil hour" on this floor by a Senator from New York, [Mr. MARCY,] in reference to the official trusts of the country, shall, as everything indicates it will, be fully carried out in practice. One of the heads of Departments, indeed, if I mistake not, (the Postmaster General,) has, in substance, openly proclaimed, in a letter published not long since, that he should consider himself guilty of treachery to his party if he appointed to office any one who was not a supporter of the Administration. I pretend not to quote the words; but this, according to the best of my recollection, was the substance and spirit of the declaration.

Office-holders, then, in general, from the nature of things, and from the tendency of the times, must be expected to be animated with the spirit, and devoted to the policy and views of the chief Executive Magistrate, from whom, directly or indirectly, they derive their appointments, and on whom they depend for continuance in office. Surely, no candid and reflecting man will deliberately say that persons standing in this situation ought to be licensed, much less prompted and encouraged, to take an active part in controlling those popular elections, through which it was the design of our republican system that the conduct of themselves and of their superiors should be brought to the test of a free, sovereign, and unbiased public judgment.

The honorable Senator from New Jersey, however, seems to think it a very great hardship, a violation of the equality of our laws, and of the spirit of the Constitution, that persons holding public offices should be temporarily abridged of privileges enjoyed and exercised by other citizens. But is this any novelty in our polity or legislation? Does not the Constitution itself especially provide that "no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House of Congress during his continuance in office; and also that "no person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States shall be appointed an elector of President and Vice President?" These are privileges, and very high privileges, too, (especially the first,) enjoyed by all other citizens, and yet the express fiat of the Constitution excludes all persons holding office from the enjoyment of them while they shall continue in office. Are office-holders better fitted, or have they, in the eye of reason and sound policy, any better right to erect themselves into political guardians and prompters of the people in elections, than to be their representatives and servants in the Legislature, from which we have just seen they are expressly excluded by the very letter of the Constitution? The honorable Senator also said in his report, that "under the existing laws, a citizen of a State does not, by accepting any of the offices under the Federal Government, forfeit any of the rights and privileges which belong to him as a citizen of a State. Now, sir, so far as the legislation of the Commonwealth which I have the honor to represent in part on this floor is concerned, the gentleman is wholly mistaken. By accepting an office under the Federal Government, a citizen of Virginia does forfeit, during his continuance in such office, the privilege enjoyed by all other citizens of the State, of eligibility to any office under the authority of the Commonwealth. By an act of fundamental legislation coeval with the adoption of the Federal Constitution, and still preserved in bold relief on our statute-book, it is declared that "no person holding or accepting any office, &c., under the authority of the United States, shall be capable of holding any office, legislative, executive, or judicial, or any other office, place, or appointment of trust or profit, under the Government of this Commonwealth." There are, doubtless, similar provisions in the laws and constitutions of the other States.

We see, then, that all our institutions, State and Federal, create a broad line of distinction between office-holders and the general mass of citizens. They impose political disqualifications and restrictions upon the former, during their continuance in office, from which the great body of the community are exempt. And wisely do they do it. These exclusions have their origin in that salutary jealousy of power which is the very instinct and vital principle of liberty. What does Mr. Jefferson tell us, in that very passage which the honorable Senator has quoted in his report, apparently unconscious of its force and just application to overthrow all the wire-drawn arguments of his elaborate defense of the equal rights of office-holders? Does he not tell us that "free government itself is founded in jealousy? It is jealousy, not confidence, which prescribes limited constitutions to bind down those whom we are obliged to trust with power."

One of the most conspicuous fruits of this wise jealousy, wherever free government is known, is to restrain all persons invested with public office from any interference with the free exercise of the sovereign right of election by the people. The Senator from Kentucky has shown us what were the solemn declarations of Mr. Jefferson on this subject before his accession to the Presidency, and the memorable circular which he caused to be issued in pursuance of those declarations after he entered upon his high duties. He has also properly reminded us of the emphatic adoption of the same principle by President Jackson, when, in his first inaugural address, he announced to the country, as the leading branch of his "task of reform," "the correction of those abuses that have brought the patronage of the Federal Government into conflict with the freedom of elections." We have seen, also, what has been the legislation of that country (next to our own the freest under the sun, and from which our ancestors brought with them so many of our own cherished institutions) for the purpose of repressing official interference with the freedom of elections.

But the Senator from New Jersey seeks to weaken the just influence of these weighty opinions and grave precedents by ascribing them to some paltry consideration of temporary expediency, rather than to the controlling authority of great and enduring principles. Mr. Jefferson's declarations, as well as that of General Jackson, he seemed to intimate, were intended more as a reflection on the conduct of their predecessors than as the annunciation of a great principle of civil Government.

Mr. WALL explained.

Mr. RIVES. Let us look at the declarations of Mr. Jefferson themselves, and then we shall understand their true character and import. He had received, while the presidential election was yet pending, a letter from Governor McKean, of Pennsylvania, informing him of the misconduct of certain Federal officers in that State. In his reply, dated February 2, 1801, he uses this emphatic language:

"One thing I will say, that, as to the future, interferences with elections, whether of the State or General Government, by officers of the latter, should be deemed cause of removal; because the constitutional remedy by the elective principle becomes nothing if it may be smothered by the enormous patronage of the General Government."

The circular which he caused to be issued by the several heads of Departments, immediately after his induction into office, is in the following words:

"The President of the United States has seen with dissatisfaction officers of the General Government taking, on various occasions, active parts in elections of the public functionaries, whether of the General or of the State Governments. Freedom of elections being essential to the mutual independence of Governments, and of the different branches of the same Government so vitally cherished by most of our constitutions, it is deemed improper for officers depending on the Executive of the Union to attempt to control or influence the free exercise of a elective right. This I am instructed, therefore, to notify to all officers within my Department holding their appointments under the authority of the President directly, and to desire them to notify to all subordinate to them. The right of any officer to give his vote at elections as a qualified citizen is not meant to be restrained, nor, however given, shall it have any effect to his prejudice; but it is expected that he will not attempt to influence the votes of others, nor take any part in the business of electioneering, that being deemed inconsistent with the spirit of the Constitution, and his duties to it."

Now, Mr. President, do you discern, or can any member of this body discern, in these solemn and emphatic declarations, the slightest appearance of an act of mere temporary expediency or of party recrimination? On the contrary, do they not proclaim the non-interference of Federal executive officers with popular elections to be a fundamental principle of liberty and the Constitution; as "essential to the mutual independence" of the State and General Governments, so "vitally cherished" by American institutions, and as indispensable, indeed, to preserve from destruction the great "constitutional remedy" of the elective right itself? Could the principle be placed on higher or more sacred or more enduring ground? It is impossible, indeed, to read these noble monuments of the principles of Mr. Jefferson without seeing in them the same steady devotion to, and just appreciation of, popular rights which, in the Declaration of Independence, asserted the right of election to be "a right inestimable to freemen and formidable to tyrants only;" and which, in his first inaugural address, inculcated "a jealous care of the right of election by the people, as the mild and safe corrective of abuses which are lopped by the sword of election, where peaceable remedies are unprovided." These, sir, are the principles of a pure, unadulterated, conservative Democracy; and I would beg leave to commend them to the meditation of the honorable Senator from New Jersey; before he comes forward with another defense of the pragmatic rights of office-holders.

In regard to the legislation of England on the subject, the honorable Senator, confining his view to a single statute, (that of the fifth year of William III.,) treated it as a special bargain between the King and the Commons, to procure supplies for the Crown, on the one hand, and to protect certain corporate rights of election held by the Commons, or their constituents, on the other; or, in other words, as a sort of mercantile contract, by which the King agreed, if the Commons would grant him a stipulated sum in taxes, he would refrain from interfering, by his officers, with the election of the Commons. But, sir, this is most grossly to misconceive the dignity and character of the question, and to degrade it below the noble principles on which it rests. The freedom of elections from official interference, as a principle of English liberty, is rooted in the glorious revolution of 1688, being intimately connected both with the moving causes and the immediate results of that great event. If the Senator from

SENATE.

New Jersey will look at the bill of rights, the great charter of British freedom, solemnly adopted by both Houses of Parliament in the name and on behalf of the nation, he will find it specially enumerated in the preamble of that act, among the causes by which James II. had forfeited the throne, that "he had violated the freedom of election of members to serve in Parliament;" and afterwards, in the body of the act, it is declared as an integral part of "the ancient rights and liberties" of the people of England, "that the election of members of Parliament ought to be free." The history of the times shows that James II. resorted to all sorts of influences, both upon his Parliament and people, to carry his favorite object of the establishment of the Roman Catholic religion. Finding the existing Parliament intractable to his purposes, after practicing upon the loyalty of each member whom he supposed bound to him by any ties of interest or attachment, by sending for them and holding private audiences with them, separately, in his closet, (a royal expedient, which first gave rise to the term closeting, as a political phrase, and which is, perhaps, not without examples of its practice in our own country,) he determined to dissolve the old Parliament, and to summon a new one. In order to mold this new Parliament to the designs of the King, all the resources of management and influence were brought to bear on the elections. Officers appointed by the Crown were sent to every part of the kingdom to regulate, as it was called, the corporate bodies possessing the right of choosing members of Parliament, or, in other words, to prepare them for the choice of such members as would be acceptable to the Court. Letters were written by the King's ministers to the lord lieutenants of the counties, and other men of influence, requiring their aid in the election of such persons as were known to be favorable to the views of the King; calling upon them, at the same time, to ascertain the sentiments of the several candidates in their respective counties, and to obtain from them pledges to support the measures of the King, in the event of their election. All—even down to justices of the peace—who declined cooperation in this political service, were immediately removed from office, and others of more pliable character substituted in their places, while such as complied were continued in office, and promised further promotion and rewards.*

It was by this licensed interference of the officers and servants of the Crown with the elections of members of Parliament that James II. was declared, in the preamble of the bill of rights, as we have seen, to have "violated the freedom of election of members to serve in Parliament," and to frown upon all such interferences in future, it was solemnly declared in the body of the same instrument, as part and parcel of the "ancient rights and liberties" of the people of England, that "elections of members of Parliament ought to be free." In order to carry out this great principle, consecrated and asserted by the revolution of 1688, various statutes have been passed, from time to time, prohibiting, under heavy penalties, any interference of officers, appointed by and dependent on the Crown, with the election of members of Parliament. A celebrated writer on the British Constitution, living near to those times, tells us that (while the spirit of English liberty, kindled and fostered by the revolution, was yet in the flush of its youthful vigor) "no less than seven acts were passed in King William Third's reign to prevent undue influences on elections."†

This great principle of the freedom of popular elections from all official interference, is not only sanctioned and enforced by the positive legislation of England in the purest period of her constitutional history, but it is laid down as a fundamental canon of civil and political liberty in all the ablest treatises on the theory of free government. Locke, it is known, wrote his immortal "Treatise on Government" shortly after the revolution of 1688, and under the inspiration of its great example. It was from his work, with those of Hooker and Milton and Sidney, that the great statesmen of our own Revolution drew those animating precepts of freedom which bore them triumphantly through the unequal contest for independence, and which they afterwards so deeply impressed on all the institutions founded by their wisdom and valor. Mr. Jefferson, especially, was trained to the great part he afterwards acted by a thorough study and meditation of Locke's work. It is a curious fact, not generally known, that several of the most striking passages of the Declaration of Independence, are taken almost verbatim from the "Treatise on Government;" and it is impossible to read the introductory part of that sublime paper, without perceiving, through the whole of that portion of it, how constantly the mind of the writer was recurring to the principles taught by his great master.*

Let us see, then, what this illustrious preceptor of the founders of American liberty has said on the matter we have been discussing. In the last chapter of this work, he is treating of the dissolution of Government, and among other ways in which that may be brought about, he lays down the proposition that whenever either of the grand departments, the legislative or the executive, acts contrary to its trust, the Government is dissolved. He then proceeds to show that the Executive power, in attempting to influence or control the election of members of the legislative department, or to influence or control their conduct as Representatives after they are elected, commits a gross and flagrant violation of its trust. The whole passage is fraught with the deepest wisdom, and should be written in living characters on the altars of freedom, in whatever land they may be raised. I beg leave to read it to the Senate, and to invoke their serious attention to every word of its venerable old English text, for every word is significant and replete with instruction for the present times:

"He [the Executive Magistrate] acts also contrary to his trust, when he either employs the force, treasures, or office of society to corrupt the representatives and gain them to his purposes, or openly prebends the electors, and prescribes to their choice such whom he has, by solicitations, threats, promises, or otherwise, won to his designs, and employs them to bring in such who have promised beforehand what to vote and what to enact. Thus to regulate candidates and electors, and new model the ways of election, what is it but to cut up the Government by the roots, and poison the very fountain of public security? For the people having reserved to themselves the choice of their representatives as the fence to their properties, could do it for no other end but that they might always be freely chosen, and so chosen, freely act and advise, as the necessity of the commonwealth and the public good should, upon examination and mature debate, be judged to require."

"To prepare such an assembly as this, and endeavor to set up the declared abettors of his own will for the true representatives of the people, and the law makers of society, is certainly as great a breach of trust and as perfect a declaration of a design to subvert the Government as is possible to be met with. To which, if we shall add rewards and punishments—

Mark, Mr. President, how similar are the practices of power in all ages and countries—

"visibly employed to the same end, and all the arts of perverted law made use of to take off and destroy all that stand in the way of such a design, and will not comply and consent to betray the liberties of their country, it will be past doubt what is doing."

Here we find, Mr. President, this great apostle

* The coincidence here noticed is so curious and instructive that it may not be amiss to present it to the view of the reader in a few parallel passages taken from the Declaration of Independence and the "Treatise on Government:"

Declaration of Independence.

"Prudence, indeed, will dictate that Governments long established should not be changed for light and transient causes; and, accordingly, all experience hath shown that mankind are more disposed to suffer, while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed."

"But when a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same object, evinces a design to reduce them under absolute dominion, it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such Government, and to provide new guards for their future security."

Locke on Government.

"People are not so easily got out of their old forms as some are apt to suggest. They are hardly to be prevailed with to amend the acknowledged faults in the frame they have been accustomed to." "Till the mischief become general, and the ill-designs of the rulers become visible, or their attempts sensible to the greater part, the people, who are more disposed to suffer than right themselves by resistance, are not apt to stir."

"But if a long train of abuses, prevarications, and artifices, all tending the same way, make the design visible to the people," &c., &c.

of liberty, of American as well as English liberty, (for our own great statesmen, the fathers of the Republic, were his disciples,) asserting the very doctrines which I have been maintaining against the Senator from New Jersey, declaring that any interference of the Executive (whether indirectly through his officers and agents, or directly by himself, is immaterial) with popular elections, any attempt to "preengage the electors, and prescribe to their choice" those whom they should elect, is a fundamental "breach of trust"—a gross violation of that right of "freely choosing their representatives which the people have reserved to themselves," and is, in fact, to use his own energetic and noble language, "to cut up the Government by the roots, and to poison the very fountain of public security." It was in this school that the great men of our Revolution were taught the principles of liberty; and it is easy to trace, indeed, in the very passage I have read to the Senate, the principles which, early impressed on the mind of Mr. Jefferson, led him to proclaim, in the outset of his administration, that noble, self-denying ordinance which, we have seen, he laid down as the rule of his own conduct, and of that of all in authority under him.

But the Senator from New Jersey, in his report, tells us that this is English doctrine, that "such a plant is indigenous in such a soil!" We have seen, sir, that it is American doctrine, sanctioned by the most venerable names in the calendar of republican statesmen, as well as English doctrine, derived from the purest sources of English constitutional freedom. But I would ask, Mr. President, in what soil (with the exception of our own favored land) has the tree of liberty ever struck deeper root, or spread out larger and more vigorous branches, than in the soil of England? Is it not the land of our glorious ancestors, whence they brought the most valued principles of our institutions, with their instinctive love of freedom and hatred of tyranny and oppression; and, above all, that sturdy spirit of independence which, if now revived, would be the happiest omen of the perpetuity of our liberties? Is it not the land of magna charta, of the petition of right, and of the bill of rights? Is it not the land of the habeas corpus, of the trial by jury, and of representative government itself? Is it not from these monuments of British freedom that Mr. Jefferson himself, "the great apostle of Democracy," as the Senator from New Jersey has learned to call him, tells us we have derived "the materials of which our own happy Government is constructed?"* And has it come to this, that principles and doctrines of the most vital importance to the preservation of our free institutions are to be scornfully rejected because they have come down to us from our English ancestors? Are Locke and Sidney, Milton and Hooker, and that long line of illustrious sages and patriots from whom Jefferson and his immortal associates drew their lessons of political wisdom, to be thus dishonored and contemned, and held as wildings and "idiots," I suppose, compared with the guiding lights of modern locofocoism?

The Senator from New Jersey also tells us, in substance, that there is much less reason for throwing up legal barriers against Executive interference and encroachment in this country than in England; that in England the chief executive magistrate is hereditary—here he is elected by the people; and hence the Senator would seem to infer that he should be free from constitutional or legislative restraints. But this very circumstance of the popular election of the Chief Magistrate, in another and more philosophical view of the subject, creates the greater necessity for raising barriers by law against the abuse of his authority; being chosen by the people, he naturally has their sympathies and confidence. They see in him the creature of their power—the reflected image of their sovereignty. They are, therefore, very naturally less disposed to be jealous or distrustful of him, than they would be of an hereditary Chief Magistrate, holding his existence and power independently of their will. On the other hand, the elective Chief Magistrate himself, relying on these natural sympathies and liberal dispositions in the popular mind, would often be tempted to abuse them; and, unless restrained by law, to venture on stretches of influence or authority which an hereditary magistrate, the constant object of public vigilance and jealousy, would be unwilling to risk. Accordingly, one of the most liberal as well as profound political writers of the age, one whom his own countryman (Talleyrand) pronounced to be a second Montesquieu, has remarked in his generally candid view of American institutions, that public officers here are ordinarily "far more independent within their sphere of action than the civil officers of his own country;" and from a reliance on the sympathy and indulgence of the people, whose agents they are, they "sometimes venture on manifestations of their power, which astonish even an European." "By this means," he adds, "habits are formed in the heart of a free country which may one day be fatal to its liberties."

These remarks of De Tocqueville are not made with reference to the President particularly, but are applied to American public officers in general. His book is by far the most favorable view of American institutions that has been presented by any foreign writer; and he holds them up, indeed, for imitation and gradual introduction into Europe, as far as the different circumstances of the Old and the New World will admit. The remark I have quoted from him, therefore, coming from so enlightened and friendly a source, deserves at least the candid consideration of every man who cherishes, and would preserve and perfect, our free popular institutions. It shows that we should not be content with the fact, important as that is, that our principal public officers are chosen by, and are, at fixed periods, responsible to, the people; that every circumstance may embolden them, from a reliance on the sympathies and protection of the people, to venture on unwarrantable excesses. The true security to freedom is to throw up, beforehand, barriers by law against the abuses of power, though it be conferred by the people; and then the responsibility of elective agents will be something real and effectual. "It would be a dangerous delusion," Mr. Jefferson has told us, "were a confidence in the men of our choice to silence our fears for the safety of our rights." "In questions of power, then, let no more be heard of confidence in man, but bind him down from mischief by the chains of the Constitution."*

And yet how often has this siren song about the men of our choice been sung to lull the jealousies of a free people, and to strengthen the arm of delegated power. In this very report of the Senator from New Jersey, the sympathies of the people are constantly invoked on behalf of the office-holders, (whose interference with their most sacred rights is sought to be subjected to some legal restraint,) by being told, in not less than half a dozen doleful passages, that these poor "proscribed officers" are the people's officers—"honored by the choice of confidence of the people!" In like manner, if a measure of the President, deemed dangerous to the liberties and best interests of the country, is opposed, and opposed with effect, the generous feelings of the people are at once appealed to, to come forward and sustain the President of their choice.

From whatever cause it has arisen, whether from that suggested by De Tocqueville, from the operations of party discipline, from the political organization of public officers, or from the prerogatives conferred on the President by the Constitution itself, or from all combined, the fact is undoubtedly true that Executive power has attained a strength and development here which it does not possess at this moment in any other constitutional system existing in the world. In England and in France we know the Executive veto has fallen into total disuse. Here it has become an ordinary and habitual resort. In England and in France, if a measure of the Executive be defeated by the representative branch of the Government, ministers resign, and a new system of administration, accommodated to the views of the Legislature, is formed. Here a favorite measure of the Executive may have been condemned and rejected time after time, and yet it is again and again presented and urged upon the Legislature and the nation without the slightest regard to the repeated manifestations of the opinion of the people and their representatives against it. And, in this very matter of elections, the most vital in a free representative Government, the interference of Executive officers (as was lately, not to speak of other instances, most publicly shown in the two largest cities of the Union) is open, systematic, and undisguised. On no subject is the spirit of liberty in England more jealously awake than on this. Under the administration of Lord North even, the lord lieutenant of a county (an officer appointed by the Crown) having written letters to some of his friends recommending to them the support of the ministerial candidate for Parliament, the matter was promptly brought to the notice of the House of Commons, and the minister showing some disposition to treat the subject rather lightly, the House immediately entered upon their Journals the following indignant rebuke of the minister, and noble vindication of the freedom of elections:

"Resolved, That it is highly criminal for any minister or ministers, or any other servant of the Crown in Great Britain, directly or indirectly, to make use of the power of his office in order to influence the election of members of Parliament; and that an attempt to exercise that influence is an attack upon the dignity, the honor, and the independence of Parliament, an infringement of the rights and the liberties of the people, and an attempt to sap the basis of our free and happy Constitution."

And, yet, if a statement repeated through many of the public journals of the country, and never, so far as I have seen, contradicted, is to be credited, a high executive officer of this Government actively interfered in an important election then pending, by addressing letters to his friends, calling on them, by their fealty to the Administration, to vote against an honorable member of the other House, [Mr. LEGARE,] who, by his short but brilliant career in Congress, has left a bright light on the parliamentary annals of his country, and to whom future times will look back as the model of an accomplished legislator, and of an eloquent and trained statesman. Let the doctrines of the report now under consideration, amounting as they do to a bold justification of these practices, be now sanctioned, and this Executive power already so formidable, reinforced by the organized electioneering activity of the whole corps of office-holders and of numerous auxiliary troops of expectants will be installed in a virtual supremacy over the laws and Constitution of the country.

The author of this report, Mr. President, has sacrilegiously, as he must pardon me for saying, invoked the authority of the Virginia resolutions and report of 1798 and 1799, and has, here and there, strangely perverted their text, to give a semblance of support to his most dangerous doctrines. Now, I take upon myself to say, there never were two documents more thoroughly opposed, in their whole spirit and substance, than this report of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate and the resolutions and report of the Virginia Legislature in 1798-99.

The object and entire drift of the Virginia report and resolutions were to assert the rights of the people as against the Government. The whole scope of the report of the Judiciary Committee is to maintain the alleged rights of the officers of the Government as against the people. The Virginia report and resolutions asserted the right of the people freely to discuss and examine the merits of public men and measures, as the means of subjecting the Government to its just responsibility to the people. This report contends for the right of the officers of the Government to interfere with elections as a means by which the people will be inevitably subjected to the undue influence of the Government.

So far from their being the slightest affinity between the doctrines of this report and those of the Virginia report and resolutions of 1798 and 1799, the identity, on the other hand, in principle and aim, at least, between it and the sedition law, is most striking and instructive. The object of the sedition law, as Mr. Madison tells us in the ever-memorable report of 1799, was to "intrench the Government in penal statutes," and so to control the free exercise of "the electoral rights of the people." The pervading principle and drift of this report is to "intrench the Government" in official influence, and by that means to control the free exercise of "the electoral rights of the people." The Virginia opposition to the sedition law in 1798 and 1799, and the opposition we are now making to the fatal doctrines of this report, in like manner proceed, step by step, on the same lofty and impregnable ground. In the report of 1799 Mr. Madison, its author, emphatically declared that "the right of electing the members of the Government constitutes more particularly the essence of a free and responsible Government;" and it was to shield that "great remedial right of the people" from the terrors of penal legislation that Virginia then interposed her solemn remonstrance. It is from the same sacred appreciation of this "inestimable right," and in order to shield it from a still greater danger, the violation of official interference, that we are now struggling against the alarming doctrines of this report. We shall hear no more then, I trust, Mr. President, of the sacrilegious invocation of the Virginia principles of 1798 and 1799, to give a sanction to the bold and anti-republican heresies of the Senator from New Jersey and of the Judiciary Committee, of which he is the organ.

I will now proceed, Mr. President, to say a word or two, and but a word or two, on the constitutional power of Congress to adopt some measure with a view to restrain the improper interference of Federal officers with elections. I am aware of the difficulty of satisfactory legislation on such a subject, and that it would be a more appropriate matter for Executive supervision. If the President would reissue Mr. Jefferson's circular, prohibiting the interference of Federal officers in elections, under pain of dismission from office, or would carry out and enforce the principle of that circular, I, for one, would be content. But if he will not do so; if, on the contrary, such practices are tolerated, not to say encouraged, is it not competent for Congress to give that principle the sanction and authority of law? My views would not extend beyond that. Cannot Congress, whose power in the creation of public offices is undoubted, also declare on what conditions those offices shall be held? Can they not say by law, that if public officers, whose places are created by them, shall, "contrary to the spirit of the Constitution and their duties under it," (to use the language of Mr. Jefferson's circular,) interfere with the free exercise of the electoral rights of the people, they shall no longer hold their offices, but that such conduct shall be deemed a forfeiture of them? It seems to me, sir, that there would be no stretch of power in this.

But the Senator from New Jersey, in his report, tells us that "Congress have no right to intermeddle by law in prescribing the qualifications of electors;" that the Constitution of the United States declares that members of the House of Representatives "shall be chosen by the people of the States who shall have the qualifications requisite for the electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature;" and, also, that electors of President and Vice President "shall be appointed in such manner as the State Legislatures may direct;" and that the right, therefore, of prescribing the qualifications of electors "belongs exclusively to the States, and is withheld from the Federal Government." But what has all this to do with the question? Has any one proposed to prescribe the qualifications of electors, or, in other words, to deprive office-holders of the right of voting? On the contrary, it is conceded on all hands, according to the terms of Mr. Jefferson's circular, that public officers are not to be deprived of the right of voting; but the object is merely to restrain them from interfering with, or attempting to control or influence, the free exercise of the right of voting by others.

But the report again tells us that this cannot be done without "abridging the freedom of speech and of the press." What does this argument amount to? That you can restrain no act, however dangerous to the peace, morals, or liberties of the country, of which words, spoken or written, may happen to be the vehicle or instrument, because, in restraining the act, you may incidentally put some restraint on the medium or instrument through which the act is done. For example, we have just passed a law prohibiting the giving of a challenge within this District to fight a duel. Now, a challenge can be given only through the medium of words spoken or written, and may be given through words spoken as well as through words written. It follows, then, we have no constitutional power to pass the law we have done for prohibiting challenges within this District to fight a duel, because in doing so, we abridge the freedom of speech! In like manner, bribery and corruption are perpetrated through the medium of words, spoken or written. No law, then, can be passed prohibiting bribery and corruption, because in doing so you abridge the freedom of speech! I will put still another case: could not Congress declare that if any officer of one of its courts, judge, United States attorney, or marshal, should improperly tamper with a jury to influence their verdict in a cause, civil or criminal; depending before them, the officer guilty of such offense should forfeit his office? And yet such tampering would be through the medium of words, and it might be said that in prohibiting it you were "abridging the freedom of speech!" These cases suggest at once the distinction between the sedition law, the "raw head and bloody bones" of which have been flourished so dramatically before our eyes, and such legislation to restrain the improper interference of Federal office-holders with the free electoral rights of the people, as I have supposed might be found to be within the limits of our constitutional powers. In the case of the sedition law, it was the "false, scandalous, and malicious writing," as described in the law, the words themselves, which were the direct and immediate object of legislative restraint; but in the other cases referred to, it is the act (the challenging, the bribery, the tampering, the improper interference) which is sought to be restrained, and the words are but the mere incident of casual accompaniment.

But I will not dwell on these things. I throw them out only for candid consideration. It is no part of my purpose to argue the constitutional question which has been raised. The proposition which I shall submit leaves that open for future and more deliberate investigation. I have a much higher object in view. I desire to obtain, in some form or other, a negation, a solemn disavowal, by an act of the Senate, of the most dangerous and anti-republican doctrines of this report. A majority of this body, by ordering a large number of copies of it to be printed, before it was duly considered, have given—hastily, I would fain believe—a sort of implied sanction to those fatal doctrines. In some way or other, I trust, that sanction may be revoked. If the doctrines of political morality inculcated by this report shall once be recognized and established in this country, the days of American liberty are numbered. Let it be understood and proclaimed—as the doctrines of this report, in effect, proclaimed—that the public trusts of the nation, won in the first instance—if the favorite motto of the "spoils of victory" is to prevail—by party servility, are to be retained by electioneering activity; that partisan service is the required return for office, as office is to be the reward of partisan service, and you lay at once the foundation of the most odious and fatal despotism which the mind of man can conceive of, a sordid party despotism far worse than a military despotism; because, though less fatal to human life, it would be infinitely more destructive to human morals, and to every manly and generous sentiment. Your office-holders, through all the ranks of venality and degradation, would be banded together by one common principle of servility and devotion to their chief; they would vie with each other only in the merit and efficiency of their electioneering services; and amid the din and bustle of the official canvass; of committees, caucuses, and conventions, all organized and directed, secretly or openly, by the agency of office-holders, the voice of the people would be stifled, or, to use the more expressive language of Mr. Jefferson, "smothered by the enormous patronage of the Government." You would have your pretorian bands of office-holders at the Capitol, and your legionary armies of them in the provinces—for your sovereign States would become dependant provinces—who would dispose of the Presidency as absolutely as the pretorian bands and legionary armies of Rome did of the imperial purple.

The forms of your government would still be preserved; but of what avail are the forms without the spirit of free government? A high authority, indeed, has told us "that the greatest masters of tyranny have judged the form without the spirit of a free government more favorable to their schemes of oppression, than all the authority that absolute monarchy can give." Rome, under the debasing despotism of the Cæsars, had still her Senate, and comitia or assemblies of the people; public affairs were, for a long time, still conducted in the name of the Consul, the Censor, the Augur, and the Tribune of the people. The forms of popular elections were still kept up, and the Emperor himself was an elective magistrate. But the spirit of liberty was extinct. "The Senate was sunk in servility, and the servility of the Senate at length infected the mass of the people."

Warned by these examples, it becomes us to keep alive in our bosoms that watchful jealousy of power and that sturdy spirit of freedom which fired the breasts and guided the councils of our glorious ancestors. The doctrines of political morality inculcated in this report, I repeat, Mr. President, are at war with all the cherished principles of our republican fathers; and if they shall once strike root in our soil, they will be fatal to the best hopes of American liberty. You have, hastily and without due consideration, given them an apparent sanction, at least by ordering an unusually large number of copies of the report to be printed for dissemination among the people. Let us now, in some way or other, perform a "solemn lustration," to cleanse ourselves, from the contamination of doctrines at once so hateful and so dangerous. We can do so in no manner more appropriate and more effectual than by a solemn reaffirmation of the principles of Mr. Jefferson in the face of this report. With this view I have prepared a resolution, which, the Senate will perceive, is expressed in the very words of Mr. Jefferson's letter to Governor McKean, and of his memorable circular, (one of the proudest monuments, in my opinion, of his principles and fame,) which commits no one on the constitutional question that has been raised, but leaves that open for the deliberate investigation of a committee, and the future decision of the Senate. I trust, then, that all who profess themselves disciples of the Democratic faith will be happy in having this opportunity afforded them of subscribing their adhesion to the doctrines of him whom the Senator from New Jersey himself has styled "the great apostle of Democracy."

Mr. Rives then submitted the following resolutions:*

Whereas "the constitutional remedy by the elective principle becomes nothing if it may be smothered by the enormous patronage of the General Government: and whereas, also, "freedom of elections is essential to the mutual independence of the State and Federal Governments, and of the different branches of the same Government, so vitally cherished by American institutions:"

Resolved, therefore, That, in the opinion of the Senate, it is highly "improper for officers depending on the Executive of the Union to attempt to control or influence the free exercise of the elective right."

Resolved, also, That measures ought to be adopted by Congress, so far as their constitutional powers may extend, to restrain by law the interference of Federal officers with elections, otherwise than by giving their own votes; and that the report of the Judiciary Committee be committed to a select committee, with instructions to new-model it according to the principles declared in the foregoing preamble and resolutions.

CONDUCT OF THE ADMINISTRATION.

SPEECH OF HON. J. P. KENNEDY,

OF MARYLAND,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 19, 1839.

The bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic service for the year 1839 being under consideration in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the question being on the amendment to strike out the appropriation for the pay of the Commissioners of the Navy,

Mr. KENNEDY said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: When I obtained the floor at the close of the last sitting of the committee, it was not my purpose to address my remarks particularly to the amendment under consideration. I wished to carry the debate into a wider field, and to look at the general condition of affairs under the present Administration.

It seemed to me that both the time and the mode of abolishing the Navy Board, which was the design of this amendment, was singularly inopportune. The House had neither the information proper to its action in this matter, nor the leisure, so near the end of the session, to give the subject the consideration it deserved. The debate itself has disclosed the want of accurate knowledge essential to the just determination of the question, and has demonstrated, I think, the impropriety of acting upon it at the present time. It is true great complaints are abroad against the efficiency of the board, and opinions unfavorable to its continuance are entertained by many judicious persons. I am not insensible to the weight of these opinions, and incline, in advance of all inquiry, to think that the duties assigned to the board might be more advantageously discharged under individual supervision. As a practical rule, I would rather intrust to a single head those functions which require much energy and judgment for their performance, than to any board, no matter how intelligent. Still, sir, this is a question of experience; and I should be loth, on the instant, to assail an organization which has been in existence for twenty years, without the amplest investigation and advice. I am glad to see that the House has fallen into this opinion. The resolution submitted by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MALLORY] this morning, and adopted by the House, referring this question to the Secretary for a formal report at the next session, indicates a design to act only upon full information, and for the present, must dispose of the amendment.

I concur, Mr. Chairman, in the remark which fell from the venerable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] that much of the complaint which has been raised against the Commissioners of the Navy would, perhaps, upon examination, be found to lie more justly at the door of the head of the Navy Department—even, perchance, of the President himself. It seldom happens in a well-ordered Government that the subordinates fail to perform their duty when they have an efficient head. The Navy has been sadly in want of direction for the last four or five years. No branch of the Administration has been so much left to chance, or to the guidance of a feeble hand; and it is, therefore, not to be wondered that complaints should be rife against the management of this department of the service throughout all its branches. Something, sir, of the common discontent which is said to exist against the board is due to this cause.

I still more cordially agree with the remark of the same honorable gentleman to whom I have just alluded, that a thorough examination of each and all of the Departments of the Government would lead to results eminently beneficial to the public welfare. Never was there an Administration, in this country at least, or perhaps in any other, more likely to reward the toil of those who should devote themselves to an investigation of its doings. From the glimpses of abuse with which we have occasionally been favored, we may infer a great amount of concealed malversation.

Sir, we know nothing of the real condition of the Departments but from these glimpses. The people are permitted to learn only by accident the state of the Administration concerns. Now and then some pampered favorite of "the party"—some conspicuous and much-trusted friend of the ruling power—perpetrates a larceny and flies—and the fact, too notorious for concealment, bursts on the public view; now and then a defaulting sub-treasurer grows contumacious to the reiterated supplications and prayers of the Secretary, and prefers exposure, with its profits, to settlement and the smiles of the chief—and thus, again, the people are indulged with a development; now and then, upon the calls of this House, in flagrant cases, which not even party hardihood can brave, some reluctant confession, beyond the art of stratagem to evade, is vouchsafed to the nation—and we again get glimpses of the truth.

Conduct of the Administration—Mr. Kennedy.

Ho. of Reps.

It seems, indeed, sir, to be a premeditated plan of "the party" in this House to resist, upon various pretexts, these calls for information touching the conduct of the Departments in matters where abuse may be supposed to exist. It is now six weeks since I myself—having reason to believe that some irregularity, at least, some extravagance, perhaps, or some favoritism, existed in the manner in which the supplies of articles, not enumerated or reported in the yearly published contracts, were furnished to the different navy-yards—submitted a resolution to call on the Secretary for information as to the prices at which these articles had been procured during the past year. It did not enter into my thoughts, when I submitted that resolution, to charge any officer of the Government with intentional abuse. I knew nothing calculated to awaken suspicion, except that very extravagant prices were alleged to have been paid; and I did not doubt that the House, respecting the obvious motive of the call, and acknowledging its propriety, would have treated it as an ordinary movement of sound and wholesome legislation; that the call would have been granted, sir, as a matter of course. Yet it was refused; not by a direct vote, but by a refusal to suspend the rules, as if the House could not afford the time from other business for this light matter. I renewed my motion day after day, praying the House to grant me this favor. Other resolutions were taken up and passed by the suspension of the rules almost every morning of the session; mine was always refused, and refused at every trial by mere party votes. I found, very early, that the proposition excited uneasiness amongst some prominent friends of the Administration. I was even informed that, by a private application to the Secretary, I might procure the information I wished; whilst those who suggested this either voted against my resolution, or refused to vote at all. Such an opposition to an ordinary inquiry, as I deemed it, could not but excite suspicions against the integrity of the management of that branch of service to which it referred. During the pendency of this question, I have received letters from different quarters, which assure me that great and flagrant abuse will be found in the distribution of these unpublished contracts, whenever the Administration shall be disposed to favor the people with a knowledge of its own proceedings.

An honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Underwood] has fared no better than myself. He offered, some days ago, a resolution for inquiry into the mode in which supplies are furnished to the army in Florida. He, too, has been denied that information by a party vote. The absurd rule that requires two thirds of the House to agree to take up such resolutions for consideration, has, in both of these cases, enabled the Administration party on this floor, although in a minority, to frustrate our endeavors to learn something of the transactions of the Government in the matters to which they referred. It is apparent that we may indulge but little hope, during the present organization of this House, to penetrate into the secrets of the Administration; but the time, I would fain believe, is not very remote when a searching inspection of this hidden machinery may no longer be parried by the tactics of party. Another year, and this duty will fall into the hands of those who, whatever may be their imputed want of qualification in other respects, will not be charged, even by their enemies, with a suspected favor or affection for the delinquents. The fruits of such an examination cannot be other-wise than wholesome.

From this investigation, Mr. Chairman, whenever it shall be undertaken, I am not unprepared to expect the disclosure of flagrant errors and misdeeds in the management of the public concerns. The calm, impartial judgment of the country rests with a deep and melancholy consciousness upon such an expectation; nay, sir, even the friends of the predominant power itself are alarmed by it, and writhe under it. The errors of this Administration are the necessary products of that state of things which brought it into power. Its misdo-ing is not less its misfortune than its fault—attributable in as large a degree to its want of sagacity as to its evil inclinations: it is the natural offspring of INCAPACITY.

It is now just ten years since the elevation to the presidential chair of the most remarkable man of our times; remarkable as much for the intrinsic properties of his character, as for the singular good fortune that attended him through life. The era of his election to the Presidency was once called the ERA OF REFORM. Some still affect to call it by that name. To my mind it is chiefly memorable as the commencement of a great delusion—an imposture conducted with no ordinary ability, and propagating its principles by troops of political Islamites as fervent, as obsequious, and as numerous as the faithful who swarmed beneath the grotesque banner of the eastern prophet. Ten years have gone by since that eventful epoch—ten long years of various fortune, in which, if the happiness of the American people has not been increased, we may confidently affirm that large and valuable additions have been made to their experience. The occasion afforded by the discussions of this committee is appropriate to a survey of this field of experience; and I propose, sir, chiefly to direct my remarks to that end.

No one can forget how peculiarly felicitous to his own fame, and how eminently favorable to the hopes of the country were the circumstances under which General Jackson was first presented to this nation as a candidate for the Presidency. The men of the Revolution were gone; the field was crowded with aspirants; and the capital had become the seat of numberless intrigues, or—what was practically the same thing—was suspected to be so. In the perplexity of the public mind, and its misgivings lest the popular will should have less to do with the adjustment of this question than the secret management of leaders, there was a sudden uprising of the great mass of the nation to take the selection of the Chief Magistrate out of the hands of the politicians, and preserve it in their own. They chose their candidate in the great military favorite of the day, even while he himself (it was at that time believed) was innocent of all thought of such an honor. General Jackson's imputed moderation of political sentiment; his freedom from party trammels, so signally proclaimed in that famous correspondence with Mr. Monroe; his extreme lenity and kindness towards the old Federal party; his unbounded personal popularity, founded on meritorious military service, his alleged honesty and directness of character, and his boasted knowledge of men—all contributed to give him a position of irresistible command, and to more than compensate for that want of statesmanship and political science which even his nearest friends admitted. With these ascribed qualities of character, he rallied around him not only the largest support of the people, but the aid of the most powerful talents in the nation. It was said—and no doubt it was true—that, in the event of his election, he might have called to the public service a combination of the greatest ability and influence which the country afforded.

At that time (I speak of the canvass of 1823-24) we heard nothing of REFORM. The country asked no reform; it needed none. The administration of Mr. Monroe had given universal satisfaction, and the people did not doubt the integrity of their public functionaries.

At the first moment of the defeat of General Jackson's election in the House of Representatives, opposition was declared against the Administration that was to succeed—fierce, unsparring, relentless opposition. It was not directed against measures, nor even against men; but was a premeditated, foreawowed hostility to each and every adherent of that Administration, and to each and every measure it should propose. Its basis was the vindication of the alleged violation of the popular will in the choice that had been made; and the new incumbent, it was profanely declared in this Capitol, should be assailed in his administration, even though that administration should be "pure as the angels at the right hand of God." The opposition, therefore, to Mr. Adams looked to no reform. Indeed, sir, in point of principle and policy, the administration of the venerable gentleman who now sits before me was identical with that of his predecessor. It adopted the same measures; rested on the same general doctrines; was, like it, economical, cautious, and conciliatory; and was sustained, and even administered, by almost the same men. What was there in it to provoke a zeal for reform?

Sir, if the nation had desired a reform, it would not have selected General Jackson. Whatever great qualities it was usual to ascribe to him, all would have conceded that he had neither the coolness of temper, the knowledge, nor the experience essential to the composition of that character. Still, however, as the second canvass approached, it fell in with the views of the party leaders, that an impression should be made of something rotten in the State, and through this opinion to enlist an opposition on the basis of reform. With this design, committees were raised in both Houses of Congress to inquire into abuses. They made their reports with ominous denunciations, and—I think, sir, in view of what has transpired since, we may now say—with a ludicrous exaggeration of sundry very pitiful complaints. The search after abuse, notwithstanding all that was made of it at the time, we may fairly admit was a distinguished failure. The scheme, however, served its turn, and General Jackson was all at once metamorphosed, or rather magnified into the Great Reformer.

This movement accomplished a double purpose. It spread abroad a false opinion of great corruption in the existing Government, and offered an acceptable flattery to the chief. It gave him a position of peculiar veneration with the people. His election was heralded as a coming glory—a mission of political regeneration—and he was looked upon, in some sort, as a predestined instrument of national blessing. He was proclaimed "the Reformer," par excellence; and—in the very novel and classical phrase of the stump-orators from Maine to Missouri—came, as a second Hercules, to sweep out the great Augean stable of the Government. It was then, sir, a favorite theme to declaim against the abuse of patronage, and the servility of the press; we often heard of the extravagance of the Administration, and of the loose supervision of the Treasury. The party evolutions of that date, the congressional reports and speeches, the newspaper dissertations, all bear evidence to the flood of patriotic and virtuous horror which burst forth from the bosoms of the reformers at the profligacy of the Government, in adding sixty or eighty thousand dollars to the national expenditure, and allowing $1,900 to Mr. Pleasants for his expenses as bearer of dispatches to Rio!

In the same tone of feeling, and in accordance with the design of the authors of the movement, General Jackson lost no time, after his election, to communicate the great purport of his newly-conceived mission, with every solemnity which official authority could throw around it. The portentous words were spoken in the inaugural from the portico of this Capitol—

"The recent demonstration of public sentiment inscribes on the list of Executive duties, in characters too legible to be overlooked, THE TASK OF REFORM; which will require particularly the correction of those abuses which have brought the patronage of the General Government in conflict with the freedom of elections, and the counteraction of those causes which have disturbed the rightful course of appointment, and have placed or continued power in unfaithful or incompetent hands."

Soon after this oracular, and, to the great body of the country, startling announcement, we were made acquainted with the specific abuses to which this pruning-knife of reform was to be chiefly and most industriously applied. The regular annual message, at the opening of the first Congress under the new Administration, is full of the grand design. This paper was matured in an interval of leisure; it was skillfully and carefully composed, and may be deemed the authoritative rescript of reform. It professes to emit the light wherein the Administration was to walk; and to lay down the map of its great working plan. In that document you shall find the President's mind occupied with four prominent reforms, which are treated as cardinal in the creed of freedom—indispensable to the existence of pure government, not less than vital to the cause of republicanism. I will not stop, sir, to read more than a few passages from this message; but I invite members, at their leisure, to give the whole of it a careful perusal. Its meditated reforms are,

1. In the mode of electing the President, and his reëligibility to office—the plan recommended being to "remove all immediate agency (of the electoral college and House of Representatives) in the election of the President and Vice President," and "in connection with such an amendment, to limit the service of the Chief Magistrate to a single term of either four or six years."

2. In the disqualification of members of Congress for office, at the appointment of the President, in whose election they may have been officially concerned.

3. In the principle of appointing to office, in the language of the message, "solely for the benefit of the people," and, "by a general extension of the law which limits appointments to four years," "to lessen the liability of encumbering the Government with men who cannot, "for any length of time, enjoy office and power without being more or less under the influence of feelings unfavorable to the faithful discharge of the public duties," and

4. To establish a strict accountability in the public servants, and a rigid supervision of the Treasury; in reference to which the attention of Congress was invited to the inquiry as to "what offices might be dispensed with, what expenses retrenched, and what improvements might be made in the organization of its various parts, to secure the proper responsibility of public agents; and promote efficiency and justice in all its operations."

Now, sir, there is the chart of reform. Good and wholesome reforms, Mr. Chairman, each and all of them! I supported them then: I would support them now. The whole nation—I mean the whole body of the governed, as distinguished from those who govern—would have sustained these improvements or changes at that day, as I have no doubt they would at this, if the proposition were submitted to them.

Well, sir, what became of all these amendments in our domestic polity? Ten years have passed over, and during all that time the reformers have had unlimited control of the Government. Is there a man on this floor who will say that General Jackson could not have carried any measure that he deemed essential to the honor and glory of his administration, or to the welfare of the nation? Did he want power to achieve his plans of administration? Was he not backed by his friends—ay, and by the large majorities of the country—in whatever scheme he indulged for the public good? Was not his honor, his faith, his reputation, pledged to these reforms? Was he not glorified by all his banded presses when he proposed them? Turn to the newspapers of December, 1829, and read how, from city to city, village to village, to every hamlet and cabin, the tide of gratulation and panegyric rolled forward to the magnifying of the Great Reformer. Now, sir, of these four conspicuous, cardinal reformations, which was achieved? Not one—not one!

Achieved! not only were they not achieved, but the whole current of the President's power, all his practice, his precept, his policy, from Alpha to Omega, set directly, and of deliberation aforethought, against this whole scheme of reform. He was not merely indifferent to it, careless in enforcing it, sluggish or preoccupied with other matter, but he grew to be, in a very brief space of time, distinctly and actively hostile to it. He wrought no change in the mode of electing the President; and so far from limiting his service to a single term, (which he might have done as efficiently by example as by law,) he actually electioneered through the country for a second choice; and, if report be true, as I believe it is, franked with his own hand the letter of his own secretary soliciting his renomination to the Presidency from the Legislature of Pennsylvania.

Holding Executive favor, as he did, to be so unfriendly to the free and faithful discharge of the duty of the representative, he might at least have been sparing in the selection of members of Congress for office. And yet, sir, upon an enumeration of his appointments, it will be found that no President had ever dealt so largely in the stock of corruption. Nay, sir, I think I am warranted in saying (I have not cast it up arithmetically) that General Jackson raised more members of Congress to office than all the Presidents before him together had done since the adoption of the Constitution.

Then, as to his pretended reform of the principle of appointment; and his doctrine that office was to be filled solely for the common good; public employment became, under his auspices, notoriously the mere prize of party service. Never, until General Jackson's day, did partisan effrontery rise into such matchless contempt of the decencies of public observance as to make open proclamation that office was the spoil of victory, and belonged of right to the conquerors. Never, until his day, was the Post Office, with its countless servitors, seized upon as the instrument of political success. Yet he did it without a blush, and has turned its whole artillery back upon the people to batter down their independence. He would have done the same with the bank, but that he found that citadel too strong to be assailed, and too firm to be seduced; to which fact may be traced that malignant and absurd war which constitutes both the chief exploit and deepest disgrace of his administration.

His greater accountability of the public servants; his guardianship of the public treasure—what are they? A jest. The Treasury has been almost emptied by the larcenies of the chief ministers of the law; and at this day the friends of the men in power are heaping upon our tables piles of bills to guard them against the felonies of their political brethren, vainly attempting to cast upon the law the irregularities that have grown out of their neglect, or their incapacity to administer it.

Thus ends this farce of reform! It has sunk into insignificance; it has left no memory behind it but that of a hypocritical and wicked fraud—a trick of imposture—a thing to juggle with. As a scheme of amendment; it was a ridiculous abortion; as a device of party tactics; it was below contempt. The august patron of pure government, the conservator of the public morals, the predestined and foreannounced reformer of a backsliding generation, has been overmatched by the seductions of Satan, and has fallen into communion with the unclean thing. He has even trafficked in the great and the small iniquities which he came to denounce.

Mr. Chairman, whilst, from this view of the movement to which I have referred, it is evident that General Jackson has been singularly unlucky as a reformer, I will not deny to him a reputation quite as prominent, and infinitely more mischievous—that of an innovator; for innovator he was, in the broadest and worst sense.

His administration was one of ceaseless change; change, sometimes stealing along in noiseless advance, sometimes bursting forth in bold, open-day achievement; one while sweeping with the breath of spring, at another with the rage and havoc of the tornado. We had ever change of men, change of measures, change of principles. The pervading characteristic of that most anomalous and extraordinary administration was mutation—uncertainty—experiment. It lived in perpetual motion, defying all hope of repose; it rejoiced in turmoil, and reveled in paradox. Those who followed it were forever ignorant of their whereabouts; they knew no rest for the soles of their feet; they traveled over quicksands. The idea of political consistency never entered the President's head; he had no perception of the meaning of the term. His idol was his popularity, and whatever sustained that constituted the theory of his conduct. It was his boast, his glory, his perpetual aim. His dream was popularity, his motive was popularity, his defense was popularity. Not that popularity which submissively trails after the public will, and humbly essays to do the public bidding; nor that nobler motive which studies the country's good, and, by an assiduous devotion to the duties of station, seeks the applause of its own conscience and the approbation of virtuous men; but a domineering, wayward, arrogant popularity—an impatient, hectoring assumption of the right to lead, which repudiates all law, despises all observance, and maintains its supremacy by personal and party force.

In General Jackson, his popularity was the means by which he increased his power; and his power was used, in turn, to enlarge his popularity. With consummate skill (for I do not deny to him great foresight and management) he turned all the resources of his position to the strengthening of this, his most cherished attribute. The very boldness of his designs seemed to fascinate the public admiration: he dazzled the popular mind by that fearlessness which we were, for a time, accustomed to interpret as a proof of his honesty and uprightness of purpose. Least of all men, was he suspected of dissimulation; and yet I am persuaded a more skillful dissembler never occupied high station in our country. He flattered the people with the address of a practiced courtier; startled and amused them by the thunderclaps of his policy, identified his success with the gratification of their favorite passions, grappled himself with wonderful adroitness to the predominant sentiments, wishes, and prejudices, of the great and massive majority, and became a monarch, an autocrat, by the sheer concentration of republican suffrage.

This power he wielded with a stern and inexorable temper of proscription against all who did not bow down to his authority, and worship him as the embodiment, the incarnation, of the popular sovereignty. He was the fountain of honor, the arbiter of disgrace, holding the political fortunes and hopes of his followers at his own capricious disposal. The most indulgent of friends, the most ruthless of enemies, there was no delinquency of the one that he could not overlook; there was no offense in the other so trivial that, when occasion offered, he would not visit it with vindictive punishment. He who could not only tolerate, but sustain, protect, and reward the troops of greedy parasites, the defaulters, the public plunderers, that thronged his hall in the guise of friends—men, some of whom were notorious for the derangement of their official accounts; could, nevertheless, pursue with unprecedented animosity an unwary trespasser upon the Government treasure—a small defaulter of some three thousand dollars—and, for years, delight himself with the sufferings of his victim. He could continue to heap upon this man fresh indignity, disgrace, and pain; even beyond a rigorous judicial sentence, until the humanity of the nation at last revolted, and cried out, "for shame!" This could he do, because the unfortunate subject of his wrath had, in an evil hour, ventured to exercise the privilege of a free citizen, and express, in a public journal, his disapprobation of the measures, and his doubts of the political integrity of the imperial republican chief.

With such a temper, and such power in the Executive, what considerate citizen of this land had not motive to pause, and look with distrust and fear to the future? Sir, the events that have taken place under that rule have fully justified the worst forebodings of those who watched its progress. A great and vicious revolution was accomplished in the character of this Government—one which shall render the name of its author forever famous in our annals.

General Jackson's first term was occupied in the practice of those arts by which his popularity was extended and confirmed. It was a period of preparation and marshaling of forces. No one who reads the history of that period, in the Executive communications and in the official press commentaries of the day, will fail to be struck with the extreme profession of reverence for the popular will which everywhere speaks in the language or breathes in the spirit of these emanations from the Chief Magistrate. Some such declarations as the following ever meet the eye in the perusal of these papers:

"I regard an appeal to the source of power, in all cases of real doubt, and when its exercise is deemed indispensable to the general welfare, as amongst the most sacred of all obligations."—Message of 1829.

"I know no tribunal to which a public man in this country, in a case of doubt and difficulty, can appeal with greater advantage or more propriety than the judgment of the people."—Message of 1830.

The frequent reiteration of such sentiments could not but inspire confidence and trust in the Executive amongst all those, especially, whose preconceived opinion of the President's uprightness prepared them to indulge the kindest feelings towards his success. This constant recurrence to the source of power was a gentle flattery, well contrived to put the people off their guard. It has ever been the trick of ambition, from the days of Cæsar to our own. With all this display of respect for the popular will, no man ever held that will in greater contempt, when it came in conflict with his own, than the late President. Sir, if you desire the proof of it, you shall find it not only in the heady current of his life, but in that battle with the legislative power which marked his career; his perpetual veto of the representative action in the internal improvement bills, the bank bill, the land bill—all forbidden in the face of large majorities of the direct representatives of the people—notoriously in the face of the popular judgment and wish of the day. You shall see it in the famous removal of the deposits; in the refusal to restore them; in that high-handed measure of holding back the land bill when it was known that two thirds of both Houses would have passed it in spite of the veto; and, above all other acts of contumacy to public opinion and popular will—the cap-sheaf of his waywardness—his pocketing, as it has been significantly termed, of the bill for the repeal of the Treasury circular.

Sir, it was this hostility to popular control that led General Jackson to that systematic assault upon the structure of this Government which I have termed a revolution, and which ended only in the subversion of some of the most important principles of the Constitution. His scheme was to enlarge the Executive power and to depress the legislative. In the Executive power he saw and felt the source of unlimited popularity; in the legislative he was aware of a constant, jealous guardianship against encroachment, that restricted his footsteps to a path in which he had no patience to walk. The one was the parent of patronage, reward, and partisan alliance; the other a surly warder of popular rights, whose appropriate duty lay in curbing the excurive spirit of an ambitious chief.

I have said, sir, that General Jackson's first term was employed in marshaling his forces. His second is distinguished by the developments of his skill in using them. Immediately after his reelection, a principle of vast import and significance was announced to the country, with all the authority which an Executive communication could confer upon it. The scope of this principle was to set Congress at defiance by assuming for the Executive, not only an independence of the Legislature, but even a superiority over it. It was declared that the President was the representative of the American people—coequal with the legislative power, accountable to the people and not to Congress for its acts.

And a corollary was deduced from this that the elections, being appeals to the people, were to be interpreted as expositions of the public judgment in favor of the great representative chief, and were to be taken as confirmations of all his acts, principles, and opinions.

"It will be for those in whose behalf we all act," says the President, in his first message after his reelection, when giving his reasons for setting aside the decision of the House of Representatives in favor of retaining the deposits in the bank, "to decide whether the executive department of the Government, in the steps which it has taken on this subject, has been found in the line of its duty."

In that appeal to the people, against Congress, is the first dawn of this new theory of Executive power. It was more fully announced afterwards, in the famous "protest" of April following.

"The President," it is there declared, "is the direct representative of the American people." And, again:

"The legislative power, subject to the qualified negative of the President, is vested in the Congress of the United States, composed of the Senate and House of Representatives. The executive power is vested exclusively in the President, except that, in the conclusion of treaties and in certain appointments to office, he is to act with the advice and consent of the Senate. The judicial power is vested exclusively in the Supreme and other courts of the United States, except in cases of impeachment, for which purpose the accusatory power is vested in the House of Representatives, and that of hearing and determining in the Senate. But although, for the special purposes which have been mentioned, there is an occasional intermixture of the powers of the different departments, yet, with these exceptions, each of the three great departments is independent of the others in its sphere of action, and, when it deviates from that sphere, is not responsible to the others further than it is expressly made so by the Constitution. In every other respect, each of them is the coequal of the other two, and all are servants of the American people, without power or right to control or censure each other in their service of their common superior, save only in the manner and to the degree which that superior has prescribed."—Protest, April, 1834.

The President having thus assumed a position which enabled him to defy the inspection or control of the Legislature; having thus exempted himself from all accountability—except in the impracticable form of impeachment—to the Representatives of the nation, and invested himself with an undefined and hitherto unheard-of pretension to the character of a direct supreme, national representative, his next step was to strengthen his vantage-ground by defenses that should, with no less efficacy, exempt the subordinate functionaries, through whom his measures were carried into effect, from their supposed accountability to the legislative power. It was very evident that the Executive had gained but half a conquest while its agents were exposed to that supervision of the Legislature which might frighten them from their party allegiance to their chief. To protect them against this supervision required a still broader pretension than the last, and thence arose that famous doctrine of Executive unity and responsibility which figures so conspicuously in the promulgation of the new creed of the second term. In this creed, the Executive is a unit, and in the President alone rests all the responsibility. The officers of Government are but the creations of his will; the agents for the performance of his duty; accountable to him, and to no one else. I read, sir, again, from the protest:

"By the Constitution, the Executive power is vested in the President of the United States. Among the duties imposed upon him, and which he is sworn to perform, is that of taking care that the laws be faithfully executed. Being thus made responsible for the entire action of the Executive department, it was but reasonable that the power of appointing, overseeing, and controlling those who execute the laws—a power in its nature executive—should remain in his hands."

And once more, in the same paper:

"The whole Executive power being vested in the President, who is responsible for its exercise, it is a necessary consequence that he should have a right to employ agents of his own choice to aid him in the performance of his duties, and to discharge them when he is no longer willing to be responsible for their acts."

True to this theory of executive duty and power, and very distinctly, sir, to my mind, denoting its parentage, we have seen, on a late occasion, the Postmaster General favoring the country with a practical commentary upon its meaning. I will beg to read a passage from his answer to the application for a mandamus in the case of Stockton & Stokes:

"The executive is a unity. The framers of the Constitution had studied history too well to impose on the country a divided executive. The executive power was vested in a President. The executive officers are his agents, for whom he is held responsible by the people, whose agent he is. The acts of the executive officers are the acts of the President. Constitutionally he is as responsible for them as if they were done by himself, though not morally."

Now, sir, it is evident that this accountability of the subordinate officers of this Government to the President is altogether incompatible with their responsibility to the National Legislature, or even with their liability to be inspected or examined by that Legislature. All responsibility is converged upon the President, and he being, according to the theory, the representative of the people, is accountable only to them, and not to his mere coequal—or, more properly speaking, in the spirit of these assumptions, his inferior—the legislative body, composed as it is of but fragment representations of that same people.

When we add, Mr. Chairman, to all these pretensions that kindred claim with which this nation was so familiar in the palmy days of Jacksonism—the claim to interpret the laws as the President understood them, without respect to judicial authority, legislative exposition, or prescriptive usage, but solely as the Chief Magistrate's green and ripe judgment, his passion or his intellect might suggest—when we add this pretension to the rest, we have a scheme of power so comprehensive for every purpose of misrule and corruption as to leave the most absolute cravings of despot ambition nothing to desire in the construction of the framework of a Government that might crush every principle of freedom in our Constitution worth contending for. The wit of man could not devise a plan of encroachment upon regulated liberty more insidious, progressive, and, finally, more sure to end in absolutism than this I have so cursorily brought into review. Based upon an imperious popularity, (for no President but one so armed with the people's devotion could have advanced a step in this perilous career,) it assumes for the Executive, successively—first, a representative character, coequal with, and independent of, the Legislature; then, a right to regard the result of the elections as a popular ratification of Executive conduct; then, a constructive and exclusive responsibility for all subordinate officers; and, finally, the independent interpretation of the laws. The result of all is, to give to this republican nation a Chief Magistrate of more power and less real responsibility, of broader range for mischievous ambition, and greater capacity for harm, than may be found in any constitutional monarch of modern times. Sir, these doctrines have sprung out of the very insolence of power; they are the land-marks which trace the victory of the proud chief over the rights and laws of a subdued country—

"Till conquest unresisted ceased to please,
And rights submitted left him none to seize."

These assumptions, Mr. Chairman, were not mere political abstractions. They were active elements in all the workings of the late Administration. They constituted the machinery by which the grossest abuses in this Government were engendered and screened from the observation of the public eye. To them may be traced that abundant fruit of corruption which is now just beginning to show its hideous rottenness. Let any one turn back to the history of "the investigation," as it is called—"the concealment" would be its better name—of 1837. There let him read the President's refusal to answer interrogatories as to the condition of the Departments, and his claim to be exempted from question unless specific charges were exhibited. Let him reflect upon the President's arrogant arraignment of members of this House for their freedom of speech in the debate that preceded the appointment of the committee; the order to the Cabinet officers to disregard the mandate of the committee, and the consequent refusal to answer; the claim to protection from this examination set up by the President and his Cabinet, upon the plea of privilege against self-inculpation; the personal immunity asserted by them against the search for papers; and finally the impudent defiance of the committee by the Postmaster General. Let any man turn to these proceedings, so recent, so vivid in the recollection of the nation, and he will at once be able to trace out the impression of this new political philosophy on every feature of that remarkable incident.

It will be remembered, too, sir, that these doctrines are altogether of recent date—the coinage of the last Administration. Never before, in the history of this Government, have they been asserted in theory or developed in practice. They are utterly without precedent or color of former example. As I have said, sir, they owed their origin to the necessities of General Jackson's scheme of administration—a scheme whose fatal aim was the prostration of every department of this Government before the Executive. It is curious to note, in the progress of this revolution, with what confidence its great author trusted to the force of profession, when it was necessary to blind the people against the perception of his real designs, and how little trouble he gave himself to reconcile this profession with his practice. There was no sentiment which was paraded more ostentatiously before the public eye by the President, than the declaration of his extreme scruple against the exercise of doubtful powers. There is scarcely a State paper of his day that does not repeat the admonition against this easy sin of questionable power, as the first and gravest to be deprecated. As if the President were conscious that his temper, and the habits of his past life, might lay him open to the suspicion of this sin, he is careful to denigrate it with a peculiar abhorrence. Now, sir, it will be found that there has been scarce a power under our Constitution, which, in the course of fifty years' administration, has been held doubtful, that General Jackson has not either exercised, or assumed the right to exercise, without hesitation. He expressed his willingness to charter a national bank; and would have done so, as he declared, if the plan had been conformable to certain views which he disclosed; he signed bills for internal improvements; he constantly used the veto, on more questions of expediency, where no constitutional objection was pretended; he has held back a bill from Congress, when two-thirds of each House would have voted for it; in the case of the specie circular, he refused to return the bill altogether; he has appointed to office, after his nominee has been rejected by the Senate; he removed the deposits upon a plea of constitutional responsibility, when the officer to whom the law specially intrusted them had refused; he has denied to Congress the right to inspect the Departments, unless that inspection were directed to previously specified charges of abuse. I do not pretend to say, Mr. Chairman, that some of the powers to which these acts refer may not be lawfully and beneficially exercised by the Executive—I believe they may, sir—but every one will admit that they may be all ranked amongst that class of doubtful powers upon which great contrariety of opinion has existed in this country; and I allude to the action of the late President in reference to them, only by way of contrast between his profession and his practice, and to show how little scrupulous he was as to constitutional restraints, when it suited his purpose to transcend them.

The adoption, Mr. Chairman, of such principles as I have described, and the administration of the Government in accordance with them, are altogether sufficient to explain any amount of official delinquency which has been, or may hereafter be, discovered. Such a system, by converting the powers of the Government into a party engine, could not fail to breed up an army of partisan zealots, such as we have seen—rude, rapacious, and selfish. It could not fail to lower the estimate of public virtue, to debauch the public morals, and to fill the land with greedy hunters after "the spoils." It could not fail to engender nests of demagogues, of every order and degree—from the fustian ranters at a tippling shop, up to the all-sufficient oracle of Jacobin philosophy in the Senate—or to the more shrewd and cunning fomenter of base prejudices and passions in the Cabinet. Yes, sir, even higher still—to the popularity-engrossing chief himself. It has already done all this, and more. The favor of Government has become a prize to be won by adulation and compliance, and, as a necessary consequence, the meanest man ever bears away the reward. Public office is to be obtained only by that subserviency which no honorable man can condescend to yield; it therefore inevitably falls into the hands of the worst. Good men fly from the association of the Executive. Sir, it is remarkable that General Jackson's administration could never retain about it men of preëminent ability; it was not their sphere. They fled from it in squadrons. Even the ties of friendly association in the Cabinet could not be preserved beyond a year at a time. President Jackson made as many ghosts as Richard:

"Where is Clarence?
Where is the gentle Rivers, Vaughan, Gray?
Where the kind Hastings?"

I may ask, where is Berrien, Branch, Ingham? Where Duane, McLane, and other early friends of the chief? Gone, sir! immolated by that spirit which endured no free opinion. Not only from the presence of the chief himself did they fly, but in every department of the service the talent of the nation deserted him. From the earliest era of that rule, down to the present day, every election has successively lowered the scale of ability by which the reigning power is sustained; until, at last, it is apparent that the party in possession of the Government is soon likely to be without that modicum of talent which, even at this moment, so scantily suffices for the small vindication, on this floor, of its own small merits.

Sir, the baleful influence of the last Administration was not confined to the character of the public men with which it was surrounded; it might be traced through almost every department of society. We lived in the midst of convulsions. The public taste was vitiated and fed by the stimulus of constantly recurring political eruptions; it delighted in strange conjunctures—the heavings and spasms of that capricious power which displayed itself in such fantastic action at the capital. A spirit of insubordination, of misrule, and riot became diffused through the community. Wild and visionary theories of political duty were disseminated abroad, and showed themselves in the most mischievous forms in the proceedings of the State Legislatures. The most abstruse and difficult problems of political economy—questions of currency, finance, constitutional power—were summarily but most authoritatively disposed of by the shallowest pretenders to statesmanship; and the oldest and best institutions of the country attacked and beaten down by political charlatans. Knowledge, deliberation, experience, all were obliged to give way to this newly-inspired intuition; and the greatest pains were taken by party leaders and demagogues to deceive the people into the belief that the profoundest questions of government might be consigned to the decision of men of the lowest scale of qualification in political science. Abroad and odious line of distinction was drawn between the rich and the poor; and where mutual dependence and interest should have engendered kind feelings, harmony, and brotherhood, the seeds of ill-will and hatred were deeply sown.

In obedience to the same influence, the Government press became a mere engine of slander—the fabricator of palpable and gross falsehood. Everything that transpired in the Government was distorted by its light. What, in its vocabulary, was called public opinion, was but the reverberation of its own false clamor. The people were systematically abused, cheated, and betrayed by its monstrous counterfeits—juggled and duped by the type fiend. The coherence of "the party" required an organized plan of misrepresentation; the existence of the Administration required it. It had risen by it, and was maintained by it. It could not have subsisted a month if the people could have heard the truth. It would have withered in the light and crumbled into dust. The whole atmosphere in which it breathed was false; the element upon which it lived was deception; its popularity, its power, its duration, depended on the essential condition of blinding the people. It lived and moved and had its being in the universal, inextinguishable, everlasting lie.

Whilst this was the action of that Administration upon the morals of the nation, its measures were no less physically hurtful to the public interest. They were hurtful from the same causes that rendered its principles vicious. They were ever dictated by selfish passion, and characterized by that domineering temper which I have before described as the distinctive impulse of the Administration.

The President's vanity and thirst for applause rendered him eagerly and rashly precipitate to pay off the public debt. All other interests were compelled to give place to the achievement of the glory of wiping away that debt during the term of his political supremacy.

His hatred, or, rather, his defiance and impatience, of the fame of one man, (Mr. Biddle,) caused him to make war upon the bank.

His personal animosity to another distinguished individual (Mr. CLAY) induced him to veto the land bill.

To these three measures, proceeding from the egotism and vain-gloriousness of the President, may be traced the chief maladies of the times. To them may be traced, in succession, the overthrow of internal improvements, the accumulation of the surplus, the distribution, the paper system, the hard-money experiment, the suspension, the wide-spread bankruptcy, and, finally, the enormous and unexampled speculation upon the public treasure.

I do not stop, sir, to expatiate upon the sequence of these events, nor to indicate more minutely their connection with each other, and with the leading measures to which I have referred them. I am sure, now that we may calmly look back to the whole train of our past disasters, the impartial judgment of the country will be at no loss to assign them to the causes I have enumerated. They will be ever accounted, sir, by the reflecting portion of our citizens, the bitter fruits of Jacksonism.

When General Jackson came into power, he found every interest in the country prosperous; when he departed, he left every interest at its lowest ebb. In the first era, our systems of policy had been matured, and were in wholesome exercise; agriculture, commerce, and manufactures were all thriving; the currency was of unexampled soundness and value; the revenues were gradually increasing; the debt was provided for; the improvements in the surface of the country were advancing at a steady and wholesome pace; the Government was economical, and its foreign relations upon the most secure and honorable footing. I will not attempt to contrast that state of the nation with the present; I will only say that General Jackson, reversing the boast of the Roman Emperor, might have exclaimed, at his departure from the capital, "I found Rome marbled, and I have left it brick."

Still, sir, I desire to do the late President justice in one particular in which I might be misapprehended. In the management of the foreign affairs of this Government, I am prepared to pay a tribute of praise to his energy. In that branch of the public concerns, he is entitled to all the applause he has ever received. The very qualities of character which rendered him dangerous at home, furnished him the means of success in the disposal of our affairs abroad. That imperious temper which despised the limits of republican rule, admirably fitted him to cope with monarchs, and transused into his foreign negotiations the vigor that crowned them with success.

In the hasty glance, Mr. Chairman, which I have taken of the principles and policy of the last Presidency, my aim has been to bring to the contemplation of the committee the singularly unhappy auspices under which the existing Chief Magistrate came into power. It was the great misfortune of Mr. Van Buren to succeed to a dilapidated inheritance; and that misfortune was most fatally aggravated by the extraordinary illusion of national prosperity which, at the moment of the departure of his predecessor, and of his own accession, haunted and bewildered the imagination of both. Sir, I have seldom read in history of such remarkable self-deception, such wonderful blindness to the signs of approaching disaster, as at that moment characterized the two illustrious individuals to whom I have alluded. Permit me, sir, to read the parting words of General Jackson, on the 3d of March, 1837, and the greeting declaration of Mr. Van Buren on the following day:

"My life has been a long one, and I cannot hope that it has, at all times, been free of errors. But I have the consolation of knowing, that if mistakes have been committed, they have not seriously injured the country I so anxiously endeavored to serve; and, at the moment when I surrender my last public trust, I leave this great people prosperous and happy."—Farewell Address.

On the 4th of March the successor spoke in this strain:

"Abroad we enjoy the respect, and, with scarcely an exception, the friendship of every nation. At home, while our Government quietly but efficiently performs the sole legitimate end of political institutions, in doing the greatest good to the greatest number, we present an aggregate of human prosperity surely not elsewhere to be found."—Inaugural of Mr. Van Buren.

Sir, at the very moment when these self-gratulating gentlemen were vaunting, in such proud phrase, of the nation's happiness, the deep thunder of the coming earthquake was already muttering beneath their feet. The retiring chief had scarcely reached the Hermitage, the complacent successor had scarcely been domesticated under the roof of the palace, before the great doom broke over the land, and scattered dismay from our remotest confine to the center. The President saw every vestige of the illusion vanish in an instant, and that couch of roses, upon which he had so confidently hoped to lie down, became a bed of thorns. Amidst the crash of the currency, the insolvency of the Government, and the general distress and wailing of the people, almost his first act of authority was to summon Congress to his aid. They came here, sir, but to bear testimony to the wide-spread havoc of the storm. The President met them in humbleness of heart, in grief and dismay; he implored a hand to help; he sought consolation where there was none to be found—upon the bosom of his party. The party had lost its power.

Fresh difficulties have thickened around him at every stage of his progress from that day. In the south the Indian war has been but a series of disasters. We have been baffled, exhausted, beaten, by a handful of savages. On the northern frontier our weakness has become a by-word of contempt. This great Republic, in the hands of its present rulers, is not even able to preserve its neutrality in the domestic rebellion of a Power with whom we profess to hold the most friendly relations; and we are obliged to confess our inability to restrain the armaments of our own citizens, which are directed against a neighbor's peace. Yes, sir, even to submit to the humiliation of having our own territory visited, our vessels seized, and our citizens slaughtered in our own harbor, by that neighbor Power, on the plea of weakness to enforce our laws.

In the embarrassments which have been brought upon our fiscal affairs, in the prostration of the agricultural, the mercantile, and the manufacturing prosperity of the country, the Administration has been able to suggest no adequate relief. We struggle along upon expedients. The visinsita of the nation, its intrinsic vigor, which not even misgovernment has been able totally to crush, has, by slow degrees, begun to revive the prosperity of the land; but the Government has done nothing. Whatever might be expected from the patriotism, the virtue, the intelligence of the people, they have nobly realized; whatever has been left to the Government has languished and faded in its hands. The guardians of the Treasury have fallen asleep; felonies, unmatched in enormity, have been detected in the innermost shrine of the temple; the very priests have robbed the altar; the nation has but extricated itself from one debt to create another; the finances are in confusion; the revenue inadequate to the expenditure; our hard-money Government has fallen into a paper-manufacturing Government; our rulers are at their wit's end; all around are the signs of their doom, the warnings of their downfall. The truth stands confessed—it is felt in every department of the public affairs—that the President and his friends are incompetent to the crisis; THEY WANT ABILITY.

Turn, sir, to the Executive mansion, and inquire what they are who at this moment guide the fortunes of this land. An easy, indolent, luxurious chief presides over a Cabinet, of which it would be flattery to say that it was a mere personation of feebleness. To the members of that Cabinet, personally, sir, so far as a very limited acquaintance may warrant, I am willing to accord all consideration and respect. I speak of them here as a public body. A more diversified compound of dulness, inaptitude, and ignorance of official duty; a greater lack of energy; a more sorely perplexed, bewildered, and dismayed association of State counselors were never, perhaps, exhibited around a council-table than may, at this present juncture, be seen in the daily anxious conferences of this precious Cabinet. Since the days of the merry monarch of England, and his hair-brained crony Rochester, never were the destinies of a great nation intrusted to more incompetent hands.

I might except from this censure, and do except, one who has the reputation of being a regular attendant at these council meetings—I doubt not the first to come and the last to depart—a person more notorious than distinguished, and yet, sir, boasting no small claim to distinction. I mean that man-of-all-work, whose marvelous exaltation from the kitchen up to the chamber nearest to the King is one of the most striking moral significations of the times. This, sir, is his administration. Whatever remainder of efficacy it has is his; whatever of shrewdness, of cohesion, of malice, or of mischief it has, belongs to him. By his sufferance does every member of that Cabinet hold his place—or did, sir, for I trust his influence is drawing to an end. Yea, even the placid and pliant chief himself has found his account in the good will of this Mephistophiles. He is the link between the past Administration and the present; the conduit-pipe by which the surplus popularity of the one is transfused into the waning circulation of the other; the ligament that still unites the small fortunes of the polished and pleasure-loving tenant of the palace to the more robust destiny of the grim and fearful lion that has his lair at the Hermitage.

But for this one informing spirit, yonder whole Cabinet array of impracticable, skillless, temporizing, expedient-mongering statesmen would, long before this, have floundered to the bottom of that pool of turbid party-waters in which they now struggle for respiration. The day, sir, is not remote when they and their guardian genius shall sink together in this oozy tide, and be remembered no more.

Mr. Chairman, I take some consolation in this melancholy view of the public affairs, from the conviction that the nation has been already driven by headstrong counsel, by weakness, and by passion, to that extreme from which it cannot but happen that the tide of Government shall flow back into a safer channel. Out of the very incompetency of our present rulers do I gather food for hope. There are already, sir, manifold signs of restoration. We cannot mistake them. We are on the backward march from Jacksonism. The footsteps were abandoned at the first stride. The great reaction has commenced, and we shall go on unraveling this web which, for ten years past, the chief functionaries of this Government have been so busily weaving around the Constitution.

It might have been foreseen—indeed, it was foreseen and predicted—that no successor could wear the republican crown of our great military President. The power which he accumulated it required his arm to wield. By one of more diminutive size, or smaller strength, it would be found a grievous burden. Mr. Van Buren was deceived, sir, not only in the computation of his own capacity, but in the nature and value of the boon which his nomination to the succession tendered to him. He little knew the estimate which the American people formed of him, when he imagined that he could occupy the station, or march in the path of General Jackson. There was no luster around his name to bewilder the gaze of the country, or to hallow an act of usurpation. He is the President by appointment, not by choice; and the career of his predecessor, sustained only by the force of unexampled personal popularity, could, in none of its dangerous leaps, be followed by one who derived no support from the affection of the people, nor aid from their ability. The consequence was inevitable that the present Administration must abandon the hope of imitating the last, and even retract the perilous errors, both of policy and of doctrine, into which that Administration had strayed. Accordingly, you shall find, Mr. Chairman, that it is even so.

First, in this backward movement, I would have you note that we have no arrogant messages from the White House. To the credit of our present Chief Magistrate, every one must acknowledge the mildness of tone, the diffidence, and the moderation of his official communication at the opening of the present session. It is, sir, strikingly, a message of recantation, and speaks in a temper of contrition, as if its author had felt the chastening of affliction. But fifteen months ago, at the extra session, the President had declared the constitutional incapacity of the Government to aid commercial operations; now, he boasts of the Government agency in restoring the commercial action, and very undeservedly, in my opinion, claims credit for it.

Until lately the Administration was clamorous for a total divorce of the banks from the Government: here, in this paper, is a warm encomium on the banks, and an avowal of the useful conditions on which they may be connected with the public concerns:

"Like other State establishments, they may be used or not in conducting the affairs of the Government, as public policy and the general interests of the Union may seem to require."

"When the Government can accomplish a financial operation better with the aid of the banks than without, it should be at liberty to seek that aid."—Message of December, 1838.

This message, too, casts aside the hackneyed phrase of the "constitutional currency," and adopts a much more rational term, "the constitutional standard of value"—a substitution of great significance and omen for the reflection of those who have heretofore identified the notion of Jacksonism with a metallic currency.

It is true the message again recommends, though faintly and with shyness, that ill-fated and unlucky sub-Treasury bill. Alas, sir, there was nothing else left! Out of the very barrenness of the soil does it come. The evil genius of the President once persuaded him to write a letter to a member of this House, [Mr. SHERRARD WILLIAMS.] It was done in the days of his vain-glory. That letter pledges him, as by a vow, against the only permanent relief to the currency of the nation which the times demand, and he has not yet (though I predict it will not be very long before he does so) taken heart to break the spell. In the mean time, this shadowy specter of a sub-Treasury—the felon bill it may be more aptly called—rises up, not to gain the favor, but to divert the thoughts of the country.

The second step in the reaction to which I have alluded is, the abandonment of that whole scheme, so famous in the annals of the last Presidency—of Executive responsibility.

Sir, the unity of the Executive has dissipated into thin air. Instead of being a unit, it is multi-form—a polygon—a many-headed monster—and of more heads than arms—not Briareus, but Hydra. In this matter of the defalcations, Mr. Van Buren is no man for responsibility; neither is any of his Cabinet ready to maintain that ancient dogma of Jacksonism. Salve qui peut! is the motto of the day.

The President is no longer the representative of the people. He now supplicates Congress to take the responsibility for the future; entreats them to appoint committees to watch the Treasury rogues; he prays the Legislature to inspect the Executive? He implores the representatives of the nation to help him—a weak and humble minister of their laws. Hear him:

"I submit to your consideration whether a committee of Congress might not be profitably employed in inspecting, at such intervals as might be deemed proper, the affairs and accounts of officers intrusted with the custody of the public moneys. The frequent performance of this duty might be made obligatory on the committee, in respect to those officers who have large sums in their possession, and left discretionary in respect to others. They might report to the Executive such defalcations as were found to exist, with a view to prompt removal from office, unless the default was satisfactorily accounted for."—Message of December, 1838.

Then, sir, we have no more lecturing on the hard-money dogma. We have come back to the toleration of paper; nay, sir, we have become ultra in this paper-mongering. The President is the patron of free banking. His confidential friend on this floor, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] at the last session gave us a panegyric on the conservative property of that great system. The Government is in close alliance with the monster. The lion and the lamb have laid down together, and the Treasury is now the chief fountain of the despised rag-money. Even the much-talked-of increase of the specie basis has fallen into oblivion. Not a word in its favor has been uttered at the present session. The message upon it is dumb.

These are all changes of high import; they are the visible and conspicuous signs of reaction. Sir, in the name of the country, I thank Mr. Van Buren for these tokens of repentance—for even this late surrender of Jacksonism! Phaeton has thrown up the reins!

Mr. Chairman, it will be observed that, as the Administration deserts its former test-principles and measures, it is busy to frame new devices for party association. Political management has, very recently, entered a fresh field. We have had most suddenly conjured up abolition for the Whigs, and the defense of slavery for "the party." The Whigs, sir, have been sagaciously attempted to be identified, by the Administration press, with that unhappy northern excitement against slavery which, until the commencement of the present session, no man was so blind as not to perceive had pursued its career without the slightest connection with parties; which, until then, too, sir, no man was so unprincipled as to assert had sought the aid of a special political alliance with friend or foe of the Administration. Sir, it is curious to note the slippery equivocation, the distortion, the desperate legerdemain of deception, of the official organ, "The Globe," on this subject.

Not even the ponderous momentum of falsehood, which long use and munificent Government support have given to that party machine; not even its practiced and subtle spirit of misrepresentation, is competent to cast an air of plausibility over this shallow trick. It is the flimsiest, the baldest invention that ever came from the cudgeled brains of "your scurvy politician." What honest man can look at the elections which have recently taken place in the North and West, and acquaint himself with the sentiments of the several candidates on this abolition question, and then say, as the Globe has said, that no Democrat (as that truthful paper styles its friends) is found an Abolitionist? How tolerant is "the organ" and its patrons of the eccentricities of "the Democrats" on this subject! How kindly does it digest the ultra anti-slavery indignation of Messrs. Morton and Rantoul, and Alexander Everett and Bancroft, in the North; of Messrs. Morris and Tappan, and the member from Cincinnati, in the West!

Sir, it needs no ghost to make us acquainted with the paternity and drift of this plot. In the sub-Treasury bill of this session—if the party should have courage to take it up—it is well understood that no specie clause may hope for the favor of the House; that, sir, is to be abandoned perforce. The Administration cannot limp along with such a burden on the bill. Now, sir, a certain great oracle has declared that this sub-Treasury scheme, without the specie clause, is a mere farce. Upon the faith of that clause alone rested, until now, the fealty of a suddenly-converted State to the Administration. Strike it out, sir, and what holds South Carolina to the worship of her strange gods? What but this pretext of the alliance of the Whigs with the Abolitionists? For then once it was found expedient that the northern man should be imbued with southern principles; the institutions of the South were to be declared in danger from the Whigs; great apprehensions were to be awakened amongst the southern people. All this, sir, was the shabby invention in which was to be found motive for the fabrication of a new bond of union between the disappointed specie-clause-sub-Treasurites and the Administration. Then, another northern man, with southern principles, was to be manufactured out of a New Hampshire Representative; and he and his comrades were to sacrifice their abolitionism on the altar of their party, and come to the rescue. There, sir, is the whole play! It has been acted out exactly as it was set down. The resolutions against the slavery petitions have been offered by the North, and South Carolina is bound in eternal gratitude to this Administration! The farce was gravely and discreetly rehearsed, and is hereafter to be played again before the nation. I commend to the actor's in this entertainment Nio Bottom's advice:

"Masters, you ought to consider with yourselves. To bring in (God shield us!) a lion amongst ladies is a most dreadful thing; for, there is not a more fearful wild fowl than your lion living, and we ought to look to it."

There is but one expedient, sir, left to us Whigs in the sad dilemma, which the alarms of our southern friends may bring us into—when this lion comes upon the stage, we shall follow the honest weaver's counsel, and "name his name, and say, plainly, he is no lion, but Snug, the joiner."

After all, I do not fear much from this formidable plot. Let the southern leader wind his horn and summon his lieges to this enterprise! Let him lead the van, if it please him, now. I predict it will not be long before he will find himself in the condition of that unlucky corps of dragoons who, after the battle of the Boyne, were summoned before the inspector—a summons that was truly answered by "Here I am, your honor"—a single man being all that had survived.

It was another trick of party, Mr. Chairman, when the cohesion of the friends of the Administration began to give way, to seek for some new name by which the forces might be rallied. The characteristic principles and measures of the party having become distasteful to the nation, it was in the emergency of self-preservation that it looked around for some appellation which might be substituted in the place of a meritorious but unattainable distinction. Until the moment of General Jackson's retirement, the party was his party. It followed him through all his fancies—liked what he liked—opposed what he opposed. It was personal to him, and derived its strength from his popularity. When he withdrew, it, of necessity, was destined soon to lose its character as a Jackson party—although that name, even yet, has magic in it to rally its myrmidons; many a vote is yet given for no better reason than that the hickory tree is engraved upon the ballot. Still, sir, with the departure of General Jackson to private life, the Jackson party was destined to decay. There could be no Van Buren party. That never was a name to conjure with.

It was, therefore, deemed a lucky thought when some central conclave of political managers resolved to change the badge from Jackson to "the Democracy." I will not dispute their right to the name; all the world knows how little signification, as indicative of principles, it carries with it. No man can be deceived out of the knowledge that those who profess now to be the "exclusive Democrats" have veered round the whole compass of opinion, and alternately vindicated and vilified every prominent measure of policy which the last ten years have brought into view. No man can be blind to the fact that the standard tenet of this new-hatched Democracy is to go for the greatest share of spoil to the greatest number of persons, and to render fealty to the party for a consideration. No man can affect to believe that conscientious opinion, as to the country's good, forms any element in the organization of the array. I advert to it only to express my conviction that the name has been chosen with a singular disregard to the feelings of some of its principal leaders. I can point out individuals in those ranks who, but a few years gone by, would not have more promptly resented any insult than to be called "a Democrat." And I can show, too, (in my own State especially,) a phalanx of ardent friends of the ruling power—prime, accredited leaders of the faithful—who even yet have not overcome an involuntary habit of wincing at the name. And although such friends may, in time, perhaps be able to avow their new distinction without a blush, I think they may scarcely be brought, by the force of discipline, to do that necessary service which the name exacts—of proscribing and denouncing an opponent as a "Federalist."

Mr. Chairman, I care not for these new tactics of the adversary. I think, sir, the public affairs have fallen into that condition in which no stratagem can have power to avert the reckoning which the people will exact from their governors. The people, however much they may have been imposed on and betrayed, can have no sentiments hostile to the good of the country. They are neither office-holders nor office-seekers. Their interests all look to the establishment of order, security, and honest administration. Their aim is the honor and happiness of the nation; and if their exertions do not promote these ends, it is only because they are not permitted to know the truth regarding the past conduct or future designs of their servants. I feel assured that, let the men in power assume what name they may, the virtue, good sense, and keen sight of the nation will not be imposed upon by these motley creeds of the day, even though those who profess them assume a title once honored in the public affections. Charlatanism is fast flying before the public rebuke, and is dropping its garments, one by one, in its flight. Sound opinion, rendered more vigorous from its long sleep, and more eager to do its duty from a consciousness of having been imposed on, is rousing up to its appropriate office. It is going forth to gather the people for the holy warfare, devoted to the purification of the national halls, and the restitution of our ancient honor. In the tide of that warfare "like reeds before the tempest's frown," we shall see this host of spurious statesmen, and abject followers, and spoil-seeking patriots, laid low. When that consummation is won, the nation will rejoice with an exceeding joy. The oldest man amongst us, sir, may yet live to take his part in that jubilee.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I will say but a few words. Whether the late Administration existed for good or for evil, is a problem that is soon to be determined. Never has popular government been subjected to a severer test. We have gone through the proof ordeal; it may not recur again in a century—perhaps, forever. We may rejoice, sir, that the nation survives that shock—not only survives, but that a healthful reaction is in progress, which must ultimately establish, on the secure foundation, the liberty derived from the forms of our social alliance.

In the last ten years, we have seen the republican principle driven into the confines of actual despotism; the aggregate power of the people has been made subservient to the accomplishment of individual will; the Constitution, under plausible pretexts, has been superseded by a law more congenial to the purposes of party arrangement; its landmarks have been transcended, its precepts disobeyed, for the sake of achieving the purposes of the day. Many of our institutions have been assailed, some of the most valuable battered down, and all disparaged in the popular esteem. Yet still the tempest has passed over; and, in the revival of the shattered prosperity of the land, the nation hastens back to its primitive republican doctrines with an earnestness and a zeal that assure us we shall, at least, turn our chastisement to a righteous use. The cause of free government has gained strength by the aberrations into which it has been betrayed. Contrition is the parent of amendment, and past suffering the source of future security. To my view, the return to sound principles, the reaction of the integrity of the nation, is certain in its march, and presents a most grateful exhibition of the innate strength of our people. May it go on, sir, until it restore all that we have lost in our late conflicts with power, and place this nation upon that eminence where all may see her, the first and best assured among the free communities of the world.
